We took the B. & O. for Washington. This is the road that evidently originated the expression, "Get onto its curves." The train was a special for the Governor of Wisconsin and his staff, to which our car was attached. Snow fell as we sped along, making a very beautiful picture, and the journey was pleasantly ended. In the evening we went to the Columbia Theatre. It was the opening night of the Bostonians in The Serenade, a comic opera by Herbert and Smith. In plot, very much after Nanon. Cowles has a song in the beginning of each act evidently written for him, which brings back memories of his singing of "The Old Cross Bow." Alice Neilson is still with them, and has been given a part of as much importance as that of Jessie Bartlett Davis. She hasn't limbered up a bit yet, but her singing has improved wonderfully.

Speaking of the beautiful snow, we have had a great deal of comfort out of it. You know when we started, William Wolff sent me a case of Moët & Chandon; I placed a few bottles in the grip. The cars were very warm, and when our throats were parched, I would fill a paper bag with snow and pack a small bottle therein, and it was soon frappé and delicious. Theu a glass of snow with a little Crème de Menthe makes a good pousse café.

This is Friday—after the ball—after the inauguration—after the procession—after the fireworks; and they were all so complete, so perfect, so magnificent, that nothing but rest and seclusion for a few hours will satisfy my whirling brain. At least 500,000 people watched the parade, which was five miles long and had 25,000 in line, made up of soldiers and political clubs from all over the country, excepting only California. Even Oregon was represented, rather painfully and lamely, it is true, but still represented; for while all the other States had from 50 to 500 in line Oregon was conspicuous by having only a banner with the name emblazoned on it, and that banner carried by Max Pracht. I think he is the same Max who was with Neville & Co., some years ago. As I drive around Washington I can't help thinking that if we could take up a subscription and use it to send a train load of politicians, supervisors, stump-speakers and silurians here and turn them loose for a week or so, enough enthusiasm might be generated so that on their return home they would work up San Francisco into imitating a city. The comfort of good streets and police discipline is only appreciated when you can have the contrast to our own.

AT THE RACES.

THE Ingleside meeting closed on Saturday and Oakland began its two weeks' meeting on Monday last. There has not been much class to the racing of late, owing to the bad weather, the best horses waiting for better conditions and a better track. The Crocker stakes at Ingleside were won by Burns and Waterhouse entry, Miss Rowena. Out of 670 races run, up to date, the favorites have captured 321; second choices, 168; and outsiders 181. California owners have won seven-tenths of the money offered in purses and stakes by the two associations.

Vol. LIV.

SAN FRANCISCO, MARCH 20, 1897.

Number 12.

Printed and Published every Saturday by the proprietor, FRED MARRIOTT
 54 1/2 Kvarny street, San Francisco. Entered at San Francisco Postoffice as Second-class Matter.

The office of the NEWS LETTER in New York City is at Temple Court;
 and at Chicago, 303 Boyce Building, (Frank E Morrison, Eastern Representative), where information may be obtained regarding subscription and advertising rates.

THE Carpenters' Union has induced the Supervisors to prevent policemen in future from doing any carpenter work on city buildings or repairs. The carpenters are to be congratulated, but what are the police to do for exercise?

THE catching of two solicitors for private street paving jobs, who had been making unfair representations in order to secure contracts, should go far toward breaking up a very pernicious method of doing this sort of work. There is opportunity for substantial reforms in these contracts, and the Board should squeeze all the light out of the Eureka street discovery that is possible.

LOS ANGELES orange growers are awaking to the fact that the alert Eastern trade is reaping where it hath not sown—in other words, is labeling Valencia and other foreign oranges "California." They should follow the example of the San Francisco Fruit Exchange, and vigorously prosecute the offenders. A few convictions would act as a wonderful moral stimulant upon the filchers of California thunder and coin.

THE Merchants' Association and Manufacturers and Producers' Association are discussing means of effectually stopping the sale of impure food in San Francisco. The road is plain: Simply continue sampling goods offered for sale, and follow the analysis by the widest publication of the brands and their manufacturers, and the firms who handle the impure articles. That will stop it. Publicity gentlemen; publicity is your cure. Discovery means death.

H. J. BUCKLEY, who lives near Gridley, this State, has sold his first carload of California hemp to Barbour Bros., of Patterson, N. J. The price obtained was five cents per pound, which netted the grower $60 per ton. He will this year cultivate six hundred acres of hemp, and his profits will be large. This is an infant industry in California, and like the production of beet sugar, is capable of great expansion, and should become a source of wealth.

PRESIDENT McKinley has determined to send representatives to Europe to work for an international monetary conference. This is to be done under a recently passed law giving the President the power to appoint three or more commissioners to visit European countries and open negotiations and pave the way for concerted movement favoring the restoration of the white metal. Only by a concert of this kind can the hope of the silverites in this country ever be realized.

REV. DR. MUNHALL, at a ministers' meeting last Monday, declared that San Francisco was the "most wicked city I was ever in." "This city," proceeded the eminent divine, "is reeking with sin." Possibly the Rev. Dr. Munhall is unacquainted with the reeking condition of some of the brethren recently here and still remaining. We have no record of such "reeking sin" as was exposed scarce one year ago upon the part of a clergyman; and many of the ministers and deacons without hesitation endorsed their fellow laborer and his moral leprosy. Rev. Munhall should refresh his memory or shut his mouth.

SENATOR FRYE, of Maine, is fighting the civil service law, and believes in curtailing its operations. Frye belongs to that host of Republican stalwarts who think that civil service rules are of value only when the appointments under them can be made by a Republican administration. That President Cleveland should have rescinded thousands of positions from the demoralizing uncertainty of the spoilsman and placed them upon a healthy civil service basis, is wormwood to the hungry successors of his party in national office. Hence this virtuous outburst of the Senator from Maine.

THE rest of the State is being pitted as usual against San Francisco, and the old game of taxing the people of this city for the benefit of the interior is being played for all it is worth. The latest illustration of this piratical custom is found in bill 902, providing for a commission which shall have power to expend $300,000 per annum on the construction of State roads. All roads in California lead to San Francisco, and San Francisco is quite willing to help pay for their building, but seriously objects to the payment of two-thirds their cost, while being as far as possible deprived of their benefits.

A HOT fight is being made against H. G. Otis, proprietor of the Los Angeles Times, who is pressing his claims for Assistant Secretary of War. Otis publishes a paper with opinionous, has long been noted for his bitter and sometimes unjust pen, and being a man of rather crabbed, unloveable personality, has raised up legions of enemies. As it is the California rule for the candidate for any office within the gift of the President to become the target for every other man in the State the moment there appears the ghost of a show for his getting it, Otis should be neither dismayed nor surprised. He is a man of ability—positive on every proposition, public or private, and a good fighter.

MORE than fifteen hundred men are registered for employment on the boulevard. It is noted without surprise that the union of the unemployed has adopted resolutions denouncing the generous promoters of the boulevard plan for helping the needy. The union is indignant because the men are not to be paid more than one dollar per day. It is such stupidity as this that does great harm to the deserving destitute. The mere fact that the funds raised are for the especial purpose of saving honest men and their families from actual want, and that business of all kinds is very dull do not penetrate the dull brains of the agitators. A man who declines to work for the wage offered will be very likely to tickle his backbone with his belly before he finds better pickings.

MARIN County is employing the convicts of San Quentin in building a system of boulevards about that side of the bay. The cost to the county is confined to the paying of the guards. There is in this work a very practical hint for other counties throughout California. There are prisoners confined in all the jails who are a great bill of expense to the tax-payers. These felons are passing their days in agreeable idleness; they care little for imprisonment, but dread work more than death. They should be employed in building county roads. If a general system were once mapped out, their work would in a short time make a material improvement in country highways. The taxpayers would get partial returns, at least, on their money, and the prisoners would receive the most complete punishment possible for their crimes. Employed in this way, convict and prison labor would not interfere with private enterprise nor displace unskilled labor.

THE MOST NEEDED CANAL AND WHAT IT WOULD DO.

THE Nicaragua Canal would be a good thing, and especially so to California. But the proposed Canal to give a deep water way from the great lakes to the Atlantic, would immediately give the greater good to the greater number. We have before us the very interesting report of the United States Deep Waterways Commission very recently filed at Washington. This is the commission of which Judge Cooley of Illinois, James B. Augel of Michigan and John E. Russell of Massachusetts were members, and who were authorized to meet a like Canadian Commission, to investigate the whole subject matter. The report contains a prodigious amount of information, yet is clear, terse and convincing as to a canal system connecting the great Lakes and the ocean which it favors. The navigable lakes have Coast lines of 3,075 miles within U. S. Territory, they border upon nine of our States, which have one third of our total population, and upon their harbors are six cities having an aggregate population of 3,000,000. The inland commerce of the United States on the Lakes has already been marvelously developed. The amount of tonnage passing through the St. Mary's Falls Canal increased from 1,035,937 tons in 1885 to 17,000,000 in 1896. In 1894 the Suez Canal passed a total tonnage of only 8,000. In 1889, seven years ago, the traffic passing through the Detroit River was three times greater than the foreign trade of New York; it exceeded by 10,000,000 tons the aggregate foreign trade of all the Seaports of the United States, and was 3,000 tons more than the foreign and coastwise trade of London and Liverpool. That this truly vast and rapidly increasing trade is more than justification for the necessary Canal to get to tide water, goes without saying. The great difficulty is that this vast inland commerce is now bottled up. It cannot get to sea.

A cargo of wheat, of flour, or of iron, after reaching Buffalo by the water route, must reach the seaboard either by the railroad, or by the Erie canal. The increase of freights thus becomes a serious handicap to the American export trade and to America's power to enter foreign markets upon such terms as to insure her supremacy. It costs twice as much to carry a bag of flour from Duluth to New York as from New York to Europe, but open up deep water ways, and the steamer could load up at Duluth and steam to Europe without a stop. The vexed question of freights would at once be solved, and the Northwest would at one stroke become really great. An exceeding strong point is made by the report in the matter of iron. The great discoveries of iron ore of a very high grade in the Lake Superior region, opens up an immense field of industry and of economical changes. It is now known that the Spanish deposits of iron which alone compare with those in the North West, and which are now depended upon mainly by England, for her iron and steel industries, will last scarcely more than ten years more, and there are none accessible in Europe to take their place. This condition points to a wonderful opportunity for the United States. With deep water to the Ocean, American ores could not only control absolutely the trade on the Atlantic coast against any possible competition, but could irresistibly invade the markets of Europe. As goes the iron trade so goes the trade of the world. The imagination sees great possibilities in the transference of the iron and steel trade to this country. It is bound to come. Even at this present time we are selling steel rails and iron bars in England cheaper than are the local producers. We are also fairly well competing in the matter of tin. A high tariff at this epoch will enhance prices, and may not now prove of benefit. The best protection would be a sailing path all the way from the point of production to the point of consumption. In good time this will come and then we shall marvel that we ever passed through such hard times as the recent past have been. Of course, California has special uses for the Nicaragua Canal. It will give us a much shorter sea route to the East and Europe, and that will be an incalculable advantage; at the same time it should be born in mind that it would give Europe and the East a nearer way to Australia, China, Japan, and the Hawaiian Islands, and to that extent injure California. The Lake Canal is of the first importance. It would open up a sea-carrying trade to the heart of our continent.

The President's First Message.

The President's first message is brief, as it could well afford to be, seeing that it is addressed to a single point. The tariff, the whole tariff and nothing but the tariff, fashioned on the McKinley model, is to be the one cry of Congress for this session. The measure is all cut and dried in the House of Representatives, and, as a dicker is understood to have been made with the Silver Republicans in the Senate to vote for it, the time needed to pass it into law should be exceptionally short. A return to McKinleyism, with higher taxes upon most everything we use from the cradle to the grave, is the outcome of the last election, and the result of the Democratic party being captured by the Bryans, Altgelds, and Tillmans of had and sad political fame. It was either McKinley or a fifty-cent dollar and the scaling down of all existing values. Both were evils, but the former was so much the lesser of the two that thinking men had practically no alternative but to accept it. That is how we are driven to the re-enactment of the McKinley tariff over again. The country could not have been carried on that twice condemned issue, had it not have become necessary to accept it in order to save the country's honor and safety. The capturing of the Chicago convention by the Southern and a few Western Populists, divided the Democratic party, and gave us McKinley as a necessity, and with him there very naturally comes all his name stands for, and that is not much. It is all told in his first brief message to Congress. The McKinley tariff over again and nothing else; not even so much as the promise of an appetizer with which to wash it down, is about the sole change to result from the new administration. Clevelandism will still make itself felt, and will go far to dominate the White House. The arbitration treaty will be ratified, Cuba will be given her way, and the United States will guarantee and ultimately pay the price of her liberty; Hawaii will change base, and with the new tariff on sugar, will no longer care for annexation, the United States troops will again be used, if any attempt in force be made to impede inter-State commerce, gold will continue to be the sole money of ultimate redemption, but under no conceivable circumstances will John Sherman give us a Venezuelan fulmination, and that, perhaps, is well; for the country's paramount need is peace abroad, as well as at home. In all, save the tariff, we have an administration that will endeavor to say "ditto to Mr. Cleveland," and for the rest will let things follow their own course. It is the certainty that this will be the future trend of political action, that enables the prediction to be made that ex-President Cleveland will soon regain his popularity. The people will see that his precedents are being followed, and will, in consequence, declare that "he was right after all!" and will do him justice. No section of our people, except the silver miners, desire political agitation at this time. They are weary of it. Else the new McKinley tariff would be wiped off the statute book two years hence. A great many things in the industrial and financial world have happened within the past four years. In the very important matters of iron and steel we are now underselling the English in their home markets. Under the Wilson tariff, the things we wear have undoubtedly been cheapened, the cost of living lessened, and the production of metals benefited in a corresponding degree. The new taxes on raw material will not help our remarkably enlarged export trade. Hence the last of McKinleyism will not have been heard of at this extra session.

The Coming President McKinley, in his inaugural, made Reciprocity. much of the intention of the administration to return to the Harrison policy of reciprocity. To that there is but one answer, yet it has the merit of being a very effective one: the thing simply cannot be done! The arrangements of the last Republican administration, in this connection, cannot be repeated, simply because there is nothing left to trade with. There is no longer a surplus, and no present possibility of producing one. The Harrison Administration, being engaged in reducing the revenue, could find plenty of trading material, and took sugar as the chiefest and best article for that purpose. The duties were removed from raw sugar coming from countries which desired to make equivalent tariff concessions to the United States. This brought Germany, Spain, and a few South American countries into the reciprocity arrangement, without, it should be added, benefiting us to any very appreciable extent. But the duties on sugar cannot now be spared, because of revenue needs. Moreover, if they could be spared, there would arise irresistible protectionist forces from the domestic cane and beet sugar industries. Any such proposition would arouse Louisiana, and even render California mad. These interests were before put off with a bounty. They refuse to be disposed of in that way now, and could not be if they were willing. The treasury has no money to pay out on bounties, and the Republican policy has had too much recent experience with bounties to try them again right away. The temper of the sugar interests was well indicated in the recent committee hearings. The beet men were tremendously in earnest in having things fixed the way they have been. Louisiana was out in full force, and Hawaii was there with all the accustomed diplomacy of her planters, and together they had no difficulty in bringing about a fixed duty of a cent a pound, that will assuredly not be given away to any foreigner reciprocally inclined. Where, then, is the reciprocity to come from? Something must be had to trade with. Wool cannot be used, because the duties upon it are being restored for protection purposes. Something might be made out of a fair arrangement with Canada, but it is needless to say that we are not that way inclined in her case. It is clear that the proposed reciprocity has nothing in it.

The Carson Disgrace Over. The prize fight between Fitzsimmons and Corbett is over, and about this time even the "sports," or most of them, are willing to concede that it had been better if it had never been begun. It was all right as long as they won their money, and among a great many Californians there was little fault to be found with it so long as a California boy was thought sure of whipping the other fellow. What honor or glory comes either to the State, or to its boys, from either winning or losing prize fights, surpasses comprehension. The whole business is conducted in fraud and ended in a degree of brutality that even the strongest cannot always withstand. Corbett, a perfect specimen of physical manhood as he is, received a blow from the effects of which he will never wholly recover, and whilst his opponent fared somewhat better, he will never again present the little wife, who so cheered him in the midst of the battle, with an osculatory salute with other than a split lip and a broken nose. It is hard to believe that any woman would care for that sort of thing, but then there is no telling what taste may be acquired by the association of even the "gentle" sex with the brutality of prize fighting. Mrs. Fitzsimmons witnessed the fight, used slang at the ring side like the rest, and finally kissed the victor, and covered her face and garments with the gore, the loss of which will render him more like a monkey than a man for the rest of his life. We can well believe that there was a time, since she became a woman, when Mrs. Fitzsimmons would have scouted the idea that she could possibly be a willing party to such a scene. But now, as ever, evil communications corrupt good manners. It has changed Corbett's. He will no longer be entitled to the honorable cognomen of "Gentleman Jim." He forfeited that when he broke through even the rough rules of the prize ring and began a rough and tumble assault upon the person who had just beaten him in fair fight. An institution that invariably changes men and women into such specimens of humanity as James J. Corbett and Mrs. Fitzsimmons are to-day, is an outrage, that the law should not permit, and that society should frown out of existence. We shall observe with some interest the course society leaders will take in regard to the visit of several of their set to the Carson prize ring. Will they let their children hear accounts of the fight from those friends? If not, then it is apparent that their homes need a better environment. Mr. Herman Oelrichs, who in his early days liked a friendly bout at his Club, said the right thing the other day that "he could neither see nor visit the encounter because of his obligations to society." That is how every gentleman ought to feel, whether he be influenced by New York, or by San Francisco. Corbett now claims that he was "knocked out" by a chance blow, that is, by a blow against which he had not guarded. Pshaw! What silly talk for an ex champion to engage in! He went into the ring to give blows, to stop them when he could, and to take them when he must. He was supposed to be, and loudly vaunted himself to be, the champion expert of the world at all those points. We dislike Fitzsimmons because of his brutal profession and have no desire to make a hero out of him, but, as lovers of fair play, we cannot help feeling a certain amount of satisfaction that he at last has come by his own. Hounded by his own fraternity, the sports, lied about by a large section of the press, jobbed out of everything he could be jobbed out of, victory snatched from him by such fellows as the Examiner man had selected for that purpose, he has beaten them all. He has now won some money, but not nearly as much as the public suppose. Let him hold on to it, and stick to his decision never to appear in the prize ring again. The jobbers, the cunningest set of them all are now at his heels, and are after his coin. Unless he promptly puts himself, and it, beyond their reach, the press will soon be recording the fact that "Bob Fitzsimmons is dead broke." That is the end that pugilism invariably leads to.

The Animal in Man. After a careful study of the remarkable scenes that transpired on Market street last Wednesday from 11 A. M. until 1 P. M. anywhere between the Phelan Building and the Palace Hotel, one is afresh forced to admit that there is in the human heart a clearly developed brutal instinct which delights in blood, and which can be whetted into startling activity whenever occasion may call it up. Between the two points named the street was literally packed with men from every walk of life, who intently gazed on the bulletin boards which announced the progress of the battle between Corbett and Fitzsimmons for the championship of the world and a large purse. Had the individual fortune of each one of the vast crowd, numbering tens of thousands, been trembling in the balance, there could have been evinced no more consuming interest in the result. The number of those who had risked money on the fight did not form a single drop in the bucket. The vast concourse of men, and a very considerable sprinkling of women, were there for no reason that could benefit them either directly or otherwise. The Presidential returns failed to bring out more than one-fourth the number of people who stood patiently for hours in the sun waiting to learn which one of two men several hundred miles away would yield to the superior skill of his antagonist. The crowd was not composed of rough characters. For average appearance and manners it was quite as respectable and intelligent as an equal number of persons likely to be found at a theatre, a lecture, or a political meeting. Not an element of hoodlumism was to be seen; more orderly people never assembled in this city out of doors; and when the result was finally announced, the cheering was as frantic as if a great event had taken place.

Yet the whole history of the prize-ring is unworthy, and its followers to a man are unfit associates for true women or men. Its whole trend and tenor is downward below the level of unthinking animals. It does not promote desirable physical culture, nor stimulate by so much as a hair's breadth wholesome manhood or healthy morals. From top to bottom it is utterly bad. Not one redeeming feature, not a single practical virtue, springs from the prize-ring or its environments. All these facts are known and doubtless acquiesced in by ninety per cent. of the entire population of San Francisco. Yet in the face of this knowledge and its practical individual acceptance, all classes were absorbed in the "manly" exhibition. It seems that this sort of temptation is hardest to resist. It is quickly aroused, and fattens by what it feeds upon, like rank weeds in rich soil, or wolves upon a stricken deer. The struggle of life itself, the frequent injustice of existence, the survival of the fittest through the generations have no doubt kept alive a disproportionate element of original savagery which, as we have seen, has not yielded to the humane and kindly influences of civilization. The atmosphere of the prize-ring is penetrating. A great majority of people seem to be peculiarly susceptible to its degrading influences. San Francisco has had too much of it; and we hope that the Supervisors will strongly set their faces against granting licenses in this city, for the sparring exhibitions, which are prize-fights without disguise.

The Grand Jury System.

They are greatly agitated over the Grand Jury system in Massachusetts, and not because of a decision in their own commonwealth. The popular interest has been aroused by a scathing arraignment of a Grand Jury by Judge Werner of Geneseo, N. Y., because of its failure to indict a defaulting ex-treasurer of that county. In discharging that Jury, the court said that "he was called upon in the name of the honest, law-abiding people of this fair county, to denounce and condemn a most flagrant prostitution of official power perpetrated within the very walls of this edifice, which for more than half a century had been dedicated to the administration of justice," and the judge went on to say that the evidence against the official in question was such that in failing to indict him the jury had "wantonly violated the dictates of conscience and the laws of this commonwealth." There is no evidence that this particular jury was bribed; the general belief is that the treasurer's personal popularity brought about his acquittal. Nevertheless, public opinion is so strong that it seems certain that the jury which has been so false to its trust may be indicted as a whole by the next similar body summoned. Massachusetts has taken the matter up as earnestly as if the evil action had taken place within her own domain, and her Legislature is wrestling with the problem as to how best reform the Grand Jury system. It is a hard nut to crack, which many have attempted, and in which most have failed. In San Francisco the system has been working better during the last two or three years than for a long time previously. The time was, when it was hardly possible to say one good thing of it. It was usually "put up" to influence partisan purposes, or to let a rascal with money have a chance to go free. But of late years there has been an appearance of sincerity about our Grand Juries that had long been lacking. Righteous ends have been accomplished, and good work has undoubtedly been done. The trouble with all Grand Juries is, that witnesses will not go before them and tell all they know. There has been too much inertness in disclosing crime, and too much sympathy with it when found hedeked in purple and fine linen or in official robes. Grand Juries are very much what District Attorneys enable them to be, and in this respect there has been a decided improvement of late. Buckley, Toohy, and Stonehill no longer, thank God! control the Grand Jury of this city and county. That was an awful period, the like of which it is to be devoutly prayed may never again visit this region.

Child Study In the Home.

Some of the mothers of San Francisco held a meeting last week at which they effected a permanent organization for the intelligent study of children in the home, and for the further purpose of bringing them into closer acquaintance psychologically and physiologically. At first blush this is certainly a novel project, and carries with it an implied neglect of maternal duties. It is, if justified, a most serious arraignment of the mothers of this city; but in many cases we are inclined to think the necessity of some invention for the purpose clearly exists. As society is constituted the study of the children at home is becoming an unknown quantity. In the residences of the wealthy the immediate care of little ones is frequently delegated to second hands. Social duties and exactions crowd out immediate and continuous contact between parents and children, and destroy, or rather prevent, the mutual understanding, warm sympathy and keen insight into the mental temperament of little ones, without which they cannot receive the best impulse to symmetrical development. The study of children has given place, in great measure, to the study of fashions and functions; and the momentary amusement of parents has absorbed the time that should be devoted to the right understanding and interpretation of child life. This applies to the wealthy everywhere. It is found in another and more objectionable form in the great majority of women who refuse to accept the highest duty of the conjugal relation. Many children in the homes of wealth are the exception, and hear out the fact that babies are not wanted.

In the case of poor people the care and study of children are left to the public school teachers—often to their credit be it said—through the stern decree of poverty and not from choice. In one case inclination, and in the other absence of ability, deprive the children of the careful training to which they are entitled. The new woman, while she is as distant from her sister of wealth and elegance as are the poles apart, throws her strident tone and assertive personality into the same balance. She seeks to attain conquest by the destruction of the sweetness and fragrance of home life; by speech-making, wearing trousers, and short hair. In her discordant clamor for recognition, her disdain for the sanctity of the true home, and her intolerable yearnings for new and impossible political, moral and domestic relations, she has no time to fritter away on her suffering and neglected offspring. Happily for the most part, she is "full of sound and fury, signifying nothing."

The organization of mothers for studying child life in the home, was not heralded by banners and hands; but it has a mission before it worthy of the respectful attention and the sympathetic co-operation of every woman who knows what the love and presence of children are. It claims a field that will repay every effort, in better men and better women, in more perfect life and greater usefulness.

Pure Food Crusade.

The first conviction in the struggle for pure food in San Francisco has been secured. The whole case was held down to two points—proofs that the article sold was impure; and that the grocer charged with having sold it, had done so. The facts of his knowledge of the character of the article, and his belief that it was as represented, were not permitted to be developed.

It is hard on merchants who honestly think they are selling pure food to suffer for their ignorance; but it looks as if the public can be protected in no other way. It would be impossible to reach the Eastern manufacturer, and manifestly absurd to permit the introduction of testimony showing that the dealer was innocent of knowledge of the quality of his goods. Any man who would knowingly sell impure food as a genuine article, would, without hesitation, swear that he thought it was pure; so that there could be neither possibility of separating the guilty from the innocent, nor hope of securing a conviction or protecting the public, if that question were to be raised. As it now stands the retailer must look to the jobber, and he to the manufacturer for protection or redress. That is a matter with which the consumer should have nothing to do. If the law is to be made effective, it will be necessary to adhere rigidly to the rule laid down by Judge Campbell. Confine the case to the two points of quality, and identity of the seller, and it will be an easy matter to secure a verdict. Men who are honest, and who have been deceived by the manufacturer, will take care that they be not caught napping a second time; and in order to sell his goods the manufacturer will be compelled to be square. The crusade, now that it is begun, should be pushed vigorously and with fairness toward both the merchants and the public.

Ex-Senator Ingalls.

Expressions of surprise are heard that John James Ingalls would permit himself to become the special correspondent of the new journalism, accepting a detail to report a prize-fight in Nevada. John James Ingalls, ex-Senator, "statesman," and political recalcitrant, repudiated by the people of his State, sees no more impropriety in becoming a reporter and interviewing prize-fighters for a few dollars, than he did several years ago in becoming a traitor to the party to which he owed everything, the moment he thought there was anything in it for himself. Ingalls showed the quality of his mental fibre when he joined the Populists, and tried to crawl into power again through the aid of those bespat upon but a short time before. He is quite at home interviewing Corbett and Fitzsimmons, and is as unconscious of the personal contempt felt for him and his acts, as if he were a simple-minded Plute. Concentrated selfishness and consuming vanity are the chief characteristics of Ingalls, and he would gladly referee a dog-fight if the animals were of sufficient pedigree to arouse general attention. An ex-United States Senator, a man who has posed as a statesman, becoming a prize-ring reporter is something of an innovation in a country of surprises. Ingalls has set a new mark for all broken-down politicians who are without influence or position at home, who have neither respect for former associations nor hopes of future honorable elevation.

The Unemployed. During every winter, for years past, there has been a large class of unemployed in this city. They are a difficult set to deal with. Some of them would rather undergo hardships in the city than live on the fat of the lamb in the country. If they cannot immediately get work in the city, they will wait and live on their wits until they can. All this, whilst there are farmers and orchardists willing to supply work at remunerative rates, to more men than our benevolent committees are feeding. We know of an orchardist who three years ago visited San Francisco, and was pained at the sight of so many men seeking soup tickets. He agreed to take two of them home with him at a monthly wage of $20 and board. Their month was up the day before Christmas, when they went to the orchardist, demanded their month's pay on the spot, and gave as a reason that they desired to go to San Francisco to spend the holidays. They had a permanent job and were not bossed, yet they must needs return to city bumdom, and become members of the unemployed. It is not to be wondered that their places were gladly filled by Japanese who are reliable in every way, and who will not leave your cow and buggy horses to roam at large because their keepers want to go on the rampage. We, however, subscribe to the doctrine that "a man who wants to do a dollar's worth of work for a dollar, ought to find it"—not necessarily in the city, but wherever labor will do the most good. San Francisco has not heretofore received value in labor for the money it has distributed among the needy. Anything for the industrious, but nothing but an opportunity for the idle.

The Collapse Of A. P. A. ism. Now that A. P. A. ism is in a condition of utter collapse, it is due to the truth of history to say that the NEWS LETTER was exposing its purposes and its men a full year before Father Yorke undertook the work for which he proved so well equipped. From the very beginning this paper said that if it approved of the purposes of the A. P. A., which it never did, it would still be opposed to any political organization, ruled by such non-descripts and rascals as then constituted the inner circle of that diabolical institution. We cared very little about A. P. A. ism, but did not believe it necessary in this country, and felt satisfied that it would disturb and anger a strangely mixed population that, at the time, was at peace within itself. But we did care about even religious bigots being deluded, for money making purposes, by a worthless set of banditti. We marvelled that such worthless fellows could come to the front in any American organization, and said so in our usual forcible way. In the fullness of time the Monitor took the movement in hand, killed it, and is now belaboring its dead carcass as assiduously as when it was a live lion. At one time it threatened to become a political power. A. P. A. ism is dead, and will know no resurrection if the Monitor will let it stay dead. It is just possible to write it into life again.

A Brave Supervisor. Whatever may be the fate of his measure, Supervisor Rottanzi is entitled to the admiring and enthusiastic thanks of all men who attend places of amusement in this city. Rottanzi is a bold man, and a friend of his brother sufferers. He has introduced a resolution in the Board of Supervisors declaring that women who wear hats at the theatres shall uncover during the performances, under pain of arrest and fine, or imprisonment; and that the proprietors of the theatres shall suffer by fine or imprisonment, or both, if they permit any women to wear hats during the play. The vast array of martyrs who have often and with deliberate cruelty been effaced by the opera or theatre hat, will offer up fervent prayer for Rottanzi and his resolution. Not one of the Supervisor's constituents lives who has not suffered absolute eclipse by the deadly high hat of the lady just in front of him at the theatre. This high hat has much to answer for. To its gloomy and dejecting obscurity may be attributed the frequent retreat of men between the acts. They require artificial reinforcements for the harrowing struggle of the evening; and it is a naked truth and solemn duty to charge the theatre hat with drunkards' graves, as well as withered pocket books. The rear view of a forest of waving plumes, extended wings, and air-spearling aigrettes, frilled with twinkling nobs—make up a sort of fantastic feminine nightmare more terrible than delirium tremens. Supervisor Rottanzi's painful experience at the French opera this week, where he suffered total eclipse for three mortal hours, resulted in this fight for freedom. The high hat gored the wrong ox for once. Now, if other Supervisors will do their duty and set their faces as flint against the pathetic protests of their female friends and relatives, the high, the broad, and the deep hat will go. On the street it is a vision of loveliness, a thing of joy, a poem of color-combination; at the opera it is a fruitful source of profanity, a friend of the bar, an instrument of torture. Long live Rottanzi: may his resolution be made law.

"We obey no wand but pleasure's."—Tom Moore.

IT does not require a Reyer Society or any organization of music pushers to work the average public up to a decent appreciation of Sigurd—if I may so judge from the average public which met this opera for the first time at the California Theatre Tuesday night. It took a society nine thousand strong, I believe, to start Wagner on his innovating career in New York. Sigurd was accomplished Tuesday night by the sole efforts of a press agent and a performance. We were told that the opera was "Reyer's masterpiece," and that it had rent New Orleans into tatters of joy. I have my own opinion about New Orleans as an art center; it is the place where Louis James secures brilliant premieres for his new plays. Marmion, Spartacus, My Lord and Some Ladies and Mr. James were all roof-high successes in New Orleans. And opera is not such a big jump from the drama. So I read my libretto calmly early in the day, and bar the advantage of sitting near a gentleman of France who had heard Sigurd several times abroad and once in New Orleans, and who assured me often that it was "great! amazingly great!" I came as near to being an impartial auditor as man can. I found not the slightest difficulty in appreciating three out of the four acts of Reyer's romantic music-drama, and I doubtless would have had a good time during the act I could not follow (the first) if half the audience had lingered less over its dinner.

It is possible that the long-haired worshippers of the divine and mystic Richard will find Sigurd too easy a game—if the opera ever should be honored by a New York production. But we of the belated West, whose ears are still attuned to the lesser harmony of Beethoven, Bach, Sousa and Italian opera, get color, scope and refreshment from this musicianly feast—even though our wrapt-eyed friends tell us we are merely taking a soft solution of Wagner in French capsules. I have never seen the score of Sigurd, and it is impossible for me to write of the motives of "Sigurd the Fearless," or "Sigurd the Impetuous," or "Brunehild the Passionate," or "Hilda the Jealous," or "Gunther the Craven" without publishing myself a hypocrite and imposter. There are moving motives in the opera—my trusty ears marked most of their introductions and repetitions; but I have nothing except the memory of my ravished auditory nerves to measure them by. The incantation of the High Priest to Freia, the Goddess of Love, haunts me still with its vast awesome grandeur; my glad astonishment is still glad over the eight bars (I think it is eight bars, but I will not swear) of ripping waltz that leaps into Sigurd's vow to keep his vizer and passions down when he delivers Brunehild; the superb sway of Gunther's song when he first sees the sleeping Brunehild, and the lyric fervor of their duo at the close of this same scene are to me a revelation of the musical goods that have been made in France; and the united song of Brunehild and Sigurd in the last act, as Sigurd goes to seek the treacherous Gunther, is a hurst of melodic sensationalism that is simply fabulous. If you were with us Tuesday night you will know what I mean and realize how much I have left unsaid; if you were not, lend your ears to the next performance—Sigurd will be repeated later in the season, I understand—and see how small are my adjectives and eulogy.

No; Reyer is not a Wagner—there is but one Wagner (just as there is but one Shakespeare) who would have dared to crowd his genius so hard—Reyer is a Wagnerette. He recalls those thoughtless moments of the Great German wherein he wrote such untangled verse as Tannhauser, Lohengrin and The Flying Dutchman. Withal he never stoops to the old scheme of aria, duo, trio and quartette, with encore space between (as in opera as she once was wrote) he takes no chances with the "endless theme." It is a wise composer who knows how little he is, and Reyer has made Sigurd quite detachable and melo-romantic and even popular in the blend of German dramatisms and French tact. He knows the pomp of brass, and he knows the seduction of reeds and strings. I cannot imagine a less painful way of becoming a Wagnerite than to have the rocky road to Beyreuth paved with such delicious Wagnerisms as there are in Sigurd. It is like taking a course of Pinero before grappling with Ibsen.

* * *

It would cost several thousand dollars to stage Sigurd up to the composer's dream. The amount expended at the California would about pay the interest on such a sum. However, I am not going to cavil at the mise-en-scène. It was flimsy and cheap, and, in spots, ludicrous; and the ring-a-round-a-rosey antics of the young women who asked us to believe they were Valkyries and Koholds and Elves were—but still I am not going to cavil. The singing and the orchestra were good, when one considers the character of the opera and the character of the company. Massart did some plucky work in the stupendous role of Sigurd; his tone was congested at times, but he came out nobly in the exacting music of the last scenes. Alber's Gunther was as nearly perfect as I can imagine the part. Foedor is of course not a Nordica; she has neither the vocal nor the physical higness that one learns to associate with the demi-Goddesses of Norse lore—but she gave us a good idea of the possibilities of the part. Athes seems to have more appreciation than voice-volume; his Hagen struck me as an excellent performance smothered by a mute. Berberth, as Hilda, was weak; in fact, impossible. Nicotias led, and the orchestra was reasonably sure. But I wish somebody would steal that piano—it seems never to stop sounding and never to be in key with the other instruments.

We were not wrong in expecting more of this French company than it gave us on the opening night. Friday's performance of Trovatore was finished and spirited, and it demanded respect for the singers, no matter how one regards the old accordion music in these advanced days. Prevost was there with Maurico's top-note, a virile, fiery C, which he delivered with beautiful patness. Otherwise he has a small, assertive, but not sensational tenor. Mme. Freneau-Benati sang a strong, deep Azucena, and Foedor awakened to inspired agility and power as Leonore. Albers was the Count, and the glory of the night. He is unquestionably the star of the company. He seems to be able to sing anything with that great, warm, lithe baritone of his. And he acts.

The Faust matinee Saturday marked the best all-round work of the season, up to the time I write. It was an even, steady performance. Berthet's Marguerite was light, but very graceful and girlish, both in the acting and singing. Massart made no special splurges, but he sang throughout with a fine purity and legitimacy. Javid, who seems to be more of a haritone than a basso, gave us a fascinating French Devil, full of buoyant humor. The hallet was a real diversion in the Walpurgis night scene. And Albers sang Valentine as I have never heard him sing before.

"There stood your champagne, but you tasted it not!"—that famous Ibsen line which has made many a London matinee girl clasp her mother by the wrist and lead her blushing from the theatre, is outdone by Victorien Sardou. "Go!" cries Gismonda to the lowly hird tamer, her large, warm arms necklacing his throat. "My God, I love you! Go! go! but—leave your door unlatched!" We had no time to look to our morals; this ended the third act; the curtain was down; and everybody in the Baldwin Theatre was storming to get it up again. This was melodrama, passion, exalted animalism—the sort to dream about. This was Sardou, the only Sardou. And in my mind there flashed a picture of Henry Arthur Jones trying to Sardou it all over again with a top hat and a frock coat and a Salvation Army glow, and renunciation and retribution and repentance in the last act. I even went lower than Jones: I thought of the inglorious Adelphi Browns and Morosco Smiths, who, confronted by the old-time plot that Sardou used, would have garlanded it with such posies of speech as Sir-r-r! Stand aside and let me pass! Oh Heavings! a ter-r-r-rible kr-ime has been kurmitted! Officer, arrest that man! And I thought of clever, naughty little Frenchmen who smoke the lean cigarette and drink the long opalescent absinthe, and write Gis- monna every day—only they give her a live, flabby husband instead of romantic widowhood, and a brain-sick adventure of the alcove in place of the huge, out-and-out melodrama of Sardou's act scene, where Gismonda says, "You gave my child to the wild beast, I give you to hell!" Muscle and might and passion and blood take a strong man to handle them. I am not sorry that Sardou's Spiritism has been an international failure. He has no business playing with small psychologic toys—there are too many littler men more expert at the game. And a few bigger.

This is Fanny Davenport's last season of Sardou plays. She has done her mite toward keeping the wolf from the good Academician's door. Sardou is now rich enough to write his masterpiece, and Miss Davenport is going to turn patriot and lift some American playmaker above the temptations to crime and dramatic criticism. I envy the man whose play she accepts—not solely on account of Miss Davenport's and Mr. MacDowell's histrionic genius, or the mere pecuniary picturesqueness it will give to the author's condition. In fact, I envy the lucky fellow more on account of the staging—the sumptuous paraphernalia of scenery, properties, lights and costumes—his play will get, than anything else. Miss Davenport burns her money in the most regal blaze of scenic art of any manager-star on the American stage. There are others who run to plain star-acting, others who run to companies, others who run to a little of each of these—but for the grand climax of what the press agent is pleased to term scenic environment and stage vesture, Fanny Davenport is the empress supreme. Incidentally, she can act; incidentally again, she buys as good plays as money can buy, and if anyone should ask me: "Where, for the general purposes of an evening's diversion of an intense but not too brainy kind, may I most safely invest a dollar and a half?" I should answer: "Give it to Fanny Davenport, she is lots of things, and there are lots of things she is not—but she is infallibly reliable."

This reliability was never better proved than in the acting of Gismonda. Miss Davenport is not a young woman—she looks five years older than she did ten years ago, and she attests to closer analogy than alliteration between prosperity and plumpness. She is still as theatrical as Bernhardt, without having the all-powerful sweep of magnetism to make one forget it; and her reading of the heavier lines is often marred by stout aspiration. But she is reliable, zealous, strong, and she brings conviction and circumstance to the role. No one can dispute the real fire in her work in the third act, or the sovereign humility of her confession in the church scene, even though she does bend more to the audience than to the altar. There are all the old virtues and no new faults in Mr. MacDowell's acting. He poses, and he hurries and tangles what leading men are prone to regard as the least important of their lines; but he is very dramatic as Almerio without being bombastic, and there is a genuine ring in his big heroic speeches.

The company is a fairly good one.

For me there is only one jarring note in the play. Waiving all question of the chivalry or caddishness of the thing, and taking it from a point of art alone, I cannot understand why Sardou should have made Almerio so everlastingly insistent in telling Gismonda that he had saved her child's life.

I do not agree with my colleagues that Miss Helyett, on Saturday night, was a dreary fizzle mainly because the majority of the audience did not parley French. I do not even blame the comedy itself, which is as feasible for us as an American farce-comedy would be for Paris. I cheerfully distribute my disesteem among the comedy people of the French company. With the exception of Manrick, who played the embryonic bull-fighter, all of these comedy singers can be enlightened in their business by spending their off nights at the Tivoli. And it will only cost them fifty cents a lesson.

As I did not see The Foundling at the Columbia in anything like its entirety, I am not in a position to agree with the various persons who tell me it is all dull and rank. I saw for myself that Thomas Burns is a clever farce-comedian, and that the rest of the company lagged miles behind him. As for Cissy, her nine-yards-around skirts and her kiek and her wink are nice, old-fashioned Gaiety Girl accomplishments. But they come too late to seduce the town.

It was soloists' afternoon Thursday at the Columbia, and the orchestra played easy, entertaining music before and between and after, and everybody was pleased. Gertrude Auld—who has prefixed Mrs. and added a hyphen and a Thomas to her name since I heard her sing several years ago at Golden Gate Hall—and Hugo Mansfield were the soloists. In a light, delicate way they both were very successful. Mrs. Thomas's art has not suffered perceptibly at the hands of matrimony. She sang the Dinah "Shadow Dance" with tripping spirit, and those white, silver top-notes were just as pure and fragile and facile as they were when she first came hark from Paris under the ambiguous halo of "Marchesi's favorite pupil." Fickle Marchesi! she has had at least a thousand favorite pupils that I know of. However, Gertrude Auld-Thomas can sing, and, now that the ice is broken again, I hope we will hear more of her sweet, slim notes. Mansfield is not a passionate pianist, but he is earnestly articulate and moderately poetic. Often it is a relief to hear a player who does not win by sheer brute force, and while Mansfield did not realize the melodramatic possibilities of Liszt's 10th Rhapsody, he played the Raff Concerto with fine intelligence and no little style. I have never heard the orchestra play with more piquancy, swing and imagination than in the Massenet suite, "Les Erynnés." Hierichs is never happier than when his baton is pulsing over a modern score.

ASHTON STEVENS.

To-night, at the California, the French singers will present the spectacular light opera, Voyage of Suzette, which never has been heard in this country outside of New Orleans. Brilliant staging is promised, and the pantomime work in one of the scenes (a butcher shop) is said to be indescribable. For Tuesday night, The Huguenots; for Thursday a grand double bill, consisting of Dragons de Villars and Masseur's La Navarraise, both new operas to us. Mignon is the popular bill for next Saturday afternoon.

With new scenery, costumes and an enlarged orchestra, Nicolai's famous comic opera The Merry Wives of Windsor will be given at the Tivoli next week. It will be the first time in years we have had an opportunity of hearing this famous work complete, though the overture and ballet music have been frequently heard at orchestra concerts. West will be the Falstaff. Laura Millard and all the Tivolians are in the cast.

The Four Cohans have made a big hit at the Orpheum with their automatic doll dance. All these new people for next week: Henry Lee, impersonating "the great men of the past and present;" Johnny Ray, heralded as "the funniest stage Irishman in the business;" Dick and Alice McAvoy, as "the Hogan Alley Kids;" a violin trio by the Vilona sisters; acrobatics by the three Richards, and Tyrolean warbling by Werner and Rieder.

Trebelle's last two concerts will take place this afternoon and to-morrow night at Golden Gate Hall. Varied and interesting programmes have been prepared for each concert, and now that music is in the air it is well not to forget so modest and charming an artist as Trebelle.

Camilla Urso will give three violin recitals at Golden Gate Hall on Monday, March 29th, Friday, April 2d, and Saturday afternoon, April 3d, under the direction of Mr. Greenbaum. Madame Urso brings with her two vocalists and a pianist.

Fanny Davenport will play Fedora to-night and Gismonda all next week, with the exception of Saturday night, when La Tosca will be given, with Davenport-Sardou souvenirs for the ladies on the lower floor.

The Foundling continues another week at the Columbia. Monday night Cissy Fitzgerald will introduce her new "hoop skirt dance" and a new song written for her, "My Race Track Winner."

The Great Northwest, a melodrama that made a big hit at the American Theatre in New York last season, will be put on at the Grand next week, to the fullest extent of Morosco's resources.

THE ART EPIUREAN.

(EIGHTH PAPER.)

WHILE gathering material for a certain sauce to put in my eighthly, a new invention or table accessory was brought to mind. As hot sauces and gravies must be first, last, and all the time served hot as when they came from the fire, and at a large table party the serving may take some time (when done at the table, English fashion), a gravy or sauce boat, fitted with a cover and poised over an alcohol lamp, is an admirable improvement and insures the desired end. Besides being such an advantage from a culinary point of view, this pretty silver table-piece is an ornament to any dining room, and will divide honors with the breakfast equipage for the coffee tankard, or the dainty five o'clock tea utensils that seem fashioned especially for milady's delicate hands.

Have I time for a delightful salad from Delmonico's chef, Charles Ranhofer? He calls it Macedoine salad, and thus describes it: Have four ounces of artichoke bottoms, four ounces of celery knob, four ounces of beet root, four ounces of turnips (sounds like a "b'iled dinner"), all cut in quarter inch squares; four ounces string beans, cut lozenge shaped, four ounces of asparagus tops, and four ounces green peas (better buy out your green grocer entire), all cooked separately in salted water. Then refresh, except the beet roots, which must be cooked whole and cut into dice afterwards. Season, with salt, pepper, oil and vinegar, and mix with a fine herb mayonnaise, which is made as follows: Pick and wash a handful of chervil, tarragon, chives, burnet, and garden watercress; blanch them in salted boiling water for five minutes. Then drain, refresh, and press well to extract the water. Pound thoroughly, adding the juice of one lemon and some ground mustard. Mix this ravigote into a pint of Mayonnaise sauce and color it a fine pistacio green with some spinach green.

One would never suppose—I dare say that even his nearest friends do not guess the sad truth—that the bane of Mr. Charles Cole's existence is what to order three times per diem for the inner man. He swears it is making his hair gray, for he has no preference for any flesh, fish or fowl. But amphibia don't count, and the secret is out that when "Tony," of the Poodle Dog up on Bush street, puts before Mr. Cole a saute sec of frogs' legs as only Tony can prepare them, that gentleman's merriness of soul is only equaled by that of the nursery-rhyme personage of royal title. Then, and only then, is the vexed question satisfactorily solved.

Bulls and bears are supposed to have carnivorous appetites, so it is not strange that Mr. Carey Friedlander, after a day "on change," pleads guilty to thinking a broiled porterhouse about the correct thing for gustatory enjoyment; and it must be accompanied by a baked potato to exactly satisfy the Friedlander palate.

"Coffee with it?" I queried innocently.

"No"—most emphatically—the little ruse was a success. "It needs ale or beer." There's modesty for you in gustatory bliss; and so easily prepared, too. But there is something that he likes equally well—at least so a friend of his confided to me—and that is, one of Charles J. Foster's dishes of fried tripe with Tilden sauce. Thereby hangs a tale:

Joe Tilden, in years ago, used to be the epicure of San Francisco. Poor fellow! He died in Honolulu some time ago, but not before he originated what the chosen spirits laughingly christened a "drunkard's breakfast." The first course was onion soup; the second was this tripe dish: and there wasn't any third, because these two made quantum suf for the rather over-worked digestion of the average devotee of Bacchus. When Joe Tilden died his cronies thought that the recipe for that famous tripe sauce had died with him, for although they had often seen him make it, they hadn't it in detail. Mr. Foster tried for two or three years without success to duplicate it, but perseverance conquers all things, even tripe sauce, and one day he was lucky enough to hit upon the right ingredients, and success perched. The kindred souls call it the Tilden sauce in honor of poor Joe. It has very hot things about it—but that has no bearing on Joseph, nor does it cast any sinister reflection. This is the way it is done:

The finest kind of honeycombed tripe must be obtained for the foundation, and fried to a turn. Have a very hot soup plate, and fill it with butter—soon melted. Everything must be piping hot. Mix in the melted butter French or English prepared mustard. Worcestershire and Harvey sauce, and le bon gout, and lastly a half teaspoonful of tabasco. No, that is not a mistake. It sounds sultry, and it is. When these are stirred thoroughly into a cream, smooth and oily, squeeze into the dish the juice of a lime to cut the oil. Have on the table a dish nicely arranged with very finely chopped green peppers, ditto of onions, ditto of small pickles, and also the tops of green onions chopped. They are milder than the onion itself for those who do not fancy quite so much of a muchness. Keep all these "trimmin's" separate on the dish, and those at the board can choose their own seasonings. Let these be sprinkled over the tripe before the sauce is poured over it. The plates must be hot. The tripe must be done at the moment that the sauce is finished. The guests must have their appetites whetted to match, and all will go merry as the marriage bell. You say, from your wider experience, that a man hasn't much appetite after a night of revelry? Conceded. But this is a sort of stimulant; taken when you need touting up. It fills a long-felt want when anything else would be unpalatable. Its votaries call it a "Sunday breakfast." I wonder why.

Georgie Cayvan, the pretty actress, is said to be very fond of apples, and has them always within reach. So alas, was her prototype, but it was on account of their being nearly out of reach upset the domestic economy of Mr. Adam's household—or garden party—and made lovely woman extravagant in the matter of dress ever since. And heartless wretch that she was, she didn't give a fig for all Adam's expostulation—just as "leaf" as not, so to speak; after which index of feeble-mindedness it behooves the writer to retire into oblivion.

A RECENT arrival from New York asked a leading society woman the other day why our swim does not make Van Ness avenue the parade ground for Sunday afternoon, as the beau monde does Fifth avenue in New York. It seems a good idea. Why do not the girls and young matrons take it up? Especially now, before the summer winds begin and society is in a state of enforced quietude. Many of the fashionable set of girls have taken recently to going out to the Presidio of an afternoon, where there are always a lot of young officers only too glad to join the walk, play tennis, or offer a cup of tea at quarters.

A whisper is afloat that the women have been seriously considering the presentation of a testimonial to Ed. Greenway at the final dance of the Cotillion Club, of which organization he has been the acknowledged leader for years past, to take place shortly after Easter. Much discussion is said to have been held as to the form of said testimonial, some going in for a loving cup; others for jeweled suspender buckles, and some one is said to have affirmed that the "genial" would not be averse to coin. However, gossip is always a dangerous thing to place credence in, and so it may all end in the proverbial smoke, not hut what the gentleman is entitled to a souvenir from his society admirers, and the society millionaires of to-day do not give jeweled scarf pins or watches as favors to the cotillion leaders, more's the pity.

It is decidedly amusing to old settlers to read the memoirs of John Bonner in a Sunday paper. If this writer's previous articles on past greatness of foreign notabilities were not more accurate than the local resume, we fear they are not very reliable. Fancy for one item being told that in Vigilante days Stockton street, between California and Clay, was the fashionable residence quarter, where the French banker, Pioche, dispensed elaborate hospitality at his handsome mansion thereabouts. This was in 1856. The Pioche house was not built until the close of the sixties. Why will people write of what they only know by hearsay.

Gossip from the East, told in letters, asserts that the popular erstwhile beau of San Francisco, Wilcox of the army, who was supposed by society to be in a state of mental collapse over Miss Julia Crocker's engagement to Buckhee, is spoken of as about to be engaged himself—not in military tactics, hut in Cupid's wiles, the fair lady of his choice being one of two cousins, native daughters of the Golden State, at present in the East.

The presence of a British Baronet and the nephew of a Duke at the Palace Hotel, although duly chronicled by the daily press, has apparently not made much stir in our social world. Our girls are beginning to value a rich American more than a fortune-hunting foreigner.

"Why don't Jim Phelan marry?" was the remark made by a prominent matron, recently, to a well-known eluh man. "For a variety of reasons, my dear madam," was the response. "First, because he don't want to." When that disappears those following may be discussed.

One of the most interesting sights at Inspector General Burton's review of troops at the Presidio last Saturday, was the enthusiasm displayed by the huds when their special favorite officer came into view. Even the young matrons were imbued with the feeling.

The Louis Parrotts are going to keep open house this summer at their San Rafael ahude. So say their friends, and as the eldest Miss Parrott is fast becoming a "bud," no doubt the rumor is correct.

The opera has become the fashion, and each night parties of the swim are to be seen at the California. A recent one was noted for the loud dressing of the women and the laissez aller manners of the men, and they were all of the swagger set.

The Sunday afternoons at the Hagers' Gough street residence have become most popular affairs, where one is sure to meet charming women and agreeable men, neither hud nor brownie being greatly in evidence on these occasious.

On dit, one of our local multi-millionaires is considering the project of a private skating rink, after those so much in vogue in London this year. What a chance for real, old-fashioned fun such a thing would be.

Among the most constant patrons of the French opera at present singing in our city is the Swiss Consul and family, who take evident delight in the performances, the young ladies being accomplished musicians.

"Beauty and Hygiene." New York. Published by Harper & Brothers. 1897.

A Book of the Week. We are constantly told by people who, being incapable of learning, have taken to teaching, that Knowledge is Power: and though this is in a sense true, it is yet surprising how few of the world's great prizes fall to the men who know most. But no one can for a moment deny that Beauty is Power—for women. The handsome men of the world do not, merely because they are handsome, achieve any special greatness. It is true that John Churchill, who was known all over the continent of Europe as "the handsome Englishman," became one of Britain's greatest military heroes and the first Duke of Marlborough, but these results were only very indirectly secured by his personal beauty. Of course, his fine looks helped him into the good graces of women, and were a valuable aid to his ambition, but they could hardly be said to have been the real foundation of his magnificent career. The great work of the world is done, and its master positions are held by men with few or no pretensions to be considered handsome. A clever man, notorious for his extreme plainness, was accustomed to say that, even with women, he was only a quarter-of-an-hour behind the handsomest man in London. But in the case of women all this is different. Beauty is the source of their Power, and the most efficient cause of their eminence. When a lovely girl of eighteen, after a few weeks of smiling and coquetry, becomes (let us say) an English Duchess, she attains at a bound rank, honors, houses, heirlooms, jewels, and historic associations, that are the accumulation of centuries of honorable work and high achievement. Can we wonder, when such dazzling brilliant chances are always dangling before their eyes, that women are tempted to do and dare almost anything to gain, if haply they may, Beauty. There is always a possibility of their achieving at a stroke, and by the mere pleasurable exercise of charms that are the gift of kindly Nature, supplemented by a little worldly knowledge, all the best things that Life has to offer. Hence the unfulfilling interest that women feel in all books that profess to teach them how to enhance and preserve their physical charms. The little volume before us, recently issued by Messrs. Harper & Brothers, awards the palm of beauty and womanly grace to the ladies of Spain, and attributes the permanence of their charms to the careful attention which they bestow upon their health and upon the preservation of their teeth, nails, hair, and complexion, by simple, natural, and hygienic means. The little treatise gives many recipes for complexion-pastes, hair-washes, tooth-powders, and other adjuncts of the toilet, most of which may be prepared at home, though some few require to be compounded by a skilled pharmacist. From a perusal of the book, which is quite readable, one rises with the conviction that, though perhaps the French proverb, Il faut souffrir pour être belle, is somewhat hyperbolic, the acquisition, enhancement, and preservation of feminine beauty are tasks demanding much time, great pains, almost incessant attention, and the resources of a very well-appointed home.

To the last issue that we have received of Harper's Round Table, Mr. Edmund Gosse contributes an article, which, though certainly above the heads of his presumably youthful readers, is eminently agreeable to their elders. It is entitled "Standards in Modern Literature." From it we cull a few pregnant and forceful sentences: "Under the strictest rules that ever were enacted, and a régime the most academic conceivable, there will never be anything like unanimity regarding the excellence of a literary product. All we can hope to reach is a general agreement of the best-trained minds, recurrent for so many generations as to become practically durable." Again: "Nothing else" (but technical excellence) "has preserved the principal writers of antiquity in esteem.

Mr. Lowell called style 'the great antiseptic;' good writing, in other words, is the only chemical product which can prevent literature from corrupting and fading away." This, too, is valuable: "On questions of the literary standard, it is the majority which is always wrong. The majority likes a warm, easy book, without pretension, unambitiously written, on a level with the experience of the vast semi-educated classes of our society." Hence the great success of books by such people as Archibald Clavering Gunter, Rosa Nouchette Carey, and "the Duchess." "One man, one vote," extended to the domain of literary taste, would mean the absolute and final extinction of all distinguished masterpieces. . . . Outside the small class of experts, there is a large body of the public which recognizes its authority and is docile to its directions. Again, outside is the vast concourse of persons competent to read and write, but no more capable of forming an opinion than is the dog that barks at their shadow, or the disreputable cat that curls at their fireside and says nothing." Now, excellent and true as all this is, we can hardly believe that any children of fifteen or sixteen are capable of appreciating it; indeed, the vast majority of people reach their graves without attaining such a condition of mind as would render these truths intelligible. We think that Messrs. Harper must have accepted Mr. Gosse's article on the strength of its writer's literary reputation, and not on account of its suitability to the Round Table. However this may be, Mr. Gosse sets forth his views in a clear and forcible manner.

The utter futility of public discussion of important or lofty subjects was well illustrated at San Jose recently. After a lecture on the civilization of Greece and Rome at the Normal Hall in that enlightened burg, where even the Man in the Street (as we have recently been told) is intelligent and honest, Professor Earl Barnes volunteered, like a fortune-telling crone at a village fair, or a candidate for office at a political meeting, to answer any questions that foolish people might wish to ask him: i. e., to answer those questions to which he knew the answers, and to evade those to which his memory or his invention suggested no convenient reply. Some inquiring donkey asked him the question, "Is the soul destructible?" to which the Professor (who, we sincerely hope, does not profess the English language at the Palo Alto High School) replied in the following elegant words: "I can chase a thing out of the universe as far as possible, and I might chase it a little farther. High forms of force cannot pass into grosser forms, and the highest form of force is the soul." Now, what human creature could be enlightened or bettered an iota by this utterance, couched as it is in the language of the curbstone? Then another ass brayed interrogatively: "Does it not mean the destruction of the personality?" To this the Professor (who is perhaps not so big a fool as he seems) discreetly answered, "I do not wish" (that is to say, I could if I would, but I do not wish) "to answer that: it comes back into theology." The Professor did, however, make a sensible remark when he said, "Men are born unequal. It is the most patent fact in the whole world." It is just these patent facts, however, that people are commonly most slow to perceive or most unwilling to admit.

Women of the so-called "advanced type" are strange creatures. Last month a congress of mothers was held in Washington, D. C., to discuss the relation of mother and child, the influence of heredity, the management of nurseries, and other matters peculiarly within the province of fruitful wives. The Brooklyn Times tells us that a large percentage of the delegates to the congress was composed of unmarried women, among whom were Miss Frances Willard, the irrepressible Parson Anna Shaw, and that old war-horse, Susan B. Anthony. Though presumably virgines intacte, these amiable creatures were quite ready to teach old married women how to suckle infants. After this, what will lovely Woman not attempt?

The Roycroft Printing Shop, of East Aurora, N. Y., is about to issue a series of short outdoor essays entitled "Upland Pastures," by Adeline Knapp. Five hundred copies are to be printed on rough English paper, at two dollars each, and forty copies on Japan vellum, illuminated by hand by Bertha C. Hubbard, at five dollars each.

DEAR EDITH: A very swell gown, just made for a great society lady, has two boxplaits on each side of the skirt, one toward the front and one toward the back, and the blouse is in clusters of fine tucks running up and down, and is open over a front of gray tulle spangled with steel. The blouse droops a little all round over a four-inch wide belt, so that it has a little the effect of a bolero. The belt is of white, striped with lines of steel braid, and is fastened with a bow of velvet. Spangled tulle is in the neck and wrists. A heart-shaped piece of white lace, with steel, is applied on the front of the neckband, and falls slightly down over the tulle. The sleeve is cut in one piece, with a puff at the top, and the lower part of the puff is in tucks running round. The skirt is finished separate from the lining and is slightly gathered on the sides, the plaits being included in the gathers. Openwork steel passementerie is applied on the sleeves and down the skirt, but is not necessary to the effect. This gown embodies the latest ideas in all its details.

Skirts, so long stationary, are now the least stable part of dress, and every day sees a new design. The other day it was a narrow skirt, covered with flounces; now it is countless plaits or innumerable godets, that fall over an underskirt, not of silk, but of flannel, and so drag and cling with siren grace. These novelties need not trouble the dressmakers much until after Easter, as they are intended for thin materials; nevertheless, here is a model.

But perhaps the greatest marvel the times have perfected is the loose jacket that in the beginning was flowing and wide, and is now metamorphosed by the chic tailors into an effect of slimmness and length. This jacket is the principal element in the serge gowns and the bicycle dress for spring. It is drawn as close to the figure as keeping it straight will allow, for it must not curve in anywhere, an apparent contradiction that gives rise to an entirely new effect.

The blouses worn with serge costumes are of Scotch plaid silk, or else they are of plain silk with a white lineu turn-over collar and a Scotch plaid tie. The tie is like a man's four-in-hand, but wider, is long enough to go round the neck, cross behind, knot in front and run down to the belt. This is the latest chic.

Just at present the sleeve question is one of absorbing interest to all womankind, and to the home dressmaker it is more or less of a difficulty, unless she is properly enlightened.

Of course, everybody recognizes the fact that the large sleeve is a thing of the past, and that a gown is no longer really stylish that is encumbered with them. It is an easy matter, however, to cut them over, if one only understands how, and a pattern is not needed in many cases.

Any of the large, old-style leg-o'-mutton or balloon sleeves will easily furnish ample material for the small sleeves of present fashion, and worn places may be avoided, only the best of the goods being put into the new sleeves. The large outer part of the sleeve is cut across the top, and is made to form the puff of the new sleeve. The lower part of the outer large leg-o'-mutton is cut to fit the inner lining to which it and the top puff are sewn. This is one of the most popular sleeves in vogue at present and is the easiest to make. It may be left perfectly plain, or dressed up as much as one likes, for a great deal of trimming on sleeves is very fashionable. If the sleeve is of wool goods, little puffs of hias silk may be set on an inch apart, covering gracefully any worn or stained places. Another fancy is to have many rows of velvet ribbon set an inch apart, or little frills of narrow lace. All sleeves are made long over the hands, either the bottom of the sleeve itself being long, or made to appear so by a frill of silk, lace, chiffon, or whatever one fancies.

Holcomb Valley Reconstruction. For at least the fourth time in as many years the reconstruction process is to be put into effect by the managers of the Holcomb Valley mines in San Bernardino County.

As there seems to be no power in Great Britain to stop this systematic robbery, or to bring the perpetrators to justice, all that is left is to once more protest against the outrage and caution people against having anything to do with the scheme. The company seems on the last occasion to have had a very decent and honest manager in a Mr. Thame. This gentleman resigned his position and went to England with a report giving his reason for discontinuing operations that "the gravel was too poor" to justify the continuance of work. Of course it is only natural to learn that the precious set at the head of this concern "are bound to say that they did not agree with the conclusions arrived at by Mr. Thame in that report." Of course not. The conclusions of Messrs. Williams, John Hays Hammond, and William Ireland, Jr., did not suit their ideas either. They always can find reasons in London for disapproval of anything unfavorable which may be said for the apology for a mine in California which gives them an excuse for existence. They are themselves working the mine proper in emptying the pockets of any investor foolish enough to throw his pennies into the hat when it makes its annual passage. The State Mineralogist's report, just issued, it might be mentioned incidentally, confirms the opinion of Mr. Thame, stating that it has been found that "the quantity of gold in the gravel is too small to make extensive operations remunerative." That water for sluicing has to be pumped from wells, according to the same report, is enough in itself to condemn a property of its class as a feasible enterprise in hydraulic or placer mining with people who know anything at all about operations of the kind. This official report, however, like all others which have preceded it, undoubtedly will suggest some reason to this precious management sufficient to hind them "not to agree with its conclusions."

A Scandalous Waste of Money.

With the report of such a man as Hammond before them, not to speak of the other prominent experts who have condemned this property for the purposes outlined by the company in control, it seems scarcely credible that more good money, to the extent of $50,000, had been thrown after bad during the past two years. On top of this it is now proposed to raise more money to ascertain what there is "in the gravel on granite," and what could be made of the water supply. Another expert examination by eminent engineers is suggested, but in the light of the past we know what that means. So far the reports have only been obtained for the purpose of pigeon-holing. This would be the preliminary to drawing upon the new capital suggested of $250,000, and enable the company to run along for a while longer before the next scheme at reconstruction. By cutting and selling timber, some 90,000 feet, for which they claim to have received $16 per thousand, some profits have accrued to the company, and this is looked to in the future as a source of revenue. Without water sufficient for practical mining, reference is made by the chairman in his reconstructed reports of the probabilities existing for an irrigation plant, furnishing additional sugar coating for the pill investors are now asked to swallow. We would like to see one of those "eminent engineers" who are acknowledged by this gentleman to exist in California called into this case and have their opinion for publication. This, however, is only likely to eventuate when some outraged shareholder arises to his wrath and takes the suppression of the schemers in his own hands.

Reconstructing the Golden Feather.

Work at Oroville will go on at the river mines located there for some time to come, if "reconstruction" has the power to stimulate the cow when it is milked again for the golden guineas. With the old company in liquidation, a new one arises like the Phoenix from its ashes, with a capital small for the work, and yet big enough in its way when it comes down to the investors punting up. An immense sum has already been spent on this claim and the one above it, which had been "reconstructed" some time ago, and in comparison, the amount to be raised now, some $960,000, seems trivial. Besides playing against the chances of mining in the matter of gold discoveries, the shareholders in this concern have the elements to contend with, and storms are apt to sweep away the profits of a season in short order. It is a great enterprise, truly, and an alluring one, which is likely to perpetuate itself for ages to come with succeeding generations of managers. Prehistoric, as well as historic forces, are at work here on human cupidity, with wide-range of possibilities for discussion on both sides. Mr. Pechey in these river mines will find a boundless field for research and adventure while money can be found to hack his endeavors.

A British Mining Combine.

The Bramhall Company of many promoters, while a local concern, is essentially British in its personnel make-up. Its membership includes the following well-known names: W. M. Bramhall, P. George Gow, C. J. Okell, H. A. Trevelyn, A. C. Donnell, C. F. Burnham and J. J. R. Peel. It is intended to establish a branch office in London. As most of the gentlemen connected with this company are acquainted with mining in California it will be hoped that their influence will make itself felt in checking rascality on the other side when it makes its appearance from time to time. In this way they will benefit both countries, which would otherwise be sufferers by enterprises of an unsavory character.

The Mines Will Survive.

Messrs. Roelker and Rolston, the former an expert for the London financial syndicate, and the latter for some company of a similar character, have been recalled to London. It is beginning to dawn upon mine owners of California that these syndicates will have to look somewhere else for the ready-made outfit they desire for stock jobbing operations on the Exchange. A "going Exchange" now means a producing mine which can be had for one-third of its owner's valuation, with life enough in it to carry the London company over enough dividends to enable the flotation of its shares at the rate of a few millions. Nearly every big mine in California has had a hack in price from representative men of the foreign syndicate, but many of them will survive the condemnation to the profit of their owners.

The Powder Combine.

After a series of "now you see it and now you don't" exhibitions by the manipulators of the Giant Powder deal, the trump card has finally dropped from the sleeve in the form of a compact between the three companies, the California, Judson, and the speculative Jack-in-the-box. An advance has been effected in the price of manufactured stuff, which will put the California at least on a fairly profitable basis. The revenue secured will help the Giant to pay up its heavy indebtedness and cheer up the hearts of the Judson shareholders. The rise in powder is not large enough to attract competition, thanks to the counsel of the more level-headed members of the combine, who have fought for weeks past an attempt to put prices at a point which would have ended in disruption just as soon as competition began from outside makes which could be counted on from the start.

The Pine Street Market.

No business worth mentioning has been transacted on Pine street during the week. Chollar continues to loom up in good shape, but the hobos who chase shadows are not zealous in the matter of an investment possessed of actual merit. It would come unnatural to those for whom the frisky wild-cat has more attraction. The Norcross difficulty is still unsettled. It is likely to remain so for a time to come.

The Local Savings Banks.

The regular statement of the local savings banks have appeared again at the end of February at the instance of the Bank Commission. The assets of the active concerns aggregate in round numbers $110,343,677, with deposits of $100,049,095. The loans on real estate amount to $77,945,660, with loans on stocks and bonds of something over $25,000,000.

Down Crier

"Hear the Crier!" "What the devil art thou?"
"One that will play the devil, sir, with you."

WILLIAM CLINE, the grocer convicted under the pure food law of having sold adulterated raspberry syrup, was yesterday fined $50 by Police Judge Campbell.
—Morning Contemporary.

Go down into your pockets, Cline,
And pungle up your little fine.
'Tis strange you should have tempted fate
By stooping to adulterate.
Such wicked conduct you must know, sir,
Is unbecoming any grocer.
Stern punishment a man deserves
For thus retailing fake preserves.
No wonder Whiskers, in his wrath
At outraged justice, blocks your path;
Oh, how that righteous man must grieve
To see another so deceive!
Of course, it naturally must
Seem to your friends a bit unjust
That you should have so little scope
And others such a length of rope.
For instance, no one does a thing
When faking journals foul "news" fling,
Thus poisoning, for ghoulish greed,
The hapless minds of those who read.
You merely cheat the palate. They Destroy the morals, day by day.
Your gill of syrup, every time,
Is evidence of greater crime
Than all the rank and slimy stuff
The papers print. I know it's tough—
Yet you're a culprit, William Cline!
Step up and pay your little fine!

IT is to be hoped that the dimpled damsels and doughy dames of San Francisco will go in a hunch to hear Suzy Tracy lecture on cooking. It might even pay us to hire this estimable young lady, and make her a Committee of One to investigate and report on the kitchens of our leading family hotels and boarding houses. The time will come when laws will be passed forcing all women to learn how to cook before they may enter upon the "higher education." Miss Suzy Tracy, the TOWN CRIER herewith makes you an honorable proposal of marriage!

THE mother-in-law will never be a popular quantity. Now cometh one and taketh a pot shot at Julian Pinto, who lives by expounding the law, the grace of God, and that peculiar forbearance for which as a people we are famous. The TOWN CRIER believes in a woman receiving her just deserts; in this case, however, and considering that only a lawyer's life is in question, he recommends the lady to the mercy of the Court and the good will of the community.

'TIS not so much repugnance for a jail
That makes a convict now turn faint and pale,
And trembling on a dungeon threshold quail.
Ah, no. It is the fear that there, for mate,
With one of Willie's staff (a dreadful fate)
He may be driven to associate.

INSTEAD of prosecuting the men who stole the diamonds from the teeth of a lady in this city, the fellows should be publicly thanked, and requested to persevere in their good work. When a woman proves herself to be such an irresponsible idiot as this one seems to be, she is placed outside of the pale of the law, and is no longer to be considered as one of us.

REVEREND DR. BOVARD of Alameda is again heard from. He opines that the Anti-Saloon bill, which he has been actively endorsing, should be allowed to rest. Now if the Doctor himself could only be persuaded to take that same cure!

H E swallowed (I am stating facts)
A dozen cocktails 'twixt the acts.
Now, was it thirst or Cissy's wink
That drove that big, strong man to drink?

THERE is a solace, after all, in poverty. The man who dies broke positively knows that his will can't be broken.

THE good ladies of the Woman's Board of Missions whose sympathies are across the seas with the un-speakable Turk, the distressed native of India, suffering Armenian, beighted African and others whose souls and stomachs need attention, should not lose sight of the fact that at their very doors are cases of dire destitution, and that muffled cries of misery are going up in this city's midst from the throats of unfortunate women and thrice-unfortunate babes. Your intentions are of the best, oh sisters, but the CRIER admonishes you that true charity begins at home.

SOMEBODY has started a discussion as to the pre-dominance of soprano over alto voices in San Francisco, the former outnumbering the latter by a vast majority. The TOWN CRIER's opinion is that when fair woman essays to sing, he whose tympanum is within hearing distance while she practises, cares not a button whether hers is a soprano or an alto. What t'ell, when he suffers just the same from either affliction?

SANITARY reform has at last reached the odorous limits of Butchertown, and the members of the Board of Health are at war with the denizens of that long-neglected locality, whose slaughter houses are, it appears, highly offensive to the city's official noses. It is but natural, though, that there should be had blood between the butchers and the health officers.

"FRENCH Must Explain," says a morning daily in one of its headlines. This is reversing the usual order of things. To explain French is difficult enough. Now French himself is called upon to interpret the reason why Governor Budd decapitated him this week as trustee of the State Normal School.

Pray tell us why, oh Henry French, if you so kindly will,
You wired State Printer Johnston to blockade that Senate bill?
We scent another scandal of a legislative brand,
And if it's told in language that we cannot understand
We'll relish it ten times as much. Our hunger, then, appease.
Be just as French and naughty, Mr. Heury, as you please!

ATTORNEY W. D. Grady, accused of mayhem, for masticating a waiter's ear, has succeeded in securing another continuance of his case. He is probably delaying matters in order that his victim may grow another ear, when the charges against him will be dismissed.

ALADY has applied to the Superior Court for permission to declare herself a "sole trader." Were she not the mother of six healthy children, the TOWN CRIER would put her down as a New Woman applying for a title as a dealer in shoe leather.

SINGER SANKEY has arrived in town. Goodness knows we need him badly enough, but we are not wholly selfish. We are in a fearful way, it is true, but there are others. Let him be shipped to Sacramento or Carson at once.

SINCE danger and disease now dwell
Within a microbe-laden kiss,
Pray, how can sentiment its spell
Weave round the dear, forbidden bliss?
Alas, romance, thy days are done.
These scientists have spoiled our fun.

AT a church entertainment the other night, somebody suggested that "A Dream of Fair Women" be placed as a program attraction. And all the sisters blushed with virtuous indignation at the very idea.

NOW that Jim Smith, the gallant Colonel of the First Regiment (militia) has spent a night in prison, he will know where to hide in case war should ever break out between this country and Oakland.

"BUTLER is at the end of his string," says a sage of the daily press. So far, so good. By the time he reaches Australia may the string have grown big enough to sustain his weight.

IT is to be hoped that the zeal of the Board of Health may not be carried so far as to involve analyzation of sausage meat. There are some mysteries which we do not care to have solved.

W H Y sentence Lawrence to a jail?
No fellow there but might corrupted be.
Better by far to lash him to a rail
And drop him, howling, in the deep blue sea.

Torturer—What's the difference between twice twenty-five and twice five and twenty? Interval of three months, during which victim uses up nineteen pencils and seven quires of paper in "working it out." VICTIM—There's no difference at all. TORTURER—Isn't there? Twice twenty-five's fifty. (Victim nods.) Twice five's ten, and twenty's thirty. Fine day, isn't it?—Tit-Bits.

"And how much will the postage on these papers be?" asked the lady editor of the woman's edition, thoughtfully. "Well," said the post office man, "the regular rates on second class matter are—" "I don't care what the rates on second class matter are," interposed the lady editor, imperiously. "This paper will go as first class matter or not at all."—Washington Times.

Belle—I'm so glad Jack has got a bicycle; it has helped his disposition wonderfully. NAN—His disposition? Why, how could it? BELLE—Oh, when he gets up to give baby a drink and steps on a tack, he is so glad that it is in his foot instead of his pneumatic tire, that he doesn't say anything.—Pearson's Weekly.

No Lenten gray my lady wears,
No penitence does she profess;
In truth she's merry as before
In both her conduct and her dress.
Yet few there are who practice more
Of self-denial than does she,
I know, because she's vowed to pass
The season sans a call from me.

—Chicago Journal.

"And you have the impudence to say that the jimmy found on you was not intended to be used in breaking into houses?" said the Judge. "Of course it ain't," said the wanderer. "It's for breakin' out o' freight cars."—Indianapolis Journal.

"Don't let this occur again," said the photographer who prides himself on being enterprising. "What do you mean?" asked the assistant. "You've made the portrait more prominent than my signature."—Washington Star.

Lady—Why don't you go to work? SANDY SIFTER—There ain't nothin' doin' at my trade now. LADY—What is your trade? SANDY SIFTER—Pickin' flowers of'n century plants.—Ex.

She tried to kill him with a look—
That was the plan—
But she was cross-eyed, and it took Another man. —Chicago Record.

"They say the Rev. Dr. Fourthly has been leading a double life?" "Yes, he confessed to the trustees that he reads the Sunday papers before going to service."—Chicago Journal.

"If you had half the nerve this tooth has," said the dentist to the quivering wretch in the chair, "you could have this all over in about five seconds."—Pearson's Weekly.

The train boy was caught smoking one of his own cigars, wasn't he? What did the company do about it? "Nothing. He died before he could be prosecuted."—Life.

"Things are looking up." "How so?" "Some fellow has invented a cash register for married men's trousers pockets."—Indianapolis Journal.

She—When you married me you said you were well off. HE—I was, but I didn't know it.—Tit-Bits.

Through Sleeping Cars to Chicago.

The Atlantic and Pacific Railroad (Santa Fe route) runs daily through from Oakland to Chicago first-class drawing room and second-class modern upholstered tourist sleeping cars. Lowest rates to all points in the United States, Canada, Mexico, or Europe. Ticket office, 644 Market street, opposite Chronicle Building. Telephone Main 1531.

California is a land of flowers, but all the same some are sweeter than others. If you want the most beautiful and richest cut roses or the freshest violets, go to Leopold's at 39 Post street. So cheap too.

A VISION OF MY MOTHER.

WHEN the work of day is done,
In the dusk, a vision clear,
Rises on my sight, of one—
Ever loved and ever dear.
She, my queenly mother, stands,
Gazing at the empty space
That had been my resting place
When a child, and wrings her hands.

Watch the gath'ring moisture rise—
Grow to tears within her eyes
—Glist'n'ng stars in moonless skies—
Which in falling crystallize—
Thus are they borne hence to God,
By an angel, sweet and fair
And are laid before the Throne
This sublimed "Mother's Pray'r."

Oft her dear voice, rich and deep,
Sang my childish heart to sleep;
Even now I hear her voice—
Woe is me, I see her weep,
Thus I see 'hee, ssintly one,
Ever loved and ever dear;
Daily, when my work is done,
And my speech is but—a tear.

ART JOTTINGS.

DOLERTON, the sculptor, has some good things blocked out in clay in his studio on Pine street, which, with a little more work, will be ready for casting. The kiss of the poet and the Sphinx is a group which certainly should be developed. There is an abandon and passion in the figures, a soft yet clever modeling, and an originality in pose and treatment which save it from being cast into the gulf of non-completion.

Fisher exhibits some good work in Morris gallery. He has a pleasant and agreeably-painted landscape, a good, harmonious picture, which bears the marks of careful study and finish. It is conscientious in every detail, without a particle of the impressionist's school about it. A river in the Redwoods, by the same artist, shows a decided improvement in his treatment of large foregrounds and forest effects.

Bloomer exhibits a view on the San Rafael road, which is one of the best painted by this artist since his return from France. It is rich and strong in color, a meaty sort of picture, well balanced and strong in tone. There is much similarity between the methods of Theodore Welch and Bloomer in the treatment of those subjects. Bloomer is more solid, and Welch more transparent, in color. The latter artist exhibits a study of high rocks at Bolinas, a deliciously breezy marine. The foreground is large and strong, and precise in detail, without any stiffness. The sky is flecked with clouds and quite unconventional. The composition is also odd, but so faithful is the ensemble that one can almost smell the salt spray, looking on the reckless breakers that hurl themselves against the iron rocks.

Cadenasso, since he strayed from portrait painting to landscape, clamors at the threshold of high heaven for startling effects. He has got one now in "Solitude," a mass of trees, clouds, and upheavals that look as if a thunderbolt had struck it. The trees are tumbling down, and there is a patch of sky in the distance, which is suggestive of cholera morbus. It is well named solitude, because nothing that lives would lose a moment in getting away from it.

J. A. Harrington is working up a number of sketches made in Africa when he was on the London News staff. They are most interesting, and embrace a variety of subjects.

PICTURESQUE SAN FRANCISCO.

THE severe simplicity of the smoking room of a Chinese restaurant, which appears in this week's NEWS LETTER, shows a striking contrast between the Celestials' ideas of comfort and the customs of civilization. The character of the furnishings do not suggest ease and luxury, but rather a council chamber or a place of business.

AGITATION for a pure food congress, to be held in this city at an early day, should result successfully. The arousing of a strong, healthy interest in this outrageous practice of selling adulterated food as pure goods, and the vigorous prosecution of those who engage in it, will result in ridding the people of this double fraud. As to the prosecutions, they should not stop with the often ignorant and innocent retailer, but should reach the jobber and manufacturer wherever possible.

THE ROSE JAR

AN ESTRANGEMENT.—W. W. STORY.

HOW is it? It seems so strange;
Only a month ago
We were such friends; now there's a change;
Why, I scarcely know.
I thought we were friends enough to say
"We differ in this or the other way,
What matter?" It was not so.
I know not the how or why,
I only feel the fact;
Something has happened to set us awry,
Something is sadly lacked—
Something that used to be before—
It seems to be nothing; I feel it the more;
Our vase is not broken, but cracked.
Friends? Oh, yes, we are friends;
The words we say are the same,
But there is not the something that lends
The grace, though it has no name;
When others are with us we feel it less;
When alone there is a sort of irksomeness—
And nobody to blame.
I wish I could say, "Dear friend,
Tell me, what have I done?
Forgive me; let it now be at an end."
But ah! we scarcely own
That aught has happened—or something so slight
'Tis ghost-like, it would not hear the light—
'Tis only a change of tone.
Suppose I should venture to say:
"Something—oh, tell me what—Tronbles the heart's free play
That once existed not."
All would be worse; we must turn our back;
Pretend not to see that there is a crack
In our vase, on our love a blot.
Once were it openly said
It would strike us more apart,
Each, alas! would know that there laid
A stone at the other's heart.
But now we carry it each alone
So we must hope to live it down,
Each one playing his part.
It is not that I express
Less, but a little more,
A little more accent, a little more stress,
Which was not needed before.
Ah! would I could feel entirely sure
That it was not so—I should be truer
If you were just as of yore.
But I cannot give you up.
Ah! no I am all to blame;
You were so kind, you killed my cup
With love—and mine is the shame;
'Twas some stupid, foolish word I said
Unwittingly, I know, that must have bred
This something without a name.
Was it not all a mistake?
Oh! porcelain friendship so thin,
It is so apt, so apt to break
And let out the wine from within;
But once it is injured the least, alack!
What hand so skillful to mend the crack,
And make it all whole again?

THE WATCHERS.—HENRIETTA CHRISTIAN WRIGHT, IN SCRIBNER'S.

Oh, ye whose unrewarded eyes
Forever watch the ocean's rim,
Your ships perchance 'neath friendlier skies
Rest far beyond your vision dim.
Perhaps in some sweet bay they wait,
Where hides the primal, perfect day;
Where airs from springtime linger late
Or never perish quite away.
In some far-off, diviner land,
Where never garnered wealth grows old,
Safe harbored they may wait your hand,
To strike their sails and yield their gold.

INSURANCE.

THE managers of the different life insurance companies in this city will tender a complimentary banquet to John A. McCall, President of the New York Life, in the red room of the Bohemian Club in a short time. Mr. McCall will reach San Francisco on next Thursday.

Stephen D. Ives, Secretary of the Home Mutual, has returned from a two weeks' vacation in the southern part of the State. Mr. Ives is a tireless worker, and his journey South was for the purpose of a much needed rest.

F. Stevens, President of the New England Life, of Mass., has been in the city for the past two weeks. Mr. Stevens holds the record for length of service. He has been continuously in an official position with that company for the past fifty years. On his return to Boston he will be the recipient of a fitting memorial of his long and faithful stewardship by the agents of the New England Life.

E. O. Parker, of the Provident Savings, has returned East, after having placed the Coast agency in the hands of George L. North, formerly of the Equitable, and who in that company made a first-class record. He will doubtless add to his reputation at the head of the Provident.

T. J. A. Tiedemann and Fred R. Stover have gone with the Scottish Union and National as special agents. Tiedemann was formerly with Brown, Craig & Co., and Stover with the P. I. U.

It is generally understood that the Equitable Life will make the loan for the erection of the building to go up at the corner of Market, Geary and Kearny streets, of which there has been some talk recently.

Allen & Lewis have been appointed city agents of the Atlas of London.

Manheim, Dibbern & Co., have been appointed exclusive agents for the Scottish Union and National.

The local Board of Underwriters, for the maintenance of rates, has been organized, with J. D. Richards, President; L. Everett, Secretary and Treasurer, and H. M. Grant, Manager. It is proposed to fix rates in this city on the basis of 20 per cent. below old P. I. U. schedule.

Assembly bill 316, to place the management of the Fire Department with the Board of Supervisors, is now a law.

The new National Surety Company, of New York, begins business this week with a paid up capital of $500,000 and $500,000 surplus. The company has absorbed the National Insurance Company of Kansas City, taking over its assets and business.

John Landers, of the Manhattan Life, made a flying visit to Carson on the 17th—purely a business trip.

T. W. Aisbitt, Pacific Coast manager of the National Life of Hartford, with headquarters at Los Angeles, is in the city.

AT THE RACES.

THE racing at the Oakland track has been very clean—and away above the average, probably owing to the improved condition of the weather. The racing stakes were captured by Free Lady; the Oakland handicap, by Howard S., and the Golden Gate handicap, by Candelsria.

Ingleside will open its doors to the public next week, and a very attractive programme is presented. The following dates have been set for stakes at Ingleside: Androus stake, March 22nd; Welman stakes, March 27th; California Derby, April 3d; Corrigan stakes, April 19th; Spreckels' Cup, April 24th; California hurdle stakes, April 28th, and the Ingleside stakes, of four miles, May 1st.

Out of 630 races run in California, to date, favorites have captured 296, second choices 154, and outsiders or long-shots in the betting, 180.

The percentage for winning mounts, shows Sloan and Willie Martin in the lead, Eddie Jones Thorpe and H. Martin, close for second honors, and Freeman and Slaughter next, and the others way off.

will purchase half interest in United States Patent controlling one of the most attractive and profitable advertising devices ever placed upon the market. Over $4000 has already been realized from the sale of three counties in California alone.

The enterprise is well worth the consideration of the most cautious investor. Serious illness necessitates sale. Address

FOR many weeks Daniel M. Hanlon had cherished a very vigorous desire to witness the championship fight at Carson, but a mild suggestion of his intentions in this respect was received with a multitude of frowns in his family circle. Notwithstanding the discouragement he received, Hanlon secretly determined to witness the mill at all hazards, but not having the courage of his convictions, instead of boldly adhering to his original announcement, he clandestinely purchased a forty dollar ticket for the scrap, and then secured a domestic furlough on the plea that cattle business called him to the southern part of the State for a few days. But for fear his presence at the ringside should be noted and his name mentioned in the subsequent newspaper accounts of the fight as "among those present," thus exposing his ruse, Hanlon made the round of the editorial rooms with the urgent request that his name be omitted from the list of spectators. Reassured on this point, he went blithely to the scene of the fray with no misgivings concerning embarrassing revelations in his home circle, and with no fear of detection in what he flattered himself was a clever hit of duplicity.

Hanlon's pleasure was somewhat marred when he discovered, later, that a conscienceless Jenkins had published the following significant paragraph in the society column of his paper:

"Mr. Daniel M. Hanlon left for Carson City on Sunday, and will return next Thursday."

As general agent for two insurance companies, Rolla V. Watt is brought into frequent contact on the street with men whose ways seem somewhat sinful and whose acts Mr. Watt, as chairman of the Christian Endeavor Convention Committee, frowningly condemns. He is even obliged to forego many innocent diversions which he could otherwise enjoy. At lunch in the Merchants' Club on the eve of the battle, William Greer Harrison was enthusiastically discussing the respective merits of the gladiators. Watt's muscular Christianity, without knowledge of his personal opinions, might fittingly suggest similar tastes on his part. In affected innocence, but really by way of guying him, the other insurance men deferentially solicited his opinion of the fight outlook. When his judgment was given, the expression surprised the coterie of ring patrons somewhat.

"I hope that Fitzsimmons will lick Corbett," said Rolla slowly. "Then I want to hear that Peter Jackson has whipped Fitz, and after that a Chinaman thump the nigger and a dog bite the Chinaman. Then,—well, one of you gentlemen might like to kick the dog."

In the days before John M. Beck became general agent of the Fire Association of Philadelphia, he was a local agent for several companies at Pasadena and by diligence and the aid of a wide acquaintance, secured a good line of business for his principals and some copulent commissions for himself. He never hesitated about mixing his social life with his business affairs, and one night he determined on a coup d'état. A ball was to be given at the Hotel Raymond and he was aware that the guests would include a girl whom he knew, and whose father was then holding the finest residence in the town. Beck resolved to seek this girl's assistance for his commercial aggrandizement. After paying her assiduous attention during the dance, he besought her good offices in inducing her father to place part of his insurance in the Beck agency. The young lady, after a little demur, gave the desired promise and the thrifty Beck was overjoyed when, on the following day, he received a note from the girl informing him that not only a share, but all of the insurance on the house would be placed through him, and enclosing a formal authorization to that effect from her father.

"Have just secured the best residence risk in the county. Top rates, and gilt edged," joyfully wired Beck to his companies, and with a light heart issued the policies protecting the house with $20,000 insurance.

For the next few days he did nothing but pat himself on the shoulder for his diplomacy and acumen, and complacently acknowledged the written congratulations of his superiors. The day the house was completed, Beck thought it about time to collect his fat premium, but that very night the mansion was burned to the ground and Beck's companies had a total loss on their "gilt-edged risk." He broke the news as gentle as possible to his principals and went off to the seaside to recuperate.

Sometime afterwards, Beck met the general agent of that company which was the heaviest loser by the fire, and received some ironical praise on the result of having a young lady transact his insurance business for him in a ballroom.

"Oh, well, I got even, if your old company did lose a trifle," answered Beck, coolly.

"How did you get even?" demanded the general agent.

"Oh, I married the girl," was Beck's blithe and ingenuous reply.

Without receding from his position condemning the effects of religious revivals, President David Starr Jordan is now content to answer his critics by simply recounting some of the humors of his experiences, and leaving the moral for others to apply. He discussed the topic in this vein while a guest at a suburban home, where there are several young men of similar scientific tastes to those of the distinguished President of the Leland Stanford Junior University. One of these boys became convinced, some months ago, that the world was about to come to an end, and concluding that all things material would soon be valueless, he suddenly dropped his researches into natural history, and devoted his entire attention to the evangelization of that portion of the world nearest him, making religious addresses day and night, whenever he could secure an audience. Dr. Jordan was ignorant of this new departure, and when his host casually remarked that his brother had just come in from the hills, supposed the latter had been pursuing his favorite study of the birds of California.

"Been out hunting, I understand?" said Dr. Jordan pleasantly, as the tardy youth entered.

"Yes—man hunting," was the sepulchral response of the amateur evangelist, who had really been holding an evening meeting at Colma.

Dr. Jordan was shocked, understanding that his friend had so far forgotten his social obligations as to attach himself to a sheriff's posse in pursuit of a criminal. He concealed his disapprobation, however, and inquired:

"Did you catch him?"

"Yes," replied the revivalist, dropping into scriptural metaphor, "snatched the brand from the burning."

"Oh, committed arson, did he? Glad you caught the scoundrel," said the college president, heartily.

And it was not until after his departure that Dr. Jordan learned the nature of his friend's "hunt," and understood the latter's offense at his unconscious flippancy.

Dr. Martin Regensburger has a young son, six years old, who has aspirations in the same direction as his immediate paternal ancestor. The boy has a little office and consultation room in the corner of his nursery, with a collection of pill boxes, and several rusty files, which he calls his instruments. He keeps his stock of drugs in an empty cigar box, the label on which interested him so much that he appealed to his father for enlightenment.

"That is Mose Gunst," and the doctor slowly spelled the letters of the name for his heir.

A few days later, the boy was observed attentively studying a framed portrait of Mozart, who, his father had often told him, was a great master of music.

"I know the name of your music master, papa," he volunteered.

"What is it, then?" obligingly asked Dr. Regensburger, who has not run up the scale for many a long year.

"Mose Gunst," artlessly replied the kid, misled by the similarity of the names of two famous men, as he pronounced them.

The search for a reason for the habitually uncravated condition of John P. Irish, naval officer of the port of San Francisco, has given rise to much speculation, and furnished the material for illimitable rallery. He is the anti-thesis of Eddy Eyre, the splendor and variety of whose imported neckwear causes envy among the Brownies. Some one may have seen the sun move, but no human being ever saw the throat of the naval officer encircled with a necktie. Col. Irish alleges as an ostensible reason for the omission that he has throat trouble, which requires freedom of action for his Adam's apple.

"When I was a young man, I could not even wear a collar," he explained to an impertinent questioner, "but after I was married, I found I had to wear the matrimonial collar anyway, and so I concluded that a strip of linen would not be much of an extra load to carry, but I drew the line at a necktie."

During a rainstorm a few days ago, while the wind was blowing a furious gale, Colonel Irish walked into the Post-office without an umbrella. A clerk glanced at him and solemnly passed out a piece of string, without comment.

"What's that for?" demanded the orator and journalist. "We thought it might do for a muffler," explained the postal employee.

The naval officer carefully surveyed the dripping skies and then waved a declining hand.

"No, it isn't raining hard enough yet for a necktie," he finally concluded.

A new record has been established for the meanest man who lives in Oakland and crosses the bay occasionally by the Broad Guage Ferry. After the string orchestra has played its choicest selections and the exiled Italian Count passes the plate, suggestively rattling a few nickels, the meanest man glances significantly at the Roman and then begins to fish in his pocket, while the musicians' treasurer waits with an expectant smile, but he finally produces only a pencil with which he draws representations of a harp on the edge of his newspaper, while the disappointed Count moves on in sadness. After several similar experiences, as the musician was commencing to recognize and avoid him, the meanest man has lately found it necessary to devise a new form of baseness. On his latest ferry trip he produced, instead of the pencil, a dollar.

"Just break this piece," he said, with a marked glance toward the contribution plate.

Congratulating himself upon such a gratifying change of heart, the victim, with eager eyes, handed out the change, and then the meanest man, after slowly counting the twenty nickels, deliberately returned them all, piece by piece to his own pocket.

Much interest was aroused last Monday on the streets and in the clubs when the wire announced the figures in the election of a Speaker of the House, showing that Francis G. Newlands of this city, and the sole representative of Nevada in the lower branch of Congress, had received just one vote for the Speakership.

"Frank would undoubtedly have beaten Tom Reed out of his boots, but for one little difficulty," remarked D. M. Delmas, musingly, as he sat in the hall of the Bohemian Club.

"What was his trouble?" queried genial Walter Turnbull, who never fails to snap at a bait.

"Why, you see, Newlands could vote only once," was the incisive explanation of the sarcastic attorney.

The shingle of Dr. John Morrison is not yet sufficiently weatherbeaten to indicate a very long professional experience. He is frank in admitting that the tide in his direction has not yet risen to any alarming height, and explains that the frock coat he wears is cut especially long to hide the weak points in the balance of his armor. Medical men consider him a master hand at the gentle art of "Oriental" repartee.

"How about your practice, Jack?" inquired an interested professional brother.

"Oh," replied Morrison, jauntily, "I am practicing patience while waiting for patients for my practice."

IN the present dearth of social affairs, the French opera has proved a veritable bonheur. Opera parties are quite the correct thing, and even for those who go simply to enjoy the music, the assemblage of pretty women in beautiful gowns and fine looking men in full evening attire is a joy in itself to contemplate. The Baldwin made a fine appearance also on Monday evening, most of the usual first-nighters doing honor to the first production of Gismonda by Fanny Davenport, theatre parties being present in good numbers. In fact, these were not confined to Monday night, but many were given during the entire week, and the dainty suppers which followed the performance were all the more enjoyed from the probable (?) fasting indulged in during the day.

The First Unitarian Church, on Franklin street, was the scene of the society wedding of the week, when on Tuesday last Miss Anna Deuprey and Orville Raymond Baldwin were united in marriage by the Rev. Mr. Stebbins. The church, which was very prettily dressed with ferns, palms and Bermuda lilies, was more than well filled with the friends of the young couple, the strains of the Lohengrin Chorus giving notice of the arrival of the bridal party promptly on time. The ushers, Messrs. Percy Mills and Douglas McBryde, who had been indefatigable in their efforts to seat the guests to their satisfaction, led the cortège as it entered, and proceeded up the aisle, and following them came two pretty young misses, the bride's sister, Claire Deuprey, and Lucille Tuttle, who were dressed in white mousseline de soie over pink silk, and carried clusters of Cecil Bruner roses. The bride, who came next escorted by her father, wore an exquisite gown of white dotted Swiss over white silk, the customary tulle veil, with natural orange blossoms in her hair, and in her hand bouquet. The groom and his best man, Hillyer Deuprey, awaited them in the chancel where the ceremony was performed. Relatives and a few intimate friends of the family were present at the wedding déjeuner at the Deuprey mansion on Clay street, and by the afternoon train Mr. and Mrs. Baldwin departed on their honeymoon trip South. The presents were numerous and valuable, many of them being articles most useful for the house-keeping they will enter upon when they return to town.

Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Ehrman's dinner, on Saturday evening last, in honor of Mr. Albert Ehrman and Miss Rose Neustadter, proved to be very enjoyable. The novelties in the way of dress reforms and tableaux produced more than expected laughter, especially as portion of the programme was entirely impromptu. The hostess, we are assured, will hereafter investigate her "surprise" party programme beforehand.

Thursday was a gala day at the Union Iron Works, a large crowd assembling to witness the launch of the two gun boats Wheeling and Marietta. The christening of the Wheeling was performed by Miss Lucile Brown, of Wheeling, Va., who had been selected by her townspeople for that service; and they will in due course of time present the vessel with china, glass and a silver punch-bowl.

Mrs. Francis Edgerton will this evening make her first appearance as President of the Mercantile Library auxiliary, when that body of ladies will give a reception at the Library, the chief feature to be the reading of Emelie Melville, who will recite scenes from Shakespeare and Schiller; the sweet voices of Alfred Wilkie and Miss Dorothy Goodsell will also be heard in illustration of old English ballads and parte-songs.

Mrs. Adams' monthly reception last week was a very pleasant one, music, both vocal and instrumental, alternating with dancing and games until a late hour, a handsome supper proving a most delightful finale to the evening's enjoyment.

Card parties are quite numerous at present, and the number who give them are increasing wonderfully as Lent goes on. One of the most elaborate of these affairs was given by Mrs. Hardesty in her rooms at the Hotel Stewart, the prizes provided for the ladies who competed for them being extremely handsome. Mrs. Frank Whitney, Mrs. R. P. Schwerine, Mrs. Hopkins, Mrs. Wilson, have also been progressive euchre hostesses, their parties ranging from small to very large, but all of them were very pleasant affairs.

A delightful evening was passed on Friday night at the Stern mansion, corner of Post and Leavenworth streets. Mr. and Mrs. Jacob Stern, who recently returned from a prolonged tour of Europe and the East, entertained their friends at a roulette party. The game was conducted on a magnificent scale, and much profit as well as credit must be placed to the efforts of "Banker Heller." A sumptuous repast was served, and early in the morning the party broke up.

San Rafael is already becoming the Mecca towards which the eyes of society are turning for their summer quarters, and present indications are that it will be the fashionable resort of the season. At the Hotel Rafael rooms are already in request, and many have been taken for the entire summer. The Gerstles and Slosses will return to San Rafael again this year, as their sojourn there last season proved remarkably pleasant. The Wordens, Townes, A. P. Reddings, H. S. Crockers, etc., are among those who have been recent guests at the hotel, and the cry is, "still they come."

Mme. Ziska inaugurated her usual series of spring receptions last Friday evening, Professor Saleberger being the "talker," and his theme "French Wit and Humor," which was greatly enjoyed. Among recent dinner hostesses may be named Mrs. Hermann Schussler, whose party was in celebration of the twenty-eighth anniversary of her marriage.

On Wednesday Mr. and Mrs. Jacob Mayer, of Portland, Or., celebrated their golden wedding at Alameda. The entire family, from all parts of the United States, assembled for the event. Mr. Sol Hirsch, ex-Minister to Turkey, is a son-in-law of the Mayer's.

Mr. and Mrs. Dick Pease are enjoying the varieties of Gotham's climate and taking in all the pleasures to be found in that charming village. Miss Eva McAllister is spending the winter in Washington City with her sister, Mrs. Frank Newlands.

Colonel and Mrs. Charles P. Eagan have returned from their trip to Europe—Colonel Eagan with added dignity of rank, having received promotion in his profession during his absence abroad.

That fortunate young couple, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Hobart, have been receiving congratulations this week from far and near over the arrival of a baby daughter.

Miss Grace Hecht, the "telegraphic" débutante of the season, gives an elaborate dinner on the 30th instant. A large number of invitations have been sent out.

On Friday night Miss May Slessinger informally entertained a few friends at dinner at her home. Later the party adjourned to the theatre.

Mrs. S. Fenchtranger's dinner was in honor of the bride and groom-elect, Miss Rosalie Neustadter and Albert Ehrman.

Mrs. Lily Coit's friends, whose name is legion, have been greatly concerned to hear of her serious illness.

THE GENUS TOURIST.

"HERE to-day, and gone to-morrow," pipes "Buttercup" in "Pinafore." That typifies the recent overland tourist party that swooped down upon us a few days ago over a hundred strong. They are a people who mean well, but they are like children out for a holiday, and sometimes to the detriment of the comfort of other people, very much like ill-behaved children. In people of mature years we learn to look for something different. Of course there is no positive harm in it, but we don't like our California languor to be disturbed, and we don't take kindly to lessons in culture of that sort.

On the ferries they flock; they are gregarious. They board a train and the average insignificant commuter has to shrink up within the smallest possible compass, and put his head out of the window to avoid the fusillade of interrogation points. Have you seen a flock of blackbirds, in the gentle springtime, alighting on the branches of a tree, and settling down to tell, in shrill accents, all about their little, dinky times? Then you know what the tourist party is like. The gladsome chattering back and forth, and around corners, and across people who are rash enough to have taken seats within the line of firing. The dungeon-like ladies' cabin of the Ukian was alive with them the other morning. Everywhere tourists and touristes. (Why not, if we persist in using somewhat ridiculously the word "artistes?") At Angel Island all flocked to the port side and threatened to capsize our cockle-shell craft. Nothing less than a stranded whale the every-day commuter put it up, and he flocked too, all by himself, only to return immediately and disgustedly to his seat. It was but the tourists going through their drill—getting all the scenery that was down in their itinerary, and who can blame them for admiring our beautiful military post, so romantically situated?

But they are harmless, though laughable. For instance, when there was a great hue and cry because Mrs. Somebody had lost "Henry," everybody in the party was telling everybody else to go and help Mrs. Somebody find Henry. The pleasures of the chase began. This is no breach of confidence, for they evidently thought Henry's defection and following detection interested all the passengers. At last Henry was located, enjoying a surreptitious weed, far from the din in the gentlemen's dungeon. Until then, we of the laity thought Henry was a seven-year-old who had eluded mamma's vigilance. He turned out to be a three hundred and fifty pound man of mature years and obviously solid standing in the community.

In the street car the chirping continued, much to the delight of the city-bred passengers, who are accustomed to the repose of the Vere de Vere in this wild and wooly country as compared with what they were called upon to notice, willy, nilly. When the car reached Montgomery street, one bright young lady arose and called in stentorian tones to those on the dummy, "There's the Palace," in a voice that would make her fortune in the passenger transferring department of that hostelry, and after the marvelous patience of the conductor had been sorely tried by long-drawn-out farewells to those they were leaving in the car, a half-dozen or more chatelaine-bagged feminines dropped off, on the wrong side, squeezing through the wrong part of the car, and were lost to sight in the enveloping rain.

But they bobbed us serenely again on the 5 o'clock trip across the bay, and judging from scraps of conversation caught en passant they had been doing Chinatown and having a royal time. Said one blithe damsel to a young stripling of about forty summers, who looked as if he wished she were not quite so self-evident (as indeed seemed to be the thought of most of the nicely behaved little men of the party. "Give me some gum. Let's go up and chew in front of Miss Ottinger." Oh Aeme of bliss! Oh innocent joyousness of the cultured daughter of the East!

THE Hungarian hand was playing a waltz; very few of the people dining in the Waldorf palm garden were aware of it; it was simply one more of the subtle ingredients, like a dash of maraschino in a sauce, that go to make dining something more than the satisfying of appetite.

The waltz was a familiar one, yet a nameless thing to hundreds of people who had danced to it, whistled it, hummed it but knew not whence it came or even how to designate it, though it had become a part of their being in the impressions it had wrought upon them.

Mrs. Wilfred James, dining at one table with Cary King and her aunt and cousins, the Duncans, with whom she was stopping at the hotel, was woefully conscious of it. Mr. Wilfred James, dining several tables away, half shut from view by a big palm, was entirely oblivious to it, and yet these two people had been as radiantly happy some three years before, floating about to its bewitching music as it is given to mortals to be. They had been separated now for six months. It had been a case of great beauty and love of admiration on one side, and of unreasoning jealousy on the other, with a large admixture of family interference to keep things seething.

She had not yet grown quite used to meeting him about; her heart still had an uncomfortable way of flunking an instant when she would first catch sight of him. To-night she had seen him the moment she had entered the dining room, and at a glance had taken in who the two men were with him. Since that moment she had devoted herself to being as entertaining as she knew how to be to her own little party, and had not looked over in his direction until they began the waltz. It was exquisitely played and it saddened her; how could it fail to do so? She remembered quite well how often they had danced together to it before she even knew that he cared, and afterwards when she was perfectly happy. * * * The waiter at the other table had been refilling the glasses with Burgundy. Now Burgundy was absolutely forbidden to Mr. Wilfred James on account of his gouty tendencies; but at the moment his wife had glanced in his direction she had seen him deliberately waiting for his glass to be filled, and a second look had found him calmly sipping it, she well knew with what satisfaction. She also knew in what torture he would regret it. Only thirty, he had inherited this painful legacy from his grandfather, who had also bestowed on him his fortune, and, in return for both, Wilfred's feelings toward that relative were not of unmingled gratitude.

During the three years of their married life his gout had been almost banished by the simple outdoor life he had led, and which she, sharing his love of sports, had enjoyed with him. Port and Burgundy, entrees and pates, were "not dreamed of in their philosophy" and now—her eyes suddenly filled with tears and her hand shook a little as she tried to chip off a bit of the misty pink ice on her plate, while she thought how actually foolhardy he had become without her.

After dinner they lingered awhile in the Turkish room; the aunt and cousins commenting on the people wandering up and down the corridor and through the rooms; while Cary talked commonplaces to her with his tongue and unutterable things with his eyes. She wearied of this after a while and went over to one of the little carved desks to write a note that she wished to send that evening. When she had finished she sat with it still before her, leaning her head on her hand in thought. Wilfred had just come into the hall. As she caught sight of him she impulsively drew another sheet of paper from the desk, tore it in half, wrote three lines and folded the half into a narrow slip; then she went back to the others, taking a seat beside her aunt on a red canopied divan near the corridor.

"Don't you want to take in an act or two of the play?" Cary asked, leaning over her. Wilfred was standing in the doorway talking with some friends. For a moment she caught his eyes upon her, then she looked smilingly up at Cary. "I should love to," she answered, "if Aunt Mary likes." Aunt Mary liked and so they all rose to go. Wilfred was still standing in the doorway, and Mrs. Duncan, having become aware of it, majestically led their exit through the opposite one; Mrs. Wilfred, before following, however, cast one more guilty look in his direction and thrust the bit of paper she still held, between the upholstered arm and seat of the divan.

A cold shiver undulated down Wilfred's spine as he watched the departure—the Duncans in front, and Cary once again beside his wife, who had waited while he went back to pick up her gloves, which she had dropped beside the divan.

Wilfred rubbed his hand confusedly across his brow. He could not take in what was being said to him. Anger, jealousy, a sense of humiliation, even pity, surged through him. Pity that she had so degenerated in the short time they had been apart, as to stoop to what he believed he had seen with his own eyes, and the cad had not even had the sense to find the note she had left there.

He excused himself, pleading illness, and went out into the night.

As he grew calmer the thought occurred to him that the note was still in the room where she had left it. What if some one discovered it? He turned, hurried along and re-entered the hotel. The Turkish room was almost deserted. He sank down on the divan as if waiting for someone, then he leaned wearily back and slipped his hand beneath the upholstered cushion. He was shaking with nervous tension and his fingers trembled weakly as they found the folded bit of paper they were seeking.

He pushed it forward, then his palm crushed over it and his heart contracted as at last he drew it out in his clenched hand. The room for a moment swam dizzily before him and there seemed something fiendish in the red glow that pervaded it.

His first impulse was to tear the paper into bits. He had not come for it to spy upon her, only to save her from herself. What folly had she written? Perhaps none, perhaps it was merely a bit of paper with some message upon it that had been handed to her. He despised himself for his sophistry; was he trying to fool himself into belief that he had a right to look at it? He had seen her at the desk, seen her smile at Cary a moment before she had slipped it into the divan and afterwards cast a frightened look in his direction. But what if it were nothing, and he was suffering all this torture unnecessarily? She was still his wife, he had a right to know—he must know if he were doing her an injustice. He opened the paper and looked:

"Dear Billie:—I saw you drinking Burgundy to-night. Have you gone mad? Please don't do it again."

He could have laughed for joy but he did not, and instead two great tears blurred the little paper in his hand. She was tender and good as she had always been; always, even when jealousy had made a devil of him and her family's interference had converted him into a fiend.

He gazed triumphantly around. Never before had the room appeared so exquisitely beautiful. Its soft red glow warmed his heart with hope, the delicate arabesques upon the walls were like the tender verdure of the spring, holding a promise of joy. He read the note again. It was just like her. She always called him Billie when she was trying to persuade him into anything. He folded it tenderly and put it in his breast pocket. Should he write her a letter? No, the Duncans might see it, and then there would be more comment and interference. A bright idea struck him. She would surely come and look to see if he had found the note; he would put another in its place.

"Dear Ethel:—I will give up Burgundy if you will write me another line."

She found it the next morning. She laughed a little and put it in her glove. She was going out but she stopped a moment to write an answer.

"Dear Billie:—Of course, I cannot be indifferent to your taking care of yourself, so please do for the sake of An'd Lang Syne."

He found it that night in the divan but had no glimpse of her.

"Dear Ethel—What is the use of taking care of one's self with nothing in life worth looking forward to?"

It frightened her a little when she found this note. She did not know quite where she was drifting now after all the desperate misery before and following their separation, but there was something deliciously absurd in the whole affair at present—this surreptitious writing to her own husband with a divan for a letter box and her aunt and cousins for dragons, such deadly dull dragons to be tied to as she found them.

She did not answer this last note but when she wandered into the Turkish room the next morning she found another awaiting her.

"Dear Ethel:—This will be a good bye. I cannot stand it any longer. I am going to sail for the south of France on Saturday."

She had taken the note into her own room to read after drawing it from its hiding place and she slipped down quite weak into a chair and tried to steady herself and think just what it meant to her.

Billie in the south of France and she dragging dismally around with her aunt; in a false position, every act criticized and nothing better to hope for in the future. Billie thousands of miles away, perhaps ill and she would not know it; perhaps falling in love with—she sprang up; she could not stand it. Oh! if he would only ask her to go with him, if she were only sure he wanted her. So she wrote:

"Dear Billie:—I want to say good-bye to you. I cannot have you go away without that."

It was Thursday. She found his answer that same night.

"Dear Ethel:—Try me once more and come with me."

She sent the following to his club, she was so afraid to trust it to the divan.

"Dear Billie:—I will come, but I shall have to run away from Aunt Mary. I don't dare to face her. Tell me how I can come to you."

He sent his answer by a messenger from the club.

"Dear Ethel:—Take your relatives, all of them, to the theatre this evening; have your maid pack your trunks, and I will see that they go aboard to-night. The steamer sails at ten, but if you will not mind an early breakfast, I will be at the hotel in the Turkish room at seven. Oh, Ethel, my darling, we will start all new again, and I shall try to make up for all the misery of the past. Your husband, WILFRED.

She did not know until she received this letter how homesick she had been.

When she found him waiting for her at seven he was the only one in the room. He was looking out of one of the windows but he heard her step and turned quickly to meet her.

She put out her hand but he only took it to draw her near and kiss her. "Are you all ready?"

She nodded; she could not speak; her lips quivered a little, and yet she laughed as he hurried her into his cab at the door.

"I feel as if I were doing something dreadful," she said at last. "I have written to Aunt explaining as best I could but I am afraid she will not understand."

"She won't have to," he answered gaily. They were rattling down the avenue by this time. "I understand though—I know what an everlasting fool I have been. I understand what I came very near losing." He kissed her again. "O Ethel, Ethel, I am only thankful that I understood in time."—Mary D. Hatch in The Peterson Magazine.

THE election of Henry J. Crocker to the Presidency of the Pacific Coast Jockey Club was an excellent selection. Mr. Crocker has taken a deep interest in the club, is a great horseman, and will maintain the reputation established for it by Mr. Spreckels. The places of all the gentlemen who resigned have been wisely filled, so that the club will doubtless preserve its high position as the exponent of square racing, enjoying the full confidence of the public, and fully deserving it.

THE TAVERN ON THE FRONT.

DOWN on the water front, empty, forsaken,
 Stands an old tavern, dust-covered and grey;
 Daily and nightly its timbers are shaken
 By the rough breezes that sport on the hay.
 Barred are its windows with meaningless shutters,
 Locked is the portal that never knew key;
 Filled are the halls with the ominous mutters
 Of winds that, imprisoned, make moan for the sea.
 Many long years the old tavern has carried
 The sign that is sad and too common: "To Let;"
 Few people saw it and none of them tarried,
 None of them viewed the old inn with regret.
 Brave were the men who attempted to run it,
 Loafers will pass it nor give it a glance;
 Even the venturesome little ones shun it,
 Policemen, when passing, will eye it askance.
 Yet it is said in the days long departed,
 Came to this tavern from countries afar
 Men that were mighty of limb, lion hearted—
 Men who had braved tribulation and war.
 Some of them came seeking fabulous treasure,
 Some of them came seeking freedom or rest.
 We of to-day may not venture to measure
 The hopes of the men that first came to the West.

Here came the miners and squandered their wages,
 Bought the red wine with a ruddier gold;
 Wrote in red letters the earliest pages
 Of doings long famous and ever re-told.
 Till the young sun with its golden-tipped finger
 Woke the great mountains with hosoms dew-pearled,
 Here in the tavern the heroes would linger—
 Telling the tales that awakened a world!
 Once the rooms echoed the sound of men's laughter,
 Heard, as they drank, the clear clink of the glass;
 Heard the brave singing that followed right after,
 Songs of the home, or the mine, or the lass.
 Now the strong singers are silent and sleeping,
 Drear are the chambers they sang in, and cold;
 Death and forgetfulness have in their keeping
 Those who once drank in the days that are old.
 Empty the house is, rat-ridden and rotten,
 Only the sunbeams caress its poor face;
 There it is standing, despised and forgotten,
 Left far behind in the city's mad race.
 Only at night-time, when slumbers the city,
 When the white mist covers hillside and street,
 Come the old spirits who love it and pity
 The place that once shook 'neath the tread of their feet.

San Francisco, March 20, 1897. HOWARD V. SUTHERLAND.

BICYCLING NOTES.

THE bicycle races, which open at the Mechanics' Pavilion to-night, will be the greatest indoor races ever seen in this country without any exceptions. The greatest aggregation of cracks which ever assembled at a race meet in this country are entered for the events which have been so arranged that every class of rider, from the short sprinter to the long-distance men will have opportunities to display their prowess.

One of the best events of to-night's programme will be the first heat of the five-mile race for the Club Cup Race. This event will be paced by tandems, and an endeavor will be made to pull the riders out under the amateur record for five miles.

There are sixteen entries for the professional scratch race, the distance being one mile. The entry includes Jay Eaton, the champion indoor rider of the world, Charley Wells, the hero of last year's indoor meet, W. E. Becker, the Minneapolis man who has been doing such good work on large gears recently, Frad Loughead, the champion of Canada, George Bovee, the Texas champion, Floyd Macfarland, the San Jose wonder, the Terrills and Allan Jones of this city, and others.

Mayor Phelan has consented to start the first race, and he will be the first Mayor of this or any other city to start a bicycle race. The Honorable Mayor takes a great deal of interest in cycling, and the management of the tournament knowing this, invited him to do the starting to-night in the first race. Society will be there in large numbers, as the entertainment is a first-class one, having none of the disagreeable features of many other sports. The music will be the best, Blanchar's Military Band having been engaged for the entire season of three weeks.

comes early to the clothes that are dragged up and down over the wash-board. It's ruinous. Nothing else uses them up so thoroughly and so quickly. This wear and tear, that tells so on your pocket, ought to be stopped. Get some Pearline—use it just as directed—no soap with it—and see how much longer the clothes last, and how much easier and quicker the work is. Pearline saves the rubbing.

Send it Back Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearline." IT'S FALSE—Pearline is never peddled, and if your grocer sends you something in place of Pearline, be honest—send it back. 513 JAMES PYLE, New York.

SAN FRANCISCO, MARCH 27, 1897.

 office as Second-class Matter

The office of the NEWS LETTER in New York City is at Temple Court;

 Representative), where information may be obtained regarding subscription and advertising rates.

REPUBLICAN Senators are still berating the Civil Service system. It is rather hard for the victors to find that they have been deprived of the spoils; but the country generally believes in the system of permanency in office and promotion on merit.

LOS ANGELES is just now engaged in rejecting several miles of asphalt pavement, involving an expenditure of more than $100,000. This is rather more than San Francisco has ever tackled at one time; but there is no doubt that a great many times $100,000 have been paid for work in this city that should have been condemned.

THE scandalous Clerk Duckworth was given a cane by his legislative associates last Saturday night, as a token of their regard for him for taking care of their friends on the stuffed pay-roll at the opening of the session. The cane would be more honorably worn out upon the shoulders of this object of general disesteem, than in supporting the carcass of him. A hundred canes could not prop up his battered reputation.

LARGE numbers of Japanese are going into Mexico, where they will colonize and cultivate a big tract of land. The indolent natives of Mexico will find that they are no match for the industrious Jap; and they will be given lessons of thrift and commercial enterprise calculated to rouse their hostility to the further introduction of Japanese. These progressive people are no more formidable when they are carrying a rifle than when armed with a spade.

THE Blythe case goes to the Supreme court, and the fair young widow is not yet through with the law's delays. However, compared with other celebrated cases, she has no great cause for complaint as to time or cost. The value of the estate is large, and unusual progress was made in reaching an ending, when all the conflicting interests are considered. This appeal may prevent final settlement for several years, but is not likely to finally disturb the result.

THE inquisitive nose of Max Popper, political reformer and purchaser of Supervisorial favors, has been inserted into the city's affairs once more. Max desired the Auditor to refuse payment of the increased salaries of police officers recently authorized by the Legislature. Broderick referred the exponent of pure politics in municipal management to the courts. Popper evidently has no sense of the humorous. He has no idea what a good joke he really is.

DURRANT has made his final appeal to the Supreme Court for a rehearing of his case, which will no doubt be denied, as his chief argument for another chance of escape is found in the alleged prejudice of the public mind, owing to the newspapers. There is nothing in this contention, which was fully considered in the Supreme Court opinion affirming his conviction in the lower court. Overruled a second time, the murderer will appeal to Governor Budd for pardon. We shall have no objection to the Governor's pardoning Durrant—only let the document be signed twenty-four hours after his execution.

THE removal of old and unused car tracks about the city, whose abandonment has been authorized by the street railroad system, will very materially aid the work of bettering the pavings. Now that the spirit of improvement is awakened it should be encouraged in every way.

IT has been discovered that the contractors on the Affiliated Colleges are mixing too much whiskey with their sand, and not enough Portland cement. The company saloon is playing an important part in the foundation of the structure. The combination should be broken by forfeiture of the contract, and a suit for damages against the conspirators, whose dishonest greed would shame an average legislator.

IT is a matter worthy of congratulation that Blanthier, the man who murdered Mrs. Langfeldt in this city, chose to take his own life rather than return and stand trial for his crime. But his judgment was decidedly bad. Had he known the history of murder trials in this State, he would have felt little fear from arrest. In California, for murder, we rarely make the punishment fit the crime; and Blanthier, had he a little money, might have counted upon dying of old age decently on his prison cot, rather than at the end of a rope.

THE fight for pure food continues, and the authorities are still swearing out warrants for the arrest of alleged violators. It is amazing that reputable firms will undertake to defend the sale of impure food. After having the character of the goods clearly established, there should be no effort to continue their sale. It is to the interest of the dealer to sell only pure food, and the merchants who fight the rigid enforcement of the law protecting the public from this sort of fraud are making a great mistake. Meantime the officers should push the crusade with vigor. Men who sell impure goods knowingly should be made to suffer for their dishonesty.

THE heavy snows in Chicago, the cyclones and the terrible floods further East, should recall to the grumblers of California that they hardly know when they are well off. Simple existence here brings more solid comfort than the accumulation of wealth in less favorable climes. Then the immediate future is bright. Crops of all kinds look well, and prices promise to be good. Hard as times have been, California's experience has been far more agreeable than that of the Eastern States. Notwithstanding the fact that the Republican advance agent of Prosperity is rather lagging, we may be able to get along without him. Industry and the resources of California make a combination that cannot be beaten, with protection or without it.

ONE of the nuisances from which the people of San Francisco suffer is the carts of the scavengers. Their wagons are not provided with covers, and as they are filled to overflowing with all manner of rubbish before being taken to the dumping grounds, their contents are scattered broadcast as they jolt along the streets. An ordinance compelling these energetic and odorous gentlemen of the swill-cart to have their wagon-boxes water tight as to bottom, and to provide their wagons with complete covers, would materially reduce the enormity of their filthy offenses. There are laws enough now to partially correct the evil; but they are not obeyed. It would be well to make them more comprehensive, and then instruct the police to rigidly enforce them. A few arrests and heavy fines would do the business. This aromatic subject is worth the Mayor's attention.

THE COMING MONETARY CONFERENCE.

THE House by a majority of 282 votes passed the Senate Bill, authorizing the President to call a conference of foreign authorities, to unite with the United States, in establishing an international ratio in the proportional prices between gold and silver. The St. Louis platform is to be given a chance. Consistency is to remain a jewel. Meanwhile Senator Wolcott has returned from his delightful trip. He was "treated like a Prince" in England, was "received with open arms by the economists of Germany," and actually assured that "if he could win over England, Germany would then be glad to take the subject up again." In other words, he was diplomatically received, but that is about all. His tail was tickled and plentifully sprinkled with salt, but nothing was accomplished at any point of the compass, but yet the high spirited Senator returns home full of hope that he has surely sown the seed of an international agreement. Mr. McKinley takes office charged with the duty of bringing about an international agreement on the silver question, and he has got to do it, or become, politically, a very sick man.

In entering upon this forlorn enterprise, it is interesting to note the absurd inconsistency of the party of the ins on the subject. Not an organ of that party, and not a stump speaker from McKinley down, in the last campaign, failed to prosecute the canvass on the line of ridiculing every principle of the bi-metallic doctrine, and denouncing its whole purpose as repudiative and dishonest. It was warmly denied that government had any power to change the relative value of the precious metals, or that it would be honest to exercise that power did the Government possess it. One and all joined in ascribing to the Bryanites the exclusive possession of such wild, fantastic, dishonest and revolutionary notions. But now the party's representatives in Congress have pretty unanimously set the seal of their approval to a measure designed to promote a policy of government differing in no respect, save from the policy of government advocated by the Bryanites. For if one Government cannot materially alter the relative values of gold and silver, then a dozen Governments cannot, even if they were inclined that way, which they are not. An international agreement would introduce silver monometallism no less certainly than independent action by the United States alone. With silver at 50 cents on the dollar, there is no nation or combination of nations that can long maintain it at par. Strong as they may be, the different Governments are debtors, and own very little of the world's money. With the silver strain upon them all, save England, they cannot any more raise silver to a parity with gold than they can lift the bed of the ocean to a level with the Himalayas.

Again, if government can so change the values of gold and silver, then an international agreement to restore silver to an equality with gold, would no less certainly cheapen gold and the dollar of the contract, and result in the loud voiced and much dreaded repudiation. The only difference between the two schemes is that the repudiation in one case would be less extensive and less disturbing than in the other. We do not believe in fooling the people any part of the time. We detest indirection, and believe in the people being told the whole truth. The fact is that there is not a man prominent in public life to-day who believes that international-bimetallism is practicable or of possible realization. It was adopted at St. Louis as a mere gilded device, intended to cover a temporary purpose. There had to be a show of doing "something for silver," or votes would be lost by the thousand. The International Conference idea was the tub that was thrown to the whale. It served to amuse the crowd that existed at the last election, but there its usefulness ended. Gold is the dearest money, and therefore is, and must continue to be, the money of ultimate redemption. The demagogues of the time and place may preach the virtues of the cheap dollar, but it will be without avail. There can be no more cheap dollar than there can be an 18 inch yard stick. Russia refuses to even consider the silver question, Chili has gone to the gold basis, Japan is making preparations to do the same thing. The United States, or rather a portion of them, are alone for silver-monometallism, and at the same time, strange to say, we are making strenuous efforts to take a leading part in the commerce of the world. To build up a foreign trade we must work with the tools of trade, and no tool is more essential than a safe and generally adopted means of exchange.

The Laws We Pass. Forty-five States furnish us with an estimated supply of 10,000 laws a year. Our own Legislature tried, but failed to get over 1200 bills through. Most of them, of course, are not general laws, but represent jobs, interferences with corporations likely to bleed, or with the affairs of Cities, Towns, or Counties that there is money in. Yet it is but fair to say that we have had many worse and few better Legislatures than this last one, which is not saying very much. That there has been bribery to a limited degree there is unfortunately very little doubt. But this is a common occurrence with each recurring Legislature, and is only what the NEWS LETTER predicted at the beginning of the session. It does not often or necessarily follow that a bill is bad because its passage has to be paid for. Some of the best laws now on the statute book have required money to pass them. It is a way that many of the impecunious members have of making an adequate salary and of paying their election expenses. It is a practice that has come to be looked upon with a degree of toleration that is simply shameful. The "combine" slipped through the courts four years ago, as easily as if bribing law-makers was good public policy. A bill has been introduced into the Kansas Legislature, and, it is said, will probably pass, making violations of the Ten Commandments criminal offenses, punishing "having any other God," with a fine of $1,000, and making theft, perjury and covetousness punishable with fine and imprisonment, at the discretion of the court. This is attributed to "Populism;" it will certainly not be credited to Californiaism, but think what a rabble must have got into the State House when such a bill can be introduced and seriously discussed. On the same day the Kansas Senate was thrown into a great excitement by two members who said they had been offered $1,000 for their votes; there was much feeling, but nothing came of it. Bribery is the only natural means of getting laws passed and good and bad alike go that way. The evil done has often been shown up by the NEWS LETTER, but it will take a cyclone of public opinion to stop it.

The History Of The Examiner says it cannot get at the news, or expose crooked ways unless "The Robbers' Roost." it breaks into men's despatch boxes, read their private letters, and whines because it must be held responsible for the lies of any scoundrel it may pick up to tell stories it wants to hear. Good journalists do not get their news in that way, nor deal with it in such slipshod fashion. No greater responsibility exists on earth than that of getting at the secret of public affairs, with a view to publication. The man who says that he is not responsible for what he has published, and is privileged to keep the names of his authorities secret, does not know the law, or what constitutes public policy, and ought to be kicked out of a newspaper office as a numskull and a fool. The exposé of the "Robbers' Roost" by the NEWS LETTER some 16 years ago, and which is now almost daily quoted by the Examiner, was not made upon any such weak and cowardly principles. We stated what we knew, challenged investigation, and stood ready with our well garnered proofs and adequate corroboration. But we should have been under no obligation to name who had put us on and kept us on the track. We had done our work too well to render any such betrayal of trust necessary. If the stories told us were true, it was easy to make an independent verification of them. Any journalist who could not do that may be "a new journalist" but he is not fit for the position he holds. Long Green Lawrence says he cannot do it that way, but then he is not a journalist. It is a way as well known to the capable journalist as the road to market. No trained newspaper man ever "gives away" his original authority, because it is bad policy and worse practice to do so. He is not trusted again, gets a bad reputation and mouths are closed when he appears. When a story is true it can always be run down and verified. In the case of "the robbers' roost," a three story building just opposite the capitol was taken and made to serve purposes that created a sensation at the period, and for ten years caused the house of evil name to be without a tenant. To this hour it has never been known how we got our information, nor has the information we published ever been successfully questioned. We say it most unqualifiedly and in the presence of experienced men, that no competent reporter has need to name his original informant, because he takes care to verify all serious matter and never uses it otherwise. When he falls back upon the "privileged communication" fake, he either falsifies, or knows he cannot afford to produce his wretched informant.

A Practical Problem. The Salvation Army inflicts much anguish upon the ears of inoffensive and peacefully-disposed citizens by its most unheavenly music; but at the same time the organization is not without the grace of practical value as a filler of aching stomachs and an aid of the needy. Commander Booth-Tucker stood up the somnolent Chamber of Commerce one day this week, and poured a great deal of practical information into the ears of the assembly there present. The Commander desires to plant members of the unemployed and destitute, now congesting the city, in the fresh atmosphere of the country, where they may become self-supporting, and in time add something to their own worth and the wealth of the State. His scheme is similar to the plan successfully worked out by General Booth in England, and like nearly all the efforts of the unmelodious army, has a practical turn that commends it to hard-headed business men. The plan of General Booth was to buy large tracts near London, reclaim and cultivate them, and in this way make the occupants independent. Tucker's plan begins in the city where lots, blocks, and other tracts in the municipal limits may be cultivated as truck patches, on the Pingree plan.

There is an element of heaven in Tucker's idea that should at once enlist the attention of practical men, even though its soundness had never been demonstrated; but inasmuch as the results have already shown its great value, the only question before the army here is the problem of money. At the Chamber of Commerce meeting quite a number of prominent citizens were present, and at the conclusion of his remarks Tucker was thanked, and an aid committee of fifteen, to be hereafter named, was resolved upon. The question of helpfully caring for the helpless in American cities is a growing one, and it cries aloud for solution. The plans of the Salvation Army offer by far the most hopeful field for the poor who are always with us. The Salvation Army has the perfected organization for making such a movement general throughout the country. Added to the intense earnestness and practical methods of dealing with dirt, death, sin, and salvation, for which the tambourine and bass drum hosts are righteously famed, they are recorded as being honest. So far as we remember, there have been no thieves among the Salvationists. Their officers of trust do not default and run away, as is frequently the case with the clean-lined elect. Business men may feel safe in joining Booth-Tucker in his praiseworthy effort to lift the yoke of grinding want from the shoulders of the destitute in the midst of us.

The Eastern Question. What shall be done with the empire of the unspeakable Turk? is one that can be answered very easily and to the general satisfaction of European powers. Put to a vote they would unanimously agree to a partition of the whole Ottoman territory. There is no sentiment which would prevent it, and no innate love for the Sultan or his subjects. The subject has been so long considered that they know just how they would go about it, too. Germany is not an active candidate for a portion of the spoils. Italy would be content to see the boundaries of the buffer State of Montenegro enlarged. Austria could be bought off with a concession in European Turkey which would give her an outlet on the Mediterranean at Salonica. France would like a foothold in Syria. England, besides some small scraps that would fall to her share, would profit by a confirmation of her hold on Egypt which Russia would not deny and France could not. Russia would take the balance, giving her full control of the Dardanelles and the Black Sea, a Mediterranean naval station in the island of Crete, and possibly a port on the Adriatic. Why has it not been an accomplished fact long ago? Simply because it means war. This would not deter the allied powers, but the leash which holds the modern dogs of war is held by bankers, not by princes. The powers behind the Powers are the bondholders. The Rothschilds of Paris and London, their clients and associates are the great creditors of the Osmanli. With Turkey intact they stand to win enormously on bonds which they purchased for a song when Turkey first defaulted. A war involving the Turk would bankrupt that empire and expose to repudiation the holdings of a thousand millions of dollars of bonded Turkish indebtedness. Russia, with eyes fixed on Constantinople, has been straining upon the start ever since her success was frustrated by the treaty of Berlin which closed the Russo-Turkish war. The same hand holds her back which protects Turkey. That is to say, the same hand is filled with Russian bonds. Germany prefers the massacre of Christians and the inaction of Greece, not because war is distasteful—it would be recreation for Wilhelm—but because the debt of 180 millions under which Greece already staggers, is mainly held by the German customers of the Bleichroder's Bank at Berlin. They cannot afford to permit Greece to endanger her ability to pay. Princes and potentates pose as the rulers—the arbiters of war and peace—but Bellona responds only to the bondholder's nod, and the bondholder will not nod until he has consulted the strong-box where his securities lie.

A Geographic Sentiment For Greece. Take any large reliable atlas and open it at the map of Greece. Observe the Peloponesus—the southern peninsular division of the Kingdom of the Hellenes.

In shape it approximates the resemblance of a human right hand with the back toward you. The wrist is in the northwest. The fingers and thumb stretch out to the southeast, extending in a grasping posture as though clutching at the island of Crete, which lies directly before them. It is no astral hand that thus strives to lay hold on the coveted island. It is distinctly of the earth, earthy. The well-formed thumb terminates in Cape Skyli. Three of the fingers are easily traced and they have at their tips Capes Malia, Matapan and Gallio. The fourth finger you may fancy doubled beneath the palm, or amputated,—lost perhaps in earlier struggles for Crete. The whole hand is attached to the Grecian mainland by a narrow land ligature which separates the gulfs of Lepanto and Ægina. Other gulfs divide the fingers. Now look at Crete. The island has the rough outline of a man's full figure, with the Mediterranean at his back and the Aegean sea in front. His head is to the west and wears a cap whose long peak forms Cape Spada. The mouth, at Canea, holds a short curved pipe. The feet are conspicuous, and the toes are Cape Sidero. The face looks toward Greece. This is not all. The subdivisions of the island fit the fancied semblance perfectly. Khania is the head and cap, Retimo the chest and Candia the legs and feet. Politically, the Grecian hand held Crete in the old days before the Moslem flood overwhelmed both. Geologically, Crete was a part of the mainland until an upheaval of Mediterranean floods broke the whole southern portion into numerous islands, tore Crete from the Peloponesian hand, and indented the mainland with gulfs and bays. The ties of religion and consanguinity still demand reunion, the hand still reaches out for its ancient possession, and nature confesses the justice of the claim. But this is sentiment—something which does not form the basis of action in the European Concert.

The Greek Situation. Greece is bold and, so far, is holding her own remarkably well. But it is to be feared that she cannot go much further. With Europe combined to compel her to keep the peace, nothing is left her but to withdraw from Crete for the present; but she will get there again, and, meanwhile, much is gained in the autonomy that is to be extended to the little island. If real trouble breaks out we may look for it on the borders between Thessaly and Macedonia, and in that event it is hard to say where matters will end. The people of England, France and Italy are not for war with Greece. It is easy to discern that a resort to arms may be had any day.

That Filibustering Decision.

The Geneva award in our favor has made our duties as neutrals very perplexing and difficult of execution. We had much bother between Chili and Peru, and, later, our obligations to Spain in regard to the rebellion against her authority in Cuba have tried our officials to the utmost. We are bound by the principles we asserted and maintained against England at Geneva. A decision of very great importance to all our allies and neutrals was handed down overruling the decision of Judge Locke of the Southern District of Florida in the case of the filibustering steamer, the Three Friends. Had the Supreme Court sustained Judge Locke, it would have been impossible for the Government to legally prevent filibustering expeditions. The famous decision of Judge Ross, afterwards sustained by Judge McKenna, now goes by the board, and at the instance of the highest appellate court in the land. The Three Friends, while on a voyage to Cuba last autumn, commenced open and avowed hostilities against the regular Cuban Government, and Spain called upon our Government to begin a suit for forfeiture against the vessel by reason of its violation of the neutrality laws. Judge Locke held that the vessel could not be forfeited under the statute, because nondescript bodies like the Cuban insurgents are not included in the words "foreign prince, or state, or of any colony, district or people." These words it was held were only intended to apply to governments to whom the rights of helligerency had been extended. Spain was such a country, whilst the Cuban insurgents were not. That is the doctrine we laid down and maintained during our civil war, and our best citizens have been pained to think that our Courts were inclined to abandon the clear and honorable course we had at first taken up. In the history of international law no such weighty and authoritative recognition of the principles that should regulate friendly nations in their action towards each other, has ever been given as this by the United States Supreme Court.

Oom Paul's New Constitution.

President Kruger is minded to provide a brand new constitution for the Transvaal. In point of fact he wants no constitution at all, save his own sovereign will. Since England occupied the country there has been a written fundamental law, which by the vote of the Volksraad and the general consent of the people, has been looked upon as the higher law or constitution of the land. It provided for a High Court, as like unto our own Supreme Court as two peas. This High Court has been in the habit of setting aside acts of the Volksraad, not in accordance with the fundamental law. Kruger wants this stopped, and has just caused the Volksraad to adopt a resolution requiring the Judges to at once renounce by oath their right to pass upon the constitutionality of laws, or to resign. He says, "the Judges must abide by the voice of the Raad, or go." This is pretty good Populistic doctrine, and the uproar over its adoption in the Transvaal hints pretty plainly at what might be expected here. The plain, blunt, and unpolished Boer, who has done so much for his country, is making a mistake in trying to cause a revolution backwards. It cannot be done. He must render it possible to live and invest in the Transvaal, or the claims of the Uitlanders will have to be conceded. If he will go ahead and pass measures necessary to mining and other interests, there seems no disposition to disturb him in his troubled position of governing Boerland.

A Proposal to Beat the Trusts.

Any sure way to heat the hideous trusts would be worth millions. Yet the Senate in Albany, N. Y., believes it has hit upon a plan to accomplish this result. The proposed law makes it unlawful for any person to advertise for sale, or to sell any article at less than its cost price, or at a price so low as to injure the business of another merchant." It is a curious proposal in which there is much more than meets the sight. What we like most about this bill is that it goes to the root of the matter, and declares "that any one who sells anything anywhere so low that it injures the business of anyone else, shall be punished." That is truly sweeping doctrine, far-reaching in its action, and not to be mistaken in the tendency of its operations. The thing that is so repulsive about Trusts is that the single trader is nowhere in competition with a combination of millionaires. The weakest must fight the strongest or go to the wall. We are all individual dealers in or producers of something, and what galls us is that some one is always offering it at a price a little lower than our own; obviously there is hardship here, and the same hardships exist wherever anything is produced or sold. In fact, it is to be found all the way from Greenland's icy mountains to India's coral strands. There is no special legislation about this hill. It applies to all classes, and gives the rich and poor relief alike. It says nothing about monopoly, or combination, but forbids any one to sell at a price so low that it will injure any one else. The person so injured will at once prefer complaint and justice will be done. Of course, objections can be made to this bill, as they can to any bill, but when nobody can undersell anybody else, there can be no dispute about the adequacy of the remedy to the seller or the producer, though the consumer may not be just as well served. The bill may be a joke, or a piece of ridicule, but it is the only really effective remedy for the everlasting Trusts we have yet met with.

Generously Leads The Way.

Mayor Phelan is like wine: he improves with age. His latest act of general commendation was the gift of $1000 for the building of the boulevard. This sum added to the Mayor's original check places to his credit $1500 in aid of a worthy improvement and the ueedy unemployed. Mayor Phelan is no doubt a believer in the force of example. He does not point the way like a sign board hut leads in a direction that is luminous with merit. His influence and prompt generosity should induce other men of wealth to come forward at once. The funds being raised are used in a most economical manner. Every dollar, he it remembered, is worth two just now. The men who are employed and those dependent on them, would have to be fed in any event, and contributions would be in order just the same. Now the hungry are cared for, and the city is getting full value for every cent expended. The appeal of the Mayor has the right ring, and it should result in bringing out many who are abundantly able, who have hitherto given nothing. In this connection it might be well to point out the extreme propriety of city employes who are drawing regular salaries making addition to the boulevard fund. The teachers in the schools could further endear themselves to the public heart by contributing toward this fund. The salaries of all public employes are far above the amounts paid for similar labor in commercial pursuits, and it is but just that they should be heard from now. Their easy bread and butter is secure; let them do a little for a good cause, and for those less fortunate. Meantime the Mayor's generous deed shows the way to our many millionaire citizens.

A Senseless and Humorous Caricature.

While the "funny papers," so-called, may safely take some latitude not allowable in serious journalism, their wanderings should not extend beyond the pale of decency. The taste of subjecting to disgusting personal caricature a President of the United States is not "questionable," it is unquestionably had. It is more; it is an insult, not only to the sovereign majority who placed him in his exalted position, but to the nation at large. It would be so construed if seen in a foreign print.

This reflection will naturally strike any one who has glanced at the lithograph which is given the place of prominence in the "Inauguration number" of Judge. The picture of an out-going President of the United States as a swine-bodied churl being thrown from a train, the moral of this color-blot on decency being pointed by the label "He's Off," is one to disgust every decent beholder of either party—all things considered, a Republican more than a Democrat, since in his case a feeling of shame must be added to disgust. (Perhaps we should give the caricaturist credit for admitting the poor likeness by printing conspicuously on the falling hat the name "Cleveland"). The picture has not even the faintest element of humor to palliate the outrage of its being. It is as void of wit as of good taste.

A President naturally vacates his office when his term expires. There is nothing ignominious in the fact that he is no longer President, and Mr. Cleveland was not even a contestant for the place. When a man steps down from a lofty position no one but a bully, and a vulgar bully at that, can feel any desire to kick him as he goes. What- ever faults the opposition may charge against Mr. Cleve- land's administration, he is a gentleman, and has left the Presidential chair with the dignity attaching to that character; undoubtedly, also, with the extremest good feeling toward and from his successor. Neither, presumably, regards himself as thrown out or as having thrown any one out. There is a legitimate field for the humorist and the caricaturist in political warfare. But each must make sure that his weapons have the keen edge of wit and humor instead of coarse vituperation and per- sonal ridicule, and that they are aimed at the acts of the directing general, not at the back of a retired officer when the war is over. If Judge has any owner, publisher, or accredited editor, and is not given over wholly into the hands of an irresponsible and, unfortunately, vulgarminded caricaturist, it should call a halt and order its artistic corps to a school of journalistic decency.

Supervisor Rottanzi stood manfully by his guns, and went down before the high hat brigade with flags flying and drums beating. He did his duty as he saw it; and incidentally as nine out of about every ten male citizens of San Fran- cisco saw it. Needless to say the duty was not on the stage or the lecture platform, for had that been the case it would have been hidden behind the legitimate object of his humane attack. That the Supervisors failed to pass the ordinance—at least in a modified form—proves that their fear of certain lectures exceeded their duty to a suffering and patient constituency. The high hat is a thing of beauty, but it is not a joy forever. Its spread of sail may delight the female heart, but on occasion it carries biting discontent and impenetrable gloom to the hearts of those who pay for the tickets. Ornithology is a delightful study, but it cannot be pursued without pre- judice at the theatre. It shines better at a museum. Ostrich tips are not the kind that the most inveterate sport would care to look on at the play house. But enough: Rottanzi lies buried beneath the high hat. The blood of the martyr is the seed of the church; and Rottanzi will rise again. Let him embellish his ticket with the highest triumph of the milliner's art when he next runs for office, and we'll make him Mayor.

Journals Not Fit To Be Read. The Century Club, of New York, having excluded the Journal and World from its files and club house, as not fit to be read, is another step towards the extirpation of a social pest. The N. Y. Nation says the movement has now become a popular one, and may be expected to extend far and wide. It ought to find imitators throughout the nation. There are other filthy publications in other cities that ought to be put under the ban equally with the two that are meeting with exclusion by the Century Club and others. It is possible for the decent people in several communities to reform these journals and save their children from the moral blight which threatens them by putting such a stigma upon them that the mass of unthink- ing people who now support such journals will drop them, and, when they do so, the reform will come. It is simply a matter of dollars and cents, says the Nation, with the publishers of these vile sheets. Whenever they find that dirt does not pay, they will stop publishing dirt. Clubs and public libraries can hasten this consummation if they will, by making dirty newspapers unfashionable.

ECHOES of the great Bradley-Martin ball, whose cost set all the sensational New York preachers and sen- sational papers discussing and condemning the right of a person to spend his wealth as he please, so long as he wrongs no one, are awakened by a clever parody just put on in that city by Hammerstein. The name of the musi- cal burlesque is Mrs. Radley's Bartons Ball, and in gor- geous costumes and all its elegant accessories, it is said to be a faithful copy of the original. Now our friends the gossipers, and the sleuths of the gutter, will have another opportunity to point another moral and adorn another tale.

ART JOTTINGS.

THE art event of this week is the picture painted by Keith and presented to the Bohemian Club by that artist, where it now stands on the easel in the Social Room. It is a large canvas, and is certainly one of the most strik- ing woodland pictures in many respects which has come from Keith's studio. It is entitled "The Unceasing Round," and presents a deep forest glade, with a monster redwood tree in the foreground. A strong light strikes in from the right of the picture, making a delicious contrast with the cool and almost dusky gloom of the background, through which some woodsmen are passing. Its treatment is unlike Keith's methods, giving more detail and more expression of form, so to speak, and there is a feeling of intense strength through all. Mr. E. R. Taylor was inspired by this fine work to write an ode thereon. He says:

In center of the canvas see this pine
All stark in death, with arms in vain appeal
For what it nevermore can taste or feel
Of joys of earth, or of the heavens divine.
Straight as in life it stands, still bearing sign
Of noble majesty and dauntless will
While at its base its elder brothers spill
Their ashes where the grasses kiss and twine.

This will be an important addition to the many fine paint- ings which now decorate the walls of the Bohemian Club. It is richly and artistically framed.

Moonlights and marines are now the fashion. Charles Rollo Peters has sent up two new and clever studies of moonlight effects in Monterey. Mr. Peters, who is very industrious, must now be the possessor of acres of moonlit sea and shore.

Robinson exhibits a pleasant marine, carefully painted, and nice in out-of-door feeling. It is what one might call a wholesome picture of shore and sea, of sun and breeze, faithful and refreshing to the eye.

Strong is so busy filling orders for his pastel portraits that he finds time for nothing else. His studies of South Sea scenery, which were brought up by Alfred O. Larkin, might be continued, for Strong has an abundance of sketches made among those pleasant isles to draw upon.

Elizabeth Strong exhibits a large landscape, apparently from the prolific Monterey quarter, which is most original in treatment and altogether out of the regular lines. It is very rich in color, and is of the French school, with per- haps more attention to detail than they usually bestow, deeming color paramount to everything. The atmosphere is there—one can feel the summery glow, and the long sedge and grasses in the foreground are Nature itself.

Joullin has finished a delicate little study of marsh land and water in the advanced twilight. It is soft in tone, and the effect is sentimental and harmonious.

Donald deV. Graham made some sketches when in the Sandwich Islands, whence he has just returned with Messrs. Gillig, Unger, and Hamilton. Mr. Graham has resumed his instructions in singing, as painting is with him simply a pastime.

'We obey no wand but pleasure's.'—Tom Moore.

I AM glad to see that our modest little opera enterprise at the California Theatre has not fallen into the hands of the financial writers. Grau went to Chicago without two star singers and without a guarantee. Furniture was visible all over the Auditorium. As one reporter chronicled the performance: "all that was lacking to make up a perfect ensemble was an audience." The Chicago critics wrote by the half-column, the financial experts by the half-page. Analogies were drawn between the prices of wheat and the prices of opera; canny calculators expounded on the declining glory of the stock-yards. Somebody pretended that the absence of Melba and Eames caused the slim houses. Nobody believed him. There were Calve, Lehman, Plançon and the de Reszkes—the $4,000 per-night team of immortal de Reszkes—and all the big little people. "Hard times" was the real apology. The rich, the gorgeous lardy-dah rich of Chicago, even syndicated on the boxes. Four big families pooled on one and shook dice to see which would get it on choice nights. "Grau is on the hog, this time sure," said a Cook county wag. And poor Grau dug long and deep to pay salaries, while a few real music-tasters sat in cheap seats and thought what a lovely time of it they were having at his expense. "I'll never come here any more" said Grau, "without a guarantee;" and he cut the prices down until you could huy the best seat in the Auditorium for two dollars.

I say again, I'm glad our modest month of French opera has not required the services of the journalistic financiers. We are a proud little people, we are, and we have done better by the unknown incandescents of the New Orleans Opera House than Chicago has by the effulgent arc-lights of the Metropolitan. And what our cheerful three dollars, two dollars and one dollar do not contribute to the adequacy of the receipts, thirty brave guarantors, check-book in hand, are ready to make good.

Sometimes angels tread where fools are timid.

Opera companies do not trouble us often now, and we are not forever holding up the hogie of other days, those good old palmy days when we got the hest and paid for it. The present public, most conveniently, has become reconciled to the French organization's scenery and the fluctuating value of its choruses, and settled into quiet, steady patronage and decent appreciation of other stable merits of the performances. The audience invariably arrives late, and the first acts of all the operas are invariably scattered. Perhaps one causes the other—we will give the French people the benefit of the doubt.

I regret the shambling first act of The Huguenots Tuesday night: first, because there are good things in the act, and afterwards because it was an injustice to the rest of the performance, which, in points of strength, unanimity, and authoritative leadership, was a distinctively good one for the most part. Foedor, who seemed tired, uncertain, and out of the spirit in the role of Rachel in La Juive at the Saturday matinee, fairly flamed in the music of Valentine. She seemed to be re-vitalized. Her throat was free and open, and her tone came high and true with the sweep of youth and the throgh of sympathy in it. In the intensity of her parting scene with Raoul she forgot not to act, forgot to pose, forgot to be old-fashioned and prima-donnish, and flung herself into the tumult of the scene with real actorial ardor as well as vocal heroism. The night was Foedor's. I was sorry there was not a tenor at hand who could have shared in some of the glory. Prevost, in my estimation, is hopeless. Last week I tried to do justice to his well-put high C, but I passed over the rest of him with the mild description, "assertive but not sensational." I take it back. Prevost is sensational. So are fire-crackers, harbed wire, and the callopie. His is the steamiest, most eruptive, explosive, non-musical tenor that ever went off in my ears. I hold human life a precious thing, but if at any time during the four acts of The Huguenots, Prevost should find his mouth an inadequate safety-valve for Raoul's hoiler throat, and explode upon the spot, I promise to make the obituary one of the most cheerful features of that week's NEWS LETTER.

Prevost was the one serious hot on the performance. Raoul is an important character in the opera; many of the others are not, strictly speaking. Even the page is not so important as Mlle. Savine looked in his handsome clothes. At least, not unless he is sung proportionately well. And no one can accuse Savine's singing of equalling the tranquil self-satisfaction of her presence. But who ever heard of a comic opera queen, no matter how humble, being submerged in anything, even Meyerbeer?

Since it is getting to be such an old and usual story to say that Albers carried off the honors of the performance, I am glad in this instance to say that he did not. It is not in the part of de Nevers. Albers was a picture; he sang with splendid forcefulness and virile grace, and that cordial magnetism of his which reaches over the lights and finds and touches us where we live and feel. It does not take a superior person to know that Albers is a wonderful man. His warm art is unmistakable. I notice the audiences are petting him shamelessly. But he does not seem to mind it a bit; he goes right along the even baritone of his way, working as only an artist will work, cheerfully, competently, until it does not seem to be work at all. And think of the responsibilities Albers carries around with him! He is the French company's link between mediocrity and greatness. Lose him and there would be little incentive to crush hats and real opera cloaks. That is, unless one remembers the hallet. It is not a big hallet, and it numbers only one première danseuse worthy of italics, but for sheer fleetness of limb, lissomeness of vertebrae, and all the flexible, sinewy, sinuous usefulness of the female form in action, it commands our best attire. The girls are not of that devastating youth and beauty which makes one give up home and mother without a struggle, but they made the hallet scene very joyous moments in this production of The Huguenots. And de Consoli danced shadows all over the desert pates in Observation Row—danced dreamily, dulcetly, glitteringly, fervently, volcanically; threading with slim, serpentine legs verse that any minor poet might be proud to kick off.

I did not notice any one sleeping through The Huguenots. We all slept more or less at L'Africaine; but this time it was a more exciting Meyerbeer and a more exciting stage. Anyway, the dead could not have slept while Prevost sang, and when he was not singing, there was no particular inducement. Berthet disposed of Queen Marguerite's music rather tidily in that cool, flute way of hers; and Athes and Gavid were weak, but not without a certain dramatic affability, in the roles of Marcel and St. Bris. The chorusters were astonishingly valiant as the opera wore on, working up to an impressive storm in the great weapon-hessing scene. Nicosias seemed to bring a bigger and hetter volume than usual from the orchestra: the brass was not choked, and the reeds and strings, given more sway to maintain the balance, improved in articulation.

I have written at some length about The Huguenots because it is practically the only theme available. La Juive, at the Saturday matinee, developed several good hits of ensemble work—otherwise it was not a brilliant affair. Foedor's singing was dull—although she did make a good effort in Rachel's big aria. But she was tired. Worse luck, Prevost was not.

The Voyage of Suzette on Saturday night was several shades brighter than the Miss Helyett performance of the Saturday previous. The music (by Leon Vasseur) is quickly intimate, and the comedy is full of action. But I cannot regard these comedy people seriously. (And that is no joke). They are only the side-show of the French Opera organization.

At last I have found the man who thinks two brains are hetter than none to build a vaudeville act. At last, after writing, preaching, cavilling at the variety perfesh for not having its skits, sketches and acts written by somebody fairly versed in the decencies of English speech, I have found my man. His name is Henry Lee, and he is at the Orpheum. He is a reformed 'leading man,' and he does a twenty-minute portraiture act entitled, "Great Men—Past and Present." See Mr. Lee and you have advanced several years in music-hall education. Admire his mimic virtuosity, his facial plasticity, and the rapidity and life-likeness of his costuming—admire these, for Lee is an artist and an innovator. And then take off your hat to the man who wrote the lines that go with them. The author is an Englishman, and he opens with William Shakespeare reading Jacques' melancholy epigrams on the seven ages of man, and ends with Mr. Gladstone delivering his farewell speech. Shakespeare, we are told, was a notoriously bad actor, so perhaps it is only fidelity to history that makes Mr. Lee appear at his worst in the Shakespearean scene. The others are all good—Bismarck, Dickens, Pope Leo, Kipling, and half a dozen more. The Pope makes the finest picture, a perfect cameo that sheds the magnetism and mysticism and the serene imperiousness of this leader of leaders. But the Kipling satire is exquisite. Kipling wears the cool, milky ducks of India, and the cool, incisive candor that is all his own. "Kipling—Rudyard Kipling—that's my name," he draws—"a curious, but striking one. Profession, a story-teller—in the proper sense of the word, of course. Discovered Tommy Atkins and a large portion of India, which I afterwards sold to the English nation in several volumes for a considerable sum." Then the Barrack-Room Bard tells us how he made a minute study of America in twelve hours. "But that's another story," he says—"which you can obtain at my publishers."

ASHTON STEVENS.

Otis Skinner commences a three weeks' engagement at the Baldwin Monday night in His Grace de Grammont, a play by Clyde Fitch. Let us hope it will be worthy of the author of Beau Brummel. The time of Charles II glows with dramatic color, and the French exile, "Chevalier de Grammont" offers the gamut of gallantry, wit, feats of arms and all the enticing charms of "the romantic." Skinner is said to be supported by a strong company and vivid romantic scenery. Saturday night he will play Hamlet.

To-night the French singers at the California present Faust, with Foeder as Marguerite; Tuesday Aida will be given; Thursday, Rigoletto; Saturday a repetition of La Juive. Albers is sure to do great work in Aida and in Rigoletto, and La Juive will well stand repetition if Massart is the tenor. Sunday night Suzette will be repeated at reduced prices.

Cissy winks a fond farewell Sunday night, and Monday sees Mr. and Mrs. Russ Whytall at the Columbia in a new war romance, For Fair Virginia, which is heralded as a big New York success. As in Gillette's famous war piece, Secret Service, the fighting is all done quietly behind the scenes; the stage gives us the excitement and suspense of it without any visible carnage.

The excellent production of The Merry Wives of Windsor at the Tivoli, has but two more nights. Monday night commences John P. Wilson's spectacular burlesque, Don Juan ad lib, which had a five weeks' run at the Tivoli several years ago. A strong cast, new songs, new jokes and two brilliant ballets are promised.

The Orpheum needs no new bill for next week. Henry Lee and all the new-comers of this week remain.

The Symphony Society gives a Wagner concert at the Columbia Thursday afternoon. Excerpts from seven of the tone-poet's works will be given. Mrs. Cecilia Adler Keesing (who has sung at Bayreuth), Mrs. Mathilde Wilde, Mrs. Hinrichs, Rhys Thomas, Alois Werner and Jacob Muller are the vocalists. Hinrichs has arranged a big programme, and the concert should draw the biggest patronage of the season. Hinrichs will read a lecture on the programme at Golden Gate Hall (upper) on Wednesday afternoon. No admission will be charged.

We are to hear more of Gertrude Auld's singing. Mr. Greenham announces recitals for Wednesday night week and Saturday afternoon week at Golden Gate Hall.

It has been a long time since Camilla Urso played the violin in San Francisco, and Manager Greenbaum seems to have a bright outlook in her three concerts at Golden Gate Hall next week. At Monday night's concert Madame Urso plays a new work, "Caprice de Concert," by Ernest Guiraud. She will also play Paganini's "Witches' Dance." Good programmes have been prepared for the other concerts, which come off on Friday night and Saturday afternoon.

There has never been held in this city a more successful millinery opening than that of Mrs. J. Coughlan, at 919 Market street, which took place last week. The ladies still through her establishment in quest of the latest creations in millinery. Everything found there is thoroughly artistic, and those who have not yet visited her store should not fail to see the admirable goods for sale there.

THE GARRISON.

It was during the Thirty Years' War that the Spanish Commander, Gonzalve de Cordone, having in his plundering course entered Palatinate, determined to seize the village of Ogersheim, defended only by a small fortification.

At his approach, all the inhabitants fled to Mannheim, while within the enclosure of the ramparts there remained only a poor shepherd, called Fritz, with his sick wife and new-born son.

You may picture to yourself the anguish of this poor man, who, while seeing the approach of his enemies, yet could not, like his neighbors, flee from their cruelty. But, being a brave, shrewd fellow, he devised a plan by which he hoped to escape the peril now threatening him.

Having embraced his wife and child, he went out to put his project in execution.

Amongst the baggage abandoned by the fugitives he easily found that for which he was seeking; that is to say, an old military suit complete.

He put on his head an enormous helmet crowned with a waving plume; on his feet some very high boots, with jingling spurs; in his belt a pair of pistols and a heavy sabre; upon his shoulders the showy cloak of an officer.

Thus equipped, he hastened to the ramparts, on the outside of which was the herald, summoning the village to surrender. "Friend," the valiant shepherd replied, "tell your General, I pray you, that I have no intention of yielding to his request, only on these conditions: First, that the garrison may go out of this fortress with all the honors of war; second, that the lives of the inhabitants will be spared; and third, that we may preserve the free enjoyment of our religion."

The herald declared that the Spaniards would never submit to such conditions, since they knew that Ogersheim was not prepared to defend itself.

"My friend," replied the shepherd, tranquilly, "be not so hasty. Tell your commander that only the desire to avoid the shedding of blood can induce me to open these gates to you; but if he will not accept the conditions which I have given you, he will enter here only by force of the sword, for I declare to you, on my word as an honest man and a Christian, that the garrison has just received a reinforcement of which you know nothing."

Speaking thus, Fritz lit his pipe and began to smoke as unconcernedly as a man who had not the least cause for uneasiness.

The soldier, disturbed by his confidence and composure, returned to his General and told him all the words of the Commander of Ogersheim.

So Gonzalve, thinking that he might meet with some resistance unexpected by him, and as he did not want to lose any time before so unimportant a town, resolved to accept the conditions imposed upon him, and therefore advanced with his troops to the gate of the fortress. Learning from the herald this generous determination of the General, the shepherd coolly responded: "Your master is a man of sense."

He then opened the gates and invited the Spaniards to enter. Surprised at seeing before him only the rustic herdsman, most grotesque in his military costume, Gonzalve thought there was some treason concealed, and immediately asked where the garrison was.

"If you will follow me," replied Fritz, "I'll show you."

"March by my side," said the Spanish General, "and I warn you that at the least indication of treachery, I will send a bullet into your head."

"Very well," responded the shepherd; "follow me confidently, for I declare by all that is to me most dear, that the garrison will do you no harm."

He then conducted the General through the silent and deserted streets until, coming to the very end of a by-way, he invited him to enter a miserable hovel which stood before them.

There, showing him his wife, Fritz said: "There is the best part of the garrison," and proudly exhibiting his new-born son, added, "and here is our last reinforcement."

Gonzalve, seeing with what a singular artifice he had been deceived, began to smile; then, detaching a gold chain from his neck, he placed it upon the bed of the young mother, and drawing from his pocket a purse fat with ducats, which he gave to Fritz, said:

"Let me give, as a testimony of my esteem, this chain to the beautiful garrison, and to you this purse for your young soldier boy."

Then, taking leave of the wife and child, he departed, and Fritz led him back through the village, thanking him with deep emotion for his generous kindness.—Translated from the French by ADELIA H. TAFFINDER.

HOW FITZY WON THE FIGHT.

"Oh, tell us of the fight, my lad, the fight that Fitzzy won; And tell us of the blows they struck and all the things they done. How Corbett started in and thought he'd do it just for fun And ended up a living corpse—the played out son of a gun."

"Oh, father, it was simply great! I knew that Fitzzy would win And told the fellows that I knew on him to pluck their tin. 'Twas I who tipped O'Hara there, and also Patsy Flynn, I said that Corbett was no good, and now we all are in."

"But tell me, hoy, for you was there, the blows the fellows hlew, If Jimmy took his medicine like a man had ought to do; If Fitzzy showed his science and the little things he knew, And how our Jimmy looked and felt when Fitzzy got all through."

"Why, father, it was simply grand! I knew it all the while. I told young Ike and Billy White to lay on Fitzzy their pile; And sister won some chewing-gum and ma a brand new tile, And all the fellows look at me, and shake my hand and smile."

"Ay, ay, I know," the old man said; "but tell me now about The scrap itself. If ever there was just the smallest doubt That Fitzzy would land a decent lick upon the other lout To do him up, and how he came to knock Jim Corbett out."

"Why, hang it, father," quoth the son, "I've told you all along The way it went until they rang the funny little gong. I tell you I feel pretty proud. I never do go wrong, And when it comes to betting, it is there that I am strong."

And as the talk goes on all day, and half the weary night And nothing can the father learn about the famous fight, The one is blind to all things else except that he was right, The other rubs his horny hands and prays to God for light.

IT is a long time—not since General Kautz and his amiable wife reigned at Angel Island—since there has been so much hospitality and fun at that post as has been the case lately. There are so many pretty women in the Third Artillery they are quite capable of furnishing the feminine element at the different entertainments without going out of Army circles, and they do. Needless to say, our city belles do not like this, as they had got to look upon the Presido chaps as their own especial property. An Army girl remarked recently: "Now we can pay the city girls back in their own coin; asking the officers, and not an army woman. See how they'll like it."

San Rafael is getting ready for an unusually brilliant season. The cottagers are cleaning house; the big house owners are sounding the note of preparation also, while the Hotel Rafael is rapidly filling up. Manager Warfield will do everything in his power to make his guests enjoy themselves, and Baron von Schroeder is always ready to give the girls a jolly good time. Then, too, the place is so easy of access and so moderate in fare from the city that men, even with small salaries, can indulge in a trip from Saturday to Monday frequently during the summer.

What a close corporation the Goad family seem to be in the matter of weddings, is the universal comment of society on learning that the marriage of Miss Aileen and Charley McIntosh is to be limited to relatives and intimate friends. Being solemnized in Lent may, however, account for this. Society will have two brilliant weddings to look forward to in those of Miss Burton and Miss Cohen, both of which will undoubtedly be the occasion of much gold lace, flags, and jingling sabres, to say nothing of the beauty of the bridal parties.

The news that the gallant Captain Marion P. Maus has been ordered away from California to act as aide to General Miles in Washington City, will be heard with deep regret by his numerous lady friends on this Coast; and any one of a venturesome inclination can easily bet two to one that the fascinating, but somewhat elusive, Captain's absence from Coronado will rob that delightful resort of the visit several of our most charming belles had in view this spring.

It seems a pity that our pretty belles do not utilize the quiet season of Lent, when balls and parties must be abandoned, by a club for learning cooking. Even a chafing dish class would be an immense factor in gaining a man's favor, especially if a few men were invited on each occasion to test the proficiency attained by the fair cusinières. What more potent charm to the average masculine than a dainty repast which his own wife prepares for him. Take the hint, girls.

The ownership of country homes à l'anglaise is fast becoming a fixed feature of our wealthy class. The Henry Scotts are going to make an ideal rural abode of their place at Burlingame, and, they say, will have house parties all summer. On dit, Jack Casserley will bring his Chicago bride to dwell amid the exclusive set down there.

Our fashionable women have found a use for the ex-champion. They are meditating getting up an athletic class for him to teach the art of boxing to. The idea is not half a bad one, for if women aspire to be men, they should not be averse to defending themselves and not compelled to depend upon the men of their family to do their fighting for them.

The resignation of Henry Crocker from the horse show and the riding club emphasizes the fact, so often asserted by his friends, that he is not to be dictated to. If there is any hossing to do, he is ready to do it himself.

Everyone in the inner circle of the swim is talking of the theatricals the Hager Company is going to give after Easter. That they will be a huge success no one can doubt when such energetic, competent heads manage the affair as are to be found among the clever society people who compose the company.

The Euchre Club, in which are enrolled some of our loveliest belles, has become a most popular organization. The men clamor for invitations, they say, but the rule of the club is, "for members only," and so, if the "fellahs" want to be in it, all they have to do is to pay their dues and join.

Young Breeze is spoken of by the society girls as a recent victim of the wily god Cupid, and it will not take very long to guess who it was directed the shaft from his bow.

The fountain of perpetual youth has never been found; but the thing next to it is Argonaut Whiskey—which is invigorating, healthful, pure. It is the best of the best—a gentleman's drink at all times and places. E. Martin & Co. at 411 Market street are Pacific Coast Agents.

PACIFIC TRANSFER CO., 20 Sutter St.

"A Bride from the Bush," by E. W. Hornung. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York, 1897. Price, 75 cents.

A Book of the Week. The eldest son of Sir James Bligh, a Justice of the Supreme Court of Great Britain, wanders out to Australia, and, being a simple-minded sort of fellow with a good income, marries the daughter of a "squatter" in the Riverina district of New South Wales. She is a girl of remarkable physical beauty, but as untamed and unbrokeu as a "waler." She and her husband go to England to visit Sir James and Lady Bligh at their house in Twickenham, where one of the bride's first performances is to get up early in the morning and amuse herself by cracking a stock-whip. Just as the coachman and stable-boy have been driven into the safe shelter of the stable, an old gentleman walks into the yard, and is at once greeted by a volley of pistol-shot-like cracks of the whip round his ears. After tiring of this, the bride lifts off his bat with the curling lash, and discloses the features of Mr. Justice Bligh. Many other "bad breaks" culminate in her standing up in the family carriage in the presence of some members of the Royal family, and uttering a loud, shrill "Coo-ee" to an Australian girl whom she recognizes riding down the Row. At last, her mortification at her inability to behave like a lady becomes so insupportable that she gets her husband's permission to visit some friends in Suffolk, bids him farewell, and takes the steamer to her native land. After a protracted search, her husband discovers whither she has gone, and follows her. A happy re-union ensues, and the couple decide that the atmosphere of an Australian sheep-farm is freer and suits them better than that of the greatest city in the world. We have known many Australian girls, and are inclined to think that Mr. Hornung, in his eagerness to depict strongly the contrast between the quiet manners of well-bred English people and the hoydenish behavior of a spoilt Australienne, has overdrawn the gaucheries and extravagances of his heroine. But, however this may be, the tale is readable, and so fulfills its prime function. And we shall be pleased to read another of this author's stories whenever it may fall into our hands. As regards make-up, the little volume is well printed, bound in white and green cloth, and has the upper edges of its pages gilt.

In Collier's Weekly for March 11th, Mr. John Habberton ut not wisely remarks: "If all the warlike counsel that has been offered the new administration by some of the newspaper press is accepted, we shall need a navy that will keep all our shipyards busy for several years to come, unless some of the Powers that are to be fought, defied, bullied, subbed, or otherwise offended, should take the initiative and send over some warships or torpedo boats to annihilate the ship-yards themselves; most of the yards are of easy reach by any war-like craft." In the same issue Edgar Saltus is hard at work making things straight with the Ambassador-to-be at the court of St. James, by letting us know that, little as we might suspect it, the Envoy-elect is a sweet poet, who, though he has long since ceased to be a lyre-strummer, has yet contributed to the verse of his native land a "gem which is almost perfect." This ought to be worth an invite to lunch when the Ambassador-to-be is installed at the U. S. Embassy in London.

The first issue of a new monthly entitled Current Thought, and defined as "a magazine of individual opinion and research," consists of twenty pages and a picture. The solitary article which fills the issue is contributed by William George Jordan, a sketch of whose goggle-bedecked profile is the picture. The article is headed: "Mental training: a remedy for education." The writer expresses his dissatisfaction with the results of the school-training of the average man, and, of course, they are poor and meagre enough. He says (and, no doubt, correctly) that most people are incapable of clear thought, and consequently of lucid expression; that their heads have been crammed with facts, and their minds have not been trained. But then most people have no minds to train; and as for their incapacity to think, it is probable that they are better, or at any rate more healthfully, occupied than in thinking, which is notoriously the most unwholesome employment in the world for man, causing headache, nervousness, dyspepsia, and myriad disorders. Further, if Mr. Jordan's essay is to be taken as a sample of the kind of work done by the man who has been educated, but not mentally trained, we are inclined to say "Give us the educated man every time." We are unable to see that Mr. Jordan has shed much light on his subject, and are not disposed to hope for any very splendid results from the extension of kindergarten methods to children of a larger growth. And all this talk about the various methods of education is to a large extent vain and fruitless, for the very best system of education in the world cannot put into a man's head or heart what a kindly or unkindly Providence has denied. As hogs' ears are not the raw material out of which silk purses are made, so you cannot make a mathematician out of a man (however intelligent) devoid of the mathematical instinct, nor dower with the gift of music him that hath no music in his soul. Besides, so far as we know, all the thinking that the world needs to have done is already done well enough: as things are, we are in more danger of running short of bootblacks and ploughmen than of becoming "shy on" thinkers.

Scribner's Magazine for March opens with a lively article by Richard Harding Davis on the Banderium of Hungary—a description of the celebration at Budapest of the thousandth year of the existence of Hungary as a kingdom. The Banderium was an exceedingly varied, brilliant, and picturesque spectacle, and roused the greatest enthusiasm in all who were fortunate enough to witness it. Four chapters of Mr. Davis's serial story appear in the same issue under the title of "Soldiers of Fortune." Lewis Morris Iddings contributes a paper on the Art of Travel by Land. It is a very sensible article, showing that its author is clearly aware that the varying customs of Europe and the United States are not the result of stupidity and crass ignorance, as some suppose, but have a basis of reason in the national temperament and in the forms of national civilization. C. D. Gibson's article on "London Audiences" is, as one might fairly expect from a wielder of the pencil who has only recently become a wielder of the pen, nearly all pictures. In the sketch entitled "A First Night" Mr. Gibson introduces several Englishmen and Englishwomen, but we feel constrained to say that he does not seem to have yet caught the type of the high-class Briton: not one of his men looks typically and unmistakably an Englishman of the army, navy, or university type. Perhaps the women are a little better, but that is probably because the Englishwoman is not so pronounced and inimitable a type as the Englishman: that is, she is in outward appearance, at any rate, more nearly like a fashionable woman of any nationality.

In the March issue of Self Culture we find editorial comments on various subjects under discussion, a review of Lord Robert's "Autobiography," an article from the Edinburgh Scotsman on the value of various foods as flesh-formers and heat-givers, and other articles. To us the most interesting contribution is Dr. William Clark's on "Conduct and Manner." "Conduct," says the writer, "not only makes a man what he is, but also shows what he is." Dr. Clark mentions a public-school teacher who evidently held very different views from Sir Joseph Porter, First Lord of the Admiralty in H. M. S. Pinafore. It was a primary article of Sir Joseph's creed that the expression "If you please" imparts a particularly gentlemanly tone to life on a man-of-war, but the school-ma'am referred to by Dr. Clark forbade her luckless pupils to use such expressions as "Thank you" or "If you please," on the ground that they savor of servility. Poor fool! as though politeness were not the surest test of superiority. It is just to Dr. Clark to say that he strongly combats what he calls "the mischievous delusion that suavity of manner is a confession of social or other inferiority, and that to preserve his self-respect and maintain his republican equality a man has to be surly or indifferent, after the manner of hotel-clerks or expressmen, and too often salesmen and "salesladies." Dr. Clark's article is good reading.

DEAR EDITH: One of the handsomest models I have seen for débutantes is made of white silk gauze over ivory-colored satin. The skirt has no train, is very close fitting at the hips, and flares considerably at the hem. Six full ruches of ivory-colored satin, pinked at the edges and graduated in width (the widest being at the hem, the narrowest below the knees), encircling the skirt. The baby waist is of satin covered with plaited gauze and découllé, and is edged with a silk ruche. Four narrow ruches at back and four at front of the neck, extending diagonally to a standing collar or necklet of folded satin ribbon edged at the top with satin tabs. A close-fitting sleeve reaches almost to the elbow, where it is finished by a ruche, and bunches of large Malmaison roses take the place of shoulder puffs. A girdle of gold filigree set with precious stones encircles the waist and finishes at the back with a long sash of satin edged with two rows of very narrow ruches.

A new ball dress of pale green satin is covered with green mousseline de soie. The skirt is trained and has satin panels embroidered with silver thread, silver spangles and pearls. They open over the underskirt of green mousseline de soie, upon which are sewn small silver spangles glittering with each motion of the wearer. The sleeves consist of a small puff, and the square-cut bodice has a small yoke embroidered to match the design on the panels. Garlands of rose geraniums, with their pretty vari-colored foliage, sprinkled with occasional dew drops of diamonds, form the epaulettes. The neck is entirely covered by a light green satin collar and tabs, richly embroidered and edged with a tiny ruche of green mousseline de soie. The hair will be done in big puffs, ornamented with strings of pearls and diamonds and a cluster of the geranium flowers and ruches. With this costume a novelty will be worn in the shape of white silk gloves, with long arm coverings of real lace extending to the shoulders and embroidered with silver and pearls.

A friend, writing from Paris, says that it is very strange that lingerie is so much cheaper over there than on this side. "Cotton goods in France," she says, "cost quite a bit more, and good sewing machines all come from the other side of the water. This year I hear that white wear is cheaper at home than it used to be. One merchant explained the question by saying there was a steadier, surer market here for the better class of lingerie, and another merchant attributed the difference in price to the cheaper labor to be had in France. It surprises one to find so much bead work on these garments, even among the very ordinary lots, and each and every piece of lingerie is embellished with a fetching bow of satin ribbon, and is set off with delicate, tinted tissue paper, until it becomes irresistible to shoppers.

The nightgowns this season are exquisite. They are made of the choicest materials, and with each gown comes a dainty little ebemise trimmed like the gown, and they are only sold in sets. One of the very expensive sets was made of a very fine quality of cambric. The yoke of the gown was tucked in tiny tucks, with a feather stitch worked between each tuck. It was a short yoke, and the fullness was gathered into a band, Empire fashion. The band was embroidered with eyelets, through which rather broad white satin ribbon was passed. Around the neck of the gown there was a fall of Valenciennes lace that merged into a jabot at the front of the gown and continued down to the hem. The sleeves were full bishop sleeves that opened from the wrist to the top. They were edged with narrow frills of Valenciennes along the opening, and at the wrist there was a broad frill of lace, headed by a band with eyelets. When the ribbon is taken out of these sleeves they become straight, plain affairs, and the very easiest sleeves to launder well.

No Demand for Mines.

The exaggerated statements which have heralded the advent of every individual who chooses to pose as an expert for one of the many so-called exploration companies, and the inflated notions regarding these concerns themselves, are to blame very much for upsetting the minds of so many people by misleading them on the mining situation, which from a popular standpoint has been on the eve of a boom for over a year past. These exploration companies are not scattering money around by the million, eager to absorb in competition everything offering in the shape of a mine. Even as it is, these companies have much to learn about investments in the West, and nothing but experience will teach them. In any event, they are not eleemosynary institutions, operating for the benefit of humanity outside of their own pale. They work for profits, and the heaviest that can be obtained on the smallest possible investment. No one will ever make a cent, wittingly, beyond the inside ring in control and its parasitical attachments, who loom up bigger, as a rule, than any one else in the concern. An idea of what is actually going on in London can best be formed from the repeated failures which are known, if not reported, of finely concocted schemes from California. Nine out of every ten propositions sent on from here for a twelvemonth past, have failed. Besides this, investment capital has fallen off, the total for February in London being estimated at five and one-half millions, against six and three-fourths millions for the same month last year. Of this amount, but a very minute fraction has been apportioned for mines, the bulk having been absorbed by breweries, distilleries, cycling, motor, industrial, and miscellaneous companies. This, however, will not serve to check the aspirations of local hudding geniuses in the promotion line, nor the volume of presentations by mail from this quarter. Hope hangs high, like the proverbial goose.

Mine Promotion in London.

Some of the "tenderfoot" promoters in this city who aim to get rich by a brilliant coup in London, where they imagine investors are as thick as blackberries, begin to look anxious over the prospects. It would be useless possibly to suggest to such people that they are chasing a phantom, or to warn them that nearly everything they are told about the condition of affairs is false in every particular. Mines are slow of sale in London, slower in fact than anything else. The offices of mining men and financiers are loaded down with propositions of the kind. It is actually surprising to learn from this correspondence the number of people in San Francisco, who in desperation have joined the immense caravan of fortune seekers, as well as the absurdities of the crude attempt at technical demonstration by the veriest tyros in the art of mining. These absurdities are so glaring that they incite suspicion upon the part of the hard headed business man abroad with most unsatisfactory results in a general way to the State. Every profession in the daily walks of life is now represented in the list of men who want to sell a mine, and no line of trade is lacking in this display of a hungry desire to hlossom out as a Barnato, or some other freak of fortune in the new world of finance. Sooner or later this mob will awake from its day dream of something that will never be and go back to its ordinary work full of disappointment. But this is the way of life, a matter of everyday occurrence with some one or other.

Tuscarora Mines Looming Up.

The Tuscarora district is looming up again through recent rich discoveries in the old Coptic and Dexter Mines. There are other mines in the vicinity which will doubtless be heard from in turn, as this portion of the State is just close enough to be under the scrutiny of its energetic and enterprising neighbors across the Utah line. This quarter of Nevada will likely continue to pick up for some time to come, as it is rich in mineral.

An Opening For Capital.

If there was any way to get around the promoter and that twin evil, the syndicate, so as to reach the monied people of Great Britain with a leaning toward mining investment, it would be a good thing for all concerned. The profitable mining interest in the future will result from the development of prospects and the discovery of new mines. The State is full of opportunities of the kind today, but the disposition is to overlook them in the general hunt for a shell with enough left in it to corroborate ancient history used as a bait for legitimate robbery. With this object in view, an opening could be found for a large amount of money with the promise of grand results. A great many people in this city are now co-operating in small ventures of the kind. The risk is comparatively small, because before any heavy expenditure of money is made, the practical operator can determine to almost a certainty whether or not it would be prudent to continue operations. A few hundred dollars will open up a ledge or piece of ground sufficient in any case to give a fair idea of its value, and to a depth sufficient, if the outlook is satisfactory, to give a value to the property of the investment many times over. Not infrequently loss in enterprises of the kind are occasioned by had judgment of the miner in charge, who fails to expend the funds at his command to good advantage, by working on plans which might be right enough if backed by large capital, while absolutely suicidal on a limited scale.

Mining in El Dorado.

The mining industry flourishes in and around the Grizzly Flat mining district of El Dorado County. The gravel property there, owned by Colonel Sutherland and others, is said to have some fine prospects in sight, averaging from 10 cents to $1.50 per pan in cement gravel. Arrangements have been completed for a 10-stamp mill to crush the cement. The property, which is a drift proposition, was purchased originally from John Melton and others, of Placerville. A correspondent, writing from this quarter, says that the Flagstaff mine, four miles north of Grizzly Flat, will be operated early this spring by capitalists from Columbus, Ohio. A fine chute of ore is also said to have been cut in the Bullard mine, assays running as high as $75 per ton. A mill will be built here. A rumor is also afloat that the Mt. Pleasant mine will resume operations in the near future under new management. There is also some talk of a consolidation between the Mt. Pleasant and the Eagle Mining Company.

A Bonanza For Lawyers.

The troubles of the Hale & Norcross un-associate directors have not as yet culminated, and while the unfortunate shareholders wait in patient expectation for the long-foretold bonanza, lawyers on all sides make the running and capture the fat stakes. In the meantime, business in the stock boards is demoralized. There is no disguising that fact. The next thing is, what are the brokers going to do pending the settlement of a litigation which may last until doomsday? Misfortune seems to have settled heavily over this Pine-street institution. Its members have had a hard road to hoe for some time past, and the future is certainly not bright. Taking the situation as a whole, it would certainly urge the necessity for radical action of some kind immediately. The continuance of the prevailing weak-kneed policy means ruin.

Grand Central Of Mexico.

The London Exploration Company, which stood sponsor for the Grand Central mines of Mexico, on the strength of a report from one of its numerous experts, seems to have already worked the property up to an explanation point. Details so far are meagre, but it appears from statements made that the estimates of ore reserves have fallen short considerably. When the mine was exported for the Exploration Company a few months ago, the reports showed some 80,000 tons of ore in sight, and after 9,000 tons had been extracted it was claimed that only 40,000 tons remained, according to somebody else. A portion of the London financial press suggests hopefully that of course a satisfactory explanation will be forthcoming on a point which it insists must be cleared up in the interests of critical investors.

Down Power

"Hear the Crier!" "What the devil art thou?"
"One that will play the devil, sir, with you."

THE Reverend H. A. Ketchum, who has for six years past discoursed on matters spiritual from the pulpit of the First Presbyterian Church at Berkeley, has been adjudged too slow and old-fashioned by the progressive members of his congregation, and in response to the firm but uncomplimentary wishes expressed by the lively sisters and frisky brethren who pay pew rent, has tendered his resignation, and will give place to some co-worker in the Lord's vineyard who is more "liberal."

'Tis sad, good sir, that you must go.
But you—beg pardon—are too slow.
Of course you meant well. That is plain.
But ministers who will disdain
With Satan sometimes to hobnob
Cannot expect to hold their job.
Your record is a spotless one.
Pray tell us, then, how 'neath the sun
Could you have ever hoped to last?
A pastor, sir, without a past!
Can you to others hold a candle
Without a solitary scandal
Against your fair, unsullied name?
You see, you have yourself to blame.
We will have men who'll make things hum
Or know the reason why, by gum!
Successful guardians of flocks
Are never sternly orthodox.
In order to be up to date,
New views you should disseminate.
'Tis quite the proper thing to mix
Religion with your politics;
One-tenth the former, nine-tenths t'other—
That is the right proportion, brother.
Once 'twas your duty to dilate
Upon a sinner's awful fate—
His punishment in regions warm—
But nowadays 'tis not good form:
Hell's conflagrations were, you know,
Put out by science long ago.
When we lean back in cushioned pews
We want to hear the latest news.
So, sir, if Providence should send Another flock for you to tend,
Here's hoping you'll know how to fetch 'em.
Reform at once, good brother Ketchum!

"DAISY," who must be a sweet, tender-hearted maiden, writes to the CRIER on cream-tinted paper, from an interior town, to know if poor Mr. Sutro was really hung the day he went out of office. No, Daisy dear, unfortunately, Adolph and his term did not expire simultaneously. Your mistake is easy to trace, however. It was his portrait that was hung in the Mayor's office on that joyful day, in obedience to a time-honored custom. We never hang people in San Francisco, dearie.

JUSTICE John A. Carroll is in a predicament from which he will have some difficulty in extricating himself, Miss Josephine Gibbons having sued him for the alleged embezzlement of a mandolin, and the entire Grand Jury having met in solemn conclave on the case.

Good heavens, what a fearful din
To raise about a mandolin!
Where is the "rift within the lute?"
To make the jarring music mute?
E'en the defendant, Judge John A.,
Is Carrolling his little lay.

THE overworked insanity plea, which is the pet refuge of most murderers, has not been urged in Butler's case. Strange. He has already given evidence of mental nuttiness as well as criminal naughtiness, for he declares that when he gets back to Australia he will employ a woman lawyer.

COMMANDER Booth-Tucker is of the opinion that had there been daily newspapers in the days of St. Peter, that worthy would never have landed in a jail. The Commander probably thinks that the mere perusal of the sheet would have been considered punishment enough for any offenses.

ROTTANZI'S resolution to crush the theatre hat was itself crushed. Thus does woman maintain her millinery rights, while man gnashes his teeth in impotent rage and groans in spirit.

The theatre hat with its steeple-top crown
Can not by municipal law be brought down.
Not only must husbands endure such ills,
But mortgage their incomes to settle the hills.
Give heed, oh fair tyrants! The average play
We do not mind missing—but there's the ballet!
And rather than silently sacrifice that We warn you we're ready to fight fur, not at,
The drop of the hat.

CAPT. DYE, the gallant horse-marine in charge of the Sunol, is apparently the possessor of so much sea knowledge that he should be promoted to a position in our invincible Navee. This genius, it appears, is unable to distinguish whether the bark that ran him down was at anchor or moving. The TOWN CRIER is no sailor, but he has never heard of a ship at anchor with all sails set. In his humble opinion, Captain Dye is a badly water-logged craft.

THE fellow who sells glucose and corn starch for jelly, and who seem to be proud of it, may be readily suspected of putting sand in their sugar or burnt wheat in their coffee. In this unrighteous traffic the thrifty sellers of unfit goods appear to forget that they are selling a percentage of their reputations whenever they knowingly take good money for bad merchandise; and at current rates it will soon be the least valuable part of the packages delivered.

BROTHER Hemphil is in hot water with the Presbyterian divines of this city and all because they consider his remarks of "clowns" and "trained monkeys" applicable to their own sacred persons. The clown and the trained monkey are undoubtedly more entertaining than these holy and stiff-lipped Presbyters and it can surely be no misdemeanor to liken them to those entertaining delights of our childhood, although it is somewhat hard on the simians.

EDWARD CASHIN, lighthouse keeper at the Faralones, wagered every hair on his pate that Pomp Jim would win the fight at Carson. Miss Doud, schoolma'am at the same windy suburb, took up the bet, and now exhibits Cashin's scalp at her belt. As a usual thing, when a woman wants to snatch a man baldheaded, she does not wait for somebody in another State to do the fighting. She prefers to take part in the melee herself.

MILLER & LUX have incurred the wrath of the butchers, and the latter are now on the war path, headed by their Board of Trade. The air is full of flying cleavers, and, festooned with strings of sausages in token of their vocation, the knights of the chopping block are hastening forward to the fray. Meanwhile the public dodges the missiles and prays for peace.

SINCE slogging matches so delight
The people that they hail the sight
When gory gladiators fight;
Resolved to win or die;
I hope that soon the day will come
(For me 'twill be millennium)
When sloggers must be deaf and dumb—
"None others need apply."

THAT octogenarian is not fit to write poetry was proven last Sunday by the appearance of the gibberish of one Rufus C. Hopkins, an otherwise worthy gentleman who usually prays for the publication of his verse. If it is true that at eighty one can hold communion with the spirit of truth, the TOWN CRIER wonders why Mr. Hopkins has the audacity to persevere at his nefarious labors.

THE attention of the Board of Health is respectfully called to Mr. James J. Corbett, a defeated prize-fighter. Can he not be classed among "Impure Jellies" and dumped into the bay?

NOW that the mail clerks have left this city for the South, there will be a chance for some of us to get in and have a little fun with the female variety.

THE only proof that Ira D. Sankey, the chirping Evangelist, is a great singer, lies in the fact that he is still unaware that he has lost his voice.

SPRING, lovely spring! Season of violently head colds and rheumatism, has burst upon us so suddenly and so gleefully that we are all taken unawares, and stare blinking at the sunshine like so many owls. It is a fine, clear, beautiful sunlight, too, and you may fancy the temperature when overcoats are discarded. There are signs of brushing up in the Park cafés, and the cheerful visages of Isaacs of the Casino, Gabe Case of McGown's Pass Tavern, and the suave Italian who dictates the fortunes of Claremont are even more cheerful than usual, especially Claremont's proprietor, for Claremont will be the scene of the unveiling—so called—of the Grant monument, which has really been unveiled for some time. Regulars, militia, naval reserves, numerous political organizations, to say nothing of the inevitable G. A. R., look forward to the day as something of great moment. Death is to me so solemn, so dignified, so sacred that I am not appreciative of display. It is like a cannibal feast. How many will really think of the dead and bow many of the festivity! Squadron A., the crack cavalry troop, blossoms out in new uniforms for the occasion, something like the Austrian Hussar uniform, and very effective.

I do not know why this sudden mad rush of Californians to Philadelphia, but for the last ten days it has been epidemic. Mrs. Philbin has just returned from a visit there. Mrs. Mullin-Belvin is now in the Quaker atmosphere. Mrs. Bradley and Mrs. Wallace (who by the way is much improved under Dr. Weir Mitchell's care), Mrs. Carl Jungen on a visit to Mrs. Cogblan, Wilder Pease, and I do not know how many others.

Mrs. George Harding, of the staid city, went over to Washington for the Inauguration as the guest of Mrs. Clinton Cushing, who has taken a beautiful house at the Capital for the season. California is not poorly represented by any means in the chief city, and all of your people are generous entertainers. Mrs. Stanford, Mrs. Hearst, Mrs. "Dick" Clover, Mrs. Cushing, Mrs. McKenna, Mrs. Field, and Mrs. Condit Smith are the shining lights.

Mrs. James Lake had a narrow escape a few days ago, owing to the desperately reckless driving of the New York tradesmen. Mrs. Lake was in a brougham with Mrs. Hammond, whose father and mother, Mr. and Mrs. William Breyfogle, will be remembered by old Californians. Mrs. Hammond's little two-year-old daughter was also with them. A brewers' bottling wagon, dashing down the street with the usual recklessness of tradesmen's wagons, collided with the brougham, in spite of the coachman's skillful efforts to avert a disaster. One of the horses was instantly killed, however, and the brougham partially overturned. The nervous shock to the occupants of the vehicle may be readily imagined.

I believe that you have your own and only Tobin with you again. Russell Wilson is at the Holland. Mrs. Elmonte of Los Angeles is at the Vendome. Mrs. Vidaver has a permanent engagement to sing at one of the large synagogues. Oliver Hazard Perry Noyes will leave in a fortnight for San Francisco en route to Japan. Mrs. John Hoffman Martin, you will be pleased to hear, has been released from her embarrassments re Ted Henley. She keeps up the excitement diligently, does she not?

New York, March 20, 1897. PASSE-PARTOUT.

PICTURESQUE SAN FRANCISCO.

THIS week the NEWS LETTER presents a very fine view of the dining room of a Chinese restaurant. In the elaborate character of decorations it will easily bear comparison to American restaurants. The quaint chairs and stools are severe and devoid of the least ornamentation, showing a remarkable difference in this respect from civilized customs.

If one really desires to combine business and pleasure in a happy proportion, it is only necessary to drop in and have a talk with George T. Marsh & Co., at 625 Market street, under the Palace. All the finest things in Japanese curios, art and antiques are collected there. These goods are all the rage just now.

FLIRTATION.

RONDEAU.

YOU ask me why my heart's as gay
As it was only yesterday,
An hour before she proved untrue,
And left me in this horrid stew,
With all her modiste's hills to pay.
You know, ma chere, it is my way
To never fret when women play
Me false, in spite of which even you,
You ask me why!
That's not the reason, sir, you say;
Granted! If I might dare—I may?
Ahem! Her exit gives the cue
For me to try my luck with—you!
You guessed as much? And yet, pardieu!
You ask me why!

—St. GEORGE BEST, in Quartier Latin.

To the refined taste food must not only be good but served in an appetizing manner. Swain's at 213 Sutter street fully appreciate this fact. A splendid table d'hôte dinner is served there every day from 5 to 8 for one dollar, that is a model of taste completeness and refined delicate service. Swain's confectionery and pastries are the best, and orders will be promptly filled by telephone or otherwise.

AN OLD MAN'S IDYL.—RICHARD REALF, IN POEMS

BY the waters of Life we sat together,
 Hand and hand in the golden days
 Of the beautiful early summer weather,
 When skies were purple and breath was praise,
 When the heart kept tune to the carol of birds,
 And the birds kept tune to the songs which ran Through shimmer of flowers on grassy swards,
 And trees with voices Æolian.

By the rivers of Life we walked together,
 I and my darling, unafraid;
 And lighter than any linnets' feather
 The burdens of Being on us weighed.
 And Love's sweet miracles o'er us threw Mantles of joy outlasting Time,
 And up from the rosy morrows grew
 A sound that seemed like a marriage chime.

In the gardens of Life we strayed together;
 And the luscious apples were ripe and red,
 And the languid lilac and honeyed heather
 Swooned with the fragrance which they shed.
 And under the trees the angels walked,
 And up in the air a sense of wings
 Awed us tenderly, while we talked Softly in sacred communings.

In the meadows of Life we strayed together,
 Watching the waving harvests grow;
 And under the henison of the Father
 Our hearts, like the lambs, skipped to and fro.
 And the cowslips, hearing our low replies,
 Brodered fairer the emerald hanks,
 And glad tears shone in the daisies' eyes,
 And the timid violet glistened thanks.

Who was with us, and what was round us,
 Neither myself nor my darling guessed;
 Only we knew that something crowned us
 Out from the heavens with crowns of rest;
 Only we knew that something bright
 Lingered lovingly where we stood,
 Clothed with the lucandescant light
 Of something higher than humanhood.

Oh, the riches Love doth inherit!
 Ah, the alchemy which doth change
 Dross of body and dregs of spirit
 Into sanctities rare and strange!
 My flesh is feeble and dry and old,
 My darling's beautiful hair is gray;
 But our elixir and precious gold
 Laugh at the footsteps of decay.

Harms of the world have come unto us,
 Cups of sorrow we yet shall drain;
 But we have a secret which doth show us
 Wonderful rainbows in the rain.
 And we hear the tread of the years move by,
 And the sun is setting behind the hills;
 But my darling does not fear to die,
 And I am happy in what God wills.

So we sit by our household fires together,
 Dreaming the dreams of long ago;
 Then it was halmy summer weather,
 And now the valleys are laid in snow.
 Icicles hang from the slippery eaves;
 The wind blows cold—'tis growing late;
 Well, well! we have garnered all our sheaves,
 I and my darling, and we wait.

SUB ROSA.—FLORENCE PROVOST CLARENDON.

Queen of thy sister flowers,
 Mistress of silence, too,
 If thou should'st see my sweetheart,
 Tell her I love her, anew.

If she should'st breathe thy fragrance,
 Fresh with the morning dew,
 Give her my loving message;
 Our secret's safe with you.

INSURANCE.

GENERAL Arthur E. Magill of the Home Mutual, of New York, who has been East for the past two weeks, has just returned.

Manager Conrad, of the Thuringia, has gone to Chicago, to be absent two or three weeks.

President John A. McCall, of the New York Life, who has been rusticated in Los Angeles for the past fortnight, was dined and wined by the officers of the company there last week. He will be in San Francisco on the first of the month.

The United States Casualty Company, represented in this city by J. D. Maxwell, is being examined by the New York Insurance Department. John A. McCall has recently resigned from the directorate of the Casualty, and this, in connection with the appearance of the company's last statement, has made the examination necessary.

The Marine Accident and Plate Glass Insurance Company continues to be the only one outside of the Compact; and as a consequence it is reaping a rich harvest.

Captain A. W. Masters, United States manager for the London Guarantee and Accident Company, and Hon. R. W. Sloan, Western manager for the same company, with headquarters at Salt Lake, were in the city during the week, and left for home Wednesday.

The Nederland Life Insurance Company, of Amsterdam, which has done business in this country for the past four years, has concluded to reinsure its lines and leave the United States. The reason of withdrawal is the increased cost of securing business in America, as against Holland. The company, up to April 1st, will keep an office in New York City for collecting premiums, settling death claims, paying surrender values, etc.

It begins to look as if the Guarantor's Insurance Company is in a bad way. A license has been refused it in its own State, New York, and it is now being examined by the Pennsylvania Insurance Department. This company has quite a business in California.

The Phoenix Life Insurance Company has appointed James S. Osborne its California manager, and offices have been established on the ground floor of the Mills Building. Mr. Osborne is a young gentleman of excellent ability and a wide and favorable acquaintance in the community.

The failure of the Legislature to pass the bill compelling a deposit of $200,000 by foreign insurance companies, will permit the continuance of unrestricted writing by such companies. A number of these are Japan and Chinese concerns, of which little is known, and they come in direct and hurtful competition with responsible home and foreign companies.

E. S. Fowler, California manager of the Preferred Accident Insurance Company, carried off the honors in the accident field last year, having written considerably more business than any of his competitors.

The insurance companies lost $155,000 by the destruction of the Cohen home in Alameda last Tuesday. The Pennsylvania Fire (Manager Pope) was extremely lucky, having a $5,000 line on the bowling alley situated but fifty feet from the residence, which escaped untouched.

The resignation of M. R. Higgins from the office of Insurance Commissioner for the State of California, to accept a position with the Mutual Life as Superintendent of agencies, is probably a satisfactory arrangement for both parties. The Pacific Mutual Life has been making strenuous efforts during the past year to enlarge its business, and has been in a degree successful. An acquaintance with the business which experience is sure to bring him, will make Mr. Higgins a valuable assistant. It is likely that Henry C. Gesford will take his place as Commissioner for the unexpired term of one year, after which Andrew J. Clunie will fill the office for the regular term of four years.

IT was to be the best entertainment in the history of local clubdom. The jinks of the Bohemian Club, the amateur theatricals of the Concordia, the ladies' nights of the Cosmos—Ben Davis said none of them would be in it with his little party, for it was the master mind of Ben which conceived the brilliant idea of a five-round fight between gentlemen, to take place in the rooms of that training school for the Concordia—the Calliopean Club. He divulged the details of his plan about a month ago to a group of fellow members, as they sat together in their cosy cottage on California street. All approved the idea, but as there was some reluctance among the others to act as principals, Ben said he would fight himself, and furthermore that he would get some one else to fight with him. As Davis is a light-weight, he selected, as his antagonist, Melville Schweitzer, whose avoirdupois is not great.

The pair said they would begin to train forthwith for the encounter, and their friends noted with satisfaction their adherence to a Spartan diet and observed that they eschewed strong drink and tobacco.

The fight was arranged for last Tuesday night, and the members of the Calliopean were besieged by their friends for invitations. At eight o'clock the large reception rooms of the club were densely packed. In the center a ring had been roped off, with all necessary pugilistic accompaniments of the best quality, for the Calliopeans never do anything by halves. Seconds were on hand with bottles and sponges, with Max Koshland in charge of one corner and Mel Waugerheim diagonally opposite him. Every one was present, except the principals, the referee, and the timekeeper. Ben Davis had said he had arranged that Fitzsimmons should act as referee and made a little speech, and that Jimmie Carroll should hold the watch.

The minutes dragged slowly, and the hands of the clock were nearer nine than eight, when the telephone bell rang and Mel Schweitzer announced that the delay was caused by the tardiness of Fitzsimmons, but that he and Bob and Ben Davis would start for the club at once. The waiting members resumed attitudes of expectancy.

"As the athletes will soon be here, gentlemen will please refrain from smoking," Sam Lezinsky had announced, an hour earlier, so even the solace of cigars was prohibited, but Louis Weill and "Peck" Eppinger livened matters by making a book on the fight. At intervals several additional telephonic messages were received, with a variety of excuses from the principals, each conversation ending with an assurance of a speedy appearance. Finally, about midnight, Ben Davis and Mel Schweitzer entered arm in arm, but instead of ring costume, they were arrayed in conventional evening dress. They had been having a jolly evening, and they looked it.

"Where's Fitz? What's the matter? Aren't you going to fight? Why have you kept us waiting?" were a few of the questions hurled at the lordly pugilists.

"Why, we were giving you what Governor Budd calls the long-distance jolly," replied the impresario imperturbably. Davis and Schweitzer had spent the evening at a theatre, sending a telephone message to the club at the end of every act.

"It's a case of sell, boys," said Hugo Waterman, who is a persistent bear on 'Change.

After much grumbling, the disappointed spectators organized a few games of draw, and just as the chips were beginning to move quickly, the fighters slipped unobserved down cellar and turned off the gas at the meter. As a harmonious whole, the evening supplied the greatest sells of the season. Ben Davis' reputation as a successful practical joker is now firmly established, and the Calliopeans are convinced that their field is too restricted for the talents of Schweitzer and Davis, and that those worthies are about ripe for graduation into the broader area of the Concordia Club.

The stormy and enthusiastic welcome accorded to prize-fighters and bruisers by the State of Nevada, through its highest officials, brings to mind an anecdote told with infinite enjoyment by the late Judge Sabin of the U. S. Circuit Court, and which has the merit of truth as well as point. The Judge's appreciation of the story was none the less keen that the joke was on his beloved sage-brush State, and directly on Wm. M. Stewart, its representative in the U. S. Senate.

A distinguished Federal official (whose identity, in the lapse of years, has been forgotten) was, during a visit to the Coast, for some weeks the guest of Senator Stewart at his Carson home, and finally journeyed with him to this city. During his stay the Senator gave a dinner at the Palace, in honor of the distinguished visitor, at which many high dignitaries of both States were present.

Conversation drifted into a discussion of the Indian question, in the course of which the host rather sententiously remarked to the guest of honor:

"There is a very curious fact in regard to the Indians of my State which you may not be aware of. You know that wherever the aborigines have been brought into contact with civilization, their number has steadily decreased. In Nevada the contrary is the case—the census shows a decided increase in their ranks, particularly in the vicinity of Carson."

The visitor regarded the speaker thoughtfully for a moment, and then slowly rejoined:

"Are you positive, Senator, that the Indians in the vicinity of Carson have been brought into contact with civilization?"

Stewart's answer is not of record; but the 17th of March gave an especial point to the long-past query.

If any love is lost between Antony Hellman and Paul Jarboe, no one has ever proclaimed that he has found it. During the morning hours Tony is a busy broker on the floor of the Stock Board, but after lunch he undergoes a transformation. He is the premiere danseuse of the Bohemian Club, and, as a female impersonator, has kicked himself into popularity with almost everyone in the club except Jarboe, who, as commander of the brigade which tempts fortune for the purchase of red liquids, is not interested in high kicking. Tony is always hatted in a silk tile of a modish block. Irrespective of the character of his costume and regardless of time or weather, the topper is always in evidence, cocked at a bewitching angle. Some people say that Tony sleeps in the hat, although that is denied. Hellman's love for his hat is a standing joke on 'Change, where it is said that he has provided for its perpetual care by a legacy in his will.

As Tony walked down the marble steps of the Bohemian Club the other day, Paul Jarboe started to ascend the same. They met at the big oak door, and neither was inclined to yield that the other might pass. Finally Paul made an exaggerated bow, as he backed half way across the Post-street pavement.

"After you, sir," he said, haughtily. "Such a hat as yours always has the right of way."

Tony was subsequently observed at various hatters pricing Fedoras.

Many ludicrous blunders have been caused by the facial resemblance between William Greer Harrison and George Grant, assistant cashier of the Nevada Bank. Ladies have mistaken one for the other, and the result has frequently been almost inextricable social confusion. When Grant heard that Harrison had gone East, he gave a sigh of relief, thinking that he had secured an immunity from many humiliating embarrassments, for it is not flattering to one's vanity to be continually mistaken for another man. The day after the departure of his double, Grant was stopped on Montgomery street by an exceptionally pretty girl. He is a cousin of Sir William Gordon Cumming, and possesses much of that same family gallantry which prompted the famous English soldier to suffer a vicarious sacrifice after the Tanby Croft incident, that the offence of the Prince of Wales might be concealed. Mr. Grant did not remember having met the girl, but then, there were her undeniably good looks, and he found no difficulty in convincing himself that his memory was not so good as it used to be, while he acknowledged her effusive greeting with much inward complacency.

"How do you do?" said the charming young woman, with a radiant smile and a confiding clasp of her little hands. "I have just been longing to see you."

This was almost too much, even for the gallant banker, but he endeavored to look as if he were not taken aback by the gushing girl's enthusiastic address. Her next remark was a cruel stab to his pride.

"Yes, I wanted to ask you this one question about Rosalind, Mr. Harrison," continued the dazzling young lady, who had been attending the insurance manager's drawing-room lectures on "The Women of Shakespeare." "Now, won't you tell me, do you really think—"

But Grant had fled, and so had his gallantry, for his inarticulate murmur of explanation did not explain. The damsel stood gazing after him in amazed indignation, and then marched off with flashing eyes and dilated nostrils. She has been telling her friends that while Mr. Harrison may be very clever, and profound, he has all the eccentricities of genius, and that his manners are sadly brusque.

His flattering habit of invariably saying the nice thing expected of him is one secret of the social and mercantile popularity of big Ray Sherman, leader of cotillions, athlete and hardware expert. He dines frequently with a family noted for its fashionable Bohemianism, the party including beside Sherman and the host and hostess, the latter's unmarried sister. At the table the other night, the talk drifted to a discussion of mutual friends, and to two married sisters who maintained an establishment in common.

"Why don't you marry some nice chap, Amy, and bring him here to live, so we could have the same good times?" said her brother-in-law, chaffingly, to the young lady of the party.

"Do you consider me a nice chap?" smilingly drawled Ray, without that thought which should always precede an utterance, especially on such a topic.

A sudden silence oppressed the diners and Raymond realized that he had said either too much or too little. He did not know what to say next and so, rather stupidly, said nothing. Now Sherman and the young lady are each wondering if the other considered it a proposal, the girl's friends don't know whether to congratulate her or not, and stalwart Ray vows he will never again say the right thing for the sake of being agreeable.

For every awkward predicament into which a man may blunder, and which may be self-explanatory, there are others which become more involved with every fresh attempt to clear away their obscurity. At least that is the conclusion of Eugene Lent, a melancholy conclusion born of an episode in his own experience. At a luncheon given in the Ladies' Annex to the University Club, Lent was one of the guests. Having occasion to leave the table temporarily, intending to seek the seclusion of the cloak room, Eugene absent-mindedly walked into the ladies' dressing apartments. Discovering his mistake, he turned to leave the quarter where no man may enter. Unfortunately, he was met on the threshold by one of the young ladies of the party. To perceive Lent's intrusion was to resent it. Before he could offer any explanation, she made him a low bow of mock courtesy.

"Vive la Imperatrice Eugenie," she said, with cutting sarcasm, and then promptly turned her back upon him.

The girl did not hesitate to narrate the occurrence, although 'Genie did, and repeated her bon mot with great gusto. And that is the explanation of how the eldest son of General "Bill" Lent came to be familiarly known as "The Empress Eugenie."

"The ex-Commodore of the Grecian fleet" is the title bestowed by his friends on Thomas C. Kierulff, who practices law and incidentally collects the rents of a Sansome-street block. Before he embarked on this career he had lofty political ambitions, but wisely determining to begin at the lowest rung of the ladder and work up, he sought, as a starter, an office which seemed easily within his grasp. The duties were not onerous and the pay was good, so Tom aspired to be Town Marshal of Berkeley. He made a rattling canvass, spending his money lavishly among "de push" of Lorin and West Berkeley. They all assured him that his opponent was "a good thing and dead easy." All the members of the Kierulff family devoted their entire attention to the campaign, and Tommy's father and three of his brothers being on the voting list, he had no fear for the outcome. As the polls opened he issued orders to an army of salaried lieutenants.

"We will beat him out of his boots," said Kierulff to these Hessians, who smiled, but said nothing.

At sundown of election day the would-be Marshal arranged for a general ratification of his triumph. Unfortunately, the result, as shown by the counting of the ballots, necessitated a slight change in the personnel of the ratification programme. By a singular succession of blunders, it was found that the voters had marked almost every ballot for the despised opponent. Kierulff received just five votes. The Kierulff family had voted solidly for Tommy.

As every one knows, the Town and Country Club is composed of fashionable women, young and old, who use their handsome quarters on Post street as a down-town resting place and rendezvous. One day this week a suburban resident had an appointment there to meet her mother, who resides in an interior town. Their arrangement was that the elder woman should go directly from the ferry to the club. At the expected hour the daughter, from her chair in the morning room, saw coming toward her a lady whom she recognized as her mother. The latter had in her hand a string attached to an inflated pink balloon, the evident mission of which was to carry joy to the heart of some petted grandchild. The daughter looked at the balloon with a disapproving gaze. She was annoyed that her mother should present such a ridiculous figure in the fin de siecle club.

"Well!" she ejaculated, sharply, and there was a baleful glitter in her eye. "You are the only one of us who ever dared to carry a thing like that," and she pointed contemptuously at the offending balloon.

And then, to her unspeakable chagrin, she saw that she had been reproving, not her mother, but one of the grand ladies of the club, and whose house is one of the smartest on Jackson street. It has occurred to her that possibly her mother's idiosyncracies might better be allowed to pass hereafter without comment.

SOCIETY FOLK appear to be keeping more quiet than usual this Lent, still they are now and then seen in public, as for instance on Tuesday evening, which was the gala night at the opera this week, the Huguenots drawing the largest and most fashionable audience of the season, including several opera parties; and quite a number of theatre parties have been made up to greet Otis Skinner at the Baldwin on Monday night of next week, when he makes his first appearance there as a star. On Tuesday evening also the Pioneers gave a party in their hall, which was the eighth of the series planned for the winter season, and it was equally as pleasant and successful as any of those given before.

Luncheons have, however, been the principal form of entertainment of late. Mrs. Van Bergin's violet lunch was one of those dainty affairs which that lady is such an adept at giving. The pink luncheon, at which Mrs. S. F. Thorne presided as hostess, was in honor of Mrs. Russell Harding, and was a very charming one, the verdict of Mrs. Thorne's guests being that she fills that role far too seldom. Miss Rosalie Neustadter was guest of honor at the white and green luncheon given by Mrs. S. B. Schloss at the Hotel Richelieu, to which were bidden a score of other young belles. Mrs. J. C. Hebbard's selection of golden poppies for the ornamentation of her lunch table was greatly admired by her guests; all of them were married ladies.

There has not been so much done in the dinner line—one of these delightful entertainments was given by the officers of the Oregon on board that vessel last Thursday, as an adieu to their popular Commander, Captain Howison and his charming wife. Captain Howison, who has recently been relieved from the Oregon on his promotion in the service, has gone East. Mrs. Howison left on the steamer Australia on Tuesday for a trip to the Sandwich Islands, anticipating an absence of several weeks.

Mrs. James Stuart's recent tea was a farewell compliment to Mrs. Greer Harrison and her daughters, who have flown Eastward, en route to Europe, where they will travel for a year or more before settling down in New York en permanence. To-day Mrs. Clarence Mann will give a tea at her residence on Washington street, when she will have the assistance of several young ladies and young matrons in her duties to her guests.

Weddings, these Lenten days, are few and far between, but after Easter the chimes of bells will fill the air right merrily. The only one named for the immediate future is that of Miss Aileen Goad and Charley McIntosh, which, to the disappointment of their friends, it has been decided shall be a home function, and a very quiet one at that, and will be solemnized late in the afternoon of Tuesday, the 7th of April, in the presence of relatives and a few intimate friends.

Our fair brides-elect have been improving the quiet hours of Lent in preparing many of the dainty little "fixins" of their trousseaux, and from all that is said among their friends the different ceremonials will be known by a favorite color. The date named by Miss Ethel Cohen for the tying of her nuptial knot is to be some time in June, and it will be a blue wedding. The destruction of beautiful Fernside, the magnificent home of the Cohens in Alameda, may be regarded as an actual calamity. In the past it was the scene of many a brilliant function, and though its hospitable doors have been in a degree closed for several years, they were about to reopen for the wedding of the sole remaining unmarried daughter, Miss Ethel, whose marriage to Lieut. Bent, it was anticipated, would be the event of the early summer. Miss Grace Sabine's wedding will take place at St. Paul's Church, on California street, but the marriage of Miss Mattie Whittier and W. B. Weir will probably be another home ceremony, and is set for Wednesday, the 21st of April.

From Paris has come the details of the wedding of Miss Jennie Sanderson and Roy Herrick, which was performed there on the 1st of March, the civil ceremony taking place two days previously. It was a home wedding at the apartments of Mrs. Sanderson, on the Avenue Molaga, the decorations being in pink and white; the bridal robe was of white satin, the maid of honor, Miss Marion Sanderson, and the two bridesmaids, Edith Sanderson and Mabel Yost, wore gowns of pale grey cashmere and large white hats and plumes. Only relatives and very intimate friends were present at the noon service, but later there was a large reception and dancing. Mr. and Mrs. Herrick spent their honeymoon in Italy.

There has been another golden wedding anniversary celebration to add to the already long list of what were at one time rare occurrences in these parts. The couple on this occasion were Mr. and Mrs. Leo Eloesser, and they held a reception at their California street residence on Tuesday last, when they received the congratulations of a very large number of friends. While golden wedding celebrations are now looked upon as quite common affairs, it is very seldom that a diamond anniversary is celebrated in California. Such a gathering took place last Monday, when at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Polack Mr. and Mrs. Solomon Bernstein celebrated their sixty years of married life together. The floral decorations of the rooms were elaborate and very beautiful, and open house was the rule during the afternoon and evening, crowds of friends calling to offer their congratulations to the aged couple.

To-morrow and Tuesday next Miss Mattie Brooks and Charles H. Marshall, whose engagement has recently been announced, will receive their friends at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. Max Brooks.

The production at the California Theatre of the Cantata of Ruth and Naomi, by the children of the Beth Israel congregation for the benefit of their Sunday-school, was not only pretty but exceedingly well done. The house was packed with a very enthusiastic audience, and the performance of the children, especially the dancing, was greatly admired, provoking warm and hearty applause.

Spring is drawing on apace, and therefore are the yachtsmen up and doing. The present week has seen lively work in the different yacht clubs, and some of the season's programmes have already been arranged. Opening day at the Encinal Club will be on the 17th of April, that of the Corinthians on the 24th, when there will be a dance in the afternoon and stag high jinks in the evening. The fire king has been playing some sad pranks of late. The San Franciscans are muchly commiserated on the loss by fire of their fine club house at Sausalito, and the members have been invited to make themselves at home as guests of the Pacific Yacht Club house.

A gala entertainment is in process of preparation in Oakland, where, on Easter Tuesday, the 20th of April, at Ebell Hall, a bal masque will be given by the society lights of that city, who will, however, have the assistance of ladies from San Francisco and Berkeley as patronesses of the party. Invitations will of course be in great demand, as without one tickets cannot be purchased, and the endeavor will be to make it exclusive and select.

The departure of Captain Maus for Washington City to act as aide on the staff of General Miles, revives the rumors (and indicate their truth) current a few months ago, of the gallant officer's engagement to Miss Cecelia Miles; so our swim will, no doubt, soon be in receipt of "cards" from the National capital.

Burns McDonald and his wife, nee Bessie Younger, are temporarily established in Los Angeles. The Misses Maude, Lucelle and Alice Younger keep house with their brother Herbert in Green street. Dr. and Mrs. William Younger reside in Chicago. Mr. and Mrs. Herman Zadig left on Wednesday last for a year's absence abroad. Mr. and Mrs. Walter Holcomb, nee Gibbs, have returned from their honeymoon trip and are "at home" to their friends at the Hotel Pleasanton. Mr. and Mrs. Richard Sprague arrived from New Orleans on Thursday and intend to make a stay of some duration.

The "children's" dancing class seems to have assumed the proportions of a training school for dibutantes, and while the good mammas decidedly object to their daughters being called "in society," they nevertheless would sooner miss a night at the opera than overlook one of these affairs—at home. The young ladies composing this select set have apparently graduated from the "Back-fisch," no longer require the assistance of a dancing master, and if my informant is right, the cotillion, as conducted on Friday evening last at the Schwabacher mansion, on Clay street, would have made the invulnerable Greenway blush, such strong competitors has he in this fin de siècle set. Once a week they meet at the houses of their respective parents, where they are thoroughly coached in all the intricacies of the terpsichorean art, as well as the mysteries of the ballroom. As they are soon to do away with the necessity of a teacher, these youthful scions of the houses of Neustadter, Hellman Lilienthal, etc., will most likely be piloted on to success by Mr. Sanford Walter.

On Thursday evening Mr. and Mrs. Moses Blum, Jr., gave an elegant dinner at their residence, on Franklin street, in honor of Mr. and Mrs. Solomon Hirsch, of Portland, Or. The decorations were of quite a novel order. The guests included none but married folks and friends—who assisted in the recent gold wedding ceremonies of Mr. and Mrs. Jacob Meyer. Mrs. Moses Blum is a daughter of the Meyers.

On Wednesday evening last Miss Louise Sussman entertained quite a number of friends at her home in honor of Mr. Albert Ehrman and Miss Rose Neustadter. The dinner, as well as the entertainment following, proved extremely enjoyable to all present.

Mr. and Mrs. Josua Eppinger have returned from their honeymoon after an extended trip through the South.

The following San Francisco people were registered at St. Denis Hotel, Broadway and Eleventh street, New York, on the 18th inst: Mrs. Etta French, I. E. Wooley, and J. B. Ross.

AT THE RACES.

INGLESIDE was re-opened last Monday under the new management for the regular two weeks' races. The sport was of a high class, the weather fine and the attendance large. The sport was above the average, and the favorites had the best of it. President Androus, who succeeds Mr. Spreckels, has been a director of the club from its organization, and is thoroughly acquainted with racing affairs on the coast. Next week's card will be an interesting one, and if the weather continues fair will be very largely attended.

THE death of Major Ruggles at his home in this city last Saturday afternoon removes another member from the thinning ranks of the California pioneers. The Major had been a resident of the State for nearly a third of a century, and at various times held positions of trust. He was deputy naval officer at this port under President Cleveland's first term, and was well known and highly regarded.

THE fur store of Mr. Ad. Kocour, at 5½ (up stairs) Kearny street, which was considerably damaged by fire last Sunday, will be ready for business next Tuesday, at which time he will be glad to meet his old customers and new.

THE San Francisco Bar Pilots on Thursday last presented Senator Androus with a magnificent diamond scarf pin in appreciation of his fairness at Sacramento when measures antagonistic to the pilots were proposed.

HAIDEE

WILSON was to tell a story to-night, and to hear it we had gathered in the smoking room of the Crayon Club, as was our custom.

"Well," he began, "the story commences at the Cordon Rouge, a little café in the Latin Quarter much frequented by artists and students, who, whilst they talked and sipped café, cognac, or absinthe, were entertained by girl singers who piped bacchanal songs, appeared in poses plastiques, or executed dances in which eccentricity and verve made up for grace and decorum. The waitresses wore the shortest of skirts and the lowest of corsages, and were understood to be paid no salary. Since the time of which I speak the whole place has, I believe, been pulled down; and I suppose the panels of the room, which were enriched with paintings by men (some of whom have now become famous) in lieu of their 'score,' have been dispersed or destroyed. They were most certainly not the style of art save for the walls of a cabaret. One large panel, I remember, was almost worthy of Degas himself. It was a scene of the Cordon Rouge interior in the early morning. Many of the men still left were sleepy or dull with absinthe; the girls were—but why describe it? You would have to see it to appreciate it. The other panels were none of them so well worked out. Several were portraits of well-known Phrynes, in traditional attire, with here and there a clever sketch of some Eden star.

"The Exposition had been closed about a couple of months. And Paris had been duly initiated into the mysteries of the danse du ventre, and the frisky and risque prancings of Spanish gitanas. Of course, all the foreigners had not yet returned to their native shores or mountains. Some were engaged in cafés and restaurants, and others had found equally good markets for their eccentricity or charms. M. le Propriétaire of the Cordon Rouge was not behind the times, and to his third-rate and rather banale troupe of lady artists had added 'the beautiful Haidee,' as the bills described her. She was to make her début on the night of which I am speaking; and picture-posters, in which she appeared as a 'milk-white Circassian,' clad in a gauze scarf and a sequin-trimmed red fez, had adorned the somewhat grimy walls of the hall of the Cordon Rouge for some days past.

"I must get on with my story, however. The night came, and the proprietor of the Cordon Rouge had a smiling face in consequence of the large gathering of his patrons.

"On the slips which lay about in plentitude upon the white, marbled-top tables, Haidee, we were informed, was to do three 'turns' during the evening: 'Une danse du Sahara,' 'Une danse du ventre,' and 'Une danse du harem.'

"Well, Haidee came on to the mimic stage at one end of the room, and she in no way helled her name. She was nearly white, an Eastern beauty, with the full form of a woman and the face of a girl of about nineteen. The frim-lah (bodice) of crimson silk was drawn tight, but the chemise and shirwal (loose trousers), of soft silk, hung loose about her in graceful folds. The first dance was slow, monotonous, and languorous. The second was the danse du ventre in its most Oriental form, the costume merely the shirwal.

"What is the danse du harem?' the spectators asked one another.

"It was long past midnight when the rustling of the faded curtains at the back of the stage heralded Haidee's advent. The dance proved to be one of those suggestive measures often described by Eastern travelers, though seldom witnessed save by the privileged few. Haidee's costume was that of the picture posters adorning the walls of the room. It was while the dance was in progress, and the dancer smiling at the audience through the thin folds of her transparent scarf, which she occasionally drew across her face in cleverly simulated shyness, that the desire to paint this beautiful white Circassian, with her harem ways, possessed me.

"I sought M. le Propriétaire and told him my desire. I was one of his favorite customers, had been for two or three years, and so he promised to help me. Eager to forestall any brother artist, I accepted Monsieur's suggestion that we should close the bargain at once.

"Haidee had scarcely begun to assume her attire of civilization when we entered the box of a room which served as the artistes' dressing-room. She received us without a trace of embarrassment, continuing her toilet whilst receiving my compliments, and hearing Monsieur le Propriétaire descend upon my fame and ability as a painter.

"Haidee was rather pleased with the idea of being painted, and perhaps appearing on the walls of the Salon and in the print shops, so we soon came to terms.

"She was to come to me three times a week, about mid-day, and stay till five if I wanted her.

She was a most tractable model, and though somewhat proud of her Parisian attire, took it all in good part when I told her one day that she mustn't ruin her figure by such close-fitting costumes till I had finished with her. I painted her coming through a doorway, just parting the heavy rich-colored Eastern hangings with her fingers, to her bath in a blue and white mosaic fountain in an inner court. Her ivory-white figure was thrown up by the effective, though somewhat bizarre, background.

Long ere the picture was finished I became confronted with a dilemma. This woman, whose charms were the cynosure of a hundred pairs of eyes nightly at the Café Cordon Rouge, was in love with me. Of course the thing was impossible; to be associated in whatever manner with the eccentric dancer of a cabaret was impossible, I told myself a dozen times. But the fact remained that my model, this Circassian girl, was in love with me. In a score of minor ways she began to show her preference, declining little suppers, and insisting upon wearing less scanty attire for her dancing at the café. When the men chaffed her she would hang her head, and resent any of the attentions the other girls seemed to delight in.

"Like most men, I am rather a coward where women are concerned, and so I began to edgel my brains for an easy way out of the difficulty. The picture was fast reaching completion. I should have no need of the model's services longer. To retain her in any way, I at once recognized, was no solution of my difficulty. So I determined to put a bold face on the matter, and dismiss her in the natural course.

"I seized my opportunity about a week later, just as she had finished posing, and was about to dress. I cannot recollect exactly what I said, but I know I managed to make the fact that I shouldn't want her to sit to me any longer perfectly clear.

"She paused, stared at me with dilated eyes of alarm, and then threw herself at my feet, pouring out her love in a torrent of scraps of French and English, which she had picked up—entreating me with floods of tears to make her my servant, my slave, anything, so that she might remain with me. Then, finding I vouchsafed no reply, she rose up and called on me to behold her beauty, enumerating her charms with the freedom of a savage and the abandon of a woman scorned. Then seeing that, though I wavered, I was unwon, she turned on me, and, when I still refused her suit, with her eyes flaming with passion spat at my feet, and going to the furthest corner of the studio sullenly prepared to leave the studio. She made one more appeal, and then, failing in her object, she departed.

"Rather upset by the incident, I decided to leave Paris for a few days' change. I did so; and upon coming back and asking for my key, which I had left with the landlady, the latter told me Haidee had been there the day before and had had the key for a few minutes. 'I hope it is all right, Monsieur,' said the woman, 'but Mademoiselle assured me she had your permission.'

"I rushed up-stairs full of apprehension. There on my easel was the picture—but what a change! A ghost seemed to glare at me from the canvas. The large brush and pot of 'white lead' standing near, which I had used in 'covering' old canvases, showed me what had been the means of this transformation. On the top of the painting, in a line with the eye, was pinned a scrap of paper. On it was written in childish, sprawling letters, 'Haidee fait ceci.' Then on another line, 'Venez à la Mo—.' I could not make out the rest of the word.

"The damage was beyond repair. This I at once saw. My beautiful Haidee had become a will-o'-the-wisp. Then I sat down somewhat bewildered. What was the last word she had written? Suddenly a light dawned on me. I seized my hat, and hailing a passing fiacre drove rapidly to the Place of the Dead.

"Haidee was there—her dress torn away by the hook of the grapping rod, revealing one white shoulder with a blue bruise upon it, and the snowy bosom which would never heave with love or passion again. She had been drawn from the Seine that morning. I identified her, and purchased her a grave. Less I could not do."

—CARL HUYSMANN in Quartier Latin.

A FAN FANCY.

UPON her fan where cupids play
 At hind-man's buff in droll array,
 A bit of rhyme he dares to write
 Whose theme is love, and love's delight
 Oh, hold, bad man; what will she say?
 And while she reads he looks away,
 To awkward doubts and fears a prey;
 "Oh, fool!" he thinks, "to love indite Upon her fan!"
 He starts to go; she bids him stay,
 Then blushes, sighs, and—names the day!
 Ah, clever maid! ah, happy wight!
 Behold a couple's lives made bright
 By just a couplet light and gay
 Upon her fan! —N. Y. Mail and Express.

THE poet says that in spring the young man's mind lightly turns to thoughts of love; but in California his mind turns toward the lightly-running wheel. And really it could be much less profitably and agreeably employed. California is the ideal country for cycling, with its cool mornings and delightfully still and fragrant nights. There are a hundred highways and byways within easy distance about the city which invite the idler and his wheel. There are so many things to be said in favor of the bicycle, and so many of them have been repeated so many times that it seems useless to attempt any new argument for this friend of fresh and healthful exercise. One of its strongest claims is that it is equally available to men and women; to young and old—all conditions and classes. The wheel, too, is a practical agent of reform, and is felt in municipal matters on the right side of every question. It is the greatest ally of good streets and roads, and in these directions will ultimately accomplish great results. The present local season promises renewed interest in the wheel, and the prominent agencies are fully prepared with all the latest models for every demand upon them.

The bicycle meet which has held the Pavilion during the present week cannot fail to give an impetus to the trade. The meetings have been fairly well attended, and several of the world's amateur records have been broken.

The annual hundred-mile club race between San Francisco and Oakland, which takes place soon, is attracting a great deal of attention, and will be fought out in grand style.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Chicago Record says: "There are now in the bonded warehouse at Tampa more than 9000 hales of tobacco, which belongs to a few manufacturers, and will last them two years. Some of the big New York factories were equally forehanded, but the rest will have to shut up shop or use the domestic product. There is no Sumatra leaf, but the shrewd Dutchmen of Amsterdam, who own the Sumatra plantations, have had their eyes opened, and are taking advantage of the situation by advancing prices. The closing of the Havana factories is going to make imported cigars scarce and high, and if Gen. Gomez and his associates keep up the war, it will be some years before the trade can be resumed. Mexican manufacturers and tobacco growers are alive to the situation, but their capacity is limited, so the smokers will have to return to pipes and use the domestic product."

PROF. FERRI of Paris says that Mme. Duse and Sarah Bernhardt have what is called "the sickle-shaped jaw," which is the sign of nervous physiognomy in its fullest expression. He admits that it is a sign of genius as well; but at the same time it is a warning to men not to marry women who have it. Warnings of this sort are seldom heeded. Men are so constructed that they think all signs fail when they are interested, and even if the woman whom they wanted to marry had two sickle jaws, they would not be deterred from marrying her. I may add that women are not deterred by storm signals where men are concerned, either.—The Critic.

PRESIDENT McKinley is beginning early the exercise of executive clemency toward condemned malefactors. He has just given a ten-days' respite to four New Mexico murderers, who should have had their necks broken last Tuesday. The President desires to make a personal investigation. The case against these men is well known and their guilt established beyond a doubt. They are assassins, and have for years terrorized Santa Fé. The President should let them hang with the utmost neatness and dispatch.

THE tariff bill has passed the House, and is now before the Senate, where it is likely to be subjected to a process of corrective emasculation that will rob it of its more objectionable features.

GOVERNOR BUDD is nobly earning his salary these post-Legislative days. He has clipped $603,925.50 from the general appropriation bill; and it is particularly pleasing to note that his official blue pencil strikes the outrageous salary list hard. He also pays economical and caustic respect to the State printing department.

STORMS, floods, snow and ice were the April greetings of the States east of the Rocky Mountains last Thursday. In California the month came smiling, bearing buds and blossoms. It is amazing that this State has less than two million inhabitants, when but four days are necessary to escape the rigors of the "East"—to graduate from a condition of misery to surroundings of delight.

SAN FRANCISCO'S week of Carnival promises to witness a splendid naval demonstration. The Commander of the Pacific squadron has been instructed by Secretary Long to parade every available war ship here at that time. The various committees report satisfactory progress in their work, and notwithstanding some slight misunderstanding at headquarters there is promise of a brilliant week of Carnival.

IT would be a shame for the people of this city to permit the location of the Wilmerding school outside of San Francisco. The generous man who made the bequest for the help of poor and struggling youth intended that the school should be located here; his wealth was accumulated here; this city was the scene of his early battles and after-life commercial successes. The Wilmerding school, to fulfil the intent of the man who made it possible, should be a San Francisco institution.

DR. CLINTON remarked at the last meeting of the Board of Supervisors that there were rumors abroad concerning the choosing of a certain kind of rock for street work in this city that did not reflect credit upon the board. Dr. Clinton made a very allopathic and complimentary diagnosis of the case. There are rumors, black, well defined ones, and backed up by conclusive circumstantial evidence, they are, too, that point to deeds well worthy of the notice of the Grand Jury and the jails. Clinton is right in asking for action: it is what any gentleman might be expected to demand.

ONE of the most important happenings of the week in this city was the settlement of differences between the insurance companies. Rates will be at once restored to old figures. It is a notorious fact that immense sums were lost by the companies during the past eighteen months, because business was written right and left at a positive loss. As the public secured the advantage of this unhealthy condition in low premiums, no particular complaint can be made. The new compact will be likely to be permanent, owing to the recent costly experiences. Insurance will cost more from now on in San Francisco.

THE Missouri Legislature has just refused to pass a bill legalizing "contests of speed, power, and physical endurance of man and beast." It was entitled the "horse breeders' bill," and was a thinly-disguised and futile effort to legalize prize-fighting in that State. The man who introduced it owes an apology to the equine race for an unwarranted insult.

IT is a misfortune that the recent effort to oust Secretary Welch from a position of authority in the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children was not successful. The man has time without number shown his utter unfitness for the position. That he is still retained reflects upon the good sense and capacity of those who keep him in office.

ONE of the worthy deeds of the Legislature was the enactment of a law providing for the building of a State highway connecting Folsom and Sacramento. This roadway is to be built of crushed rock, with granite or stone for drains and culverts. The work will be of chief advantage in illustrating in a practical manner the system that should prevail throughout the State. Roads—permanent, sound, and equally good winter and summer alike—are a great need. The Folsom-Sacramento highway may be their beginning.

A NUMBER of Northern California landowners are arranging for a meeting with President C. P. Huntington of the Southern Pacific. They want his assistance in settling and improving 200,000 acres of land in the Sacramento valley. They desire to cut this tract into small holdings, and improve each piece upon the colonization plan. Should they meet the shrewd President of the railroad, they will obtain information and practical suggestions well worthy of their consideration. Mr. Huntington favors any intelligent means of settling the unoccupied lands of the State, and the promoters of this scheme, if it be meritorious, are wise in seeking his assistance.

WORK on the boulevard continues with vigor. Total subscriptions are nearing the $15,000 mark. The men employed are making excellent progress; but at least an equal sum must be added to that already announced in order to complete the roadway as originally contemplated. A great many demands have been made upon the generous citizens of San Francisco within the past year, but not one of them has greater merit, or is worthy of more prompt response than this one. While it gives the needy employment, the highway they are building will intrinsically be worth in the nature of a permanent improvement, many times its cost. Help along the boulevard.

THE sum of $10,000 was appropriated by the last Board of Health for the purpose of providing a proper system of sewerage for the City and County Hospital. As is frequently the case, the money was wasted. The present Board made an examination, and closed up a part of the institution for a time because of the wretched condition of the sewers. An appropriation of $500, it was thought, would make such repairs as were absolutely necessary. Auditor Broderick signed bills for more than $3,000 for the improvements that it was promised should cost but $500, and the end is not yet. This incident is an illustration of the manner in which the taxpayers of San Francisco are duped, fooled and defrauded year in and year out. The Auditor is not at fault, the Board of Health is blameless—in heaven's kind name where are all these leaks and drains hidden, and why are they never discovered until the mischief has been done?

SPANISH TROUBLES AT HOME AND ABROAD.

SPAIN is in more troubles than those she has in Cuba. It appears pretty certain that the time is approaching when she will need more men and officers than she has got to suppress another Carlist rebellion at home. Judging by her failure in Cuba, she cannot be strong from any military point of view. Her Government has just called the attention of France to the activity of Carlist agents in the purchase of arms and ammunition in France and Belgium, and their dispatch to the Pyrenees. Don Carlos, whose partisans were driven over the border more than twenty years ago, announces from Venice his preparation to resign his claims, he calls them, "to abdicate his throne in favor of his son, Don Jayme." The Basques and Navarraise, whose ancient rights were abolished as punishment for their part in the Carlist movement of 1874-6, have never been reconciled, and such an outbreak as that was might call for more troops than the Government of Queen Christina has either at home or abroad. Then the rebellion in the Philippines continues unsubdued, and, in fact, looks more formidable than ever. The Cuban campaign clearly reveals the fact that Spain has small military talent to spare, and evidently no military genius at all. The collapse of Spain's colonial power seems ending, whilst her home rule has a formidable chance of going to Don Carlos, or his son. There are not a few Californians who will regret such a complete collapse of the great power that once, in pride and grandeur, ruled well nigh all of the Pacific Coast on which we dwell, and will ardently wish that such a fate may yet be spared her, had as the outlook for the moment undoubtedly appears to be.

Spain has been mighty in discovering, but weak in keeping new lands. The colder, or what may be termed the harder sections of the Earth, she has pretty generally eschewed, but the warmer or moderate areas she was mindful to occupy at a very early period in the history of modern conquest. We believe it true that Columbus was the real discoverer of America, and that the sale of her jewels by Queen Isabella rendered him essential aid at a critical moment. No true American can desire to witness the downfall of the old empire that gave this continent to the world. No genuine man can desire the Spanish race to be without a home they can call their home—they who have discovered homes for uncouth millions, ought not to have it to say: "No foot of land have I on this vast wilderness." The beauty of the true-bred Castilian women and the lordly hospitality of the Hidalgos ought never to be blotted off this Earth. They are like unto the famous gems that should know not what extinguishment is. The depth of their welcome—la casa de usted, Señor—is seldom equaled on this earth. Tens of thousands of our pioneers have gone to their graves thinking them the sweetest sounds they ever heard among men. When they, with distinguished mien and the sweetest of words, tell you that "my house is yours," they do not literally mean a strict interpretation of their words, but they do mean a warmth of hospitality that has scarcely an equal among men. The greatest of colonizers, no one will wish that old Spain shall disappear from among the nations of Earth. She has given us several large slices of her lands, added considerably to our population, and become a friend in many ways. She was the first to grant us a valuable reciprocity treaty. It is difficult for even the jingoes to give a reason for wishing her harm.

The Mistress of the Spanish Main has doubtless made mistakes in her treatment of her colonies. The principal one has been that of sending lordlings and spendthrifts to administer lucrative offices. They almost invariably went to the colonies to cut a dash and to steal themselves rich. "As wealthy as a colonial Governor" became a by-word throughout Spain. So much was made out of the current Government revenues by the home officers, that colony after colony broke away from the mother country's rule, and finally gained their independence. Cuba and the Philippines still remain, but their departure, at no very distant date, is inevitable, which will prove a mistake to themselves as well as to civilization. The islands are not fit for self-government, and are better, in every way, as they are. Cuba free will mean Cuba eternally at war within itself. No one party will be able long to maintain itself. A mixed race, made up of negroes, Indians and creoles, their ways differ widely, and their prejudices against each other are as bitter as hatred can make them. Some of our own people are glad of this condition, because it renders it likely that the Cuban pear will one day drop into the open mouth of Uncle Sam. They know not what they seek. The annexation of Cuba would bring us endless trouble, which we had better leave to Spain.

The Arbitration Treaty At Present. As amended the arbitration treaty has gone back to the Senate. President McKinley's influence does not appear to be great with the Committee on Foreign affairs, for that body has recommended substantially the same changes that had been agreed upon before the new administration came in. The most important of these is that no question can be arbitrated without the Senate's consent, which means the negotiation of a new treaty when an arbitration is desired. If ratified in this form, it will seem a very lame ending of the great arbitration treaty movement. Still the idea of any sort of treaty will do good. By this so-called treaty, arbitration will be more deeply imbedded in the public mind, and that alone will do good. In England they have given themselves over to the idea that party politics are in some way interfering with the treaty's ratification. That is clearly not the case, as two different administrations have now fathered it. The jealousy of certain statesmen, the hatred borne towards England by a few jingoes, and the Hibernian societies, are about all the opposition there is to the treaty, which in fact has become no treaty at all. If the Senate says "nay," there can be no arbitration. It is not such a determination of an issue of the first magnitude as the public conscience will approve, and before long the best American voices will be found denouncing it. European exchanges are making fun of the amendments made, and some of them are finding pleasure in the idea that Russia and the Green Isle got the better of John Bull. Of course with the people who treat the subject in that spirit, arbitration is a farce. If peace be not the thing wanted, this talk about arbitration is humbug, and we had better go to war at the first favorable opportunity. That is the logic of the jingoes, but happily there are a great many people in this country who do not think that way.

Does Not Take After Cleveland. The New President is endeavoring to take after his predecessor as little as possible. That may be good politics, but that is something the future alone can determine.

Cleveland's methods procured him two terms and three nominations, but it has not yet done, or shaped as if it would do as much for McKinley. For the time being McKinley is a great popular success in Washington. His pie counter is still covered with things good and rare, beautiful to the sight and of great value. He insists on special attention being paid to the wishes of Senators and Representatives in appointments to office. A well known writer called at the White House a short time ago and applied for a certain office. As McKinley knew him well, he said he had secured no endorsements. But these the President advised him to get. The names of Representatives are good to have, but "be sure of the Senators" were his last words. That was not much like Cleveland. Not much! The new President has no use for special police protection. Garfield had, and so had Cleveland more than once, although he managed to keep the fact quiet. McKinley has put away the sentry boxes, sees the people, takes afternoon walks down Pennsylvania avenue, but, above all, is determined to keep on good relations with Senators and Representatives. He may do all these things better than Grover Cleveland, but that will not constitute him a statesman, nor cause his name to live in history. If he makes name and fame his efforts must be directed in a totally different direction.

The Laws We Are Living Under. It is the supposed right of every American citizen to have the opportunity to know the laws which he is living under, but today no man can learn that, unless he be the Government printer. During the last days of the sessions such an avalanche of hills went through that no man has summed them up, made a calendar of them or, given the press a brief glossary of what they contain. This state of affairs, a week after the adjournment of the Legislature, is not an exception to what generally occurs. We recall the fact that some years ago 241 bills were passed on the last day, by merely reading their titles, and it was three weeks before we knew as much as the titles of the laws under which we were managing to keep the peace, if we did keep it. The new constitution was supposed to cure this, in a large measure, but its success has not equalled the hopes of its friends. What happens to the bills between final passage, and final printing, God alone knows. We have tried to keep track of them during that dubious period, but somehow or other could never keep ourselves in exactly the right place at the right time. The bills slipped away as if by magic. The clerks were obliging and good fellows like Duckworth. All the same, the bills became laws in a shape that all was prepared to swear to be O. K. Every man stood ready to swear that each bill, even to the dotting of an "i" was exactly in the shape members had voted it should be. Why we cannot at this late date get at what bills were at the last moment pushed through and what were left behind, we pretty well know, but think the new journalism should do something to win its spurs, and accordingly leave them this little job to do. In better days good journalists were content to go for the bottom facts of things, and to get them so straight, that they could take the risk of a libel suit every time, knowing that they were fortified behind proofs that would bear them harmless through. The new journalism the other day guessed at its facts, lied about them, and earned nothing but contempt. We shall all soon know that any statement that may appear in a certain sheet is worthless because of being devoid of the first element of truth. What the new list of laws will show we cannot now be very sure, but we are fully persuaded that few of the Examiner's pet measures were approved, whilst nearly all that it opposed became laws. "To get there" is the vaunting motto of the slum sheet. Its present experience is "to get left."

Bears Expected Fruit. It may sometimes be wise to assume a virtue, even though you have it not.

Prize-fighting is one of the amusements not unknown to San Francisco; but the raw and repulsive features of the pastime are thinly veiled under the guise of physical culture exhibitions. Licenses are granted and boxing contests are permitted in any one of the several clubs in the city, which in fact are knock-out prize-fights. The bruisers are just as vicious and brutal as were the pugilists who appeared last month at Carson. The distinction lies in the unimportant fact that the local fights are not called finish contests; and if they are prolonged beyond a certain point the police interfere. But defeat and victory are more frequently accomplished before such official restraint is exercised. In the moral effect on those present, there can be drawn no distinguishing line between despised Carson and decent San Francisco. This fact is undeniable, but thick-skinned and indifferent as have been average California legislative bodies, not one of them would for one moment entertain a proposition to legalize out-and-out prize-fighting. In Nevada, however, there exists neither such virtue nor the claim for it. With blunt frankness Satan's sage-brush solons advertised to the world their entire willingness to harter their State's honor in aid of its treasury. That men do not gather figs from thistles nor grapes from thorns is therein verified. Such flagrant violation of propriety and right has born its inevitable fruit. It is said that arrangements are being made and plans laid for embellishing Nevada's statutes two years hence with a fitting companion to the prize-ring law. Ever since public opinion and the acts of Congress drove the lottery out of business in Louisiana, it has desired to return to the United States. Nevada's stand has given the enterprising Stuart hope that he has found there congenial soil for a lottery scheme. Being interviewed as to this report, Governor Sadler declared that he knew nothing of the movement to turn Nevada into a cemetery for those who commit suicide; but the genial official curio gave forth no note of disapproval. Without doubt he would be entirely pleased to superintend the monthly drawings for a fat salary, and give his personal endorsement to a plan for the remodeling of the State of Nevada upon the lines of Monte Carlo.

Slum Journalism. Libraries, Club rooms, and such like institutions all over the land, are dealing with the N. Y. World and Journal as they deserve to be dealt with. The Springfield Republican, widely known as one of the cleanest, ablest, and best of our American newspapers, aptly uses the phrase "slum journal," and adds the information that the Springfield city library has removed the N. Y. World from its shelves and that the Journal never had a place there. The Century Club orders the Journal, which still continues to be sent against many demands that it be discontinued, to be thrown into the ash barrel. "From all over the country," says the Republican, "these two flagrant examples of a vicious development of news is being condemned. This exclusion of such sheets from the reading rooms of associations of high character does not affect seriously their subscription list, or their sales on the streets and car lines. But moral reprobation counts for something, and ere long such papers will not be read in families that have regard for the moral well being of their little ones, and eventually the hard-shelled consciences of their proprietors will be pricked, and their sheets will no longer defame and disgrace the newspaper profession." This is good and wholesome talk which may safely be indulged in with comfort in Massachusetts, but in San Francisco it involves the writer in all the mud spattering that a vicious press has, in its malice and hatred, the heart to cover him with. But a discriminating public, or, at least, that part of it which is discriminating, will make no mistake in identifying the qualities of the old and new journalist. Once upon a time it was the rule of journalists to respect each other's individuality and private life, but now it is the fashion to lie about these matters atrociously, and refuse any sort of correction. But even this evil will be cured, for men will not stand it. It is exceeding the boundary line between what a man may submit to and what his manhood forbids that he should. This New Journalism has ways that cannot stand exposure, and whatever else may be said of San Francisco, it does not give its sympathy to such brutality as the Examiner indulges in. It knows no respect for anybody, or for anybody's rights, but it does not control all the Courts, and it is not unlikely to be compelled to respect the law.

Ingalls Catching It. Ex-Senator Ingalls is catching it all over the East for the little part he took in the recent prize fight at Carson. To be sure, he did but little save to lend his Senatorial name to the Examiner and Journal. He telegraphed a few quirks and jibes for two or three days directed at what he called "hypocrites" who pretended not to like pugilism. That kind of talk does not go very well among respectable people and Ingalls is being tahoood from good society in consequence. The scoring he is receiving will be likely to make him a marked man as long as he lives. His eccentricity has gained him much notoriety in the past, but his engaging himself to a disreputable newspaper, as a reporter of a prize fight, bars him from the portals of all that good citizens desire to keep clean. He is now without the pale. His own State has disowned him, and passed a law by which any citizen of Kansas attending a prize fight anywhere shall be ineligible thereafter to hold any State or municipal office. The Legislatures generally have the power to pass such inhibitions. California has effectually stopped duelling in that way. If the majority of our people are as sincere as we believe them to be in the matter of prize fighting, they can promptly end the disgrace of Carson, and the abominations of the man fights there, by simply making the attendants, who are nearly always politicians, ineligible for office. They would run away like rats leaving a sinking ship.

Ex-Presidents And Their Kin. What to do with our Ex-Presidents is not a problem yet solved, nor in a likely way of being solved. Some ex-Presidents drop out of view better than others, whilst a few remain laggard on the stage for many long years. Whether they should be comfortably pensioned, or made life Senators, or sent as ambassadors to the foremost nations, are all suggestions that have received more or less approval, but none of them has commended national assent. We favor life Senatorship ourselves, but as that proposition meets with considerable opposition and as we have no personal interest in it, we leave the settlement of a problem that may one day become a grave one to a newer generation that may favor constitutional changes more than this one does. The question of what to do with ex-Presidents' sons seems, however, to be in a fair way to settle itself. Colonel Fred Grant is not satisfied with the Police Commissionerhip of New York, but wants a Foreign Ambassadorship to a first-class power, and his wife has even begged Senator Cullom to accredit her husband's name to the State of Illinois, in order to promote his chances. Cullom has refused. There are too many actual residents of Illinois who want first-class missions. One of the Hayes boys is also up for a foreign Mission, and so also is one of the Garfield boys. A son of Chester A. Arthur is a candidate for one of the Secretaryships of a European embassy. Mrs. John A. Logan is working every available influence to secure the appointment of John A. Logan Jr. to the Austrian Mission. His chief qualifications are that he has a rich wife and little to do. Russel Harrison, it is said, will be content with a federal office near to Grandpa's hat. Lincoln is busy in gathering together the Presidential families, and it looks likely that we may some day have a nobility of Presidential ancestry. Cleveland will be "away up" in the matter of supplying marriageable daughters, whilst McKinley has boys that promise to rank with the best. There is no longer any import in the query as to "what we are to do with the boys:" if only they be ex-Presidents' sons.

The Hawaiian Dilemma. It is noted by the dispatches that the Japanese Consul at Honolulu has called for a warship to huck up his demand for the landing of Japanese laborers at that point. The islands are now overrun with "little brown men," and the white population feel that their further influx would prove a serious menace to the peace and prosperity of the Hawaiian republic. If the demand of the Consul be granted and a Japanese warship sent to override the laws of the Government, a crisis such as the islands have not faced since the deposition of the ex-Queen will engage the attention of President Dole and his compatriots. Meantime representatives of the Hawaiian Government at Washington are actively engaged in forwarding their scheme of annexation by urging the incorporation of a territorial autonomy under the strong protection of this country. These gentlemen will be likely to achieve a brilliant failure. The Sandwich Islands are more than two thousand miles distant from the Pacific Coast. That any considerable number of disinterested intelligent men in either house of Congress should favor such a wide and ominous departure from the safe precedent of past American history is not to be believed. McKinley declared in his inaugural address that his foreign policy would be built on conservative lines; and he may be expected to oppose the annexationists. All this country wants with the Sandwich Islands is the commerce dictated by mutual interests, and the establishment of a coaling station there—neither one of which is contingent on annexation.

Pure Food Congress. From present indications the Pure Food Congress, which is to be held here during the first days of May, will be an unqualified success. The crusade for pure food started with the election of Milk Inspector Dockery, who was the first official to demonstrate that his position was not a sinecure. His raid against dishonest purveyors of milk startled the community and aroused an interest that has not yet disappeared. It was shown by his vigilance that there was an immense amount of fraud in the milk trade of the city, which through his industry has been very materially curtailed. Later the officers took up the investigation of various articles sold by grocers. Here was also discovered a very general adulteration of jellies and similar goods. The fight against the offenders in this direction has reached an acute stage. The Manufacturers' and Producers' Association has taken a very firm stand against adulterated goods, in which it should be sustained. The Merchants' Association takes the ground that the innocent retailer should be warned of the impure brands of goods he has for sale, and he given time in which to replace them. No doubt injustice is done retailers who, having trusted the manufacturer, find themselves arrested for selling goods they always supposed were pure. But the fault does not lie with the consumer, who pays honest money out for food that is not what he thinks it is. He must be protected. The retailer has recourse against the manufacturer who has imposed upon him, and who is morally at fault. We know of one dealer at least who will bring suit for heavy damages against the maker of adulterated jellies for the sale of which he was arrested and fined. In bringing about the reforms that are now proved to be most necessary, some of the innocent will suffer with the guilty. But it appears that the chief offenders—the manufacturers—cannot be brought to justice without in greater or lesser degree involving the retailers. The Pure Food Congress which it has been determined to hold in this city, beginning on the 30th of this month, will keep alive the interest in this deeply important question, and should result in much practical, lasting good.

The Free Market. Governor Budd has signed Senate Bill 507, authorizing the State Board of Harbor Commissioners to establish and maintain a free market at some convenient point on the water front in San Francisco. This is a move that has at various times attracted public attention; has always been regarded favorably by the people, and firmly opposed by the commission and produce dealers of the city. The consumers in San Francisco have felt that there has been maintained a combination among the dealers whereby the prices of vegetables, fruits and garden stuffs generally have been kept up without regard to the laws of supply and demand. The fact that tons of onions, potatoes, melons and other farm products are, with annual regularity, thrown into the bay because they cannot be jobbed at a certain price, while the same articles in the stores and stands about the city have been selling at undisturbed figures, has made it clear that prices in San Francisco have been little influenced by the supply. All this time the farmer has been unable to sell his vegetables, has taken about what was offered to him, or has seen his hard earnings float out to sea.

The free market has been measurably successful in other places, and there appears no good reason why it should not bring the producer and consumer into direct and mutually profitable contact here. There is something radically wrong when tons of wholesome food are thrown into the bay, while within actual sight of the waste are thousands of people in want, who would be glad to pay enough for them to make the producer whole if commission charges were cut out. The establishment of a free market on the water front will give the countryman a chance to bring his produce here and sell it to the consumer. This is the intent of the act. It may work a temporary hardship upon the commission dealers, but it should effectually prevent the waste that has been witnessed on the water front in San Francisco every year—a waste borne by the helpless producer and the poorer class of consumers. The free market ought to be a blessing to both.

The Face Doctors. The Supreme Court has decided that no man may practice dentistry in this State except he have the consent of the State Board of Dental Examiners. Why should not the public be protected in other directions? San Francisco has a host of alleged dermatologists and face doctors who are every day duping women in search of beauty. Their numerous lotions, face washes, and skin renews are either liable to disfigure the users of them for life, or subject them to great temporary pain and inconvenience. Laws governing these hrazen quacks, who prey upon the credulity of the female community, should be enacted. They should be compelled to qualify themselves and obtain and display diplomas showing a practical knowledge of their business. Every now and again instances are noted where serious injuries have resulted from the use of their beautifiers. Mortification and fear of ridicule prevents many who suffer from their treatment from denouncing them. San Francisco supports no frauds equal to them, and they should be suppressed.

ART JOTTINGS.

LATIMER finished this week "Morning in the Redwoods," which has some excellent qualities, but somehow is lacking in that tender feeling which is expressed in his wood and water piece before mentioned. The treatment is good, but there is a coldness in the ensemble which is more of an artistic accident than an artistic fault. He has presented it to the Bohemian Club, an institution which has been especially fortunate during the last few months in being the recipient of presents from its artist members.

At a recent sale in London, Arthur Lemon received a thousand pounds for an animal picture. We may claim Lemon, though of English birth, as a California artist. His first work of any merit was painted in Oakland, and Edward Bosqui was among his earliest patrons. Then Lemon returned to London, studied some time in Paris, and astonished the artistic world by an animal picture which won the highest commendation from the critics. Lemon was made a member of the Royal Academy, and is to-day the Landseer of England.

With the exception of Toby Rosenthal, every artist who pitched his camp in San Francisco and painted away for the crust in the past has returned to this city certainly within a decade. Fred Yates came back with his laurels won as a painter of portraits. Bloomer, Peters, all the wanderers, have dropped in from time to time to dwell a little while among the scenes of their early struggles. But Rosenthal, of whom so much was said in adulation, keeps housed in Munich, or some other art center, and languishes for the golden sands no more.

The studio art patron is a thing of the past in this city. Time was when the opulent visitor strolled from studio to studio, leaving fat orders behind him or her. Something on the easel, or an unfinished canvas in a corner of the room, won their fancy, and a request for its completion was usually accompanied by a check for a trifle on account. Nor were those angels' visits few and far between. Mrs. Robert A. Johnson, Tiburcio Parrott, Mr. A. P. Hotaling, and a score or so of others, amused themselves in this way, and their amusement was largely to the artist's profit. The custom of giving Saturday afternoon receptions has also gone out of date, with the reception of Bruce Porter, who still asks his friends to tea with him occasionally.

The ninth annual exhibition of the Sketch Club is at hand, and invitations have been issued by the members to their friends. The receptions will begin Tuesday next, and continue to Saturday, the 10th, at 503 Montgomery street. The hanging committee were busy this week in the discharge of their important duties, for in the Sketch Club many are called, but few are chosen.

Emil Carlsen, at one time instructor at the Art School, and who has been away in New York for the past four years, will revisit this city next summer.

JULIUS S. GODEAU.

ONE of the best-known men among the French residents of this city is Julius S. Godeau, who has acted as treasurer of the Fourteenth of July Committee and been a factor in the success of various French celebrations for years past. He has a wide circle of friends and acquaintances, being a member of nearly every fraternal society in this city. In consequence, he possesses more than usual influence, which he has shown not only in politics but in such business affairs as the lighting of Montgomery avenue with arc lights, the movement for that helpful illumination being largely aided by Mr. Godeau. The Republicans of his district hold him in high esteem, he being very energetic in promoting the interests of his political party there. His parents were pioneers. They were established in business here in 1849. Mr. Godeau was born in San Francisco in 1864.

OF course one can say smart things about Otis Skinner—things that are impertinent and unpleasant and true, just as one can say them about any new star—but one cannot read the list of the plays in which Skinner is to act during his three weeks' season at the Baldwin Theatre and deny him enterprise and grit. Skinner has long had the courage, now he has the means, to act what he thinks he can act; and if his repertory is to be trusted to have omitted all of those plays wherein he doubts his fitness for the leading roles, it is easy to see that what Skinner does not think himself capable of attaining to is not of much consequence in the drama anyway.

For my part, I frankly admire the young actor who is so heels-over-head in love with all the keys of his art that he has not the time, or the luck, to become highly specialized in any one particular department. So far as I know, Mr. Skinner has not yet committed his master-work. It is quite possible that he never will—he is so copious and fearless. Besides, his personality is evasive. Like the handwriting of the young, it is all random future—no past. And the actor without a past is oftenest the actor with a future. We all would consider Richard Mansfield in a happier light as an all-around craftsman if it were not for Beau Brummel. No matter what he acts now, we remember him in that play; and I, for one, am human enough to deride his art, catalogue his stageisms, even resent his personality whenever he fails to exact from himself that very best of tact, technique and exquisiteness which is so beautifully epitomized in the character of the Beau. Perhaps it is well that Skinner has never arrived, that he has no Beau Brummel past to pale the mild glow of his present.

Beau Brummel brings me easily to His Grace de Grammont. Clyde Fitch wrote both plays, and Skinner gave us the latter at the Baldwin Monday night—an inoffensive bit of historic romancing, pretty, in truth a rather entertaining elaboration of an anecdote or two which Fitch possibly did not hear very clearly in the first place, or bother himself to stick to very closely in the second. Play tinkers avail themselves of all the license that literature has granted geniuses, and consequently a Clyde Fitch of to-day will subordinate polite history, or any sort of history or historic character, to the requirements of his mood, or his customer's, quite as readily and as loosely as a William Shakespeare would have done in an equally practical yesterday—a yesterday wherein dramatists were proportionately as anxious to land buttered side up at court as they now are to land any side up anywhere, so long as the feat brings popularity and profit. Of course, in this age of indiscriminate trade, Fitch has no Crown censor to fear, no noble patron to sleek the softest way. Dynasties do not tremble or noble family skeletons rattle bonefully when Fitch's pen is inked. But there are the public who pays, the matinee maid and mother, the prudish critic made prudish by the Ibsen which he does not understand and the cheaper decorative problem which he does. Fitch thought of these, and he de-odorized de Grammont. "A tinker's tink for fact and history," said Fitch; "the 'Chevalier' is my hero, and I'll make him respectable. Charles can remain a wench, and I suppose Middleton and Warmestre will go all right as seducers—nobody minds the morals of a villainess; but the 'Chevalier' must be pure and fragrant." So Fitch adjusted his stained-glass monocle and made the "chaser" chaste. De Grammont could now be turned loose with safety at a Sabbath-school picnic. Needless to say, Mistress Hamilton is converted into a worthy mate for the regenerated hero.

I am not a precisian in the matter of immorals, and I admit that these sanitary improvements have not spoiled the play. They rather enhance my reverence for the author's pellucid imagination. After this rehabilitation of de Grammont—de Grammont the prime cut of the tenderloin of France, the sweetest scoundrel in all England, the keenest card-sharp of his day—I believe Fitch capable of exalting lusty Tom Jones to the virgin pages of the Ladies' Home Journal. In any event His Grace de Grammont is not notably dull. It is very much like a comic opera, decorative, unreal, better constructed than most comic operas, and quick and clever in some of the lines. "Your Majesty has done me the honor of eaves-dropping," says de Grammont to Charles II. Such a line at the end of an act has an infallibly uplifting effect on the curtain. To say that the King decks his mistresses with rings for every finger but the wedding one is also bright and heroic. Other parts of speech are not so good—as when de Grammont finds Mistress Hamilton with the King at Whitehall, and fumes on her thus: "When you smile the smile that stings but does not intoxicate—when you pack up your court belongings and unpack your love for me!" Could anything be worse? No. Nor could anything be better than this which follows, when Charles has given up all hopes of possessing the pale, exclusive charms of Mistress Hamilton, and his trusty caterer, Jermyn, whispers consolingly, "Sire, she is not the only maiden in your kingdom!" Isn't that immense? If Fitch had written, "Sire, she is not the only hirdie on the bough," or something like that, I should know he meant it to be saucy and devilish. But that line is too good. It must have been an accident.

I have little to say about the acting. Skinner plays the artificial role of De Grammont in a thoroughly artificial manner. It is not expected of an actor to do quite all that his author has not done for him. Still, a little more plasticity and a little less elaboration and not so much of that over-trained emotionalism with which the average actor usually convinces himself—and no one else—that he is being French and I can imagine the "Chevalier," even in his present state of expurgation, being a much more enchanting fellow than Skinner made him Monday night. Maud Durbin lent no distinction whatever to Mistress Hamilton. Frederick Mosley was a very good picture as Charles II, but he stopped at the picture. I can recall no noteworthy achievement by the other members of the company.

Massenet, the minaturest, who has been called "Mlle. Wagner" by persons who do not like Wagner, and a plagiarist by persons who do not like Massenet, and a noisy boulevardier by persons who do not like any musical work that is not posthumous, was represented in the repertory of his countrymen at the California Theatre a week ago Thursday. I come late, but enthusiastic. It is easy to recall the thrill of La Navarraise, a tragedy of an hour's duration, done in the fierce primary tones of battle, blood, passion and despair. It is vast, unsuperfluous, terse, complete. It is an opera of tension. It begins with suspense as the orchestra sounds the first notes that echo the savage snapping of musketry from behind the yet unraised curtain; it ends with death and madness as the girl Anita cries her pitiable, hrutish cry as she falls upon the body of her dead lover. There is no mistaking the meaning of such music. It is dramatic—yes, melodramatic, and lyric, too, at times, in a bold, grim way. Sheer melody leaps like verse and tells the story quick and true, where rhythm can tell it best. But the colloquial phrase, short, terrible, tragic, moves it on with breathless velocity. The orchestration is superb; its compactness is indescribable. It is not multi-colored, but it is the better for that. Foedor gave her best to the role of Anita. It was a brave best—strong, magnetic and sure. Nicosias led with inspiring excitement.

Everybody was happy, even the guarantors, at the opera Tuesday night. Aida was the hill, and it marked the most pretentious and successful production of the season. From any standpoint, scenic, ensemble or star, it was a brilliant night. There was hut one expression from the managers: "Oh, if we had only opened the season with this!" Critically compared, the first act was slow and the last found Foedor and Massart somewhat the worse for their tremendous work in the scenes which had gone before. But the second and third acts were glittering triumphs. The finale of the Temple scene will be remembered when there is an opera house in San Francisco, and the work of Alhers, Foedor and Massart will do more to boom opera here than all the indiscriminate puffs of all the indiscriminate critics in the country.

Whenever the French singers become too serious a strain on your auditory nerves, drop in at the Tivoli and see Don Juan and his more-than-ever erratic ad lib. Laura Millard is home again with the trusty Tivoli folk, and Wilson's Hyronic burlesque is having a glad time of it at the old opera house around the corner on Eddy street.

For Fair Virginia is an unobtrusive little war melodrama that will offend no one and please a great many. I am a bit sick of stage distortions of the late unpleasantness myself, but this play exploits the old theme in softer notes than usual; dramatic unity is aimed at more than hair-raising climaxes, and the result is a fairly normal bit of drama. Like most war pieces, it is treated from the external only. I should like to see some American playwright catch the inside spirit of the thing, as Bret Harte did in his story, "Clarence." To my knowledge it has never been done.

Russ Whytal is the author of the play, and he makes the villain's part worse than it really is by playing it himself. The only mentionable acting by the company is done by John Woodward as an old negro, and Lottie Briscoe, a child actress, who, in the part of a boy, maintains a good Southern accent, and is altogether the superior artist of her colleagues.

If I could only satisfy myself that it was Wagner, and not the six vocal soloists, who packed the Columbia Thursday afternoon, I should say that we were in a fair way to become Wagnerites on the spot. At all events, it was a great audience. And if the crowd turned out only to hear its friends sing, then the crowd was most properly punished; for, besides the singing being the weakest feature of the afternoon, Hinrichs was in one of his brilliant moods, and he performed some excellent missionary work on behalf of the Bard of Beyreuth. I have always claimed that it is a delicious thing to be educated without pain, and I must say that for an orchestra which, as a body, is not on the chummiest terms with Wagner, Hinrichs's accomplished a beautiful, eloquent lesson on Thursday afternoon. In the Lohengrin Prelude, the "Murmuring Forest" music from Siegfried, the "Song of the Rhine Daughters" from Götterdämmerung, and "Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Magic" from Die Walküre, Hinrichs led his musicians with power, imagination, and unerring authority. Elsa and Ortund's duet from Lohengrin, sung by Mrs. Cecelia A. Adler and Mrs. Hinrichs, struck me as being the only vocal episode which was in any way adequate. The Meistersinger quintette was loosely sung, and Rhys Thomas accentuated an inflexible vocal method in "Walter's Prize Song." The Tannhäuser scene, sung by Mathilde Wilde and Jacob Mueller, was pitiable rather than funny. I shall not be fippant at the old people's expense. They both have seen better days. But I cannot pass over Mr. Mueller's feat of wearing evening clothes and bridegroom gloves at three o'clock in the afternoon. ASHTON STEVENS.

Next week is the last of the opera season at the California, and five performances will be given instead of the usual four. The extra one takes place on Friday night, when Thomas' Hamlet is the bill. The opera is new to us, and Albers sings the part of "Hamlet." Moreover, the performance is a benefit to Albers, and everybody is sure to be there. This is the bill for the rest of the week: Monday, William Tell; Wednesday, a repetition of Aida; Saturday matinee, Carmen; Saturday night, grand triple bill—Pagliucci, La Navarraise and a scene from La Favorite. La Juive will be repeated to-night.

Otis Skinner plays "Hamlet" at the Baldwin to-night. Five nights of next week will be devoted to A Soldier of Fortune, a romantic drama placed in Italy in the exciting sixteenth century. On next Saturday night Skinner will present The Merchant of Venice and Katherine and Petruchio.

GAYETIES OF FORTY YEARS AGO.

THE society folk of the present day are frequently heard expressing a wonder if the entertainments of early days in San Francisco were so much pleasanter than those now given, as old timers would have them believe. Take for instance the public and semi-public balls that appear to have, during the past twenty years, fallen into a state of innocuous desuetude; for the surroundings of some of these early affairs were what would now-a-days be called crude—few decorations were used and flowers were seldom seen that did not at all detract from their enjoyability, as any who may recall them can testify. Suppose we enumerate a few of them and see what the verdict will be.

For many years an affair to date from was the hall given away back in the early fifties, which was held in warm regard by all who took part in it. It was the grandest affair that young San Francisco had ever attempted and took place at Mme. Pique's Hall, which stood on Kearny street, somewhere near Bush, and was a subscription ball given by the gentlemen of the city to the officers of the Army and Navy, and as a welcome to Captain (afterwards Admiral) Farragut on his arrival here to establish the Navy Yard at Mare Island.

Next on the list, to be recalled with pride, was the famous ball given by the members of the Pacific Club on October 8, 1857. The Pacific Club then occupied the rooms of a building on Commercial street, which were formerly those of Steve Whipple's gambling establishment, and on this occasion they were all thrown open and garnished for the ball, which was a grand affair, all the best society of the city crowding them to an uncomfortable degree.

The committee of invitation were: Judge J. B. Crockett, J. P. Hoge, Hall McAllister, J. Mora Moss, William Duer, and Fred Billings, and it goes without saying that they were a very much sought set of men with the fair sex about that date.

It was at this hall that the first cotillion was ever danced in San Francisco. It was under the guidance of Cutler McAllister, who held the position of cotillion leader for many a year afterwards. The first military ball of prominence was given at the Presidio to celebrate the tenth anniversary of the establishment of that post, on the second of May, 1859. To reach the Presidio in those days was an arduous undertaking by daylight; the road was a series of mud holes requiring skillful navigation to escape broken springs and wrecked axletrees. How much more courage then did it take to make the trip that night, especially as during the preceding week an unusual quantity of rain had fallen? There were very few regrets received, however, by the gallant sons of Mars, who posed as hosts, among whom were Major E. D. Keyes, Lieutenant (afterwards the lamented General) J. B. McPherson, Lieutenant Custis Lee, Lieutenant G. H. Elliott, Lieutenant G. H. Gibson, and Doctor C. C. Keeney.

Mrs. Keeney (now Mrs. Wm. Alvord) assisted the gentlemen to receive their guests; the dancing took place in the long adobe building which is now used as the men's quarters. Some of the guests made up parties and chartered omnibuses; one of these, which included John H. Wise, our present Collector, then a leading beau, and Miss Maggie Middleton, now Mrs. Tom Morrison, one of San Francisco's belles of the period, came to grief in one of the aforesaid mud holes, and were rescued by another party after a delay of over an hour on the road. A few weeks later, on June 1, 1859, a very delightful ball was given at the American Theatre, in aid of the Mount Vernon Fund; the parquet was boarded over and canvassed and made an excellent floor for dancing, and the whole place was artistically draped with flags. It was a society affair; every one went to it, the late Mrs. Wm. Blanding, who was vice-regent for California, receiving the guests, assisted by Mrs. Louis McLane, Mrs. R. J. Vandewater, Mrs. Harrison Randolph, Mrs. Chamberlain, Mrs. S. P. Dewey and Miss Sarah Haight.

Public balls were a very favorite form of welcoming Foreign Naval visitors, and during the '60 decade they were plentiful. The officers of the Russian Frigate Calavala were given a ball at Plat's Hall on the evening of December 27, 1861, which was under the management of the "City Guard" which was then the "society corps" of our citizen soldiery. Next on the list comes the hall given by the Spanish residents in honor of Admiral Pinzon and the officers of the Spanish Squadron, which also took place at Plat's Hall on the 16th of October, 1863. The display of gold lace was bewildering, for not only were there several Spanish ships in port, but there were also the English flag-ship Sutlej, the Russian flag-ship Bogatyre, the U. S. flag-ship Lancaster, and a number of other ships of those several nationalities, and all the Admirals and their officers were present at the ball in full uniform. The hall was elaborately festooned with wreaths of flowers and hunting of all nations, and the costumes of the ladies were remarkably handsome. One of the most gorgeous was worn by a Spanish lady, wife of Abel Stearns of Los Angeles; it was of crimson velvet, draped with a magnificent point lace overdress; she also fairly blazed with many diamonds. Madame Gautier, wife of the French Consul, Mrs. J. B. Haggin, Mrs. J. W. Brumagin, Mrs. F. F. Low, Mrs. Lloyd Tevis, Mrs. Hall McAllister, and Mrs. Leland Stanford were among those who were remarked for their beautiful toilettes.

Handsome as was this hall it was outshone by the gorgeousness of the grand military and civic ball given by the city in honor of Admiral Popoff and the officers of the Russian Fleet, on Tuesday evening, November 17, 1863. For this affair Union Hall on Howard street was selected. The decorations were most elaborate, consisting of the royal arms of Russia, allegorical pictures representing Unity and Love, the national flags of Russia and America, pillars and arches twined with evergreens and innumerable little cages of canary birds which filled the hall with melody.

The foreign Consuls, and the Army and Navy officers were in uniform, and the ladies were, of course, resplendent in silks, satans, feathers, and jewels. The magnificence of the lace on Mrs. S. J. Hensley's dress of corn-colored silk was one of the topics of the evening. Another much admired gown of white moire and black lace was worn by Mrs. O'Sullivan, a Spanish looking beauty, who about this time appeared for a few months in San Francisco's firmament, and who was noted for that crowning glory of woman, magnificent hair, which when flowing loose completely enveloped her figure from head to foot. The supper be it said, was superb, and the whole entertainment cost upwards of twenty-five thousand dollars.

The following is the card of invitation:

U. R. S.

The Citizens of San Francisco desiring to give expression to the feelings of amity and respect which they entertain towards Russia as a Nation, respectfully tender to Admiral A. A. Popoff and officers of H. I. R. M. Squadron, a Complimentary Ball, to be given at Union Hall, on Tuesday evening, November 17, 1863. You are cordially invited to attend.

Committee of Arrangements: Hon. F. F. Low, (Governor elect) Chairman; Hon. Ogden Hoffman, U. S. District Judge; Admiral C. H. Bell, Commander Pacific Squadron; Brig. General Geo. Wright, Commander Department of the Pacific; Hon. Charles James, Collector of the Port; Hon. W. B. Farwell, Naval Officer; Hon. Richard Cheney, Naval Agent; Major E. S. Purdy U. S. A.; Hon. H. P. Coon, Mayor; Major General L. H. Allen, Major John Hewston, Jr., Colonel C. L. Taylor, Captain W. C. Little, Wm. C. Ralston, Cbas. Walcott Brooks, William R. Garrison, Frederick W. Macondray, I. Ward Eaton, Frederick MacCrellish, William W. Greenwood, Benj. C. Howard, E. H. Washburn, Eugene Casserly.

Spring is here and flowers will soon bloom everywhere. But none will be so beautiful as the buds, bouquets, and cut flowers you can get at Leopold's, 39 Post street. Prices lowest; bouquets the choicest.

“Macbeth” means toughness of glass, when applied to lamp-chimneys; perfection of draft besides, if you get the Number made for your lamp.

DEAR EDITH: One would hardly imagine that there are different schools of fashion for Lenten raiment, and there are the conservative as well as progressive ideas of the proper fashions during these repentant days. One school, which may be termed the progressive one, claims that there is a style, and a correct style, for everything, and that Lenten raiment is as much governed by rule as that of Easter, midsummer, or any other season. The other school, the historical one, takes the position that the real meaning of Lent is the giving up of the pomps and vanities of life, among which and pre-eminent are style, fashion, and dress. Each school has much in its favor. At one time women wore sackcloth in Lent; at another time they put on their old garments. On the other hand, the society woman of to-day invariably appears in some very neat though subdued toilet during the prescribed period. Both schools, however, are agreed upon the avoidance of bright colors and striking contrasts, upon the disuse of passementerie, rich laces, costly ornaments, and jewelry. A majority avoid velvet, unless of a dark shade, silks unless dark, and gayly-figured goods. One common practice is the wearing of special waists of black silk or other deep color during Lent. The prevailing fashion of separate waists gives great latitude to the wearer. Thus, it will be seen, it is possible to gratify any taste, no matter how sombre. For women in deep mourning separate waists can be secured in crepe or in crepe with a black silk lining. For those in half mourning, designs in black and purple, black and lilac, purple and lilac, are numerous. These designs are very popular with Italians, and especially the Spanish and Portuguese. These people observe Lent with much more ceremony than do we. The devout fashionable woman wears special clothing and even half mourning during Lent, and on Good Friday actually puts on deep mourning, while the men wear mourning and put all the flags at half mast. Fashion in our own race has never gone this far, although many women of a poetic temperament have worn half mourning.

Dark coats of light weight in faced cloth are worn this Lent. Despite their color they are really very artistic, and serve to set off a brilliant complexion very effectively. Also appropriate are many of the new spring walking suits. These are made of very fine tweeds, of finely finished chevots and of soft serges. The skirts are from three to eight gored, with a simple but elegant coat, and beneath this any kind of pretty waist, which may suit the wearer's taste or complexion, is worn. These new coat-jackets vary considerably in cut. Nearly all have the novel style of turreted collar which is rapidly taking the place of the de Medici design and which is susceptible of numberless variations.

The two favorite types of coat are the modified Empire and the modified Cambridge. Still another style which promises to grow in vogue as the weather becomes warmer is the double-breasted sacque, with roll-back fronts. In all of the new creations the edges are heavily embroidered or braided. A stunning garment for Lenten wear is the Bernhardt paletot, which is very chic and altogether eccentric. In carriage wraps and capes there are a number of new patterns. Opinion differs as to whether these latest examples of the modiste's art will be very much worn or not.

Red bids for high favor this season; not the old-fashioned reds, but those with a tinge of pink, yellow, or violet in their composition. The bodice, which is of the seamless kind stretched over a fitted lining and fastening at left shoulder and under arm seams, is decorated with bands of the velvet running entirely round the body, the two lower ones being adorned with buttons of rhinestones. The same buttons reappear on the lace scarf, draping it artistically. The skirt is cut with a very wide front gore, and two back gores, which are cut straight in front, where they join the front gore, which is bias, and are bias at the back, where they meet.

It had come to be the custom for the members of the Symphony Orchestra to live across the bridge on the west side of the river. In the first place, it facilitated frequent rehearsals, it fostered a degree of sociability among the men—and their number was sufficient to make a good-sized little community—and most important of all, Frau Weber lived there.

It was the ambition of every unmarried man in the orchestra to board at Frau Weber's. Her great roomy house was filled with musicians. Pianos rang out from the second story, violins triumphantly held the third, while from the garret trombones, flutes and even cymbals were permitted to agitate the air unmolested. Breakfast was served to the crescendo and diminuendo of scales, dinner was accompanied by peals of vocal arpeggios and at supper, wild, untrammelled improvisations upon every known instrument besieged the ears of the guests. Not to their inconvenience, however. They criticized as they ate, stopping to applaud a meritorious bit or to drown in derisive shouts that which offended their musical ears. They talked nothing but music, and the flaxen-haired maids as they waited upon table, hummed strains from Schumann and Beethoven.

Frau Weber's husband had been a violinist and the Frau's fat white hands, which were now so capable in the concoction of sauces and pastry, had once been greatly in demand, so careful, so sympathetic an accompanist had she been. As to Fraulein Weber, she could play well upon no instrument, except upon the male human heart.

She had taken lessons from Lowenthal, the harpist, for a time, and made wonderful progress. So had he, for he proposed at the end of three months and the lessons ceased. Then it was Meier's turn. He undertook to make of the dimpled little fraulein a great singer, but she made a fool of him and then turned diligently to the piano. For a time she was a devoted student and Von Rhein neglected his other pupils to watch over the merry little fraulein's ten fingers. Then he went the way of all others, and the fraulein ceased to care for the piano.

When Reichert came to the house, she had taken a short course on almost every musical instrument, and had refused every man in the house, mockingly, regretfully or tearfully as the occasion and the degree of her affection for the suitor warranted. She liked them all. She stated frankly that she couldn't marry a man who wasn't a musician, and after the young fellows had recovered (which to tell the truth they did promptly, fearing ejection from the happy company) Marie was ready to listen sympathetically to the musical woes of the harpist, the triumphs of the haritone, the perplexities of the pianist.

She teased and she petted them. She flirted a little when a man seemed indifferent, but after his surrender, she generously admitted him into the large brotherhood and warmed and comforted him back into content. Behind the saucy twinkle of her dark eyes there dwelt a deal of tenderness for these boys, old and young, whom she mothered adorably. She championed the timid, she devoted herself to the awkward, she kept the secrets of the composers and plotted and schemed opportunities for them. Of course, it was she who had worked for poor old Stoes, the copyist, who dwelt in the attic, that winter rheumatism attacked his fingers, and it was she who had conceived the joke which humiliated and improved Grau, the cellist, as a punishment for his conceit and arrogance.

When Reichert came peace reigned in Frau Weber's house. Every man in it was devoted to the fraulein and she never seemed to desire any special affection. She laughingly declared that the house would become Fraulein Weher's in time, and asked the hoarders to promise her the patronage of their sons and nephews in the time to come, when the gold should have faded from her hair and her soft, round cheek should have lost its delicate color.

But she never spoke so to Reichert. She confessed to Von Rhein that at first she had been a little afraid of the tall, grave director, but as he fell down and worshiped openly, unabashed by the men's most merciless teasing, it could not have been timidity that restrained the fraulein from begging Fritz Reichert to kindly influence his relations in her behalf, some years hence.

There was nothing she might ask which he could deny. He seemed like a man who had never looked at a woman twice before, and now Fraulein Marie's grace, her tenderness, her frank camaraderie had come to him like a revelation.

He consulted with her as to the programmes for the symphonies, he listened with all deference to her criticisms and objections, he had special rehearsals for her, taxing the men's time and their patience, that their playing might call forth a soft "brava" from the demure little figure, alone in the empty concert hall, up in the balcony, where the music sounded hest to her. To the men it came to seem almost as though all their work, all the repetitions, all the ceaseless practice upon which Reichert insisted were solely for the fraulein. If the great hall were crowded with a cheering, music-mad audience, the conductor's how was only prefatory unless he could catch a glimpse of a flushed, girlish face and two brown eyes shining applause.

But with it all Reichert was still unsatisfied. He had worked unceasingly till his men had become so many replicas of himself, toned by his artistic insight, warmed into enthusiasm by his strong personality. The whole orchestra was swayed by him, moved by his intense musical feeling. Still to Reichert, it lacked something.

"I want a first violinist," he said to the fraulein as they walked home together, while the men left behind, were gathering up their music and instruments. "I want a man, not a machine. I want an artist who will be himself, not me, who will play with us but who will not be dominated by the conductor. Hartman has all the delicacy but he lacks power, spirit, originality. He has no genius. Ah, mein Fraulein, if you could hear that solo in the second movement"—he whistled the opening bars of the melody as they walked—"if you could hear it as I have heard it played—by Jacobi—O, the man, the very man! I'll send for him. If he comes, Fraulein Marie, you'll be satisfied. Such tone, such sweetness, such power. Have you never heard him? He shall play for you. The man's an artist, a genius, I'll write to him to night."

And Jacobi came and verified all that Reichert had said of him. When at the first rehearsal, he played the morceau upon which Hartmann had spent months of patient practice, even the deposed violinist could not resist the beauty of his art. There was a hurst of rapturous applause from the men upon the stage, in which poor Hartmann joined. Reichert himself heat his haton upon the stand before him, and from the balcony Fraulein Marie called "Brava, brava!"

To all of which the handsome violinist responded with a smile and a mocking, exaggerated how, and the symphony proceeded.

But with Jacobi's entrance into Frau Weber's family a new and inharmonious element was introduced. The violinist followed a recognized precedent when he fell in love with the fraulein, but the man's tempestuous nature was not the kind to bring comfort with his love, or to resign itself to an unrequited passion. It was difficult, too, to tell whether Marie responded to the jealous affection betrayed by the artist's undisciplined nature. At first his indifference and later his sarcasm had piqued her, and she vowed to punish him for every taunting word he had spoken about the young girl's peculiar position among the musicians who thronged the house.

Jacobi did not believe in friendship, even between man and man. How impossible a thing, then, between man and woman! His childhood had been a miserable one, his youth had passed in sordid struggles for time and opportunity to become the artist he felt, at heart, he was. He had conquered obstacles as only genius can, but all hope, all faith in human nature had left him. His heart was weary and saddened and bitter, and the gloom and hopelessness of his temperament found vent in cynicism and sarcasm, which plagued the child-like, optimistic natures with which in Frau Weber's house he came in contact.

But Marie's sweet friendliness at length disarmed Jacobi. He yielded to her charm, and with all the strength of his passionate nature set himself to win the girl's love. She was the magical drop, he told himself, that could sweeten the whole cup of life for him, and in the ardor of his longing to be at peace again with the whole world, he tried to be gentle and considerate, strove to be tolerant and pitiful, curbing his desire to ridicule the feeble and to hattle with the strong. His restless, unhappy spirit kept him ever at war with himself, and he came to count upon Marie to exercise the demon of dissatisfaction which tormented him. The sound of her gracious voice, the touch of her hand, soothed him; all the pettiness and misery of life faded away in the sun of her healthy, merry nature.

The artist found himself roused to action, with the hope of gaining that which would make his life so well worth living. The plans and hopes of his youth came back to him; he worked like one possessed. He had found the touchstone which turned those old idle dreams of his into vital, noble endeavor. If greater, more-enduring fame should come to him from the melodies which surged in his re-awakened heart and brain, the more nearly worthy might he be of the frank and lovely girl, whose happy trustfulness was so childlike, whose sympathetic nature was so womanly.

Neither he nor Reichert seemed conscious of the rivalry between them. Each was so absorbed in his own emotion, and all three became so engrossed in the preparations for the grand, final symphony of the winter series, that for a time they lived together in a sweet, strange trinity, all three thrilling with the passion of loving, yet unaware of the tragedy that could not affect but one of such close friends.

Jacobi's Awakening Symphony had been placed last upon the programme. He had written it under the influence of the strongest, purest emotion he had ever felt. All its delicacy, its exquisite melody, its artistic clearness of composition, were to him but means of expression for the soul-recreation the artist had experienced. It was his life's story expressed in the musical language, familiar to him since his childhood, more subtle, more expressive, more delicately true and richer, fuller than the idiom of words.

Its beginning is simple, almost elemental. Then the strivings, the vain endeavor, the battle between the artist's hopes and doubts change the music into a stormy, passionate allegro, through which a half-uttered melody continually breaks, and then dies away to reappear again and again, till with the close of the allegro it is buried beneath the hushed, melancholy minor chords which fall thick and thicker, soft and softer, like hurrying, deadening snow-flakes.

The beautiful solo in the second movement, which Jacobi had written for the violin, is the reincarnation of the half-uttered melody. From the first faint strain to its fuller echo, its richer repetition, the music soars and swells till it closes in a triumphantly sweet harmony, the revelation to the artist of his beloved's perfection. That last night Jacobi played this as he had never played in his life. All the strength, the fire of his genius seemed to condense upon this expression of his passion. He played to Marie, to her alone. With his eyes fixed upon her intent, changeable face, forgetful of the hushed, eager crowd, his heart spoke to hers in the sweetest love-poem music has ever expressed. To him, laying his heart bare before her, the girl seemed some far-off saint; his roses she held in her tightly-clasped hands, the votive offering of a poor sinner upon the shrine of her purity and loveliness. His violin throbbed and wept, and sang under the touch of the master-hand. Its tone was almost humanly sweet and powerful as the strain rose and fell and mounted again, ever upward, till the last note quivered upon the air.

When the applause died away, Jacobi looked again at Marie. All that a man might do to woo a maid he had done. She knew now all that he had refrained from putting in words. O for a sign that the cord of her sweet nature might vibrate to the pitch of his full heart's beating!

The short chant that follows the violin solo is like a murmured prayer. It came in exquisite fullness from the instruments, which seemed only varying expressions of the director's conception. Reichert's tall, slender figure swayed—it almost soared with the music. And he conducted the last movement as though he alone were interpreting every note of it. The music leaped from his baton; he seemed to catch up the melody and to weave and interweave the swelling strains with a harmonic shuttle playing in and out, above and underneath this great loom whose warp and woof were music. The magnetism of his exalted, inspiring face, the alert enthusiasm of his motions, the fire of appreciation and expectation that glowed in his steel-gray eyes, roused the men under him till they became so many passive instruments waiting for the inspiration that came with a glance or a wave of his long, white hand, or of the wand which drew from each absorbed artist the note, the strain, the phrase which the magician needed to complete the chorusing tone-picture.

In the whirl of his own emotion, of his proud satisfaction as composer, of his delight as an artist, Jacobi marveled at his friend's power. Surely, this, too, is genius, this fullness of conception, this blending of others to work one's will, this triumphant exposition of one's ideas, this wielding of instruments and of men, not as inert tools, but as the slaves of one's wish, as the obedient senses, almost of one body.

At the end the audience was standing. The hall resounded with shouts and applause. Jacobi looked and listened, and gloried doubly in his friend's triumph, which was so much his own. He turned from Reichert's bowing figure and raised his eyes to Marie's face that his cup of satisfaction might be full. She was standing, too, her brown eyes gleaming, her lips parted, her face flushed with pleasure and pride. She seemed like some fluttering bird poised for flight, trembling with the answering call the mad melody of her mate's voice had created within her.

Jacobi groaned aloud as he watched, for suddenly she pressed the flowers to her lips, and with a beautiful, free gesture, she threw them at Reichert's feet. The leader bent to pick them up, and as he rose his eyes met hers in perfect unconsciousness of all else. They two were alone, and the light in his eyes and the love in hers winged and met across the crowd of turbulent heads that separated them.

To Jacobi it seemed that instant lasted through all eternity. He had achieved his masterpiece, every heart-throb, every pulse of his genius had spent itself that Reichert and not he might triumph. The girl was the instrument he had sought to play upon, and she responded to Reichert's hand, not his.

Jacobi turned away, and holding his wonderful old violin a moment lovingly to him, suddenly with both hands he broke it violently across his knee. He rose, and ignoring the enthusiastic calls for the composer, made his way through the throng of astonished musicians, out into the street and away from the town. He was done forever with the two passions that had been all of life to him.

The Pine Street Market.

Never before in the history of mining speculation on Pine street have prices been so low as they are at present. The question, however, which now agitates the speculatively inclined mind is whether the stocks possess the recuperative power which they have had in the past. It is beginning to look serious, it must be admitted, for investors who hold shares in the various companies at much higher figures, augmented in many cases by a continuous levy of assessments, which must be kept up in the future or work will have to stop in the mines altogether. Of course it is claimed that the discovery of another ore body will straighten matters out all right. It is very questionable whether it would or not, in face of the action of Chollar-Brunswick, with a development of high-class ore as good as anything the Comstock has ever had to boast of since the bonanza days. The way this stock has been treated by speculators, and the very fact that a petty little ring of malicious tricksters on the street were able to helie its merits and undermine the value of the mine, in spite of the efforts of the powerful monied interest supposed to be at its hack, does not augur very favorably for the future with people who do not believe in the omnipotence of the Comstock manipulator. The outrageous attack on Chollar has done more to weaken the public interest in mining speculation than all the law suits combined which have taken place in the past twenty years. Too great a stress is being placed on the Hale & Norcross difficulty altogether as a lever in bearing prices. With advancing prices in other quarters, this bugbear would soon be passed out of sight, and the shares side-tracked as a speculative medium until a settlement is reached in years to come, beyond the ken of this generation of peace disturbers. Some palliative measure to obliterate the memory of the Chollar disaster, showing speculators that they are not completely at the mercy of any clique of wreckers which may elect to raid the market, will do more than anything else to revive confidence in a business which now appears to be controlled by weaklings, who bend before every blast as it comes along. Things are rapidly coming down to a crisis on Pine street, when a power stronger than any now in existence will have to be exerted to save the market from destruction. Talk is cheap, and getting cheaper every day on the Stock Exchange. Money is what is required, and some one who knows how to handle it to good advantage.

Some News From Abroad. A recent number of the Mining Journal of London contains, among notes from California, some most extraordinary statements, notably the figures of the Utica Mining Company, which are set down as glibly as if the management itself had jitted down the figures at $1,600,000 in gold for 1895, and $2,300,000 for "this year," presumably 1896. The Utica owners have never yet given up the secret of their actual production for publication, and until this London announcement, which will doubtless receive full weight with our mining men, it has only been a matter of surmise. A few more surprising facts follow, which will also prove of interest to us out here. The Kennedy mine is popped up as second in rank as a producer, while the North Star is again placed on a paying basis. The Rawhyde (sic) mine of "Jamestown," gets mention, while the Jumper, Black Oak, and Golden Gate are classed noteworthy as old mines re-opened or put in shape by the investment of capital. The Black Oak gets a great send-off on the strength of an alleged sale at $500,000, which, by the way, never took place, not to speak of the figures quoted a mile high, and the kindly prediction is made that "it will be one of the leading paying mines in this State in the near future." The last time this property was hounded it was to Belgians, not to Easteru people, and they did not take it eventually. The Worcester mine, wherever that is, also comes in for a boost, while English capital is involved in the construction of a line of railroad through Stanislaus to Tuolumne. The Mariposa grant is transferred wholesale to London parties. The Rothschilds are acered-ited with heavy investments in California. In dealing with Randsburg, a discovery is reported, following "a little desultory investigation by one of the owners of the Monkey Wrench mine, which developed ore capable of producing $8000 of gold to the ton." On the day of the strike, it is further stated, the mine was visited by over five hundred people anxious for specimens, "which the generous owner permitted each one to take away." It is too had that the reputation of the Monkey Wrench faded with another blast, or there might be something interesting as well as romantic about the Journal's narrative. Two of the Fish Commissioners are reported as paying $20,000 for an old Tuolumne mine, from which they got $26,000 right hack from the dump. Another paragraph credits the Kennedy Company with having spent $100,000 in re-opening the mine, and have "since received $2,000,000 in dividends." This and a few more items of a similar character constitute interesting reading for the investing classes, and even if they bear ear-marks of an author's license, what does it matter?

The Holcomb Valley Humbug.

The Capitalist of London, which has invariably shown a disposition to assist in stamping fraudulent mining schemes and properties of all kinds detrimental to investors, says, in commenting upon a recent article in the NEWS LETTER warning people against putting more money into the "sink" of the Holcomb Valley management: "The Holcomb Valley Company came into existence at the close of 1892, with the object of taking over the undertaking of an earlier enterprise known as the Valley Gold Company, Limited. Under one name or another the concern has been sucking up the money of shareholders in calls for years, and there appears no more prospect of profit now than at any previous period. An ever revolving cycle of calls and reconstructions appears to be the fate of those who put their faith and their money in this venture."

April Interest And Dividends.

Interest became due and payable April 1st on the following bonds: U. S. 4s, old issue; California Electric Light 6s, quarterly; Geary street railway 5s, semi-annual; Northern railway of California 5s, semi-annual; Omnibus Cable railway 6s, semi-annual; Southern Pacific railway of California 6s, semi-annual; Southern Pacific Branch Railway of California 6s, semi-annual. The following corporations will pay quarterly dividends in April: Capital Gas, 50 cents; Stockton Gas, 30 cents; Fireman's Fund Insurance, $3; California Safe Deposit and Trust Company, $1.50; First National Bank, $1.50; Bank of California, $3; Nevada Bank, $1.50; Sutter St. railroad, $1.25.

Grand Central Embroglio.

The manner in which some of the goody-goodies of the London financial press are writhing over the iniquitous delinquencies of the Grand Central experts, is excruciatingly funny after reading all the nice things the same papers had to say about this property and other investments of the syndicate about the time the prospectuses cropped up for publication. Before another year elapses, there will be lots of amusement over these much over-estimated combinations and the naughty brood of retainers in their train. In the meantime, it is consolatory to know that every time a Grand Central episode is reported, the chances for trouble to the investing public are minimized.

Another Mine Reconstructed.

The latest reconstruction scheme announced in London is that of the Banner Gold mine, Limited, working the property of that name in Butte county. In the future this concern will be known as the Consolidated Gold Mines of California, the new company asking for $1,250,000 from the investing classes to continue the exploration of the ground. This company is blessed, however, with a competent management at this end, which is something to be said in its favor. If there is a mine there it has some chance of being developed in time.

New London Mine Flotations.

While there are undoubtedly quite a number of London schemes drifting around the California mining offices, none have so far cropped up before the public. The most recent American scheme is the Gold Reefs of Georgia, to work mines in that State. A company, known as the Canadian Pacific Exploration Company, has been brought out to operate in Canada and United States mines.

 A husband in hot pursuit
 Of a fleeing pair, gone God knows where;
 Weapons swift raised to shoot;
 Groaning of suicides;
 Chimes from a wedding bell;
 A crime-stained soul sent to its goal
 In the uttermost depths of hell;
 The tread of an angel's feet
 Where sorrow casts its blight;
 A painted face—and one whose grace
 Is touched with heaven's light;
 Scandals that shock the town;
 A skeleton's moldy grin;
 Glitter of gold; a conscience sold;
 A record of wanton sin;
 Men of brain and nerve,
 Who dare to make their way
 With honest aim that a spotless fame
 Shall be their own some day;
 Hunger and riotous feast;
 A "property" infant's part
 In the legal strife of a dual life;
 A woman's broken heart;
 Visions of earthly bliss;
 Willing and helpless slaves
 To hollow fashion or idle passion;
 Saints and scheming knaves;
 Snailes and sneers and tears;
 A murderer's lengthened rope—
 All these I've seen, and more, I ween,
 In our city's kinetoscope.
 A bargain, indeed, my lords, to seek—
 Yet the dailies thought it a quiet week.

NOW that the pugilists have taken their battered mugs Eastward, and Mrs. John Martin has arrived upon the lonely scene, the terrible possibility is suggested that Mrs. Fitz be recalled, and the Mechanics' Pavilion secured for a slogging match between these two pugnacious females. Should the authorities interfere, the petticoated champonesses could easily be bundled off to Carson with extra baggage in the line of hairpins and "false fronts" to replace inevitable losses in the fray. Each is a holy terror in her way, and journalism need not languish for copyrighted sensations in the interim.

MR. MARTIN, of will-contest notoriety, is, she says, undecided whether to marry a New York millionaire, embark in a business scheme that will bring one million dollars yearly to California, or go on a theatrical tour to Africa. By all means let her choose the latter course. It would be interesting from a scientific and geographical standpoint; for, if Mrs. Martin makes it as hot for the denizens of the Dark Continent as she has for people elsewhere, the climate there will make Hades superfluous.

PASTOR GIBSON has been again paraded in the public prints. The reverend gentleman did not achieve his greatness. It was thrust upon him. He didn't do a thing. And just see how hard his conferees, Parson Case and Dille on this side of the bay and Parson F. D. Blowhard in Alameda, are exercising their jaws to attend an equal share of fame. This is a cruel world, even to the Lord's most loudly bleating lambs.

JAMES WOOD, of the Cigar Makers' National Union, declares that Chinatown has the vilest cigar factory in the country.

We do not attempt to deny, Mr. Wood,
 That in doing our duty we certainly should
 Have stamped out the evil you, horrified, trace
 To the dens of the wicked Mongolian race,
 But how can we preach to the heathen who delves
 Until we have ceased to be heathen ourselves?

A RUMOR is extant to the effect that Judge Campbell will be shorn of his wonderful whiskers at the Chutes to-morrow. The attraction should draw even greater crowds than the appearance of both the prize-fighters.

BLANTHER may have cheated the gallows but he cannot swindle the devil.

GROCER Smith, who does business on Market street, near the ferries, justifies the sale of currant jellies loaded with apple juice upon the ground that everybody is acquainted with the fact, and that it is not injurious to public health. An injection of water does not mennee the public health when unsuspectingly taken in liquid beverages, but the Crier always prefers his whisky unadulterated. The value of Grocer Smith's contribution to the pure food literature of the day really cannot be measured—chiefly because it hasn't any.

NOW that Corbett is at a safe distance from the hairy paws of his fellow bruiser, he is gradually waxing bold and defiant again and we shall soon hear that he was the victor in the late disgraceful scrap. At present, however, he is still whining and amongst other things stated that "a man never knows how many friends he has in this city until he is down." "Gentleman" Jim would really be surprised to know how many of us would readily flock to his funeral.

EDWARD K. ALSIP finds out rather late that it is a wise father who knows his own child. The information is valuable, for the hot-blooded Edward paid something like $15,000 to make the discovery. The gay blade seems to have had the name without the game. It is against his philanthropic intentions, however, that he christened his alleged offspring after his mother-in-law.

JUSTICE CARROLL, to whom the Almighty gave small bones but a large conceit, is accused by some gay cbarmer of unlawfully retaining her mandolin. It seems to us only proper that a Carroll should occasionally like to accompany himself and, considering the emoluments and their extraction, a cultivated musical taste can hardly be expected of a mere Justice of the Peace.

THE Corbett and Fitzsimmons brawl
 (The fates be praised!) is o'er at last.
 We've seen the boastful Jimmy fall,
 And even little Fitz's squall
 Is but an echo of the past.
 The lean and hungry paws of Bob
 Have firmly clutched the champion's job,
 While California veils her face
 And mourns her sister State's disgrace.
 God speed the time (for come it must)
 When sloggers all shall bite the dust.
 And may I live to see the day
 When Satan, chuckling, claims his prey.

THE bill now before the Senate for preventing the use of the United States mails for transmission of kinetoscope or other pictures of prize fights, if it should finally become a law, would be a serious blow to the prize-ring. The Crier tenders sympathies to Governor Sadler and the Nevada Legislators, as that State is now the only legal home of fistic enterprise in the country. It is a direct thrust at Nevada's protected industries.

ONE Mrs. Bowen has been given six months by Judge Campbell for having pierced the lean pericardium of a luckless waiter with a hat stick pin. The lady's attorney pleaded in extenuation that his client was drunk at the time; but the Judge learnedly declared that intoxication was no excuse for carrying concealed weapons.

THE succulent spud is being assiduously cultivated for the benefit of the poor, and Major Winchell of the Salvation Army is proving himself a farmer of no ordinary ability. However, a man who is accustomed to harvesting souls ought to be able to manage a potato patch.

SOME day, when seeking sweet repose,
 The Crier upward turns his toes,
 And his most cherished enemy
 Is dancing on his grave with glee,
 Let these few words of praise be said
 Upon the tombstone at his head:
 "He never cut up any capers
 To get his picture in the papers,
 And died that happiest of men—
 A dead-broke, wifeless citizen."

WHY the daily drop of a workman down the wire of a city building should cause excitement is not clear to the Crier's perception. Scarcely a day passes that some one of our citizens does not fall from grace with equal swiftness on the wire of public opinion.

IT is a wise child that knows its own father in San Francisco.

ONE would think that our swagger set were beginning to feel deficiencies of early education, to judge from the varied "classes" formed by the swim during the penitential period. Some are to study French; others are "conversation classes;" others, again, for literature. The trio of society lights who weekly (an "a" in this would not be amiss) go through a Shakespearean play, are doing such good work it would not be surprising, to those on the inside, if the queenly Emily essays Portia in the trial scene of the Merchant of Venice, as the much-expected dramatic entertainment to be offered by her hospitable mother to the dear Five Hundred in the coming Easter-tide.

Any one who thinks our worthy Mayor is not a marrying man is much mistaken. At least this is the opinion given by one of his oldest friends, who further adds that Jim has his eye on the toga, having achieved which matrimony will follow, and the lady of his choice he capable of shining at the nation's capital. Strangely enough, the wives of California's representatives "in Congress assembled," are not quoted as adding particular lustre to their husband's position. "We will change all that," Jim is credited with thinking, and one has not to go far afield to guess who the lady of his choice is, her brilliant mental attainments having gained her a reputation for wit and cleverness ahead of all others in our local swim.

* * *

The "Sense and Sentiment Cluh" is the last addition to the list. The President of the day takes the chair, gives the topic to be discussed, and at the close of the meeting requires a written opinion of each woman to be read at the next meeting. On dit, a recent one where Love was the theme, was rich and racy, and efforts are being made by an attache of a leading firm to obtain a copy of the paper for the delectation of his next dinner guests.

* * *

What has become of the well-bred genuine American men whom we were wont to see out here en route for a trip to China, or the Yosemite. Has the East been so alluring as to keep them all at home, or have they chosen the Atlantic in lieu of the Pacific as a means of transportation? This query is often made when the fin de siecle imitators of a Britisher come out here nowadays and call themselves New Yorkers or Bostonians.

* * *

It seems incredible that a man like Verdinal, writing for newspapers, and living in Gotham, the very center of Anglo-maniaism, should not know that the wife of a haronet has no right to a personal title, and is only "by courtesy" styled "lady;" but will persist in dubbing little Maude Burke as Lady Maude Cunard!

* * *

If hut half the rumors that come hack to us from over the sea be true, no wonder some people take such delight in trips to "the Islands." Honolulu must be tinged pretty strongly with a Midway Plaisance flavor, judging from the stories told of and by our tourists who go there.

What a blessing it would be if some of the audience in the high priced seats at the opera would not afflict their neighbors with a chatter intended to air their French. The result is really painful.

* * *

Gossip says it begins to look as though a corner residence on the broad avenue would be left vacant by the fitting of its owner to another nest, thus forging another link in two families recently united.

Speculation is rife among the many friends of the Shafter family as to whether the robust Colonel will ere long see stars * * * on his shoulder straps.

The lover said:
 "Modest she was when first we wed;
 So shy, indeed, I can't forget
 Her blushes red!
 And when she mounted her pony true
 For a canter down Fifth avenue,
 She wore a long skirt of sober blue,
 Hiding her feet, and side-saddle, too."

Again he said:
 "Now she's a bold and airy maid,
 A hiking mss., of naught afraid,
 All coyness fled!
 She wears a jaunty bloomer faddle,
 And, when mounting her cycle saddle,
 she nimbly leaps and lands a-straddle,
 Then pedestrians just skedaddle."

THE IRONY OF TIME.—CHARLES LOTIN HILDRETH.

If we could resurrect the years again,
When life is on the wane;
If we could learn by many a bitter truth
The value of our youth,
Ere the inexorable hand of Time
Has harvested our prime—
How we should drain from every flower we meet
The last drop of its sweet!
We scorn the present hour, and strive to borrow
Some foretaste of the morrow;
The morrow has its morrow and the pain
Of hope deferred again;
So waste the years, till Age defeated stands,
Desolate, with empty hands.

Pilgrims on paths our fathers trod before,
We trace their footsteps o'er;
On every height, in every vale we meet
Signs of their toiling feet
Gashed on the rock and wounded by the thorn,
Where we are stung and torn.
What was it that they sought? O burning eyes,
Fixed on low western skies!
The beckoning shapes that seem so fair to you Wear the same dazzling hue
That lured the Vikings through tempestuous seas,
Beyond the Hebrides,
Toward purple isles of peace and golden lands—
To die on freezing strands.

Time has no precious treasure stored away
Beyond our grasp to-day.
Earth has no secret garden of delight
Hid from our aching sight.
Too late we learn the humble highway flower
Is life's best gift and dower;
The light that kindles in meek, maiden eyes
Is love's divinest guise;
Too late, too late we find there is no more,
On any sea or shore,
Than those rich offerings we have overthrown,
Pursuing the unknown;
Nor any road by which we can attain
Youth's vanished grace again.

IN ARCADY.—J. B. N., IN BOSTON JOURNAL.

It was easy to say "I love you!"
Under a summer sky,
When the hours went slow, and the bees hummed low,
And the winds went whispering by.
For we were young and bappy,
Nothing of life knew we;
And what more sweet than with careless feet
To wander in Arcady?
To-day, in a book forgotten,
I found a rose you had kissed,
Do you remember the moonlight?
The path to the lover's tryst?
And do you sometimes, I wonder,
Think of the past and me?
And wish, some day, we could steal away
And wander in Arcady?

Ah! no, 'tis a foolish fancy,
The dream is dreamed and over,
And you have forgotten the dear dead days,
When I was your loyal lover;
For we are two weary worldlings,
Seldom from care set free.
And never again can we find the path
That leads through Arcady!

MAIDENHAIR FERN.—DORA GOODALE.

Where the twinkling waterfalls
Sparkle over rocky ledges,
Where the slate-gray catbird calls
In and out the tangled hedges,
Green and slender, spreading fair,
You may see the maidenhair.

INSURANCE.

THE revival of the old P. I. U. Compact last Tuesday, under the name of the Board of Fire Underwriters of the Pacific, immediately raised rates to the basis in operation three years ago. The agreement is practically unanimous, as several companies not represented at Tuesday's meeting have since signified their intention to sign the required pledge. Of the companies remaining out, the Continental and Northwestern National are alone of any consequence, the intention of Manager Voss, of the Thuringia, being in doubt. The rates throughout the State will undoubtedly undergo reconstruction, and a general reduction of from 15 to 25 per cent. be effected from those prevailing two years ago. Much business has been written by the companies for terms of two and three years, and where the "non-cancellation" clause has been attached to such policies, this business will not be affected until expiration of the term; where term insurance has been affected without the clause, however, the rate will, undoubtedly, sooner or later be raised or the policy cancelled.

President John A. McCall, the life insurance magnate, is in the city, and is being extensively wined and dined. The rumor that his visit is connected with an intention to loan several large sums to San Francisco property holders for building purposes, lacks foundation in fact.

The officers of the reconstructed Fire Underwriter's Association are: Chas. D. Haveus, President; Wm. J. Dutton, Vice President; J. H. Marhardt, Secretary. The Executive Committee consists of Arthur E. Magill, Robt. Dickson, A. Mullins, Geo. W. Spencer, Geo. H. Tyson, Belden and Mann. The management will probably go to H. M. Grant, although Alfred Stillman has a strong pull with the committee, but is not generally liked by the members.

Immediately after the formation of the compact brokers were energetically engaged in the effort to renew existing contracts for an extended term at the old rates, but met with poor success, companies which have not yet signed the agreement, very generally refusing to accept the business.

It is an open secret in the editorial rooms of the Examiner that the affection between Andy Lawrence and Tom Garrett, who holds down the city desk, is a clever imitation of the love which the parrot bears to the proverbial monkey. Andy conceives the little fakes, and Tommy elaborates them. Their plots against the whites are developed with a plentiful lack of harmony, for Garrett does not enjoy his enforced role of playing the sneeze to Andy's snuff. The relative positions of the harmonious pair were not always as at present. Two or three years ago, after a brief but inglorious reign as city editor of the Examiner, he was incontinently fired, and became a reporter on the Chronicle, which was, at the time, publishing daily criticisms of the existing school board. Andy was detailed for this work by Garrett who then occupied the city desk in the tall tower on Market street. Tommy took unobvious pleasure in humiliating the reporter who had so recently been his editorial rival. Andy writhed under the discipline, and most unwillingly acknowledged the other's authority.

After turning in his copy about the school department one night, long after twelve o'clock, Andy sauntered complacently into Tommy's sanctum, magnificently arrayed in a white box coat, top hat, lavender trousers and patent leather boots.

"Well, Garrett," he said, breezily, drawing on a pair of red gloves, preparatory to departure, "If I keep up this lick, I guess Hearst will be sending for me."

"Guess again," snorted the irascible Thomas, with a disdainful glance at the dapper little dandy. "And say," he added, as an afterthought, "while you are waiting for that summons from Hearst, you get a boat and board the incoming China steamer which will be in port between now and four o'clock. Get out and skate now!"

Andy had guessed wrong. After he had procured a new suit of clothes to replace those ruined by his water-front detail, he started for New York in search of pastures new.

To say that Jim Thomas, who died this week, was the highest man in the grain business, did not necessarily imply that his operations were more extensive than those of any other local speculator, but simply that he measured six feet four in his stockings. He was quite sensitive regarding his stature and any allusion to his height put him into a fury. In some discussion with Ed Cutter, the latter accused Thomas of trying to hrowheat him because he was "a mile and a half high." Jim rushed at his critic like a wild hull and although Cutter eluded him, Thomas never spoke to Ed again. The giant grain dealer was cantankerous and notional, no one being able to keep pace with his fancies. Entering his store one morning he profanely commented on the number of cats about, although many of the cats had been there for years and there had been no recent feline multiplication.

"Whose cats are they, anyway?" thundered Thomas, who had hitherto been indifferent to their presence.

"Why, yours, sir, I supposed," faltered a clerk.

"Mine, are they? Well, I'll show you! Close the store at noon to-day."

When the doors were locked at twelve, Thomas armed himself with a hatchet, handed one clerk a boat hook and another a big poker, and started in to assassinate the cats. After he had chopped half through his own big toe, and one of his clerks had almost poked out the eye of the other with the boat hook, the furniture in the office being partially destroyed, but the cats sustaining absolutely no injuries, Jim suddenly abandoned his plan of annihilation. It was thoroughly characteristic of the impetuous giant that after this defeat he developed a positive affection for cats with as much suddenness as had marked the growth of his antipathy. Until the day of his sudden death, he always maintained, thereafter, an army of feline pets.

Boh Woodward judicially remarks that his friend Ted Haldan, the insurance manager, is a trifle slow, adding that when Haldan travels he always goes as freight. In the new Cosmos Club, a week ago, the assembled sages were discussing the topics of the day.

"I see that Governor Boies has struck the town," remarked handsome Charlie McIntosh, who is taking advantage of his brief ante-nuptial furlough to spend all his leisure hours at the club.

A few yards distant sat a party of dead-game sports, who had been at Carson, had gone broke on Corbett, and who had just returned penniless and irritable. They failed to hear correctly all of McIntosh's harmless remark about his distinguished fellow Iowan, and fancied his comment contained some reflection on their woehegone appearance.

"Well, we are not beefing about it," said Ted Haldan, sharply, to the bride-groom elect. "We are not that kind of boys."

"And I was talking of a different kind of Boies, too," rejoined Charlie, quickly.

Woodward says Ted has not seen it yet.

At the ecclesiastical comedy, sometimes termed a church council, which followed the exposure of the Brown-Overman scandal, the rays of some side lights fell on Charles G. Nagle, who posed as the adviser of the erring pastor. Nagle's office was recently the scene of a lively encounter concerning which the attorney covets the shadows of oblivion. The story, as told by his brother Jim, begins with Charlie's friendship for a girl whose very name suggested purring, and who had been accustomed to telephone frequently to the Nagle office. Determining to discontinue the affair, Charlie instructed his female stenographer to intimate her fickle employer's resolution in curt terms the next time his fair friend telephoned. This order was so effectually carried out by the zealous typewriter that on the following day there was an impromptu meeting in the office of the inconstant attorney, with a lively melee, London prize ring rules. The grand mixture of angry females was disentangled by Jim Nagle, at imminent risk of a broken head. Since the episode Charlie has been in strict seclusion. His friends say he is considering the advisability of entering a monastery.

Col. Peter A. Finegan, the unfortunate millionaire, who is so poor that he says he really cannot afford to pay his wife $100 a month alimony while her divorce suit is pending, has always been noted for the possession of that form of wealth which loves to ape poverty. In the business office of the Call they tell a characteristic story concerning him. For many years the Colonel was on that paper's free list on the strength of his boasted friendship for the late Loring Pickering. When Charles M. Shortridge became proprietor of the paper, one of his first orders was to consign the list of deadheads to the office fire. Colonel Finegan, grief-stricken, protested against the injustice of depriving of a free copy such a good friend of the Call as himself, but Mr. Shortridge was obdurate. Then the Colonel offered to compromise by paying 25 cents, which is the carrier's charge for serving the paper, instead of the customary monthly rate of 65 cents. That offer being promptly rejected, Colonel Finegan grandiloquently "stopped the paper."

It is a custom of the Call Board men, in buying or selling produce, to sample one sack in ten of every shipment, and to gauge the price by the average of all the samples thus obtained. A large consignment of beans from Ventura county was received in due course by John F. English, and a few days later he managed to dispose of the entire shipment at prices which left the current market quotations far in the rear. None of the other commission men could understand the reason for his lucky sales, and finally they asked him about it in the Produce Exchange.

"Simple enough," responded English, with charming sang froid. "When I find a good sack I stay with it."

Having opened a bag of exceptionally fine beans, he had used only the contents of that sack as his selling sample. He explains that he just reverses this method when he buys. As Mr. English says, "It's simple enough."

By some lucky mischance, young Gussie Costigan became the owner of a racehorse named Gold Dust. The animal looked well, but for a long period his performances at the track constituted an unbroken series of disappointments. Several weeks ago, "Cuss" and his friend Eugene Bresse, formerly junior partner in the firm of L. W. McGlaughlin & Co., who, after a sojourn in New York, is again to be seen on the Cal Board floor, went out to the Ingleside track together. It was said afterwards that "Cuss" had pretty good reasons to believe his horse would win, but as Gold Dust had never achieved a single success, he was able to secure odds of eight to one for his money. Carefully concealing the fact of his ownership, he quietly distributed as many bets as he dared among the stands of the various bookmakers. Then "Cuss" deputed Bresse to place some more money for him on Gold Dust, without assigning any reason, for Costigan does not like to share a good thing, even with a friend.

"I don't know anything about horses, Eugene," he said with apparent ingenuousness, "but I am betting my money on Gold Dust."

Bresse felt sorry for his misguided companion, but failing to convince him of his folly, placed Costigan's money as directed on Gold Dust, while he made his own bets on the favorite. After the race was over, Bresse sought his innocent friend, who was cashing a big pile of tickets, all at eight to one.

"I say, Gussie, how did you get that tip for Gold Dust?" inquired Eugene, who wondered why the information had not been passed along to him.

"Oh, I am the owner of the horse," softly replied the man who "knew nothing about horses."

Among the men in the employ of the El Dorado Linseed Oil Works is a dull but honest Swede, who has worked for years with steady industry as a laborer. During the temporary closing down of the works this week, Secretary George Moore, of the company, met the Swede emerging from a steamship office.

"Hello, Nansen," he said, in his customary tone of friendly greeting. "What are you doing in there?"

"Oh, sir," replied Nansen, with a radiant countenance, "I have been working eight years for this."

"Working eight years for what?" asked the perplexed official.

"To bring out my wife and children from Sweden. I have just paid for their passage," and he exhibited several steerage tickets.

"Yes?" pursued Moore, now quite interested. "How old are your children?"

"Six, four, and two years," replied the happy "father."

"Ahem! And—and you haven't seen your wife or family for eight years?" queried Moore, doubtfully.

"No, but they will all be here in two months," joyfully answered Nansen, whose faith was only equalled by his simplicity.

Motives of delicacy absolutely prohibited further interrogation.

It is hardly a matter for comment that in such a musical neighborhood as Hyde street, twin flats should each contain an inveterate piano-player—but with a difference. In the upper flat is a child, with an abnormal sense of justice, and with an aunt who is really a brilliant pianist. Below is a woman whose industry is only equalled by her incompetency. She is merely a mechanical musician, and when she pounds on the unfortunate instrument, which never did anything to her, she jars the nerves of the entire neighborhood. But she piles insult on top of injury by complaining that the performance of the real piano sharp above makes her intensely nervous and quite upsets her. This Pharsaical comment being duly retailed upstairs, in the presence of the little girl with the sense of justice, aroused all the righteous indignation of the kid.

"Oh, well, mudder," was the final and consoling outburst of the child, who has an immense veneration for all the constituted authorities, without a very clear perception of their respective functions, "Jesus and the policeman know she is the bad one, not us."

LENTEN clouds still lower over the social world, and what entertainments are given are mostly on a small scale, on the quiet, as it were. Theatre parties and opera parties there have been during the week, but they are not so many as would have been the case were it not the season for sackcloth and ashes—not exactly the garments to be worn in public. However, those who do not observe the Lenten fast may be said to be doing fairly well, and in music especially there has been more of a feast than a famine, for what a week this has been for sweet sounds in addition to the opera concerts taking place every night, and next week promises to be equally well provided. Among other musical affairs, the third concert of their present season will be given by the Loring Club next Tuesday evening at Odd Fellows' Hall, and it will, it is said, be one of unusual excellence.

Mrs. Whitelaw Reid's visit here is passing away rapidly, and yet so quietly that only a few of her most intimate friends are conscious of her presence in her old home. Her aunt, Mrs. A. M. Easton, gave a luncheon in her honor last week, which was one of the few occasions she has met her friends since coming on her present visit to California. Luncheons and cards have ever been favorite Lenten diversions, and it seems as though the young ladies were monopolizing the duties of hostess, at present so many are filling that role. Miss Alice Ames came to the front as a hostess last week, and the parlors of the Ames residence, on Taylor street, were filled with a merry gathering of young people. First there was a jolly game of cards, then delightful music, and finally delicious refreshments, making the evening a continued pleasure to the friends thus entertained.

Miss Mau's euchre party was a particularly pleasant one, thirty ladies competing for the pretty prizes, the first of which was won by Miss Baldwin, the second by Miss Wells, and the third by Mrs. Whitney. Miss Giselman's recent dinner was in compliment to the bride and groom-elect, Miss Estee and Leonard Everett; pink was the hue selected for the floral and other dainty adornments of the dinner table, at which a dozen guests were seated.

Miss Rosalie Neustadter continues to be the motif for many a pleasant gathering at the hands of her many friends, and another young lady who has come in for a good deal of entertainment is Miss Owen, who has been visiting Mrs. G. C. Boardman for some time past, and she has been indefatigable in giving Miss Owen a "good time" since her arrival from the East.

Miss Hecht's entertainment was a dinner, which she gave to a party of young people on Tuesday evening.

Wednesday's review at the Presidio, in spite of threatening skies, drew another large gathering of belles, almost as large as at the recent one in which Inspector-General Burton was the chief figure. On this occasion Colonel Young was in command, with Colonel Willeston an able assistant, and after the display was over and the duties of the day finished there were several pleasant little luncheon parties at the post.

On Monday evening last Mr. and Mrs. Isaac Strassburger gave an elegant dinner at the Palace Hotel. Ever since their return from Europe last fall they have been the recipients of innumerable attentions at the hands of their friends, and sought this most fitting method of reciprocating. Some three hours were passed at the festal board which was beautifully decorated with flowers and ribbons. An orchestra discoursed the popular melodies of the day from an adjacent retreat. Mr. and Mrs. Strassburger will shortly leave the hotel to reside in their new home out on Pacific Heights.

Any novel in social amusement is always welcome, and therefore the pretty game of comptant les fleurs, introduced by Mrs. Clarence Mann at her tea last Saturday, was an instant and great success, the Misses May, Schuaroood and Harrison being the winners of the three prizes offered for the best guesses. The musical reception given by Chris. Jorgensen at his studio on Saturday afternoon was a charming affair, as are indeed most gatherings of a like nature. There is a spice of Bohemia about it that adds to the pleasure of the bidden guests. Flowers, tastefully arranged, gave brightness to the rooms, and the musical selections of the Messrs. Henley, Tilton, Suggden and Jorgensen were warmly applauded. The chief stag gathering was the elaborate banquet last Saturday evening, with which the members of the Cosmos Club inaugurated their new quarters on Sutter street.

The handsome residence of Mr. and Mrs. J. Boas, on O'Farrell and Laguna streets, was elaborately adorned with flowers and foliage for the marriage of their daughter Minnie to Marc L. Davis, which was celebrated last Tuesday evening at 6 o'clock. The wedding ceremony was performed by the Rev. Jacob Nieto, the bridal party standing beneath a wedding bell of white roses, suspended from the archway between the parlors, and was witnessed by a large assemblage of friends. The pretty bride, who was given away by her father, was robed in an elegant creation of white satin and mousseline de soie, trimmed with lace and orange blossoms. The same sweet-scented blossoms were worn in her hair, and her tulle veil enveloped her graceful figure. Her bouquet was of lilies of the valley. The bride's only attendant was her sister Stella, who wore a gown of white silk, prettily trimmed with ribbons and tulle, and she carried a bouquet of bridesmaid's roses. Beujamin Davis supported his brother as best man. An elaborate hanquet, prepared by Max Abraham, was served at the conclusion of the ceremony, and then there was dancing until a late hour. The presents were many and very handsome, and the young couple have been passing their honeymoon at Coronado.

Several interesting engagements have been announced during the past week. One is that of Mrs. Margaret E. Whitelaw and Walter N. Brunt, with the wedding day set for the 12th of May; and another, that of Miss Dollie Brown and Charles Wood. Oakland will claim a wedding of the near future, as from the other side of the bay comes the intelligence of Miss Jessie Glascock's engagement to Alex. R. Baldwin, which means that society will on this side of the bay acquire a charming matron, the fair bride having been one of Oakland's helles during the past season. Miss Mattie Whittier's will not be the only society wedding on the 21st of April, as Miss Minnie O'Neill has selected that date for her marriage to J. J. Baumgartner.

Stormy March has been no misnomer this year, the coldness of the temperature this week, which has been far more like winter than any spring, has rather retarded the discussions usually indulged in about this period of "where shall we go this summer?" But from all that can be heard it would seem as though San Rafael would be the most favored locale with our fashionable folk, the majority appearing to incline in that direction. And while active preparations for a hegira from town may not be made for some time yet, taking time by the forelock, rooms are being secured at the Hotel Rafael at such a rate that the tardy ones may have to regret their delay in doing so by finding them all gone.

Mr. and Mrs. Maurice Wieland were at home last Sunday and Monday for the purpose of bidding their friends adieu, previous to their departure for the East and Europe. Louis Sloss Jr. has gone on an extended trip through Canada and the Eastern States, on which Rudolph Neumann accompanied him. Society is about to sustain a loss in the near departure of Miss Ronnie Wallace, who will accompany her sister, Mrs. Sprague, here at present on a visit to her parents, when she returns Eastward, and later they will go to Europe together.

Mr. and Mrs. C. P. Huntington are installed in their handsome residence on Nob Hill, having arrived last week on one of Mr. Huntington's periodical business visits to the coast. They will remain some time in San Francisco. Mr. and Mrs. S. I. Wormser will soon occupy the Wieland residence on Laguna street, and remain there during the absence of the owners in foreign parts. Mrs. Louise Wormser has taken the Rothschild house on Octavia street for the summer months. Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Simon will occupy the Muser residence on California street, while the Musers spend the coming two years abroad. Mrs. John W. Shaw of New York is visiting her sister, Mrs. I. L. Regua, at Piedmont. George T. Marye was one of the Eastbound passengers last Saturday.

One of the most worthy charities in the city is the Children's Hospital, which in a practical way has done and is doing a vast deal of good. The lady managers of this admirable charity contemplate giving a grand entertainment some time in May, not yet fixed, in aid of that institution.

THE Park is to be effectively lighted by electricity, the Commissioners having determined to erect a power house at a cost of $40,000 for this purpose. The plans adopted contemplate sufficient light to make the roadway from the Park entrance to the beach bright and clear on the darkest nights. The installation of the plant will meet a popular demand, and the expenditure is more than justified by the increased pleasure to be derived from it by cyclists, pedestrians, horsemen and others.

"My Long Life: An Autobiographic Sketch." by Mary Cowden-Clarke, author of "The Concordance to Shakespeare." New York. Dodd, Mead & Co. 1896.

Mary, daughter of Vincent Novello, the great London music-publisher, was born in 1809 in a house on Oxford street. From the earliest age she showed a strong predilection for music and literature, in which she was much encouraged by her father and by the distinguished musicians and literary men whom she met at her parents' house. During her childhood she met Mary and Charles Lamb, Leigh Hunt, and others, and in later life made the acquaintance of Mary Shelley, Sir Michael Costa, Sir Henry Bessemer, Felix Mendelssohn, and other distinguished persons. When she was seventeen years of age she was betrothed to Charles Cowden-Clarke, whom she married in 1828. From that time forth she lived an ideally happy married life. Her husband took up the work of lecturing on English literature, and being eminently well-fitted by nature for the work, and enthusiastically devoted to it, he achieved great success. The "Concordance to Shakespeare," by which Mrs. Cowden-Clarke is best known to the world, was published in 1841, having taken several years to accomplish: but besides her magnum opus she wrote articles for English and American magazines, and stories for various publications. She also played in Charles Dickens's Amateur Company, has traveled widely in France, Germany, and Italy, and heard an incalculable number of concerts, operas, and dramatic performances. She has known nearly every musician and composer of eminence in Europe, and her sisters are singers and instrumentalists of no mean capacity. Her disposition throughout life has been of the sunniest, and wherever she has gone she has made warm friends. She has a natural abhorrence for coarseness, and, as an illustration of her attitude of mind, she quotes from Sir John Lubbock's "Pleasures of Life" the following words: "The soul is dyed by its thoughts: we cannot keep our minds pure if we allow them to be sullied by detailed accounts of crime and sin." We recommend the proprietors of our big daily papers to lay these words to heart, and to consider whether the glowing narratives of sensuality and wickedness which defile their columns—and by a singular misconception are termed "news"—are not the efficient cause of much of the crime they delight to chronicle. An hour before writing these words, we found nearly a column of a daily paper taken up by an account of the vulgar intrigue of a butcher with the wife of a haker. To return to Mrs. Clarke: she has lived so much in foreign countries that her English seems here and there to have become tinged with foreign idiom: as when she writes of Rubinstein, the pianist, "I felt, so to say, as if he played Mozart, Mozartianly; Beethoven, Beethovenishly; Weher, Weherishly, and so on." Again, she speaks of Gounod as "altogether fascinating to me personally as well as compherly." Of a certain hotel proprietor in Lugano, she says "that it seemed as if he took us for . . . royalties, he treated us so distinguishably." But these are slight hlemishes in a volume that is interesting to all readers as the record of the happy life of a singularly vivacious and sweet-tempered woman, and especially so to readers who are fond of music and musicians.

In The Dial of March 1st, we find a communication from Oscar Lovell Triggs, of the University of Chicago, who is anxious to draw a distinction between what he terms "aristocratic and democratic modes of criticism." He asks: "Are we to form our methods on the lines of a culture that is narrow, intellectual, exclusive, or of a culture that is comprehensive, social, inclusive?" Does Mr. Triggs really mean to say that the culture of Matthew Arnold, Andrew Lang, J. R. Lowell, and W. E. Gladstone is "narrow" as compared with that of Hamlin Garland and the Professors of Western Universities? Will he have the temerity to assert that the wisdom of John Ruskin is less broad, less deep, less "comprehensive" or "inclusive" than that of Professor Brander Matthews, let us say? That their culture is "intellectual" seems to us self-evident; is that of Mr. Triggs unintellectual? Mr. Triggs proceeds: "The tendency of modern criticism, under the combined influences of science and democracy, is to substitute relative for absolute standards, and the personal for the impersonal point of view." And much more to the same purpose. Now, all this is fundamentally and entirely wrong: There are two kinds of criticism, it is true, but these have nothing essentially to do either with aristocracy or democracy, as is shown by the fact that the best literary criticism is found in France and Great Britain, one of which countries is a democracy, while the other is an aristocracy. The two kinds of criticism are the good and the had, the true and the false, the educated and the uneducated, the trained and the untrained, the expert and the inexperienced, the "intellectual" and the unintelligent, the "exclusive," which excludes the had and worthless, and the "inclusive," which includes bad and good with equal indiscrimination. The only estimates of literature, that are of any value are those formed by persons properly qualified by Nature and training, without any regard at all to the forms of Government that they favor or live under. The bluest-blooded noble may be an utterly worthless literary critic, and a man of the people may be a most valuable one. The function of criticism is to distinguish between the good and the had, between the rich and the tawdry, between the permanent and the ephemeral; and to exclude rigidly the latter. The critic who, knowing better, tries to palm off a had book as a good one, is unworthy of his office, which should be taken by another.

The immortality of a work of literature is secured by the beauty of its style, and no work the style of which is not almost perfect has survived, or will survive, throughout the ages. In so far as criticism, whether that of aristocrats, democrats, plutocrats, or popocrats, proceeds upon any other principles than these, it is all astray. There is no method whereby a poor book, written by a person unfamiliar with the technique of literature, can be made out to be a good one. It is entirely possible that a man of earnest character, broad sympathies, and noble courage, may write a book which is, as literature, quite worthless: while an immortal work may be written by a shiftless, unprincipled, reckless, devil-may-care fellow without a dollar in the world. For a man without literary training to attempt to write—except for practice and his own delectation—is as foolish as for him to try to row, hox, play hilliards or whist, in utter ignorance of the rules of those exercises. Ignominious failure can be the only result. Amid the vast mass of law-books that have been put forth in the last century-and-a-half what is it that has made the commentaries of Blackstone pre-eminent? Is it not the beauty of their style, peerless among legal treatises? A good book is good for all alike, and a had one is a had one. To say, as Mr. Triggs does, that "democratic criticism records a personal experience" is to say that it is not criticism: that it is merely the expression of a personal preference. There are many millions of people who can only say of a work of art "I like it," or "I do not care for it," but to call these good creatures critics, or their feeble likes and dislikes criticism, is absurd. The laws of right reason and true art cannot be changed to suit the personal preferences of persons who have not the aptitude, or will not take the pains, to study the great masters patiently, modestly, and persistently. The new criticism (so-called) is merely another of the familiar attempts to convert Iowan and Nebraskan goslings into world-renowned cygnets. Such attempts are foredoomed to failure and should not be made by men whose position seems to imply the possession of better sense.

Godey's Magazine for March is filled with articles of interest to women. Grace H. Wehh writes of Dresden Opera, and Rupert Hughes contributes "Modern Art in Piano Building," and "Music in America." In a rather foolish article on "Handsome newspaper women" Helen M. Winslow remarks that newspaper-work "requires not only a quick but a well-developed brain, the finest of perceptions, and an ever-increasing culture." And here we have been supposing, from what we see of the daily papers, that journalistic work required perceptions naturally coarse or blunted by hard experience, very moderate education, a certain vulgar sharpness not to be dignified by the title of intelligence, and a marked aptitude for making other people's affairs your business. We even supposed that anything like culture absolutely unfitted a man or woman for the ordinary work of the local room of a newspaper. Mrs. Winslow must know that nineteen-twentieths of the contents of our daily papers are written by men who have not even had a high-school education, and whom it would be ludicrous to call men of taste, delicacy or culture. Are not people of refinement continually shocked and disgusted at the daily papers, and do not some of them abandon the reading of papers altogether for weeks or months? How is it that the work of people of "the finest of perceptions and an ever-increasing culture" produces these results? Nor are we able to agree with Mrs. Winslow when she says that journalistic work "gives well-bred women the open sesame to good society everywhere." Let any woman who thinks so try to enter the good society of Rome, Paris, Vienna, or London, on the strength of being a "society reporter," and see how far she will get. The issue contains the usual well-illustrated fashion article, and the third of Grace E. Drew's "Modes and Manners of seventy years."

The International Studio, published by John Lane at the Bodley Head, is one of the handsomest of the periodicals. The paper on which it is printed is heavy and of fine quality. The March issue gives us reproductions, in black, brown or Bartolozzi red, of M. L. Lévy-Dhurmer's pictures, which are of a remarkably dreamy character. A letter from Japan by Mortimer Mepes is reproduced in fac-simile, drawings and all. Other copiously illustrated articles deal with early Scandinavian wood-carvings, and show some excellent examples of bookbinding by T. J. Cobden-Sanderson and Miss E. M. MacCall. It is pointed out that the important thing about a design for a book-cover is beauty, not appropriateness: a very "appropriate" design may be both vulgar and stupid. The Studio will prove valuable to all who are interested in artistic work of almost every kind, for it covers a wide field.

In Game Land for March we see an article entitled "Three Hundred Miles Afoot. A Pedestrian-Collecting Trip." Now, if a stamp-collector means one who collects stamps, and a fern-collecting expedition is one having for its object the gathering of ferns, it must needs be that "a pedestrian-collecting trip" is one taken for the purpose of collecting pedestrians. Yet the first words in the title of the article make it clear that what is meant is a trip on foot for the purpose of making a collection of certain things not mentioned—possibly United States gold dollars.

On February 25th and again on March 2d Mr. J. W. Laing, M. A., F. R. G. S., formerly of this city, delivered at Victoria, B. C., a lecture on India and its people. On the first occasion the lecture was delivered in aid of the Indian Famine Relief Fund and realized $165. The chair was taken on both evenings by the Hon. James Baker, Minister of Education, and the newspapers of Victoria speak very highly of the lecture.

Early in April the Century Company will publish "The Stand-by," a novel by Edmund P. Dole of Hawaii, and a volume of stories by Mrs. Schuyler van Rennselaer; also "Talks to young men" and "Talks to young women," by Dr. Parkhurst, who is turning to account with publishers the notoriety gained in New York purlieus.

Dauchy's newspaper catalogue for 1897 is fully up to the standard of previous issues, and will be found of especial value to advertisers generally.

THE splendid racing which has been witnessed by enthusiastic crowds at the Mechanics' Pavilion these past two weeks, has done much to aid the interest in wheeling generally and the trade in particular. The riding has been of the best, and the aggregation of speedy wheelmen and the close competition have given lovers of the sport entertainment of the highest order. Notwithstanding the great roar made by the manager of the meet, as to the manner in which the racing men have been imposed upon by race promoters on this Coast before his advent upon the scene, he has seen fit to discontinue one of the most interesting features of the meet—the amateur races—and all because he could not force the boys to take a lot of cheap jewelry and under-value prizes as trophies won. He declared with much force that "them amateurs is the ungratefulest set of boys I ever seen." And that the prizes were "the most expensivest" that could be selected.

The tournament concludes with this evening's races, most of the flyers taking their departure to-morrow for Nashville, Tenn. It is safe to say that no hetter nor more niggardly or poor management ever went hand in hand before.

Coming on the heels of the Indoor Meet, as it does, the relay race to be held to-morrow has been in a manner lost sight of by wheelmen generally, excepting, of course, those actually conditioning themselves for the contest. This annual hundred-mile race around the bay is one of the greatest road events that takes place in the United States. It is run under the auspices of the California Associated Cycling Clubs, and forms one of a series of three annual races—the others being respectively ten and twenty-five mile handicap runs, all taking place on the road.

To-night will determine whether or not we are to have track racing on Sunday in this State. The matter will be finally acted upon this evening at a general meeting of the delegates of the C. A. C. C., held for the purpose of considering the advisability of wresting the control of track racing in this State from the League of American Wheelmen, which organization has refused to grant the West the relief asked in the matter of division option. The course of the parent body in this matter has been the cause of the dissolution of the North California Division of the League, and bids fair to deprive the L. A. W. of all control of track racing in the United States.

AT THE RACES.

THE racing at Ingleside during the past week has been of the sensational order, and on several occasions the talent have been completely routed. This was due to had starting—in several cases—favorites and second choices being left at the post. There has been a lamentable lack of handicap races of late, and too many cheap selling events. It is almost impossible to fill a handicap race with high-class performers, owing to the great number of selling races on the daily card. The sensation of the week was the winning of Mainstay at odds of 100 to 1, he defeating Sallie Cliquot, Santa Bella, Lady Diamond, Caliente, Logan, and others; the odds were undoubtedly false against this horse.

The Gentlemen's race for the cup was won by Flashlight, cleverly ridden by Mr. Skinner. Athens was second, ridden by Lieutenant Haines, who rode a great race to heat Yankee Doodle. The California Derby will be decided this afternoon, and promises to be a grand contest, and will be worth a long journey to see. There is a large number of entries, and $5000 will go to the winners.

There is the fullest and most valuable collection of Japanese curios, tapestries, art goods, etc., in San Francisco, to be found anywhere in the United States. George T. Marsh & Co., at 625 Market Street, under the Palace Hotel, is the place, and a visit there is a treat and liberal education in Japanese art.

SAN FRANCISCO NEWS LETTER

California Advertiser.

Vol. LIV.

SAN FRANCISCO, APRIL 10, 1897.

Number 15.

Printed and Published every Saturday by the proprietor, FRED MARRIOTT
54 1/2 Kearny street, San Francisco. Entered at San Francisco Postoffice as Second-class Matter.

The office of the NEWS LETTER in New York City is at Temple Court;
and at Chicago, 505 Hayes Building, (Frank E. Morrison, Eastern Representative), where information may be obtained regarding subscription and advertising rates.

THE announcement is made that one of the athletic clubs of the city will "box for charity." If this be not borrowing the livery of heaven to serve the devil in, no such instance finds record.

THE notorious Cremorne, on Market street, must yield to the march of improvements. It should have yielded to a sense of decency and the march of the police long ago. It wore the frayed garments of moulting vulgarity, and was redolent of the squirming hula-hula, the bear-eyed box rustler, and the pickpocket. That its going is owing to commercial pressure rather than public sentiment, is no compliment to this city.

STATEMENTS that fabulously rich diggings have been struck in the Yuma, Arizona, mining district, may be accepted with a great degree of caution. There has never yet been manufactured a magnifying glass of power equal to the eye of the prospector. The fact that he is sincere in the falsehoods he tells detracts nothing from their harmfulness. Yuma is a pretty hot district, and almost anything can be hatched out in the sands along the Colorado river.

THE Grand Jury has just discovered that the new system of collecting taxes costs $40,000 more than the old plan, and a special committee of inquiry very sensibly recommends that a return to former methods is in order. It is really surprising that the tax-eaters, who gather where they have not strewn, and reap where they have not sown, let us off with a simple $40,000. Their moderation in this respect entitles them to the penitentiary rather than the gallows.

A MONUMENT to Lincoln will be commendable at an opportune time; but his noble life, simplicity of character, and sweet regard for others, have made for him a monument so lasting that mere marble is almost superfluous. There is just at this time a more urgent need for money to feed the hungry than to raise a shaft in memory of the greatest American. Some prominent point in the city, rather than the Park, would be a more appropriate place for the monument; and the 25-cent pieces the school children are to be asked to give toward it will in many cases mean either actual sacrifice or personal humiliation.

THE Mission Five Mile Improvement Club is making an effort to remove the dairies and swineries that infest that part of the city. The inquisitive goat, the odorous porker, and the tuberculous cow that now make up a large part of the population of that district are to be driven off. The Supervisors are asked to extend the pound limits, so that the operation of the law may make these industries unremunerative. It is a source of surprise that the dairy-men and hog-raisers have been permitted to conduct their business in the city limits. Milk and pork are unfit for sale when so produced, to say nothing of the health of those residing in the immediate vicinity of such disease-breeding localities. That these offenders insist on polluting the air of the city and endangering health is a conclusive proof that all hogs do not necessarily travel on four legs.

LAW is said to be the perfection of human reason. But that was not the article Judge Coffey dealt out when he declared that a will was invalid because the first two figures of the date, 1895, had been omitted in that instrument. This learned Judge says that he cannot tell what "November 6, '95," means, and so sets it aside! All of which shows that common sense is not necessarily the mental equipment of a probate judge.

JUDGE WALLACE may be said to have reversed the Supreme Court in the case of Buckley, ballot-box stuffer, who has thus far, through the law's delays, partially escaped punishment for his crime. The higher tribunal practically ordered the release of Buckley, and Wallace refused to honor the requisition, so to speak. Now, by denying the petition for a writ of habeas corpus, the Supreme Court affirms Judge Wallace. It is a novel procedure, but it shows that the soundest law does not necessarily spring from the highest source.

A LOS ANGELES jelly manufacturer writes to the San Francisco Board of Health, and hacks his protest by affidavit, that goods of his make recently found to be adulterated, are the quintessence of purity. The question naturally arises whether affidavits are cheaper in Los Angeles than the ingredients of which pure goods are made. He also suggests that the Board of Health submit to the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce a similar sample for analysis. We move for a change of venue.

ANOTHER man has sued the city for damages because of the overflow from a broken sewer. There is little doubt that he will recover, and little doubt that he ought to. It's a pretty safe proposition to say that half the work of this sort done in San Francisco is defective. Their long practice in giving tax-payers the double cross has prepared the public for any outrage in the way of contractors' work. Defective sewers and defective officials go hand in hand—with the advantages slightly favoring the sewers.

THE Populist statesmen of Kansas are incubating a plan by which they may tax inordinate wealth. These emissaries of financial disaster have established headquarters and are in receipt of an enormous quantity of mail. Yes; there are few Populists so poor that they cannot afford a postal card or postage stamp, and the number of statesmen of this sort who can tell what should be done with other people's wealth is large and increasing. Kansas has woes enough already without these exaggerated imbeciles. It claims John James Ingalls as all its own.

THE Board of Health is worthy of its name. Its members do not belong to the invertebrates. The strenuous efforts that have been made to prevent vigorous prosecution of violators of the pure food laws have not affected this board. The crusade will continue, and every effort will be made to stop the obtaining of money under false pretenses by those who knowingly sell adulterated food as pure goods. There is no way to prevent this growing evil excepting through public prosecution. No doubt, some of those who have been gathering in honest shekels for dishonest foods did so ignorantly; but this fact, however consoling it may be from a strictly moral point of view, subtracts nothing from the wrong inflicted upon the unsuspecting purchaser. "Getting caught at it," is a wonderful stimulant for dormant consciences. The doctors should not spare their physic: it will kill or cure.

GLADSTONE ON THE CRETAN DIFFICULTY.

MR. GLADSTONE has never been deemed a high authority on foreign affairs, but his influence over the opinions and passions of his people is unequalled. No man living has a greater sway over the judgment of the people of England than William Ewart Gladstone. When he passionately declares that the honor of his country is at stake the conscience of England will go with him. This he has just said in a way that only he can say it. The Nation is with him and he is for war. It may therefore be taken for granted that whatever occurs ultimately, England will be against the "unspeakable Turk" whom Mr. Gladstone wanted to turn out of Europe years ago, "bag and baggage." The sympathy of the people of the United States will go out towards the grand old man and do what it can to uphold his hands. At the same time, whilst Lord Salisbury has charge of the matter, it is in safe, capable, and conservative hands. He will wield a moderating influence, but, with Gladstone leading public opinion, he dare not lag far behind. It is obvious that the Prime Minister of England has a heavy weight of responsibility on his shoulders just now. A nod of his head or one false step may bring on the long expected and much dreaded European war, the dire consequences of which no man can limit. Whenever the time comes that the despatches can be published, we feel satisfied that Lord Salisbury will be found to have acted well his part, and that under stupendous difficulties. It has been said that great occasions make great men, certainly in England the right time, as a rule, brings out the right man. Gladstone is all right where he is, but were he in Salisbury's place he would almost certainly be all wrong. Salisbury's temper is fortunately not as keen as a Damascus blade, but his head is strictly level, and he has a wonderful amount of back bone. With such an equipment he is unquestionably the right man in the right place at this time.

What the particular difficulties are which keep "the concert of Europe" divided and inactive, are possibly not so much as imagined by the guessing newspaper men of the period. Diplomacy is conducted in a very high handed and secretive way in the older countries. More than one half of all press despatches that are coming to this country at present are mere guess work. Combination after combination is talked about that is absolutely absurd. We do not believe that any one outside of the very highest diplomatic ranks has the slightest idea of the card that Germany is playing. We believe that she is for any side, or for no side, if that will tend to separate Russia from France. That Russia will ultimately have no objection to Greece annexing Crete is undoubtedly true, but the present she thinks untimely. She is not ready to seize the Dardanelles and occupy Constantinople, and wants no war in that locality until she is. Greece will secure a liberal autonomy for Crete now, and later on will secure annexation. All this looks like a continuance of peace. But we are strongly disposed to think that a play for position is going on, and that the issues of peace or war hang upon the condition of the Czar's health. We think that England is little understood in this matter. She received a rude shock some months ago and woke up to find Russia and Germany united against her. A thing that had for so many years seemed impossible. Jealousy of her territorial and commercial success was rampant on every side. Nearly every body was ready to kick old John Bull's pants into smithereens. He was specially surprised to find the United States against him, and took care to promptly set matters straight about the Monroe Doctrine and all else we wanted. He then began cautiously to set all his other fences in order, and without a doubt is doing a heap of thinking over that matter to this very hour. It became plain that Italy and Austria had been deluded by Germany in the Dreibund. France, too, had been deceived by Russia in favor of Germany. All these powers are at sixes and sevens, and distrust reigns all around. England, France, Italy, and possibly Austria, have alone proven trustworthy. We think they are the coming combination and that England is not as averse to war as some people have thought. She is fairly well prepared now. Her million and a half of trained Indian soldiers, her wonderful navy, and, above all, her great supply of money, give her a degree of strength greater than anything she ever before possessed. We think she is now engaged in convincing the European Concert that whilst she is for peace, she is not for peace at any price, and that if the circumstances justify it, she is willing to fight, even if she has to go it alone. If she plays out the game on those lines, it will be one of the most heroic bluffs on record. Yet England can fight and no man living can set bounds to what she might prove herself capable of accomplishing in that line. We believe Mr. Gladstone was put up to make that speech, and that there was design in it. The politics of Europe are seldom what they seem to be. England may see that war is inevitable, and that the present time suits her as well as any other.

McKinley and Sherman's Foreign Policy.

There is to be no jingoism in this administration. That much is certain. Mr. Smalley, the American correspondent of the London Times, publishes an interview he had with our President and Secretary of State, in regard to matters of public policy, that is frank and unpretentious in the extreme. President McKinley will maintain the gold standard whilst "doing something" for international bimetalism; he is still a convinced protectionist, but "he recognizes that times are altered since the 1890 tariff." He favors the arbitration treaty without material amendment. He did not propose to take any new departure in regard to Cuba. Secretary Sherman talked at length, but almost exclusively about foreign affairs. According to him, and he ought to know, this administration is possessed of the most conservative and pacific intentions. He believes in the Washingtonian doctrine of "friendship with all, with entangling alliances with none." "There will be no war with Spain," he said; "we want none, and have no reason to believe she does with us." He declared that if Spain would give him a quit claim to Cuba, he would not have it. He is opposed to all the annexation schemes, those of Hawaii and Canada included. As far as this northern continent goes, he says "that his dream is for three great republics—Mexico, the United States, and Canada"—but he would not take a single step to alter things as they are. That is all good and pretty enough for a Sunday school, and we believe the Secretary quite sincere, but the responsibilities of office do most wonderfully change the views of men. It was this self-same Sherman who, as a Senator, voted for recognizing both the belligerency and independence of Cuba. It is one of the humors of the time that after four years of Republican roasting of Cleveland's "invertebrate" foreign policy, the administration that succeeds him should announce the continuance of that same cursed and bedeviled policy. But it is the policy that the Republican voters of the country want, all the same.

In re
Lunacy.

There are good laws and very ill considered ones on the statue book. There are some things our municipality does well, whilst there are others that it does in a manner that is a disgrace to our vaunted civilization. For instance our laws relating to the arrest and imprisonment of a person, on complaint of another, that he is insane and unfit to go at large, is a relic of the barbaric ages. It may occur and it has occurred that the complaining person is the only demented one. It is one of the well known freaks of lunatics to imagine and charge the sane person to be insane. That is an experience which mad doctors meet with almost every day of their lives, and not infrequently it is the one who prefers the charge who goes to jail. When the law is operated in that way, it affords the kind and degree of protection that it appears any sane man may need any day. No man should be sent to a dungeon, dark, and drear, unless for crime, whether he be sane or insane. If he be sane he is deprived of his liberty, and it may be of his health, without cause. If he be insane, he should be placed in a suitable place, and at least some attention should be paid to his wants. The dictates of humanity should have some respect paid them when persons suspected of either disease of mind or body are concerned. When all the officers around are satisfied that the arrested is the subject of a job, and "has as clear a mind as any man in the country" it is a bad and wicked law that keeps him there longer, and which, unless he has a kiud friend at hand, would detain him three days more. He can only get discharged by an order of a Superior Judge, and if the police be that way minded he is arrested and not given a chance to send to and explain to a judge. Besides, who cares to listen to a lunatic, anyway, or even take the risk of letting him go at large. No such monstrous treatment should be imposed upon him in such a case, and in no case, unless experts have been first called and probable cause shown. To imprison a man who in his daily walk, conversation, and employment gives the highest evidences known among men of his mental balance, is to demonstrate the fact that our laws regarding the treatment of persons charged with lunacy are a libel upon humanity.

The law permits all these things to be done in San Francisco to as sane a man as there is in it. Suppose that in addition to what the law permits, there is police malice, press jealousy, and private devilry at your heels trying to crush you, is not our lunacy laws in that case a dangerous weapon for your ruin, or your belittlement before the public? Just this condition has been permitted by our lunacy laws, and that is evidence enough that they need a radical change. Under their operation an irresponsible crank may cause the incarceration of Professor LeCoate, of Professor Jordan or of any man of mark in our midst.

In all this we do not want to be understood as reflecting upon any of the present officials. They do the best they can with the laws and appliances at their command. The professional gentlemen of the commission are undoubted experts, and, what is rarer around the City Hall, they are gentlemen. Judge Becher does his duty thoroughly, but rather brusquely, yet possibly that is his way of applying an expert test. The man who receives his patients, as in fact they are, and takes away their private papers and other property which some how or other reach other hands, is in manner and otherwise a good man to be permitted to find another situation. We are sorry the Legislature is not in existence to supply a remedy, but one shall be found for this mad house infamy. The laws in the early stages of their administration are not operated as humanity or civilization demand. An insane man is an object of sympathy and should be treated as such. He is not a criminal to be handed over to a police, perhaps predetermined to treat him with unusual brutality. If the Governor and Mayor will lay their heads together they can find money and a way to treat them more like human beings than they now are treated.

The Change
In The Police Regime.

Crowley is out and Lees is in, but that constitutes no change in the inner workings of the Police Department. There is a change in the name of the ostensible

Chief, but not in that of the real one. Lees is now in name what he always was in fact. Crowley was kept where he was because of his suavity of manners. He possessed a large share of the suavitor in modo, but was so given to stock gambling, that he leaves office with but a moderate fortune. A few years ago stocks ruined him and it has proved a good thing for him that that sort of gambling at last ended. His failure to grow as rich as some of his associates reflected upon them, whilst it served him with the public. It at the same time demonstrated that nominal chief though he was the money department was in other hands. Ex-Chief Crowley himself makes no bones of these facts and does not deny that he never was the real chief, but claims, and no doubt truly, that "he could not help himself, because the game was not put up that way, and he was always in need of his official salary." The dailies are pretending to give an unbiased history of Crowley's Administration. It is all hosh. They dare not do it. It will be written with something like accuracy, at the end of the short period at which the venerable Captain is hilled to resign on a handsome pension he does not need.

Street Work And The Departments.

The Superintendent of Streets has not always, or often, been either a fool or a knave, but he has always been, before his term was far advanced, a fifth wheel in the coach of municipal improvements. He was in an office where reform had to come from without. It was a place that could not rise higher than its source. The Supervisors had use of it, the contractors were a political power whom it could not afford to displease, and certain privileged tax payers never failed to secure a pull that could not be ignored. Hence it came that the Department more often paved our streets with good intentions than with the material contracted and paid for. Any sort of a favor could be obtained for either love (politics) or money. There has always been corruption in the department, but we think, not nearly so much as has at times been suspected. There have been superintendents who could not be reached that way, and the indications are that such is the case at present. But, now as ever, there are ways of "getting at" the department. Things can be obtained that are called "favors," and doubtless the hangers on around the office are permitted to make "a piece" out of these numerous but unconsidered trifles. Indeed, we have witnessed signs that only in this way can the Department be moved to do even legitimate business. Its a way that has sprung up by which "the boys" who did not get places, are permitted to "earn salt." This practice applies to nearly every public office in the city. There are favored hummers around even the Courts, and "useful" ones, both with and without stars, are as plentiful around police quarters as the business will carry. It is not of these needy hangers on to the ragged edge of politics that we are referring when we say that things can be bought at even the street department counter. It is true that there remains one thing that cannot be bought without a known and recognized pull, and that thing is: CIVILITY. The best exceptions to this had rule may be found in the County Clerk's office, and on about two-thirds of the Superior Court Benches. So many of the other offices need taking to pieces, and their inner works exhibited to a people as yet comparatively uninformed, that its non-performance renders it obvious how little reliance can be placed upon "the New Journalism." "The slum sheet" was long since "downed" by one of the departments, and, when the sign is given, dare not call its soul its own.

A Disagreeable Man.

Judge Wallace is a disagreeable man to have on the Superior Court Bench, or at least it is more than probable that the Supreme Judges think so. A head and shoulders above the Supreme Judges as a lawyer, he sets traps that tend to render their Honors ridiculous oftener than can be comfortable to them. The other day, in the case of one of the election officers, the Appellate Court reviewed the testimony and declared it insufficient to justify a verdict of guilty. The very next day, as it happened, their Honors handed down a decision in the Durrant case, in which they held that it was not their province to review the testimony, of which it was to be supposed that the jurors were the best judges. Their Brother Wallace indulged in one of those bright twinkles of the eye that are peculiar to him, and let fall a little satirical aside, ex cathedra, as it were, that made the whole of the Supreme Judges, the Court commissioners included, wince as if they were hurt. When judicial errors of that kind are liable to be made, it cannot be consoling to have Brother Wallace around. The California Reports are printed at great cost, and are supposed to be authoritative as to the sound law of the decisions to be found therein. But what is to be said of them when important points are decided both ways? No doubt the existing rush of business is responsible for much error that would not otherwise be committed. It is to be regretted that a constitutional amendment has not been submitted to the people adding another department to its highest Court. It is appalling to think of the many and grievous evils that are likely to flow from the continuance for four years longer of the existing status. If the judges are two years behind now, what will they be four years hence, and what will be the condition of things meanwhile.

A Growing Menace To Public Health.

The efforts of the Health Department of San Francisco to establish regulations for the prevention of the spread of consumption are worthy the support of every citizen. The immediate cause of consumption has for some time been known to be the presence in the lung tissues of the bacillus tuberculosis. The germ was discovered and definitely isolated by Robert Koch as long ago as 1881. Since that time the investigations of pathologists, of Health Boards in large cities and of bacteriological societies in all parts of the world has added many items of information. Among them, that the bacillus of consumption is one of the most active and fertile of disease germs, and of remarkable vitality; that it survives apart from the infected tissues; that it is eminently contagious, being transmissible from person to person, from man to animal and vice versa; and that the largest number of germs is to be found in the sputum of consumptive individuals. No clime or country is free from the disease, except perhaps small areas in the higher Alps, Andes, and Rocky Mountains, and on the elevated plateau of Central Mexico. No race is exempt from it, and all ages and conditions are easily susceptible. The disease has spread through carelessness or ignorance of its infective nature, until to-day it is the attributable cause of one-seventh of the world's deaths—vastly more than can be credited to any other single cause. Its spread by the sputum is caused largely by expectoration in public places, on floors, sidewalks, and in street-cars. When the sputum has dried and become ground to a fine dust, it easily floats in the air, carrying the germs of disease to the healthy lung tissues of those who inhale it. While easily communicable, it is also distinctly preventable, but prevention requires careful regulations enforced by intelligent, popular appreciation. It requires not alone the control of the tuberculous individual, but the co-operation of the healthy who are continually exposed. The disease is rapidly increasing in San Francisco, and the Health Department are alive to the necessity of action, as is shown by the anti-expectoration ordinance passed by the Supervisors, and which should be vigorously enforced. This is in line with what has already been accomplished in many large cities. As yet, no specific, germicidal curative for tuberculosis has been discovered, although several agents are being discussed, but the ounce of prevention is ready to the public hand, and can be applied with good effect if the people appreciate the necessity, and support wise regulations to that end.

The Coming Endeavorers. The coming convention of Christian Endeavorers from all over the United States is likely to prove a notable event. Earnest minded men and women, intent upon the spiritual good of mankind, are coming in their thousands, and will merit all the hospitality that can be shown them. They will see our State at the best time of year and should be shown as much of it as possible. They will, among other things, make admirable immigration agents. They will do much to direct, enliven, and enlarge the future of Christian endeavor on this Coast. It cannot fail to be of incalculable good to come into close touch with the really spiritually minded folks from the best portions of our great Christian country. The missionary work among our Chinese has always had a strange sort of fascination for the Eastern churches, and they mainly support it. It is to be hoped that whilst here they will truly, and at some pains, inform themselves of what that work truly is, both outwardly and inwardly. If after due enquiry they should reach the conclusion that it is an exceptional work into which young girls and women ought not to be intruded, they will do wisely and well, and keep step with the best thought upon the subject on this Coast. In short, they will have it in their power to put an end to an evil that otherwise is bound to lead to an open scandal. In the enlightenment of the Christian work generally there is a fine field for endeavor on the part of the earnest Endeavorers who are soon to visit us.

Cecil Rhodes Before His Accusers. Cecil Rhodes of South Africa is being accused as Warren Hastings was, and for much the same cause. A Parliamentary commission is enquiring as to the why and the wherefore of the Jameson raid into the Transvaal. Rhodes was administering the far off Matabele land at the time, and was not near the scene of action when Jameson planned his mad but brave exploit. Rhodes says the whole thing was premature and rash, but does not hesitate to say that he favored the cause of the Uitlanders, and would have aided Jameson had he been at the scene of action. He says that a people who constitute two thirds of the population, and pay nineteen-twentieths of the revenue, are not to be denied necessary legislation, mining and water rights, educational facilities, railroads, etc., etc. They have the right to that representation that naturally follows taxation, and avows that the Africanders mean to have a voice in the Government, which, he says, will benefit nobody so much as the Boers themselves. If that meant treason, he declared they might make the most of it. However brave that talk may be, spoken where it was, it is likely to make no end of trouble for the British Government, who were bound to protect the Boers. Jameson and his brave party have been tried and punished, and England is about to make a money indemnity for the damage that was done. Cecil Rhodes was far away from the conflict, but did not advise or participate in it. He is therefore free of personal responsibility for overt acts, but the outspoken statement of his future course is awkward in every way. He is a power all through Southern Africa that cannot be denied. They have the right of self-government in Cape Colony and will undoubtedly make Rhodes Prime Minister again at an early day. He boasts that "so far from his career being over, it had hardly yet begun." He declares, in open speech, that all South Africa should be a Republic of States, and says he shall work to that end. What will the Transvaal say and do under the circumstances. She has an independent constitution guaranteed to her by Great Britain. Clearly England cannot permit her subjects in Cape Colony to filibuster over into the Transvaal. Mr. Cecil Rhodes is not a good man to have around Parliament just how.

A Kick Against The Tariff. Some very ardent Protectionists are making a sturdy kick against parts of the proposed tariff. The New England cloth manufacturers are against the duties on fine wool to a man. The leather men declare that a duty on raw hides would ruin the hoot trade. The apparently strongest kick, however, is that which comes from the retail traders of New York and Chicago, who strongly object to "the personal effects" of American travelers returning from Europe being admitted duty free. Of course everybody knows that these Americans return with many trunks full of "personal effects" manufactured by the pauper labor of Europe. They are generally high priced goods and are brought in by a class well able to bear its fair burden of taxation. There is no consistency in a tariff law which compels those remaining at home to pay tariff prices on all merchandise they buy, and permits those who are able to go abroad to load up with a two or three years supply of clothing, gloves, silks, boots and the like, which they are graciously permitted to enter free of tariff charges. There should be no favoritism shown to the already favored army of annual or bi-annual excursionists to Europe. They should pay taxes on everything they did not take with them, which could easily be made to work. Strange to say, we should exempt diamonds, for the reason that they simply cannot be found. The enlarged mouth of Fitzsimmons would about this time hide enough diamonds to pay for the ship that carried him and them. It is idle to put a tax on anything that cannot be collected. The traders of Chicago and New York are quite right, and, organized, as they now are, they are a power. The end of tariff talk is not yet, although everybody is sick of it.

Railroads Beaten In Court. It has come to be quite the custom with the stump orators of the day to proclaim that it is useless to sue the railroads in Court, because they always win. To the extent to which that is true, the fault lies with those who bring suits that there is nothing in but humbug. When any real breach of the law is charged against a railroad, it loses as often as other litigants. The other day two officers of the Texas and Pacific railroad at New Orleans were convicted of unjust discrimination in favor of a particular cotton firm. They were fined $4,000 and costs each, by the United States Court. This is a very proper and most important decision, the first of its kind under an amended section of the interstate commerce law, prohibiting the granting of rebates and other favors to particular shippers. Railroads are the common carriers of the country, and must deal with all alike, or they will enrich many men at the cost of others. That is a most desirable exhibition of the strength of the law which imposes heavy fines on the wrong doers; railroad officers though they be.

ART JOTTINGS.

THE ninth semi-annual exhibition of the Sketch Club opened on Tuesday, and closes this evening. The Sketch Club is a prosperous institution. It is also harmonious, though its membership, now forty-one, is confined to the gentler sex. The ladies are held closely together in the pleasant sisterhood of art, and assist one another on the narrow and thorny path to fame. The list of associate members is a large one, composing the names of a large proportion of those ladies and gentlemen who are identified with the art progress of this Coast.

The club rooms in the Pacific Mutual building are hung with the product of the six months' work—oils, water colors, pastels, and black and white. Among the former, "A Sunny Road," Jane Gallatin Powers, is an attractive little canvas, the color nice and warm, and the perspective well handled.

"On the Slope of Tamalpais," Marie Rey Sander, is a good out-of-door study, carefully painted, and with a characteristic fidelity to the locality. "San Bruno Marsh," Josephine Eckler; "An April Day," Nellie L. Treat, and "The Beach," Isabella Morrison Niles, are pleasing, and show fair ability. "The Bolinas Road," Marie Rey Sander, is a pretty bit of landscape, with a tender atmospheric effect, and the distance is well expressed. There is a rich, autumnal tone in the color, and a clever handling of the foliage.

Two portraits, one by L. McDonald Sleeth, and the other by Geneve Rixford Sargeant, have merit, as also a portrait by Caroline E. Rixford, and the study of a head by Bertha Henicke Taussig is gentle, clever, and full of promise. "Haycocks in June," Nellie L. Treat, "An Oak," Geneve Rixford Sargeant, and "Evening in Sausalito," Josephine Eckler, are carefully painted and meritorious studies.

Helen Hyde contributes one of the most ambitious pictures in the oil collection, "Gabrielle." It is a girl seated by an open window, through which the light falls upon her face and drapery. The handling is very good, and the color rich. The pose is easy and natural, but the face might be more comely.

"Mending the Old Coat," Molly Hutchinson Peixotto, is strong, and in drawing and color will compare favorably with the work of more famous and more experienced artists. "Some Onions," a still life piece by N. L. Murtha, is quite good, and suggestive of Carlsen, the master in that line of art. "Chinese Child," Jane R. McElroy, shows good taste in color.

There are in all thirty-three oils, and the prices are marked in the catalogue after each. They range from $7 to $150, the latter being the figure at which Miss Peixotto values "Mending the Old Coat." Some of the more conservative artists have not set the price to their pictures. A fair number have been sold already.

There are twenty-two water-colors on exhibition, embracing an extensive variety of subjects. "Spring," Pauline Dworzek, and "Spring," Anne Frances Briggs, give a poetic conception of the month of the birth of flowers. "Hollyhocks," Mathilde Hampe, is one of the most original and cleverly painted studies in the collection. There is a delicious bit of distance disclosed, and the handling of the light and shade on the right of the picture is very artistic. "A Street in Chinatown," by the same artist, is not so pleasing. "A Muddy Road," Anne Frances Briggs, has some excellent points. It is good in tone, and the wintry air, illustrated by the withered poplars in the middle distance, and the cloud-flecked sky, with the purple haze beneath, show a close study of nature, and careful painting. Miss Stella Austin exhibits some good work in this department. Two pictures of violets, and "Baby Blue Eyes" are capital, with a nice attention to detail and harmony in color. "Chrysanthemums," Mathilde Eggers Hampe, is quite an ambitious, and certainly a well executed picture of those fashionable flowers, odorless, passionless things that they are, and always suggestive of a rag baby. But Miss Hampe has brought out all their good points. "A Field of Mustard," Pauline Dworzek, and a "Quiet Spot," by the same, are good. Lilian Veseria contributes "Moonlight" and the "Edge of the Marsh." Both, especially the latter, possess merit, which may be said of "A Willow Pond," a good study in bright greens, with a bit of mirror-like water.

There are thirteen pastels, four of which are contributed by Miss Helen Hyde. The "One-legged Dancers," of the latter, is well handled. "A Gray Day," Sylvia Rey, "Castle Crags," Marie Rey Sander, "Ethel," Blanche Letcher, and "Evening," N. L. Treat, are worthy of mention.

Miss Grace Wetherell almost monopolizes the black and white, showing six of the sixteen hung on the walls of this department. "Puck on Asparagus," by Albertine Randall Wheelan, is a clever little conceit, and the study of an aged Nun, by the same artist, is decidedly good.

The officers of the Sketch Club are: President, Josephine M. Hyde; Vice-President, L. Macdonald Sleeth; Treasurer, Helen Hyde; Secretary, Anne Frances Briggs; Directors, Anne Frances Briggs, Nellie Stearns Goodloe, Marie Rey Sander, L. Macdonald Sleeth, Nellie L. Treat, Josephine M. Hyde, Nellie L. Murtha, Helen Hyde, and Caroline L. Cook.

"PICTURESQUE San Francisco" gives place this week to a double-plate group of a number of the Sons of the American Revolution, all of them well known in this city and prominent in social or business circles. The picture is exceptionally clear, and is an interesting supplement to the NEWS LETTER's article upon that organization.

The Rio Grande Western Railway and connections are offering low rates and superior accommodations to all points East. Before purchasing tickets, call at 14 Montgomery street.

THE performance of William Tell, at the California Monday night, was not the pleasantest thing in the world that might have happened me. During the day I had been looking over the score—re-acquainting myself with the boiling teapot tempests of recitative, the cumbersome dialogue, the oratorical bursts of pompous melody, the tenor's dizzy top-notes, the fraternal old overture. What an overture! It had lived for near seventy years, it would live longer—and with all that length of verbose opera wagging behind it. What a beautiful thing! How complete, compact! What a monument of melody—I thought to myself—if some one had cut off the tail! Altogether I was in just the mood for reflection. Given half a chance, I felt cheerfully competent to settle the relative unworth of operas of the diddle-dee and um-pa schools in a single column. Ten shakes of the leader's baton, and my mood fled. Poor, pre-Verdian Rossini was clean forgot. His hug-a-boo recitatives did not frighten the oldest infant in the house. They were turned to wild comedic extravagance. The feetful rushes of rythm were so tangled and lamed in the giving forth that the youngest critic forgot to sneer superiorly. And the overture—after waiting an act that everybody might be there to hear it—came out drivelling, senile, bald, shorn of all its might and meaning and tone. Every musician in the band had a different system of tempo, nuance and pitch to play it with. Nicosias heat the air wildly for a while; then he dozed while his men waged civil war in the allegro.

So my good schemes came to naught. Rossini's case is postponed.

I understand that early in the last act—which I did not wait to witness—Mons. Charley, the sphinx-like impresario, removed his hat for the first time during the engagement, smote himself on the hair, said "William t'ell!" and ordered the curtain down. Down it came in the middle of the act. William and his how-arrow are still in the hands of the enemy.

God bless the enemy!

If there were any scraps of honor to be got from this night's awful work, Berthet—who sang Mathilde—carried them off on the tip of her fleet, hirdie voice. Albers was completely out of condition. He sang Tell with a strain in every note, and his acting was dull and banal. Somebody told me that Prevost, too, was on the off list, and that he could turn only half a head of steam into Arnold's music. It was enough. He hlistered my ears, the noisy ruffian.

I have seen a great many had opera productions in San Francisco, but never such a sensational, go-as-you-please scramble as this one of William Tell. From the orchestra in front to the choruses in back, and in all that lay between, it was unfit for publication. A deaf mute could have discovered that there was something unfragrant in Switzerland—it was in the air. Out of curiosity I read the reviews written by my colleagues for Tuesday's newspapers. In only two instances was I disappointed. All the others were unqualified puffs.

Otis Skinner and his own play, A Soldier of Fortune, did not seem to have so much luck with the gentlemen of the press. I went to the Baldwin Tuesday night, and for the life of me I can not see why this particular play should be slated by these particular critics, whose policy seems to be this: praise everything that is strong enough to reach the town, and some day we will strike a masterpiece in disguise. A Soldier of Fortune is not the masterpiece. But that is not the question—it might have been. My colleagues acted very imprudently.

Like a handmaster's opera, Skinner's drama seems to have a little of all the good old tunes in it. I think he might have named it The Star-Actors' Dream with a more considerable patness than the present title shows—but that is no particular business of ours. A Soldier of Fortune is a good title; it has a warm, rich, romantic ring, and in several ways the play lives up to it. It is not fair to call a man a plagiarist when he takes openly and avowedly, as Skinner does. Skinner wanted Lucretia Borgia for his play, and he took her and he programmed her in her full name. She brings circumstance and conviction to the otherwise trite poison bottle. He wanted a hero, a ready, romantic hero, a daring, devilish fire-eater, and he took D'Artagnan, transposed him to the Borgia period in Italy, and gave him the lyrical Latin name of Fabian Torelli. Then he drew forth an imperious maiden who has hut to be insulted and Fabian does the rest in noblest s'death-villain style. Any author will tell you that history covers a multitude of play-maker's sins. Skinner very tactfully makes the imperious Laura a ward of old Niccolo Macchiavellio's—of course you may not believe that Macchiavellio ever had such a beautiful, statuesque ward, but then if you don't believe it you have no imagination and you do not belong at the plush-mounted, dagger-studded, romantic drama. Add to these I have mentioned a trusty soldier to companion the hero, Caesar Borgia, for high lord villain, Daubigny to assist him, Daubigny's wife, to love the hero with an unrequited passion and wear man's clothes for his sake, and be made love to in a perfectly shameless manner, while she is in doublet and hose, by warm, poisonous Lucretia, and finally die in the last act saving the hero's life that he may be spared to the beautiful, Imperious One. Then put in the Cardinal of Narbonne in the act of being poisoned, and season with sundry sworded gentlemen of rival factions full of "s'hloods!" and "what hos!" stew the whole violently, and you will see how Otis Skinner made romantic drama that is the real article. It is the easiest thing imaginable after you see Skinner's work. I forgot to detail the plot. But it does not matter much; attend closely to the plush and the swords and the people, and the plot will take care of itself.

As I have intimated before, it takes a vigorous imagination to receive the modern idea of the romantic drama in the proper spirit. You must not look for reality of any kind; you must not expect character building—you must reckon fever the equivalent of dramatic power, and find the finesse in the costumes. Skinner's play will ask you to appreciate dispatch. It has a wonderful move ou, so to say. No critic can say that it lacks action. In ten times my allotted space I could not tell you one-tenth of what takes place during those four momentous acts. And Fabian Torelli, you may be sure, is in the thick of the hest of it; for Skinner plays Torelli, and there is absolutely no limit to Skinner's self-sufficiency in the romantic drama.

I do not know whether I like Otis Skinner hetter as an author or actor. By comparison with Clyde Fitch of last week he is an author not to be sneezed at; by comparison with himself as His Grace de Grammont he is a most live and re-vitalized actor. In either capacity he entertained me Tuesday night. But I cannot imagine why any actor so young and ambitious as Mr. Skinner is, should hurden himself with such mannerisms as an abject cringeing of the shoulders when he would appear to be most intense, an unchristian working of the eyebrows when he would seem most passionate, and a fabulous expulsion of breath when he would retain his audience's respect for his stage sufferings. These are the things that stamp out the young actor's anonymity; we get to know him too intimately, and he loses the chance of some day surprising us into helleving him a first-rate actor. What I cared for particularly in Skinner's acting of Fabian Torelli was the mettle, virility, and spontaneity which were noticeable in his less theatrical moments. And these fresh qualities were apparent only when the actorisms I have mentioned, and several others not so important, were not.

The company was at much hetter advantage all round in A Soldier of Fortune. Maud Durhin would have brought a pretty perfection out of the part of Blanche Daubigny if she had not voiced her serious lines in what, for lack of a truer expression, I must call a whine.

Otis Skinner broke away from a great many Hamlet traditions Saturday night at the Baldwin. For instance, in the speech before the curtain he neither grovelled toadily to the audience nor apologized for himself. He said quite sincerely and ingenuously that the audience always played the bigger part of Hamlet, and he congratulated this particular audience on its success. The people were very enthusiastic throughout the play, and certainly such demonstration of sympathy and approval could not be without good effect on the actor. In fact, Skinner's Hamlet charmed me most by its special qualities of enthusiasm, which, though they often ran away with him and left me in rather ambiguous understanding of just what manner of madman he construed Hamlet to be, at other times gave a fine nervous grip and bold youthfulness to the character that were undeniably attractive. Beyond its youth, Skinner's Hamlet is unlike others that I have seen in that it is at its worst in the passages which are most famous for bringing out good acting, and at its best in the passages that are not celebrated for any marked feats of virtuosity. In the soliloquies Skinner was theatrical and unimpressive; in the direct action of the play, in the ensembles I may say, he was perhaps equally as theatrical, but there was a genuine burn under it all—the friction that comes from line against line and action for action. It is a very difficult thing to read through a soliloquy on the stage and not detract from whatever illusion the play may have built up for the auditor by thrusting upon him the personality of the player. To do this sort of thing perfectly, I should think, must be almost as difficult as to give a satisfying monologue in vaudeville. I have seen not one satisfying monologist and but few capable soliloquists. I admire the youth, color, and velocity that have so many timely moments in Skinner's Hamlet, and I hope that he will grow to be more successful in maintaining apart the super-sensationalism of the modern romantic play of costumes and valor and the intellectual excitement of a play of brains. Hero worship is a bad thing to practice on one's self in Hamlet.

ASHTON STEVENS.

Monday night will find four new acts on the Orpheum stage: the Merilles Sisters, who are modestly billed "Europe's premiere singing and dancing artistes;" Harris and Walters, eccentric comedians; Kronemann Brothers, comedic acrobats, and Evans and Vidocq, jocular musicians. Delmore and Lee, who have made a big hit in their revolving ladder act, will be retained, together with several other favorites.

Otis Skinner will present the double bill of The Merchant of Venice and Katherine and Petruchio at the Baldwin to-night. Monday and Saturday nights of next week will be given to Richard III.; Tuesday and Saturday matinee, The Lady of Lyons; Wednesday, a repetition of to-night's double bill; Thursday, Romeo and Juliet. On Friday night Skinner will give another performance of Hamlet.

Georgia Cayvan comes to the Columbia Monday night a full-fledged star in Buchanan's pastoral drama, Squire Kate. The Eastern critics have been more than kind to Miss Cayvan and her company in the revival of the old Lyceum company's success. During the second week she will give us Mary Pennington, Spinster, a feminine problem that caused some discussion in New York.

Only two more nights of French opera at the California. To-night a big bill, embracing the second act of L'Africaine, third act of La Favorita, La Navarraise, the ballet scene from Pastor, and the William Tell overture and the Carabinieri Rusticana intermezzo. Sunday night, La Traviata at popular prices.

The Tivoli company will sing romantic Irish opera next week—Benedict's The Lily of Killarney, founded on Boucicault's celebrated play, The Colleen Bawn. After the Easter holidays the Tivoli promises a number of breezy novelties, beginning with Miss Frisco, a genial satire on the town.

The sixth and last of the present season of symphony concerts is postponed a week, the regular day falling on Holy Thursday.

Gertrude Auld announces a song recital for Friday night week at Golden Gate Hall.

SONS OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION.

IN this age, in which the absorbing necessities of commercial existence are pressing out and driving from the general heart that respect and reverence for the early struggles for American independence, and the heroes whose blood cemented the original thirteen States, due them, it is particularly gratifying to emphasize the fact that the State of California more than twenty years ago gave birth to an organization whose purpose and intent contemplated the perpetuity of that loyalty to country and inspiring appreciation of those brave spirits whose sacrifices and unwavering courage made possible a republic of more than seventy millions of freemen. It is an honor that cannot be too widely known, that the order of the "Sons of Revolutionary Sires"—now the "Sons of the American Revolution"—was organized in this city on the 22d day of October, 1876, and that after a wavering and doubtful existence, during which time a few tenacious and patriotic citizens struggled against almost overwhelming adversities, the order has grown until its branches are found in every State in the American union, its members are numbered by the thousands, and its influence, making for better citizenship and broader patriotism, rapidly extending throughout the nation. It has not yet taken root in foreign soil—save only the Sandwich Islands—but there can be no doubt that in time under every flag, where are found the descendants of those who struggled for the freedom of the country, its seeds will take root and its existence be made perpetual.

It would be impossible in fewer words than are found in Article II of the Constitution of the National Society to set out the scope of the organization:

"The objects of this society shall be to perpetuate the memory of the men who by their services or sacrifices during the war of the American Revolution, achieved the independence of the American people; to unite and promote fellowship among their descendants; to inspire them and the community at large with a more profound reverence for the principles of the Government founded by our forefathers; to encourage historical research in relation to the American Revolution; to acquire and preserve the records of the individual services of the patriots of the war, as well as documents, relics, and landmarks; to mark the scenes of the Revolution by appropriate memorials; to celebrate the anniversaries of the prominent events of the war; to foster true patriotism; to maintain and extend the institutions of American freedom, and to carry out the purposes expressed in the Preamble to the Constitution of our country and the injunctions of Washington in his farewell address to the American people."

"Article III provides that any man shall be eligible to membership in this society who, being of the age of twenty-one years or over, and a citizen of good repute in the community, is the lineal descendant of an ancestor who was at all times unfailing in his loyalty to and rendered actual service in the cause of American independence, either as an officer, soldier, seaman, marine, militiaman, or minute man, in the armed forces of Continental Congress, or of any one of the several colonies or States; or as a signer of the Declaration of Independence; or as a member of a committee of safety or correspondence, or as a member of any Continental, Provincial or Colonial Congress, or Legislature; was a civil officer, either of one of the colonies, States, or of the National Government; or as a recognized patriot who performed actual service by overt acts of resistance to the authority of Great Britain."

Thus comprehensively are set out the aims and objects of the Order of the Sons of the American Revolution. They are made for all time, and will meet the requirements of a century hence, when the Order shall have gained a membership of hundreds of thousands, and assumed an importance and influence in the councils and accomplishments of the nation second to none other.

The first notice which suggested the formation of such an organization was written by a woman, which appeared in the Alta California of June 26, 1876. In that article it was suggested that the then approaching city centennial celebration should in its procession have a representative from every State in the union who should be the son or daughter or grandchild of one of the Revolutionary heroes. The idea was eagerly seized, and on the 27th day of that month Dr. La Fayette Cogswell issued an invitation to all those who were interested in the matter to assemble at his office. The meeting resulted in subsequently meeting at the Palace Hotel on the morning of July 4, 1876, where there met fifty descendants of Revolutionary sires, who marched in San Francisco's procession.

Organization was further advanced on the evening of July 11, 1876, at Dashaway Hall, at which time a committee was chosen to prepare a constitution and by-laws, which were accepted at the Palace Hotel on the evening of August 2d; and the "Sons of Revolutionary Sires" became an accomplished fact.

From the Sons of the American Revolution have grown up kindred Orders throughout the country. Originally the organization was known as "Sons of Revolutionary Sires," and it was under this signature that the original bulletins and all other literature was sent throughout the United States. The record of the meetings of this parent society were faithfully kept, and their proceedings were regularly sent to prominent people in the East, to public libraries and historical societies—in fact, wherever it was thought the seed might fall upon fruitful soil. Provision for co-operative societies had been wisely provided for in the original organization under the head of "co-equal branches." In 1883 a society of the "Sons of the American Revolution," was formed in New York city. Again, in 1889, in view of the approaching centennial anniversary of the inauguration of President Washington, a meeting was called in New York city for the purpose of further arousing interest in the heroes of the glorious past, and the lasting perpetuation of their patriotic deeds. At that meeting, which took place on April 30, 1889, and to which the California Sons and other societies had been invited to send delegates, the national organization became an accomplished fact. The name "Sons of Revolutionary Sires" disappeared, and in its place appeared the "Sons of the American Revolution"—a more fitting and comprehensive title.

Since that time the organization has grown rapidly. In this State there are more than two hundred members, and an active interest is taken in the Order. It may be said to be the parent of all the similar societies—the honored pioneer whose children are actuated by the same patriotic impulses and inspired by a similar love of country and veneration of those who made American achievements what they have been in the past and what they promise in the future.

The Presidents of the California society down to the present time have been: Dr. Peter Wilkins Raudall, Gen. Albert M. Winn, Hon. Caleb T. Fay, Captain Augustus C. Taylor, Loring Pickering (all of whom are dead), Colonel A. S. Hubbard (also an Honorary President General of the National Society), Colonel Edward Hunter, U. S. A., Judge E. W. McKinstry, C. J. King, and Sydney M. Smith, the present incumbent.

"Wisdom, humility and dignity are woman's fairest attributes —Unidentified Fossil.

The San Francisco girl may not be wise,
If wisdom be the knowledge conned from books,
But there is witchery within her eyes,
And in her laugh one hears the rippling brooks
Go tinkling on their way through sunny nooks.
So much has nature doue for her in looks,
In voice and gesture and in supple grace,
That gazing in her bright, uplifted face
One is not prone to monrn much, I surmise,
If she be not Minerva-browed and wise.

The San Francisco girl may not be staid;
O'er much of primness is beyond her ken.
Her merry glance rests on you unafraid;
Perhaps she flirts a little now and then—
Such is the dreadful influence of men.
I am not here to chide her with my pen.
Nor wise, nor meek nor staid. And yet were she
The perfect incarnation of all three,
Methinks a wallflower's fate were hers, poor maid.
Who would adore her, were she prim and staid?

MOTHERS, be sure and use "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup" for your children while teething.

IN spite of the enforced seclusion of many society buds, the surplus who are not Lent keepers have been pretty busy the past week with theatre parties, card ditto, and suppers ad lib. The Chutes has grown in favor with those who find a Baldwin theatre party or the French opera quite an item in finance. Mrs. O'Neil Reiss has taken several parties out there, and now that pale Luna is trying to shine, no doubt the Park will be a favorite place for riding parties.

The brides to be—all pretty girls—are vieing with each other in the little details which give tone and finish to a brilliant wedding. The Burton and Cohen affairs will be strictly military, therefore very showy in gilt buttons, gold lace, etc; and the maids chosen by each bride are culled from the loveliest buds of the swim. Miss Emma Butler will be maid-of-honor to Lieutenant Bent's future bride, and Miss Leila Burton will fill that role for her sister. The weddings take place within a day of each other, and while one will be a church ceremonial, the other will be solemnized at home.

Why does not some enterprising social light undertake to coach the swim in its epistolary efforts. Surely many of the dear creatures—male and female—require more than a hint as to polite écriture. The stationery stores do much to cultivate a taste for the beautiful and artistic in paper, but it is what goes on the paper that, as Hamlet says, is "the rub." These reflections are the result of frequent experiences told of, and met with, in our best society.

The appendicitis fad seems to be the latest in fashionable circles; every young person who has a stomach-ache is "operated" upon at once, as the physicians say the taking away of the useless little affair is practically "nothing" at a tender age. The craze has broken out in the Eastern boarding schools, where all the girls are offering themselves as subjects for the surgeon's knife.

The Hotel Rafael grows in favor daily as a place for society's summer outing. Even Eastern visitors are making Major Warfield's admirably kept hostelry their selection for an abiding place for the spring and summer months. The residents of Koss Valley are hoping that a large fête champêtre may be given by one of the householders in the merry month of May.

Rumor is again insistent upon the fact that a young lady of Southern States stock, and the Lieutenant who abandoned the study of war tactics for legal maxims, are subjects for congratulations by their friends. They are both of the same studious tastes, and society is unanimous in declaring it would be a charming match.

What a charming ante-nuptial trip a mother can manage for her son is evidenced by the Southern passéar being enjoyed together by three prominent society people—mother son, and fiancée.

"What a Godsend Wiltsee has been to the swim!" the women say. This popular beau can always be depended upon for flowers, theatre tickets, and lovely little suppers—so no wonder he is always a welcome guest.

Every one is pleased to see Hon. Frank McCoppin able to be out among his friends again after his long illness. Mrs. McCoppin is slowly recovering.

Gossip credits Mrs. J. D. Fry with the amiable intention of giving a very elaborate entertainment shortly after Easter.

The plaint of our most stylish stores is that so many of the swagger set go to Gotham for their wardrobe as the seasons change, and from there to Paris. As they feelingly observe, "How can one expect business to be better with all our rich folks going away to spend their money?"

To judge from the various pretty devices adopted by the several givers of social entertainments lately, it would seem that the chief object to be attained by the hostess is an opportunity to bestow a dainty gift as a "prize" to the luckiest of her guests.

"In Bamboo Lands," by Katharine Schuyler Baxter. Illustrated. New York. The Merriam Company, 67 Fifth Avenue.

We were for some time rather doubtful as to the nationality of Mrs. Baxter, but now feel satisfied that, despite the fact that she started from a Canadian city on her trip to Japan, the United States is the land of her birth. On page 253, in commenting on the topsy-turviness of Japanese customs, she writes: "Wine is used before dinner," without saying for what purpose it is used. Cooks "use" champagne to boil ham in, and the Romans under the Empire "used" copious draughts of wine as an emetic, to make room for the heavy repast to follow. Do the Japanese employ it in cooking, to induce nausea, or to wash their hands? The handsome volume before us gives an account of the author's travels in the land of the Mikado, and of her observations of the manners, customs, and habits of the Japanese. It is illustrated with many excellent reproductions of photographs, and is further supplied with a glossary of Japanese words and a map—the last always a desirable adjunct to a book of travel. The volume opens with a short description of the journey from Montreal to Vancouver, which is called "a young ambitious city, with a fine harbor, a beautiful park, and real estate agents enough to buy and sell every foot of land on the Coast." On board the Empress of India she was fortunate enough to become friendly with a married lady, who turned out to be the eldest daughter of Sir Harry Parkes, who was Britain's able representative in the Far East for forty-three years, and at the time of his death was British Minister at the Court of Peking. This lady's acquaintance proved most valuable, rendering all letters of introduction superfluous, and freely opening to Mrs. Baxter everything worth seeing. She describes well what she saw, but has done her work too conscientiously: she has the idea, commonly entertained by the inexperienced writer, that you must faithfully record all you see. Now, a lively narrative owes quite as much of its vivacity to what is suppressed as to what is expressed; it is in knowing what not to tell, and not telling it, that the good narrator excels. By this we do not mean to be understood as saying that Mrs. Baxter's book is not readable; merely that we think that she is too faithful and minute a recorder. The book is a good epitome of the things, places, and people that a visitor to Japan is most likely to see and to want to learn something about. Much of the scenery of Japan is very beautiful, while the temples are perfectly bewildering in number, variety, and richness of decoration. Indeed, one cannot help suspecting from Mrs. Baxter's book that, if one had the good fortune to visit the Britain of the East, one would be tempted, after carefully examining a thousand shrines or so, to take the rest for granted. There are some notes on the manufacture of pottery, cloisonné, and lacquer ware, that will be interesting to people who are interested in things of that sort, and a good description by Major-General Palmer of cormorant fishing has been rescued from the columns of the London Times. The press-work and paper of the volume are very good, and the photographs excellent.

"An Ambitious Slave," by Reginald Rowland. Buffalo. Published by the Peter Paul Book Company. 1897.

The publishers' note accompanying this little paper-covered tome informs us with needless particularity that the writer's mother's name before she married the writer's father was Oakman, that Mrs. Rowland (née Oakman) lived in Atlanta, that the youthful Reginald at the age of twenty-one left the said Atlanta, and went to reside in Norfolk, Va., that he has been an employee of the Richmond & Dansville railroad, etc., etc. We are further told that the principal character in the story was "taken from real life," and that some of the incidents are founded on real facts, and are presented from "an unbiased standpoint." All of which is either unimportant or erroneous. The author it not yet, at any rate, of sufficient note for the precise details of his early life or present employment to be of interest, nor is the value of the tale he tells enhanced by the fact that his hero lived somewhere and somewhen. A work of fiction is an offspring of the imagination, not a narrative of facts: if a man's talent lies in the direction of narration of actual events, let him write historical sketches. The characters of a tale are good or bad according as they interest us or not: you cannot make wooden puppets live for the reader by telling him that the people from whom they are "taken" did once move and have a being. The reader may reply: "Did they? Well, they are dead enough now." The story is that of a negro slave whose freedom is purchased by some Bostonians, and who becomes a person of importance among his fellow-negroes. The principal event is the attempt of the liberated slave to warn President Lincoln of the intention to assassinate him at Ford's Theatre, Washington. There is really no story, and no plot: but there are some queer phrases, as, for instance, "An unlimited degree of impunity;" and "the counters were strewn with . . . all manner of old jewelry and bric-a-brac too numerous to mention." The little hook does not contain any strong evidence of the existence of the story-telling gift in its writer, and without that gift all tales are naught.

In an article in the March issue of McClure's Magazine, Mr. W. D. Howells, while speaking in terms of the highest admiration of Rudyard Kipling, whom he calls "The Laureate of the larger England," and strangely claims as in some sort an American, also takes occasion (after a nasty fashion that he has) to say that the name of England "awakens only a cold disgust" in Americans. We cannot help thinking that Mr. Howells is expressing his own feeling only, and not that of the great body of his fellow-countrymen. For Mr. Howells' individual opinion on such a matter we do not care a snap of the fingers, and we do not believe that his view is the one entertained by Americans generally. It would be passing strange if disgust were all that England spells to Americans, when we reflect that upon all that is greatest and best in the United States is writ in large characters the legend, "Made in England." Is it possible that Americans feel nothing but "disgust" for that little isle set in the silver seas, whence sprang their forefathers, their language, law, literature, and most of their religions? Does an American feel only "disgust" as he walks over London Bridge, gazes at the Tower, stands in Poets' Corner in Westminster Abbey, listens to a debate in that House of Commons to which he owes his own liberty, or stands under the bust of Shakespeare in Stratford-on-Avon church? We think better of human nature in general, and of American nature in particular, than Mr. Howells' utterances (if we did not excuse them as the result of unfortunate early environment) might perhaps permit us to think.

The Hon. George N. Curzon, M. P., Permanent Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs, whose marriage to Miss Leiter of Chicago reverberated over the whole North American continent, and awoke echoes in distant Japan and India, was one of Dr. Jewett's young men at Balliol College, Oxford, where he was familiarly known as

"George Nathaniel Curzon
A most superior purzon."

It is said that he has lately developed a long-windedness and verbosity that are infinitely tedious to the House of Commons, which is not at all patient of men ambitious to practice oratory at the expense of their hearers.

Massey's Magazine (Toronto, Canada), for March, opens with an account of Edouard Detaille, the famous French painter, whose spirited pictures of military life are so well known. Dr. William Clark continues his series of articles on Parkman in Canada, and W. L. Marschamp contributes a well-illustrated article on the 13th (or Winnipeg) Field Battery of Canadian Artillery. Stories, editorial comments, and verse, round out the issue.

When dizzy or drowsy take BEECHAM'S PILLS.

DEAR EDITH: Reds, green, black, and white are to be the prevailing colors this season, and particularly the latter two colors are marked for greater popularity than ever before for spring and summer. The variety of black and white silks is probably equal to all the other designs put together. The black and white furore appeals to the middle-aged woman, for it may be youthful though elegant and yet suited to her forty or forty-five years. A complete novelty, as far as the writer's knowledge goes, is a pinhead check moire. Imagine this in black and gray white or in black, white and lavender. It admits of many artistic effects and is a joy to the proficient dressmaker, who studies materials as a painter does his canvas and pigments. A costume may be dressy according to the proportion of white, and the designs range all the way from those in white sprigged with black to those in black sprigged with only a little white. Black and white petticoats are numerous and exceedingly popular.

Petticoats, by the way, deserve a word, for they are anything but prosaic. The new styles in white muslin embroidery trimmed are out, selling from $3 50 to $5 and $6. Hamburg insertions and flounces are the rule here. The dressy petticoat is of black brocaded silk, flounced with lace and trimmed with ribbon the shade of flower. Black mohair, trimmed with a corded flounce or with silk ruffles, is a good petticoat for common wear. Moreen has its admirers. In selecting this fabric one should know there are several varieties, of which silk moreen is the best. The colors are gray, dull blue, black, brown and yellow.

Moire velour is the material par excellence for dressy toilettes and stem green is the stylish color. The costume that has possessed the feminine mind is made with a stem green moire velour skirt and a black velvet coat bodice. While the skirt is plain, if a skirt fitting so perfectly can be called plain, the bodice is most elaborate, with small revers faced with green silk and covered with Brussels lace. The full vest is an intricate arrangement of yellow and white lace frills. The black velvet coat, of course, offers a striking contrast to the shimmering, soft green skirt; but another almost equally pretty costume can be made of green moire, with the bodice of the same cut, with a plaited position back and a blouse front of yellow chiffon, trimmed with bands of ostrich feathers.

Sleeves of silk dresses are, in nearly every case, covered with chiffon or gauze, shirred from wrist to shoulder puff.

A quaint color scheme for an afternoon frock can be made in the following way: The silk is effective, with a white ground covered with green wall paper scrolls and black sprays, so that the green predominates. The skirt is made double, with the upper one accordion plaited and reaching just below the knee, when it is finished all around with a black lace flounce. A black lace bolero edged with a fine piece of lace, a black satin girdle and a fancy collarette of finely plaited blue silk, the stock and collarette being in one, suggest the piquancy of the bodice. There is a scheme of economy in these collarettes, combining stock, for, when removed, the dress may do service for evening wear, with its pretty, round throat.

Other very handsome gowns for afternoon and reception use in velvet and cream guipure are made thus: Bodice of the lace confined round the waist by a velvet belt fastened with a strass clasp. Short bolero of velvet with lacings in front. Collar and sleeves frilled with guipure. Plain skirt. Pale gray green cashmere cloth gown. The skirt has a row of black braiding at the foot. The smart little coat has a plain vest of the cloth closed at the side, and is confined to the figure by a wide belt of black satin, which passes through openings at each side. Princess dress of gray cloth or peau de soie, trimmed with velvet set on in Vandykes. At the top the front is cut in V shape over a chemisette of pink velvet, the same lining the high collar. Silk muslin bow. These are some of the many new styles that are handsome and nearly always becoming.

Mrs. M. J. Butler 131 POST STREET, San Francisco, Cal., U. S. A.

Old Tuolumne To the Front.

That section of the mother lode in the neighborhood of Sonora has proved so far the richest of any heretofore opened up along its entire line. At other points, of course, there are mines which have made a record, but they alone represent separate and distinct localities. Take the Utica, for instance. Outside of this particular mine and the extensions which constitute that group, no other property has yet been able to do much in the way of brag outside of the hackneyed bid for distinction so common in expert reports from the vicinity, which always locate the ground "within half a mile of the wealthy Utica," or on the same vein; anything, in fact, to claim relationship to the representative mine of the district. Of course, down Sonora way, the Rawhide has to do duty as sponsor for no end of locations, but at the same time there are some outside properties which furnish additional proof of the extraordinary prolific character of the "lode" in this vicinity. It may interest the people in London, who turned the Rawhide down at $150,000, to learn that after producing some millions in gold, the ledge at a depth of 1,100 feet, the point to which the shaft is now down, shows up thirty feet wide, and is of an exceedingly rich grade. They lost the best bargain on this occasion they are ever likely to get again. With the Rawhide they would have had something to fall back upon to offset the severe salting they have had in nearly everything they have touched in the past, not to speak of the similar reckoning which is bound to fall to their share in the future. The App and Jumper are next in line as representative properties of this section. Lately the Tarantula has begun to loom up with a strike of ore of a remarkably fine grade. Present appearances would seem to indicate that the new owners of this property have got a very valuable piece of ground.

The Alaskan Gold Bubble.

The season is now approaching when the steamship lines doing business with Alaska ports begin to dispense attractive literature, calling the attention of the public to vast deposits of gold which are alleged to exist in this distant and inhospitable region. The bait takes with a class of people ever ready to ensnare themselves in all kinds of trouble, and a large proportion of their scanty purses finds its way into the coffers of corporations which would as lief transport them to Satan's domain itself could any inducement be held out to turn travel thither. Steamship owners were enriched last year by the same ruthless game. A large number of unfortunates squandered their little savings to gain the bitter experience that Alaska gold fields are not poor men's diggings, and return broken down in spirits and health, and without a dollar. The authorities should take some steps, if possible, to protect such people from misadventure and the hardships entailed in chasing the dazzling, colored illusions so skillfully spread before them by the rapacious managers of transportation companies, whose acts are equivalent to wholesale murder. Experience in the past shows that where one man makes money in Alaskan gold mining, a hundred drift homeward in a state of pauperization or remain to perish of starvation.

Deep Mining on the Rand.

A doubt has been expressed for some time past of the existence of ore at any considerable depth in the South African mines. Some news has just been received in this city which will practically settle that question. A Johannesburg correspondent of Mr. E. A. Wiltze, the prominent mining engineer of this city, reports a strike south in the Robinson Deep property in that district, at a depth of 2,390 feet, and a superficial distance of 3,900 feet from the outcrop, the "deepest strike yet made." "The strike," he continues, "is important as proving the existence of the reef at depth, and removing all doubt as to the maintenance of value." An assurance of this kind should have a good effect in stimulating the mining market in London by a revival of interest in speculative shares of this description. This in turn will help out some California ventures which have been hanging fire woefully of late.

Mining Again Is Favored.

Not so many months ago a mining item was barred on most of the great daily papers of this city. The author of it was regarded with suspicion, if it was not openly intimated that a job of some kind was behind the story. Now it is altogether different, and the editorial columns of one and the other in turn give expression to the opinion that mining for gold is the future basis of the State's prosperity. They might go further, and say that bad it not been for the contempt showered upon the industry for years past, and the obstacles thrown in the way of developing our mineral resources, California would to-day be the most flourishing State in the Union. When the citizens of San Francisco can be persuaded to embark their money, now tied up in the savings banks, in legitimate mining work, the town will begin to take new life, and the more the press enlarges on the proposition the better it will be for every one concerned. A careful investigation in other branches of business does not develop much in augury of a bright future, if the truth were told.

What is a Known Mine?

The question, what is a "known mine?" has arisen in the Mirabel mine litigation, which involves the validity of a United States patent for land afterwards found to be mineral in character. Mr. A. H. Ricketts, the attorney for the plaintiff, shows in his brief that a "known mine" in the eyes of the law is an actual operated mine, susceptible of profitable working. That veins of cinnabar do not necessarily impress land covered by an agricultural patent with its character of mineral land. That a vein is not legally known to exist until it has been duly located, and that a mine is not properly so called until it is opened; before that it is but a "vein." Or, in other words, that the existence of unlocated out-croppings of a vein does not constitute a mine, nor prove that the land will ever be sufficiently valuable to be worked as a mine. That until ore is shown to exist within the "location," it is only a "prospect," and the mere existence of shafts and other workings on the vein is not sufficient evidence of a "mine" to exempt the land from agricultural entry and patent.

Comstock Shares More Active.

Prices firmed a little during the week on Pine street, creating a better feeling among the speculative fraternity. Business has been more active in all the leading stocks, and the only prayer is that it may last. The touter has not been in evidence, for a wonder, which probably accounts for the revival of confidence to a certain degree. That this feeling may continue to grow and extend to the outside masses is the prayer of all who are interested in seeing the business again restored to a basis of prosperity. A good many bear operators are wondering what struck them. Those who have not filled and taken their losses have been half scared to death. The scarcity of stocks with the brokers makes the situation precarious, should prices shoot up to a point which would bring heavy operators back to the street. A boom in any particular stock or line of stocks would undoubtedly attract buyers, with the inevitable result that the bear pen would be speedily vacated by its occupants, not a few of whom might be expected to take to the woods, never to return.

A Deadly Explosive Gas.

Acetylene gas is not held in much esteem in Great Britain; in fact, it has been branded as highly dangerous, owing to the number of serious accidents which have attended its use in different parts of the country. On the first of the current month, the new illuminant came under Government control in accordance with an order in council made under the 14th section of the Petroleum Act, 1871, promulgated in a circular issued from the Home Office. Accordingly, from the date mentioned, viz., April 1, 1897, it will be unlawful to keep carbide of calcium except in virtue of a license, to be obtained from the local authority, under the act mentioned. Any local authority to whom application may be made for license to keep carbide of calcium can, if it so desires, obtain on application to the Home Office, a memorandum showing the character of the risks to be guarded against, and containing suggestions as to the nature of the precautions likely to be most effectual for securing safety. We will probably come to something of the same sort in this country after the coroner has had to do with a few victims of the craze for new fads of the kind.

Down Crier

"Hear the Crier!" "What the devil art thou?"
"One that will play the devil, sir, with you."

ANOTHER blow has descended with stunning severity upon the lonely heads of such sighing spinsters as survive in San Francisco; and the tender heart of many a frisky young thing of fifty or sixty winters, whose pulses palpitated with the hope that '97 would in its mercy send a husband her way, is crushed by the announcement that a second shiplod of bachelors is about to sail to the South Seas and there wot the dusky, gambolsome native, whose petticoat is a fig-leaf, and who wears naught else to speak of but a pair of ear-rings and an engaging smile. The CRIER is sympathetic, though he is not suspected of possessing that Christian virtue, and advises these disheartened sisters not to despair, but get a move on, charter a brig, lay in a stock of cocoanut oil for their skins and some epidermis dye warranted not to fade, and haste to the tropics. By the time they arrive, they ought to be a rich café au lait tint. Fig leaves are cheap, so are smiles and nose rings—and there you are. Cheer up, girls. Bananas are ripe.

Why sadly mope at home and mourn,
And wish that you were never born?
Quick, hie you to the southern seas,
Where husbands are as thick as bees.
First, sell your duds at second-hand;
You will not need them in that land;
The sun, my dears, will keep you warm—
Indeed, your clothes would be bad forru.
A lifeleaf for a place like this
When emigrating brings you bliss!

IT having been decided by the medicos and public at large across the pond that the Czar and Emperor William are rapidly going crazy, and other distinguished personages who wear glittering crowns for a living are showing unmistakable symptoms of disintegration in the upper story, the idea of a Royal Freak Asylum is at once feasible and appropriate. By all means let a nice, sunny wing of the structure be set apart for a colony which might easily be spared this side o' the water. That hoary-headed crank, ex-Mayor Sutro, would look real picturesque if added, stuffed, to the collection. And there are others.

WITH the gay and gladsome announcement that the Sunday picnic season has opened, comes the usual list of casualties. Several women on the last holy Sabbath day had their ankles twisted from over-indulgence in dancng. Considering the fact that these picnics are such twisters of morals as well as ankles, it is unfortunate that an equal number of necks cannot undergo the twisting process. The chippy and its mate flock altogether too numerously as it is. 'Twere a benefit to San Francisco were there an open season—say the picnic season—for this species of game.

THE man who would expectorate
In public, must beware his fate.
No longer can he take the floor
Or pavement for a cuspidor.
The citizen who thus defiles
The sidewalks and the street-car aisles
From now henceforth, to jail must go.
So far, so good, I say. But oh
Great City fathers, I entreat
You'll take your eyes from off the street
And frame another ordinance
The public comfort to enhance—
A law to fit that worst of hores
And nuisances, the man who snores!

EMMA Griffiths rashly, but with great success, dosed herself with rat poison the other day because, according to her statement, her Jim, who had a mortgage on her youthful affections, "did not greet her with the same old smile." Take warning, lads, if you would not drive your sweethearts to suicidal despair. Cultivate the old smile for all it is worth. It won't work with the tailor and the landlady, I know, but it may keep your best girl out of the Morgue. Smile. It may save you costly floral emblems; and times are hard, lads, hard.

WHENCE has he fled, this Windsor Keefer?
Alas, would his career were hrier!
He hypnotized each willing dupe,
Then left him quaffing in the soup.
A clever ruse his, I opine,
To represent he owned a mine!
He floated shares of bogus stock,
And wound his victims like a clock—
So promptly did they come to time.
His nerve was something quite as blime.
Yet, stay. Perhaps it was, in truth,
A mine that Keefer worked, forsooth,
Before he vanished like a rocket—
The kind the miners call "a pocket."

THE ways of Providence are mysterious, but we admit they are sometimes exceeding wise. One Charles Kleuper, in a condition of presumed insanity (mortally drunk), recently committed a double murder. Being in jail in Stockton, he last Tuesday quietly hung himself. Thus in an act of sanity he demonstrated the recovery of his reason. He hung himself to escape the disgrace of being hung. So the scales of Divine Justice are evenly suspended, and the money of the people saved to be distributed among the politicians.

SOMEHOW a wrong impression got abroad this week that the Miller mixed up in fight by heroically trying to defend a woman was our own Joaquin. The inference was but natural, as the leonine Poet of the Sierras has ever been noted for gallantry. In truth, his fondness for the fair sex has led to many romantic entanglements in his tuneful career that would not exactly do for Sunday-school literature. Joaquin, however, was always safe from legal complications, being armed with a poet's license.

BENJAMIN F. Ames avers in court that his wife has been addicted to the unpleasant habit of scratching his face in the solemn watches of the night while he was endeavoring to sleep the sleep of the innocout and just. He also claims that she refuses point-blank to cook his meals. The first charge savors of cruelty, the CRIER admits, but the second is not so clearly proven. Many a man's life has been saved by his wife's refusal to cook his meals for him.

THE steeple hat that woman fair
Now dotes in placing on her hair,
And loves especially to wear
When sitting at the play,
Produces (so they say)
Such frightful mental irritation
That Lawyer Vogelsang's vexation
Will send him, says he, "to damnation."
Now this is news, I do declare!
Damnation, eh? I thought, I swear,
The lawyers were already there.

MR. Wm. J. Bryan last Tuesday told the United States Supreme Court what the law was, then stalked into the White House, like a living spectre, to make Mr. McKinley uncomfortable, and later congratulated Carter Harrison on being elected Democratic Mayor of Chicago. Trouble enough for one day, and Willie slept all night and dreamed he was President. And yet they say "dreams go by contraries," whatever that elegant sentence may mean.

MEDICOS Mizner's, Livingstone's, Tait's, and Rosenstiru's fees for attendance in a professional capacity upon the late James G. Fair prove how much more difficult it is to kill a rich man than a poor mau. Were the TOWN CRIER, for instance, to be brought low with a malady that required a consultation of doctors, the chances are that the learned gentlemen would attend to his case with such neatness and dispatch that he would not have time to say his prayers.

THE fact that Blanther was much handsomer dead than alive, according to pictorial evidence in the papers this week, ought to appeal somewhat to Durrant's well-known vanity. He might possibly be tempted to assist justice by becoming a cadaver, provided a written agreement between himself and the camera man were signed, to make him good-looking. Old Nick can safely be entrusted with the finishing touches.

GEOLOGIST Attwood's office was broken into by thieves the other night. They were probably after rocks.

THE OLD SOLDIER—FORT RUSSEL KNAPSACK.

THE soldier was old and his hair was white,
Where it fell away from his polished pate,
And bid the scar that a bullet's flight
Had left as reminder of red man's hate,
The soldier was old and his hair was white,
But it mattered not, for his beard was light,
And his clear gray eyes with youth shone bright,
Though a veteran soldier of high three score.

Deep-chested and broad, he's at home in the gym,
In the field or the post he's contented,
Whatever the grub, it satisfies him.
And he laughs at the ill-feelings vented.
He's a hero, that's what!—say what you will,
Revere him who wish for some fancied ill,
He's a soldier and a veteran still.

A veteran soldier of Uncle Sam—
Aged in the service—but how or where?
As straight as an arrow, or southern palm,
As lithe as a panther though not so spare—
Strong of limb and disciplined well,
A soldier of fortune—its ebb or swell
Find him unconcerned though it pass or dwell;
The fates have dealt lightly with him they adore.

EN TOUT CAS.—ANTHONY FOX, IN FALL MALL.

Accept, dear heart, this silken shade,
Proclaimed for equal service made
In sun and shower;
And may it prove companion meet,
Whether noon-splendors on thee beat
Or storm-clouds lower.

For both 'tis meant! And yet I deem
It augurs less of gloom than gleam,
Shaped most for light:
So, though some passing drops must fall,
Yet may thy years, my darling, all
Be chiefly bright!

But know that as we tread together
Life's path, with all its changing weather,
Its rain and shine,
For ever, thy dear head above,
Remains a canopy of Love
En tout cas t'bine!

CONSCIOUSNESS.—ELLA WHEELER WILCOX, IN COLLIER'S WEEKLY.

Within the silent rock exist
A billion yearning lives.
Man is a petty egotist
To think he only strives—
To think he only stroggles up
To God through toil and pain:
He is but one drop in a cup
Filled from the mighty main.

The flowers have tender little souls
That love, repine, aspire.
Each star that on its orbit rolls
Feels infinite desire.
The diamond longs to scintillate
When hid beneath the sod.
The universe is animate
With consciousness of God.

WHENNE HATTE-TREES BLOCM.—GOOEY'S.

Whenne batte-trees bloom and blue skyes shyne
Lives there ye mayde who can declyne
Toe crympe ye bange and curl ye locke,
Or steele ber bearte agaynst that knocke
Wybch promptes Easter offeryngs fyne.

In sootbe each fayre must falle in lyne
Toe sporten Springe's garbe divyne,
And all ye maydes uponne ye blocke
Have battes ye witte of man toe mocke,
And rove where bonnet-husbes twynne
And hatte-trees bloom.

An English captain of a regiment stationed at Natal was paying off his command and happened to give one of them a Transvaal half-crown which bears the image of President Kruger. The man brought it back to the pay table and said to the captain: "Please, sir, you've given me a bad half-crown." The officer took the coin, and, without looking at it, rung it on the table, and then remarked: "It sounds all right, Bagster. It's all right. You can pass it at the canteen." This apparently satisfied Bagster, who walked off, making the remark: "If you say it's a right, sir, it's a right; but it's the first time I've seed the Queen wi' whiskers on."—London Answers.

INSURANCE.

THOS. C. HINDMAN, formerly General Pacific Coast Manager of the defunct Columbian Fire Insurance Company, and a heavy stockholder thereof, is retrieving his fortunes with the Mutual Life, of New York, in Kentucky. As manager of that company he captured the Presidents' cup for doing the largest amount of business during the months of November and December of last year.

W. S. Du Vall has been appointed Inspector for the new compact for all territory in this State north of Tehachapi.

Affairs in the recently organized Fire Underwriters' Association are running smoothly, and there is every indication of permanency. With the exception of the Thuringia and Continental, all companies of any consequence are in the Board.

During the visit here of John A. McCall, he was agreeably entertained by Charles A. McLane, the company's chief representative at this place, and others of the insurance fraternity. He left for the East on Thursday night.

Manager Callingham, of the Sun Insurance Office, has appointed Crawford & Conover representatives of the company at Seattle.

Manager Beggs, of the Standard Life and Accident Insurance Company, has moved his Pacific Coast headquarters from Portland to San Francisco. With the exception of the Penn Mutual Life Insurance Company, the headquarters of all companies doing business on the Pacific Coast are now located here.

The much-advertised Denver Life Insurance Company is having its books examined by the Colorado State insurance officials. It has been discovered that the $25,000 securities deposited with the Insurance Department are practically worthless, and that the majority of the Directors are ignorant of its financial standing. Many of them have resigned the past week, and the vacancies have not yet been filled.

Risks written last year in this State amounted to $336,334,238; for which premiums received were $3,817,317. The largest amount written and largest amount of premiums received in any one year in California was in 1892, when the amount written was $398,623,490, and premiums received $7,067,460. From these figures some interesting deductions as to the cost of the recently-ended rate war may be obtained.

The business of the Nederland Life, since the retirement of that company on the first of the month, is being rapidly absorbed by other companies, and the probabilities are that there will be little cause for continuing the New York office for finishing up its business in this country.

Five of the seven Directors of the Massachusetts Benefit Life have resigned, and their places have been filled.

Will D. Jenkins, Secretary of State of Washington, and acting Insurance Commissioner, desires us to say that until further notice checks, drafts, or certificates of deposit will not be received by his department for the payment of any fees or licenses, as the department has lost money through the failure of several northern banks.

Manager Houghton, of the Aetna Life, has appointed J. W. Edmonds general agent for Oregon and Washington, to succeed W. J. Hunter, who died January 27th.

Manager Cofran, of the Hartford, after a two weeks' visit, has returned to Chicago.

Alfred Stoneman has been elected manager of the Board of Fire Underwriters of the Pacific. This gentleman filled the same position under the old Pacific Insurance Union.

The Norwalk Fire has been admitted to South Dakota and Colorado.

The Hartford Life and Annuity Company will hereafter be known as the Hartford Life Insurance Company.

When it comes to a question of quality, Argonaut Whiskey stands at the head of all the drinks made for the gratification of the tastes of man. It is recognized as the perfection of excellence in the art of liquor making. E. Martin & Co., 411 Market street, are sole Pacific Coast agents for this delightful whiskey.

FOR ALLAYING HOARSENESS AND IRRITATION OF THE THROAT "Brown's Bronchial Troches" are wonderfully effective. Avoid imitations.

GAYETIES OF FORTY YEARS AGO.—Second Paper.

THE most noted semi-public ball given during 1864 was the fancy dress one given at the Cosmopolitan Hotel in the month of December, of which mention was made in the NEWS LETTER a few weeks ago.

One of the earliest events of 1865 was the ball given by General and Mrs. McDowell, which may be called of a semi-public character, as it was not alone their personal friends who were entertained at it. The ball, which was given on the 21th of January, at the Occidental Hotel, was the sensation of the hour. The dining-room was made the ball-room for the occasion, General and Mrs. McDowell receiving their guests in the parlors, the supper tables being laid in the broad halls near by, the new portion of the hotel not being yet opened.

Very nearly all society was present, regardless of the North and South war feeling which pervaded it at that time. Society being largely composed of the Southern element. Among the belles were the Misses Maxwell, McMullin, Butterworth, Atherton, Raymond Foard, Chamberlains, Hort, etc., and among the most noted guests were Mr. and Mrs. Charles Kean, who were then playing an engagement at Maguire's Opera House.

The Navy proved that they could play hosts as well as guests, by a delightful ball given on board the flagship Lancaster on the 22nd of June, 1865. The weather, fortunately was most propitious, and the trip to the ship, by means of small boats, was one of the pleasant features of the evening. The entire deck was covered in for dancing, and brilliantly lighted with lanterns, and a superb supper was served by Leland of the Occidental Hotel. The officers of the ship included Admiral Pearson, Captain Davenport, Lieutenant-Commander E. P. McCrea, Lieutenants W. R. Bridgeman, A. S. Barker, present Commander of the Oregon, M. W. Sanders, Surgeon Potter, Lieutenant Webster of the marines, etc.

The Occidental Hotel was again the scene of a brilliant gathering on Thursday evening, July 6th, when the young gentlemen of society gave a ball in honor of Admiral Pearson and the officers of the Lancaster as a return compliment for the very delightful one above mentioned. Cutler McAllister had entire charge of this affair, and it was as perfect as it could be made; W. H. L. Barnes, Lieutenant W. W. Tompkins, U. S. A., W. C. Little, and Ben Smith were his assistants and floor managers. Being a button dance, the scene was a dazzling one, and of the belles, both married and single, there was not one missing. Then followed another button affair, a military one this time, given at the Presidio by the officers of the Second Infantry of California Volunteers, who were garrisoning that Post while the regulars were in the field.

When the new dining-room of the Lick House was opened, it at once sprang into popularity for ballroom purposes, and the "Lick House Ball," given on the 21st of February, 1867, was the first of a series that took place therein. The second came off one week later, and was a masquerade, at which Miss Alice Risdon appeared as the Goddess of Liberty, Mrs. Peters and Mrs. Schmiedell as two peasant girls, Mrs. Fred Castle as Diana, Mrs. C. R. Story as Columbia, Mr. and Mrs. Speyer as the game of Bezique, Mrs. A. Seligman as the Queen of Clubs, Mrs. Fred Low as a French Marquise, Mrs. Bandman as Pocahontas, Miss Lotty Hall as Queen of Night, Mrs. Janes as a Gypsy, Miss Gummer as a Snow Storm, Mrs. Frank Hassey as "Night." Fred Castle appeared as Hamlet, General Hewston as a Matelot, Eugene Dewey as a gallant of the time of Louis the 15th, and John McCullough as a knight in armor. A number of ladies created quite a sensation by going in a party, in domino, and fleeing at midnight, when unmasking time came. Among them were Mrs. Hall McAllister, Miss Ella Maxwell, Miss Jenny McNulty, Miss Alexandra Atherton and Miss Noyes. The escorts of this "Cinderella Brigade," as it was called, included General C. A. Whittier, Colonel Neil Dennison, W. H. L. Barnes, Charley Le Gay, Ben Smith, etc.

A new aspirant for ballroom honors was Pacific Hall, over the new (old) California Theatre, inaugurated on the 6th of February, 1869, by a ball given by the San Francisco Verein Club. It was a fancy dress masquerade, at which Mrs. J. W. Kidwell wore a Plantagenet costume, her cousin, Miss Mamie Kelly, appeared as "Cherry Ripe," Miss Dingee as Satanella, Mrs. Braverman as an Albanian, Miss Nonie Smith as an Indian Princess. Mrs. Schmiedell, Miss Kate Robinson, Mrs. Tom Cash, Miss Lotty Hall, Miss Fanny Daniels, Miss Lount, and the Misses Greenhood were among those who wore dominos. Captain Roberts appeared as a fireman, Coll Deane as Raoul, Charley Le Gay as Pierrot, W. C. Ralston as the Doge of Venice, Raphael Weill wore the dress of a German Dragoon, George C. Bodie was Cardinal de Richelieu. One of the most effective dresses was that worn by Miss Emma Adams, who appeared as a Peasant Girl.

During the spring and summer of 1870 the port of San Francisco was paid frequent visits by U. S. M. S. Zealous. Admiral Farquhar and his officers gave innumerable dances on board the ship; indeed, during one long stay of nearly three months these hops were of weekly occurrence. Therefore, towards the close of this visit, gentlemen who had been among their guests on many occasions, deemed it only fitting that some return should be made by them, and the result was a handsome entertainment in the shape of a ball, given at Pacific Hall September 13, 1870. It was on a very elaborate scale; the decorations of the brilliantly lighted hall, the excellent floor, superb music, delicious supper, and the beautifully garbed ladies, who represented the cream of our social world, rendered it an affair to be proud of, and a theme talked of for many a day afterwards. The committee of invitation were Thomas H. Selby, Cutler McAllister, Delos Lake, Judge Ogden Hoffman, Judge H. A. Lyons, and H. B. Williams. The floor managers included the best known young club men of the city. Admiral Farquhar and officers of the Zealous, escorted by Mayor Selby and the floor managers, entered the ballroom to the strains of "God Save the Queen," and after they had made a tour of the ball the ball was opened by Admiral Farquhar selecting a partner for the "Admiral's Quadrille." Once dancing was inaugurated, the ball went with a brilliancy seldom seen, and never excelled in San Francisco.

The dining-room of the Lick House was the place chosen for the ball given on the 15th of September, 1870, by the city to General Sherman on his visit here that summer, General Sherman and General Schofield entering the ballroom together at 10 o'clock. It was a veritable jam; so great was the crowd in the ballroom it was a pleasure to the guests to wander through the broad halls, the lemonade and punch tables which were placed in one of them near the door of the dining-room attracting almost as many as the dance inside. Among the handsome women present were Mrs. C. A. Low, Mrs. Pepe Barron, Mrs. F. F. Low, Mrs. George Howard, Mrs. P. S. Van Ranselaar of New York, Mrs. W. C. Ralston, Mrs. M. S. Latbam, and Mrs. Wherry, the wife of one of Schofield's aides.

During the Ralston regime at Belmont, many delightful entertainments were given there; probably the two most of a semi-public character were the receptions given by him in honor of Admiral Farragut and Schuyler Colfax, September 24, 1869, and of General Sherman, September 10, 1870. On both occasions the guests went down by special train, were conveyed to the house by carriages, and found that palatial abode ablaze with lights, Ballenberg and his band to provide the music for dancing, and a magnificent supper for a finale.

One of the public balls of 1870 was given at the Cosmopolitan Hotel in compliment to the Boston Board of Trade, which, with a large party of ladies, paid San Francisco a brief visit. It took place on the 17th of June, and was known as the $50,000,000 dance. This Boston party was composed of many leading members of the Hub's social and business circles, and with them they brought a bottle of water from the Atlantic Ocean, which with great ceremony they poured into the Pacific from the beach near the Cliff House, thus mingling the waters of two great oceans, and uniting Boston and San Francisco.

PAUPER ALLEY has been much exercised over the mysterious disappearance of Windsor A. Keefer, the well-known mining man, who, for many years, has been a familiar figure on the lane which serves as a thoroughfare for every one having the slightest connection with stocks. Keefer spent most of his waking hours on the alley, and notwithstanding his apparent prosperity, took many of his meals at a cheap little kitchen, the only virtue of which was its proximity to the Stock Boards. He was the first man to be seen in that vicinity in the morning, arriving before the shutters were taken from the saloons and invariably being served with the first national cocktail. Long after the stars came out, he took his final and purposeless promenade through the quarter. Keefer's costume was as peculiar as were the hours he kept. He invariably wore a suit of black broadcloth, of antique cut, a black slouch hat and a small black cravat tied in a bow, leaving a wide expanse of skirt bosom.

This costume and his habitually solemn countenance were once responsible for a ludicrous mistake which caused the mining speculator much secret gratification. Up in Tuolumne County, while investigating a reported mineral discovery, he had occasion to spend a day or two in a mountain hamlet where he was quite unknown. Misled by his broadcloth and his demeanor, the miners mistook him for an itinerant Methodist minister—an assumption quite justified by his appearance. A clergyman was an unknown quantity in that camp and the novelty made the miners anxious to utilize his talents promptly. Accordingly a deputation waited on Keefer and asked him to preach that evening. Without changing countenance or making verbal response to the request, he sauntered toward the bar of the inn, the deputation following from force of habit.

"Everybody step up," shouted Keefer, in stentorian tones, and the population of the entire camp was soon crowded about the saloon.

There were not glasses enough to go around and so the barkeeper passed out bottles from which each man took as big a drink as he was able.

"Here's to you, Parson," they shouted, a toast which the supposed minister modestly acknowledged.

Then Keefer, without any reference to his prospective sermon, paid his score, slung his hag over his shoulder and silently departed. The miners looked after him with admiration and wonderment.

"He's O. K., he is," was the emphatic verdict of the spokesman of the deputation, "hut I'll be jiggered if he ain't the rummest parson I ever seed!"

Everyone, including babies and dogs, likes James C. Adams, who practices law on Sansome street, lives in Oakland and is famous for voiceless cachinnation. So good natured and approachable is he that he is daily accosted by people he does not know, hut who want to see his parted lips. As Adams was crossing on the ferry one day this week, he was greeted by a very inebriated individual, confident of the friendly sympathy which he at once received. The haccchant warmly grasped the hand of the popular member of the aristocratic Lake Merritt set.

"You're a good fellow," he proclaimed, with alcoholic effusiveness. "I like you. Now, where's your joint? I want to give you all my trade. I know every joint from Second street to East Oakland and I've never yet seen you behind a har. Where's your joint?"

All his acquaintances are now asking Jim the same question.

Comment is made that at the noon meetings for business men conducted by Archdeacon Webber in the Chamber of Commerce, the Episcopal clergy, who share seats in the audience with the down-town contingent, are as tardy as the hankers and brokers are punctual in their attendance.

No one has been quite so late, however, as the Reverend Robert C. Foute, rector of Grace Church. Thereby hangs a tale, and thereby also hung, for a time, the fashionable priest. As the auditorium of the Chamber of Commerce is on the second floor and up a long flight of steps, many elderly gentlemen en route to hear the Archdeacon have recourse to the Merchants' Exchange elevator, an old-fashioned contrivance which frequently illustrates Matthew Arnold's declaration that it is the unexpected that happens. Mr. Foute knew that he was late when he stepped into the elevator, hut when it stopped between the first and second floors he foresaw that he would be later.

"Never mind taking me up-stairs," he shouted, in his abrupt way. "Just let me out of this confounded thing, and I'll walk."

Even this was impossible. The lift stuck fast; all efforts to move it were unavailing, and it was as difficult to go down as up. There soon gathered a crowd, composed of the unregenerate who were not going to the meeting, and who amused themselves with jeering the caged occupants of the suspended elevator. Rector Foute, having graduated from the navy into the church, was able to express his opinion as forcibly as the less reverend.

"The preacher don't seem to be stepping heavenward at a very rapid gait," said a scoffer, at whom the clergyman hurled muttered anathemas.

After half an hour's hard work the lift slowly descended to its starting place. Mr. Foute rushed out, and hurriedly made for the stairway. He was in time to meet his descending brother clergymen, who had left the chamber, the meeting being long over. The portly rector's ruffled sensibilities were not soothed to any noticeable extent by the evident incredulity with which the other ministers received his explanation of absence.

A tapping at the studio door of a young woman who is a member of the Art Students' League, brought the fair tenant to the entrance. The vision that met her eyes was more gorgeous than sunset at the Cliff House. A pink shirt with broad bars of yellow, a bright blue necktie, white hat, black clothes, brown waistcoat, and about seven inches of grin—all bowed to her at once. She rubbed her eyes, hut it was still there, and, oh, horrors! the grin was perceptibly widening!

The artist realized that she had been working too steadily. She resolved to lay aside her palette, stop mixing tubes of paint, and take a long rest in the country.

Then her reflective monologue was interrupted.

"I'm Jimmie," piped a voice, which came from the center of that growing cavity.

"So you are a real, live Brownie? And it wasn't a mirage, and I haven't strabismus!" ejaculated the artist, in surprised relief. "But, who is Jimmie?" she added, haughtily. "This is no Christmas pantomime. I am not accustomed to such introductions, sir!"

The animated rainbow, without a word, produced a stubby pencil, and, with a few strokes, sketched on a panel of the artist's door the outlines of a diminutive bear and the head of a cherub, of which the most distinguishing feature was its expansive smile.

The unmistakable evidences of frost vanished, and were succeeded by a sunshine which was almost tropical.

"Oh! I see. How do you do? Wou't you come in, Mr. Swinnerton?" invited the artist cordially. "I am so pleased to meet you."

Joaquin Miller has issued invitations for a dinner party on Sunday at his quaint cabin on The Heights. Like everything else with which the Poet of the Sierras is connected, the invitations were highly original, although irreverent, bordering, indeed, on the sacrilegious.

"Come and have a good time with me," said old Joaquin, to his prospective guests. "We will emulate the example of the Creator. God always took Sunday off and lay around, and smoked and had a good time. He didn't hold any of those praise services that are so fashionable nowadays. No; he wasn't so damned egotistical."

And now it is Oakland which, according to the Thespian verdict, from which there is no appeal, is a jay town. It all came about through the way the mud flat residents received the presentation of Gismonda. At the end of the third act it was quite in accordance with the nightly programme that flowers for Miss Davenport should be passed up over the footlights, and plump Fanny and the stalwart Melbourne Macdowell were always called before the curtain.

Now, among the trifling details of the handsome stage setting is a bunch of artificial roses which conscientiously imitate a bloom from their vase on a small round table. During his impassioned love-making, Macdowell unconsciously upset this imitation bouquet, which fell, unnoticed, to the floor. The Oaklanders were somewhat shy on the proper standard of enthusiasm that night; even the manager forgot his cue, and so, no flowers were forthcoming from the orchestra leader at the critical moment. Macdowell perceived this omission, as also the manifest disappointment of Miss Davenport.

Suddenly he caught sight of the paper roses at his feet. In the excitement of the moment, he mistook the property bouquet for the genuine floral article, and gracefully presented it to the now smiling Fanny. But those in the dress circle, who had noted all the movements of the stage roses, and who appreciated the significance of Melbourne's mistake, unkindly laughed; while the gallery howled with malicious glee. There was no recall after the third act that night, and now Oakland is added, in the dramatic catalogue, to the list of uncultured communities.

A taste of his own medicine was administered this week to Professor L. Du Pont Syle of the English Department in the State University. Syle is noted in college circles as a particularly severe critic and his students often write under his sarcastic shafts.

"What they need is a tonic, not a sedative," is his defence for biting judgments harshly expressed.

Outside of his lecture room Syle is amiable enough and is considered an accomplished dramatist. He recently wrote a comedy, "The Chaplain's Revenge," which was produced by his students. The play was so favorably received that Syle thought he could afford to invite class criticisms upon it, anticipating comments from his own scholars at least as favorable as those of the critics in the daily press. Unfortunately for him, Professor Syle had forgotten that characteristic of collegians which never overlooks an opportunity to get even. To his pain and surprise one after another in his class poured hot shot into his little comedy, and it was small comfort to the unhappy instructor to feel that most of the aspersions of his critics were unjust. His cup of bitterness ran over when a "co-ed," who had had a leading role in the cast and who, Syle naturally supposed, would rush to his defense, declared that the play was sadly lacking in unity and was merely a succession of commonplace incidents, inartistically strung together. Syle hotly defended the child of his brain, but it is understood he will change its name to "The Student's Revenge."

Her ostensible purpose in visiting the Anglo-California Bank was to have a check cashed, but she almost forgot about the money in her eagerness to discuss Edwin K. Alsip's little slip, the flight of Attorney Morgan, the baby, the fictitious mamma, the discomfiture of those concerned in the blackmailing scheme and all the details of the victim's misadventure.

"I know Alsip quite well," she said, volubly, to genial Billy Stinson, the paying teller. "Alsip's all right. In his case, it was not an error of the heart," she continued, oracularly, "but of the—ahem!—of the—"

She floundered, hesitated, blushed and gasped. With a dexterous sweep of his arm, Stinson spread in a shining semi-circle on the counter, the gold pieces represented by her check. Then he looked steadily at the confused female and leaned confidentially toward her.

"My dear Madam," said Billy, in his blandest tones, "you are in deep water. Swim out."

Some of his opponents in the Hale & Norcross management are now unkind enough to say that it was the irony of fate which sent Jeremiah Lynch to the State Senate. His political triumph came just after he completed his memorable trip on the Nile, under the direction of a tourist's excursion party. That expedition was directly responsible for the book about Egyptian sand, and mummies, and obelisks, published after the travelers return, and to the editing of which was ascribed the sudden affluence of Harry Dan, now of London. Jerry has always been a great favorite among the ladies, and his successes are supposed to be due to those well-known charms of person, of which he is not unconscious. When he arrived in Sacramento to attend the Legislature, Senator Lynch wore bushy whiskers, on which he lavished a wealth of affection. He took a seat in the Chamber next to a hold-over Senator, of whom he asked an embarrassing question, in his famous lisp, while he caressed the curls on his chin.

"Can you tell me, thir," Jerry said, sweetly, "who wath the handthometh man in the lath Thenate?"

There could be no question as to the identity of the handsomest man in the Senate during that session.

The decorative soul of John Harrold has been finding a partial expression in the work of college settlement, established in San Francisco two years ago by Professor Bernard Moses. Harrold has been showering his talents on a band of ungrateful little street arabs, but who, he is firmly convinced, will be more appreciative some day. They view the entire plan for their mental and social improvement in the light of a huge joke, their conception of its benefits being confined to the many opportunities it presents for "stringing" their instructors. By way of inducing better deportment, and with his own dignity in mind, Harrold organized the kids under his supervision into a club, to meet two nights a week, all business being transacted by the boys themselves. The first test of the new order of things came at the second meeting of the club, when the juvenile secretary gravely read the minutes of the previous session, recording the first vote thus:

"Eight ayses, nine noses."

IF music be the food of love, what a feast there has been of late! The opera will, however, soon be a thing of the past, and for the closing nights of the season there have been quite a number of parties arranged to enjoy them. The concert of the Loring Club, on Tuesday night, was one of the best the club has ever given, and the attendance—always large at these popular society affairs—was even more so than usual. The art lectures of the Henri Fairweathers, which Sorosis has been enjoying during the past weeks, have been great treats. The Wagner series has been finished, and now Browning is to be the theme.

Social festivities have, in the main, been confined to dinners and suppers, the latter preceded by theatre, opera, and Chute parties, of which last Mrs. J. O'Neil Reis has proved to be one of the most successful arrangers. On Monday evening the members of the Sketch Club gave a reception in their rooms on Montgomery street, the musical features being provided by the University Mandolin Club, and the Spring Show has, during the week, attracted many visitors to their pleasant quarters.

By far the handsomest entertainment of the Lenten season was the pink luncheon which Mrs. William Alvord gave on Tuesday last in honor of Mrs. Whitelaw Reid. Fifteen ladies were seated at the round table, the floral adornments of which were pinks of various tints combined with smilax, and a couple of hours were delightfully spent in discussing a most elaborate menu. Among the guests were Mrs. Lloyd Tevis, Mrs. Ansel Easton, Mrs. Lawrence Poole, Mrs. Willie Howard, Mrs. Chas. Brigham, Mrs. Ed. Hopkins, Mrs. Willie Babcock, Mrs. Russ Wilson, etc.

Dinners were quite plentiful during the closing days of last week, one of the prettiest being given by Miss Genevieve Goad, whose guests were all young people. William Alvord presided as host at a very elaborate dinner given at the Pacific-Union Club, at which D. O. Mills was guest of honor, to meet whom twenty-two other gentlemen were hidden at what was a veritable hanquet. The menus were in hook form on white cardboard, and the guests' names were hand-painted on the front leaf. Miss Grace Hecht's recent white dinner was to signalize her formal début in society, and the evening hours were delightfully passed in dancing.

On Sunday last the marriage of Miss Henrietta Weil and Leopold Sondheimer took place at the home of the bride on Ellis street. Rabbi Voorsanger performed the ceremony, relatives and intimate friends only being present, and at its conclusion a handsome wedding déjeuner was served, later in the day the young couple departing on a honeymoon trip to Coronado. There were neither bridesmaids nor groomsmen, and the bride wore a travelling costume of gray cloth, which was very becoming, and a hat to correspond.

It has been a matter of comment the disagreeable weather most of the brides of the past winter and early spring have had to mark their wedding days. Miss Aileen Goad had, therefore, to congratulate herself on her better fortune in having one of the brightest days which has fallen to our lot of late, for her marriage to Charles McIntosh, which was solemnized at the Goad residence on Washington street, on Wednesday afternoon, Bishop Nichols tying the nuptial knot in the presence of quite an assemblage of relatives and intimate friends. Miss Genevieve Goad officiated as her sister's maid-of-honor, and Claude Terry Hamilton supported the groom as best man.

Still a third wedding for the 21st of April is arranged to take place in addition to those of Miss Mattie Whittier and Miss Minnie O'Neil; the bride and groom in this instance will be Miss Helen Sutro and Samuel Schwartz, and the ceremony to be performed at the home of the bride's mother, on Pine street. The Low-Bush wedding, which will be an event in New York society, will take place in Gotham during Easter week. The fair bride-elect is a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. C. Adolph Low, former popular members of San Francisco's swim.

The coming June weddings are a leading topic in fashionable circles, and the indications are that they will be brilliant affairs. June 1st will be the wedding day of Miss Minnie Burton and Lieutenant Pierce, and the ceremony will be performed at the residence of Colonel Burton on Pacific avenue. It is to be a blue wedding, and Miss Leila Burton is to appear as her sister's maid-of-honor, and the Misses Grace Sabine, Lottie Woods, Kathro Burton, etc., will officiate as bridesmaids. A large reception will follow the ceremony.

The nuptials of Miss Ethel Cohen and Lieutenant Bent will be solemnized on Wednesday evening, June 2d, the Rev. Horatio Stebbins tying the knot at the Unitarian Church on Franklin street, after which there will be a reception at the residence of the bride's uncle, Dr. Henry Gibbons, on Polk street. Miss Cohen's bridal robe will be of white satin, and Miss Emma Butler, as maid-of-honor, will be arrayed in blue. The bridesmaids, who will wear dainty gowns of white organdie, will be the Misses Ida Gibbons, Helen Wagner, Julia Crocker, Bernie Drown, and Alice Moffitt of Oakland.

A very pretty wedding was that which took place at the residence of J. H. Swain, in Stockton, on last Wednesday, when Miss Mahel Swain was united in marriage to H. E. Plummer, of Lathrop. The family home was profusely decorated with flowers, and the ceremony was performed beneath a mass of smilax and white rosebuds. Mr. and Mrs. Plummer will spend their honeymoon in an extended tour of the Coast.

Recently announced engagements include that of Miss Lauretta Cook and J. C. Applewhite.

But one more week of Lent, and then a brief but gay season of dances and weddings ere the summer flit from town begins. First on the list of gay doings will probably be the Oakland fancy dress bal masque at Ehell Hall on Easter Tuesday night; quite a large party will go from this side of the bay to take part in the festivity, and it promises to be a brilliant affair. On Friday evening, the 23d, the last meeting for this season of the Saturday evening Cotillion Club will be held in Native Son's hall. It will be on quite an elaborate scale, and more formal than any of the dances last winter. Howard Adams, who will lead the cotillion, will introduce several new figures, for which favors are to be distributed, and after supper it is the intention to have general dancing.

The opening day of the Pacific Yacht Club is set for the 15th of May, for which preparations will soon be made, ensuring the club and its guests one of those delightful times for which in the past it has been famous.

The entertainment under discussion by the lady managers of the Maria Kip Orphanage has resolved itself into a concert and tea, which will be given at the new building on Seventh avenue and Lake street on the afternoon of May 22d. The lady managers of the Children's Hospital are busily preparing an entertainment for the benefit of that popular charity, of which due notice will be given.

Mrs. W. L. Gerstle is visiting Mr. and Mrs. M. H. Hecht at their home on Washington street during the absence of Mr. Gerstle in Alaska, who anticipates returning about the first of June. Mrs. and Miss Skea, Mr. and Mrs. Ignatz Steinhart, Dr. George Sheils, Mrs. T. W. Lillenthal, Mrs. J. L. Little, Miss Little, Mrs. Gustave Sutro, and Miss Sutro, are among the guests at the Hotel Rafael; Mr. and Mrs. D. Roth and family, have returned from a year's sojourn abroad, during which time they very thoroughly did Continental Europe. Miss May Hoffman is expected home by the next steamer from the Sandwich Islands.

Among those making the annual exodus to San Rafael this season, we may count upon the Slosses, Gerstles, Hechts, Greenwalds, and Hasses, all of whom are already preparing to leave the city. The Neustadters will frequent their usual "haunts" at Tahoe, while Alaska and Yosemite parties are now being planned galore.

The most important affair of the week was the magnificent theatre party given by Miss Hellman at the opera on Wednesday night. Unlike the usual theatre party, the guests arrived on time, and enjoyed the rare treat of hearing the overture. After the opera the party adjourned to the Hellman mansion, corner of Franklin and Sacramento streets, where a most sumptuous feast awaited them. It was not until the "wee sma' hours" of the morn that the party broke up. Mr. Albert Ehrman and Miss Rosalie Neustadter were guests of honor.

It is noted from a late copy of the Berlin (German) Times that Miss Mariou Bear, a well-known young lady of this city, who has been abroad for the past four years studying music, made her initial appearance in concert at Berlin on the 10th of March. The Times speaks in very flattering terms of Miss Bear's debut. Her performance is described as brilliant, powerful, and effective. Miss Bear intends returning to San Francisco this fall, when she will doubtless be heard.

Miss Laura McKinstry accompanied Mr. and Mrs. Henry Scott on their recent hurried trip East. Mrs. Frank Carolan is visiting Mrs. George Pullman in Chicago. Mrs. Fred Castle and Miss Blanche have departed for Europe, where they will remain until the early autumn. D. O. Mills, Mr. and Mrs. Whitelaw Reed, leave for their home in New York to-day, and to-day also Mrs. McNutt and her daughters, accompanied by Miss Genevieve Goad, leave for a several weeks' visit to Santa Barbara.

Club elections is the talk of the hour. The San Francisco Verein has nominated Mr. I. Strassburger for President for the ensuing year. The nominating board is to be congratulated upon its selection, as their choice is a gentleman of wide experience and good judgment in club matters, who fortunately has the time at his disposal to devote to the club's interests.

On the 2d inst., Mrs. Leila Ellis and Miss L. Owen Ellis, both of whom have a wide acquaintance in this city, gave a most enjoyable dramatic recital at the residence of Mrs. Gilbert Jones, 222 Madison avenue, New York city. The subject of the entertainment was "Word Pictures of Plantation Life in the Old South," and was illustrated by scenes from modern literature. The recital was so well received that it is to be repeated on next Monday evening at the Carnegie building in that city.

Not so with the Concordia, however; their board has been laboring arduously, endeavoring to make the right selection for the place. The enormous amount of work connected with the executive office, in this instance, has made the available element rather wary about accepting the honor. Henry Wangenheim, last year's Vice-President, has been looked upon as a possibility, although younger members are to be placed upon the Board of Managers.

Miss Ella Morgan will spend the summer months the other side of the continent. Mrs. Homer King will be another absentee from our social world for some weeks, but when she returns from her trip East, her daughter, who is there at school, will return with her. Colonel Fred Crocker and family will occupy their villa at San Mateo in June.

Mrs. A. Schwabacher and Miss Mina Schwabacher have returned home, after an extended sojourn in the East.

GENERAL Francis J. Heney left Wednesday night for Arizona and Mexico, where he goes for several weeks in the interest of the San Rafael de la Zenja Mexican land grant as against the government of the United States. This grant contains 255 square miles of land and belongs to Senator Don Cameron.

The Japanese may not capture the Hawaiian Islands, but if you want to see their exquisite art work, curios, tapestries, etc., a visit to George T. Marsh & Co., at 625 Market street, under the Palace Hotel, is the place to find them. Constantly receiving new and beautiful art goods from Japan.

Excellent taste, combined with wide experience, is necessary to make the successful caterer. All these, Max Abraham, at 428 Geary street, has. He superintends nearly every swell banquet and supper given in the city, and his services are always most satisfactory.

THE SEÑORA'S DINNER PARTY

By G. A. Danziger

CAN I ever forget that New Year's dinner at the house of the adorable Señora? Not that I have not tasted such sweet birds, such salads, such soup, or such wines before or since. I am not speaking of that. Things of the kitchen are like yesterday's smoked cigar—he it ever so rich—soon forgotten. But that which transpired during the dinner, or rather after, has stirred my heart and left an indelible mark upon my memory. The story of Bechinia de Leon, the tragic end of one of the guests, and Donna Anna's vendetta are fresh. I see them before me as I pen these lines.

The dinner party was the Señora's tribute to the Bohemians of San Francisco.

A dinner at the Señora's was an affair, and all were eager to be there. Her house had not exactly the air of a convent, nor was it quite a salon du demi monde. They sat in corners by pairs, but the best gas light would not have revealed a rumpled skirt or a disarranged corsage. Of course Pety was an exception; but he was not bound by ordinary rules of conduct. He was the Señora's favorite, and as he had a penchant for whispering—a habit most unbecoming yet uncontrollable—he was polite enough to retire into some dark corner, or into an adjoining room, and the Señora—dear heart—would keep him company for a brief spell. If anyone asked for Pety, the Señora would put her bejewelled and plump little hand upon her dazzling hosom and say: "Ah, dios mio, de Señor Pete, he seek; he lie on de lounge."

The Señora's husband, a learned man, was a splendid talker, and she adored him—she adored all men who had brains and heart and looks. The Señor did not have much looks, and he was rather of diminutive size; but then, he was hrainy and a splendid cook.

However, I am not to write of the viands, but of the tragedy, perchance of men. Had you been present at that dinner, you might have been guilty of the same digression. There were so many interesting people present. I have spoken already of Pety, whose conversational powers were as unlimited as his capacity for punch. Pety the beautiful, whose cherubic face and perennial smile made him the favorite of his superiors and the envied of his equals; the incomparable Pety, who had dined with Lords and Princes; the sailor, soldier, journalist and champion liar of the universe.

Then there was that little curly-headed, black-eyed musician, who spoke of his violin as his mistress, and when in drink, spoke of his mistress as his violin.

Then there were the "brothers," both rather small and slender, but endowed with a Gambrinian capacity for beer. Willis, the elder, had long, light hair, that fell in matted strands from the middle of his head. His brilliant, glistening eyes were almost as marvelous as his mouth, which, in its semi-circular stretch, frequently caught the lohes of his ears in the corners. Dan, the younger, was a musician, a painter, a poet, and an all-around minstrel; next to cigarettes he loved the Señora's second daughter, who he called his Moon-kissed Pink.

And so, one and all of those fellows who constitute the vie du Boheme and its hangers on, of San Francisco, might he said to have accepted the invitation of the Señora, and to have turned in ready to eat and drink in honor of her who was prolific in her favors to those she liked.

Among the great number of people at the table, there was one person who had attracted my attention more than the rest. Firstly, because he was a stranger to me; secondly, because he was a queer looking man of an uncertain age, who had evidently disguised his looks, and, thirdly, because he sat a little too close, I thought, to Katy, the finest specimen of a Spanish creole I had ever seen. Katy was a type of beauty, Madonna-like in expression, with that dreamy, pensive look in her eyes, the light and fire of which are a mixture of heaven and hell;

the power of which no man ever successfully withstood. The person referred to looked into Katy's face with the insinuating smile of a hyena. He was almost ghastly pale and this I thought so unnatural that I was tempted to throw a glass of wine in his face, just to see whether that whitewash would come off. His waxed mustachios, which stood out straight on either side, had that dark lack-luster tinge which dye gives to hair; and when he moved his lips those waxed points moved automatically.

The Señora, in the flush of wine and in the grace of Pety's attentions, suddenly cast her dancing eyes upon Katy's neighbor and exclaimed:

"Usted es un pobre comedor; Usted no come nada, Señor Campo-Novo."

"Gracias Señora, you no desco nada mas," replied he, addressed as Señor Campo-Novo.

Few noticed this parley; most of the guests were either jesting, or swearing eternal friendship with liberal portions of red, red wine, and the Señora continued her whisperings with the divine Pety.

Our host dilated upon some of the Italian dishes he had prepared, and told stories to those near him. When black coffee and cigars had been served, the door opened and Donna Anna, mother of our hostess, entered.

"Yo te saludo, mama," cried our host, and all present gave the quaint, swarthy little woman a roaring welcome.

"Donna Anna does not dine with us on New Year's eve," said our host, "she only partakes in a smoke as a peace offering to the family; hey, mama?" he cried, handing her a long Virginia.

Donna Anna smiled, showing a set of symmetrical white teeth that contrasted beautifully with her dark face.

"It is just fifteen years to-night," our host continued, "that Don Francisco de Leon took dinner with us in this very room and fell dead at the very place now occupied by Señor Campo-Novo."

By this time the noise had somewhat subsided and all were listening to the Señor.

"You are burning the table-cloth, Donna Anna," cried our host.

Donna Anna put her dark hand upon the smoldering cloth.

"Lo siento," she said, and all laughed at her contrition, she was such a good soul, no one could be harsh with her.

"As I was saying," the Señor continued, "Francisco de Leon died of money. That is a strange disease. But old Francisco was a miser, and when a miser gives away his money—something breaks. Look out, Donna Anna!" cried the Señor, seeing that the hand holding the Donna's cigar had sank upon the table and the fire was igniting the cloth. She started, put the cigar on a plate, and while our host continued his narrative she held her gaze riveted upon the place occupied by Señor Campo-Novo.

"Francisco had an only child, Bechinia, upon whom he doted, and for whose sake he labored and lived in a miserable hovel, though he owned all the property on the north side between Bush and Pine streets. Bechinia was a beautiful woman, and when she became engaged to Señor de Cima the old man was not quite satisfied. 'She ought to be a great lady,' he would say. De Cima did not suit him. In one of Francisco's houses there lived at that time a German music teacher, a handsome fellow, who went by the name of Count Duerstein. He was the fashion, and Bechinia, too, became his pupil. In less than a month she threw over de Cima and married the Count."

At this juncture Señor Campo-Novo, who I soon learned was engaged to Katy, whispered into the latter's ear, whereupon she proposed that the company go into the parlor. But we objected sotto voce, clamoring for the end of the story.

"The majority rules," said our host, and continued:

"Francisco de Leon always dined with us on New Year's eye and while at the table the last time, told us of the virtues of his son-in-law, and that the Count had taken Bechinia to Germany to be introduced to his people. Donna Anna did not like the Count. "I don't believe he is a Count at all and he may have a wife and children somewhere in the world," she had said. Old Francisco grew very angry at his sister-in-law's remark; his face turned almost purple, he wanted to get up, but fell and was dead.

"However, he made a will, and had stipulated that under no condition should the estate be sold by Bechinia or her husband, that they were to draw the income during their lives, and on the death of her without issue, the husband should receive the sum of ten thousand dollars, and the whole estate to revert to my wife.

"Two years had gone by and all that was heard of the Duersteins was through their European bankers, to whom we sent a princely sum every three months. One day an order was sent from Germany for a very large sum of money. The executors of the estate had a consultation and concluded not to honor the order, claiming that it would affect the estate. Two months after this a cablegram announced the death of Bechinia, and having received the necessary papers, we sent ten thousand dollars to the Count. Donna Anna was inconsolable; Bechinia's death seemed to have clouded her life.

"One day a letter reached me from the Mexican Consul in Strassbourg, that chilled my very blood. It ran thus:

"I happened to make a tour through the asylum for the insane in this city, when I came upon a Spanish woman from San Francisco, California. She told me that her husband had put her there two years ago. She is a sad sight, though no more insane than I am. Her name is Bechinia de Leon. Countess Duerstein."

"The trustees of the estate, being informed of the outrage, sent a trusted agent to Europe to bring Bechinia home. Poor thing, she died on the steamer. It is just twelve years, three years before that, old Francisco dined with us."

"And what became of the Count?" we asked in chorus.

"I have never heard of him since, and I hope never to hear of him again. It would not do for him to meet Donna Anna."

The latter had risen, her oval face livid, her black eyes shooting flashes, and her blue lips covered with foam.

"The murderer of my poor child, my Bechinia," she shrieked, "there—there he sits," pointing at Señor Campo-Novo. "I know you, Professor Duerstein in spite of your shaven chin and waxed moustachios! You murdered my Bechinia, when you could not get her fortune, you—"

Like a puma, Donna Anna leaped over the table, and before any one could as much as move, she struck the Señor Campo-Novo in the chest. He groaned and fell from his seat, blood maculating his white shirt front. She had driven a stiletto into his heart.

Donna Anna has since died in the asylum whither she was taken a few days later.

FOOLING HIS SHADOW.—ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.

I HAVE a little shadow that goes in and out with me,
 And what can be the use of him is more than I can see.
 He is very, very like me, from the beels up to the bead;
 And I see him jump before me when I jump into my bed.
 The funniest thing about him is the way he likes to grow—
 Not at all like proper children, which is always very slow;
 For he sometimes shoots up taller, like an India rubber ball,
 And he sometimes gets so little that there's none of him at all,
 One morning very early, before the sun was up,
 I rose and found the shining dew on every buttercup,
 But my lazy little shadow, like an arrant sleepyhead,
 Had stayed at home behind me and was fast asleep in bed.

THE annual election of the Directors of the Southern Pacific Railroad took place Wednesday in this city, and resulted in the re-election of the entire old Board. Julian Kruttschnitt was elected to fill the vacancy caused by the death of A. L. Tubbs. President Huntington will succeed himself.

THE performance to take place on Monday evening in aid of the relief fund, at the Standard Theatre, promises to be well-attended. The programme includes three one-act plays, A Fair Encounter, The Violin Maker of Cremona, and Off the Stage.

WHAT a revelation to those who think cycling a fad fast dying out, the thousands of wheels at the finish of the relay last Sunday must have been. Many of the bikes were of this year's vintage, and showed that the riders of last year appreciate fully the pleasures to be enjoyed by pedaling a new mount. It is safe to say that, until the problem of aerial navigation is settled, that wheeling will be the nearest approach to flying we of the human race may indulge in.

Now that the cup is won and the race ended, it behooves some enterprising business firm or public-spirited wheel enthusiast to present another trophy to the California Associated Cycling Clubs, to be competed for under the same conditions, but with several restrictions, that the Varney cup was ridden for. In limiting a club's representatives on a relay team to those bona fide members who reside within a radius of one hundred miles from the headquarters of the club, a check is put upon the wholesale importation of the "cracks" from all parts of the country, thus giving clubs not financially able to bid for a rider's services an equal chance with their more wealthy adversaries.

That the coming year will see the daily use of motor vehicles in the larger cities of the country is presaged by this week's reports, which show that two companies are in active preparation to meet the demand which is sure to come. Chicago has had a company in successful operation for the past year, several of its vehicles having been purchased by business houses for various uses.

Too often the cycling reformer with a mission is looking for a commission, and because a man has had some success as a trainer of racing men, it is no reason why he should shine as a promoter of bicycle meets and "booster" to the trade. The manager and "his secretary" of the late lamented indoor tournament are bright examples of promoters who fail to promote. When it comes to reckoning up the cost, the trade may very well congratulate themselves that although they benefited in a way, it was not through the endeavors of the management, and the professional riders who were beguiled into parting with their hard-earned cash for the privilege of riding on a so-called California circuit are mourning their loss and wondering if ever again they will let an outsider promise them forty dollars for a first prize, and pay them one dollar and fifty-five cents as their share of the percentage, as was the remuneration at Santa Rosa.

EASTERN advices say that California prunes are in great demand and prices rising. The same conditions exist as to oranges. The prune is not so gaudy as the orange, but Central California's crop brings annually a large sum of money into the State. Take the prunes, oranges, olives, dried fruits, and grain of California into account, and they make a combination for prosperity that even McKinley cannot break.

FORGET-ME-NOT.—A. W. BELLAW.

A simple flower, and the night,
And neither night or flower forgot.
When coming years looked dim through tears
She gave me this Forget-me-not.
O never tongue more tenderly Murmured a maiden's pleading prayer,
"Farewell. Well fare.
Forget-me-not. Forget not me."
A little maiden, and the night,
And Love that drew of Sorrow's lot,
When unresigned I left behind
All save this fain Forget-me-not.
Moved all my soul to hear the plea
That scarcely stirred the stilly air,
"Farewell. Well fare.
Forget-me-not. Forget not me."
The maid, the flower, and the night.
The lingering at the parting spot,
And then the past which was so vast
Was closed by this Forget-me-not.
Sweet spirit, saintly memory,
Still in this flower abides thy prayer,
"Farewell. Well fare.
Forget-me-not. Forget not me."

ONE of the neatest souvenirs that has been issued here for a long time is that of the San Francisco and North Pacific Railroad, descriptive of the country through which the line runs. The little booklet is a pleasing invitation to travel via the S. F. & N. P. R. R., and is a beautiful example of half-tone work.

SAN FRANCISCO
NEWS LETTER
 California Advertiser.

Vol. LIV.

SAN FRANCISCO, APRIL 17, 1897.

Number 16.

Printed and Published every Saturday by the proprietor, FRED MARRIOTT
 5½ Kearny street, San Francisco. Entered at San Francisco Postoffice as Second-class Matter.

The office of the NEWS LETTER in New York City is at Temple Court;
 and at Chicago, 508 Boyce Building, (Frank E. Morrison, Eastern Representative), where information may be obtained regarding subscription and advertising rates.

CHARLES P. Welch has resigned from the position of Secretary of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. It is the only thing he has done since assuming the office that entitles him to the thanks of the community.

IT is estimated that five hundred delegates will attend the pure food congress to be held here on the 30th inst. This congress should accomplish great good, and stimulate the manufacture of wholesome foods, composed of California products, thus excluding Eastern trash.

DR. STAHL, former Superintendent of the City and County hospital, has been indicted by the Grand Jury for a failure to discriminate between "mine" and "thine." The thrifty doctor is charged with having appropriated furniture and carpets paid for by the city for hospital use. This is an ugly accusation. If it be true, the only proper and harmonious place for their use by the doctor would appear to be in the city and county jail.

THE San Francisco Carnival has been abandoned. It never seriously got beyond the offices of the newspapers. There was no enthusiasm and less money in the movement, and sudden death, rather than a halting, half-hearted parade, is desirable. The coin subscribed should be speedily transferred to the boulevard fund, where its expenditure will yield excellent and permanent results. Evidently Los Angeles holds the patent rights of this Coast for la fiesta.

INASMUCH as self-preservation is the first law of nature, mankind may hail with delight and a new sense of security the statement that the cooking departments are to be abolished in the public schools. Strict adherence to the original intent of that branch of instruction would have undermined the public health and resulted in a race of dyspeptics in San Francisco. The morning flap-jack and the dinner steak will now proceed along their alimentary way, unobstructed by had grammar or mathematical conundrums.

THE Horticultural Society of this State has placed an embargo upon the beautiful custom of wreathing the Hawaiian steamships bound for San Francisco with plants and flowers of the islands. These evidences and testimonials of friendship are often alive with red wax-scales, which, once here, would spread with amazing rapidity. The pest is very destructive, and is exterminated only at great cost. It is possible that there are those in California who want to annex the islands, but there is no disposition to annex the Honolulu red wax-scale.

THE people of Indianapolis secured the passage of a law by the Legislature of Indiana cutting street railway fares in that city from five to three cents. The New York Central Trust Company, the trustee of the street railway bonds, has brought suit to perpetually enjoin the company from observance of the law. It will doubtless maintain that the law is illegal in that its application would virtually amount to confiscation of private property, and the courts will more than likely sustain the contention of the Trust Company.

IT is said that the commission men of the city will attack, by injunction, the law enacted by the last Legislature which empowers the Harbor Commissioners to establish a free market on the water front. The enterprising purveyors of fruits, vegetables and etceteras, by their active opposition to the free market, are giving voluntary testimony against themselves. They have played both ends against the middle so long that a single commission will not satisfy them.

JUDGE Campbell has fined Louis Hartter, of the grocery firm of Hartter, Hayes & Co. of this city, $60 for having sold adulterated Eastern jellies. Hartter filed an affidavit for a change of venue, declaring that the Judge was prejudiced and that he could not get a fair trial. Campbell was assigned all those adulterated food cases at the beginning of this crusade, and the fact that he has fined every man brought before him clearly disposes of the theory that he is not treating them fairly.

THE report that John W. Mackay has determined to drive out the disreputable habitues of the old Cremorne building on Market street, raze it, and purify the air thereabout by erecting a creditable building that should be leased to respectable occupants, was premature. Mr. Mackay did intend to remove that shameful deadfall, but his temporary lapse has been succeeded by usual convalescence: The Cremorne will run for another three years—unless the Supervisors refuse a license for the Midway Plaisance and its hula-hula charms.

SUPERVISOR Rottaui is nothing if not dauntless. He introduced on last Monday, for the second time within the month, his anti-high hat ordinance. Like the bead-gear against which he tilts, he will not down. Seriously, there is substantial reason and justice in his crusade. The high hat is a nuisance, and there is every reason why it should be prohibited at the theatre. The Supervisors can spend some time very profitably in literally clipping its wings. The constitution gives every woman the right to pursue her own inclinations so long as there is no interference with the happiness of others. But the high hat not only interferes—it eclipses.

THE warship Oregon has met with a serious mishap in the waters of Puget Sound. Thus the misfortunes of our new navy are not confined to the Atlantic squadron. The exact extent of the Oregon's injuries are not known; but there is consolation in the fact that this is the first accident that has occurred to one of the Pacific-built vessels of the navy. The English drydock at Esquimalt may be employed to make necessary repairs on Uncle Sam's fighting machine. Should the misfortunes that have befallen the Atlantic squadron become epidemic here, as a means of protection we would suggest the equipment of war vessels with sets of legs.

AID of the Cuban revolutionists by enthusiastic citizens is a matter of personal judgment; but there can be no question that there are at our own doors those who are very much more in need of assistance and far more deserving. The Cuban situation is not correctly understood here, owing to the untruthful and distorted press reports; and the stories of Spanish atrocities and lamb-like rebel virtues are in essentials false. The continued outrages by one and the uncomplaining forbearance of the other have no place in fact. A half-caste, clad in rags, waving a machete and yelling "Cuba Libre!" at the top of his lungs, is not the only proof necessary of his nobility of character and claim for the contribution of American dollars.

FOOD ADULTERATION.

THE NEWS LETTER takes considerable interest, as well as pride, in the work the Board of Health is attempting to accomplish in suppressing the adulterated, and deteriorated food that constitutes so large a share of the retail trade of this city. This work is now going ahead like a flame through a burning bush. For years, commencing about 1880, it was impossible to arouse public attention to the food evils, unspeakably bad as they then were. The NEWS LETTER's plans of action were then more costly and efficient than any thing that has yet been substituted for them. We procured samples all over the city, and without the knowledge of the purveyor. Beginning with milk, we went on to coffee, sugar, jellies, jams, but did not reach, perhaps the most important of all: lager beer. We paid for all our samples but kept quiet as to the purpose to which they were destined. The NEWS LETTER had the good fortune to secure the services of, perhaps, the most accomplished quantitative, and qualitative analyst that ever came to this coast. The late Dr. John Bleasdale D. D. had no superior as an analytical chemist in this country, and probably in no other. He took hold of the work for this paper with a zest born of his interest in the subject. Samples were obtained for him in two parts, one to be analyzed by him; the other to be retained as evidence that the analysis of the first was correct. When the undeniable results were reached they were written up in words that breathed and in thoughts that burned, by a writer who was then and still continues a contributor to these columns. The microscopic examples of horribly bad products were enlarged, engraved and printed, and samples of sugar, full of live insects, were kept on our office counter, and materially lessened the sales of the candy makers. The exposures we made of whiskey and imported wines were almost beyond belief. The fusil oil in the one, and the sulphuric acid in the other, rendered them both vicious and dangerous, beyond the power of the lay mind to comprehend. The milk proved to be worse, rather than better, than Mr. Dockery found it to be. There can be no doubt but that hundreds of innocent babes were being sent to untimely graves because of the poisonous character of the milk they then consumed.

The advantage Mr. Dockery had was that he was sustained by good officers, and strengthened laws. His earnestness in stamping out had milk brought him prestige from all quarters. The daily press, instead of being jealous of his success, hacked up his every good movement with support, as they ought to have done in all other cases. Moreover, public opinion had become educated and ripe for an earnest raid upon all adulteration in both food and drink, and thus we cheerfully concede that Mr. Dockery has hauled better than even he himself at first expected. But he has much yet to accomplish. He needs more help, better analytical arrangements and power to enforce quantitative, as well as qualitative virtues in all the food and drink that go to sustain the vim and force in young America. He needs to be, as happily he is now being, better backed up by the force of a healthier public opinion.

The NEWS LETTER recently pointed out the urgent need there is for looking into the wretched stuff sold under the name of Lager Beer. Some of it is not "kept" as long as it ought to be, it is vilely concocted, and most abominably adulterated, which, no doubt, accounts for the ill effects it has upon the policemen in our suburbs. The jams and jellies have not been severely enough dealt with as yet, and astonishing facts remain to be evolved. The milk campaign is on the wane, and needs stirring up. It should never be lost sight of. Many of the grocery stores need a watchful eye kept on them all the time. Eternal vigilance, on the part of the officers charged with the work, is the price of getting what you can buy and what you pay for in San Francisco. We are cheated in all we buy, from the cradle to the grave. When the NEWS LETTER sampled coffee, we succeeded in procuring one pure sample in all San Francisco, and that was in a little unpretentious shop; whilst the very worst specimen came from the then store that held up its head with more pretense and show than the others. Fraud in what we may buy, may be said to be every man's individual affair, but no one man can be an expert in everything. That is the truest experting which provides the greatest good for the greatest number.

The Grand Jurors Seeking Popularity.

The Grand Jury are travelling far afield of legitimate duty in search of popularity. A reduction of water rates may be an admirable thing to many consumers, but it may be loss and practical confiscation to a host of investors in a great public use. Of the two the latter has a right to no less fair play than the former. The one invests and risks his money in an enterprise which the other could not get along without, and saves the city from fire and drought. Nobody these times puts his money in the safest of local securities, such as banks, building societies and the like, at less than six per cent per annum. The Grand Jury of this city is poking its nose into a matter over which it has no judicial control, and for no other purpose, as we believe, than to gain a certain kind of popularity that has never proved as certain as it appeared on the surface. The owners of capital in this city are now so wide spread as to be abundantly able to take care of themselves. Demagogism is not as rampant as it was, and men are counting the cost of helittling capital in street cars, water works and the like. We are all seeing the local utility of owning a share in these public necessities. If the people are but honest they are about the best security a city can hold. Besides building up the municipality, they afford a perfect security among an honest community. They keep money and interest at home and localize municipal improvements. A dollar spent in improving our city is worth two dollars sent to improve some other city. The Grand Jury of this city and county has taken the Examiner's figures as correct, although they have time and time again been proven as inaccurate as its statements usually are. That is at least bad form for the grand inquest to find itself in, and tends to weaken the findings it has more right to deal with. As a matter of law it has nothing whatever to do with the water rates at all, unless it finds that somebody has been criminally stealing them. There was a law passed by the late Legislature that may cause grand juries to consider how they pass upon acts, over which they have no jurisdiction. "Reports not ending in indictments are no longer privileged," and are subject to prosecution as libels. It is a good law, unless the jury be held in public, and a hearing given to both sides. It is monstrous that men should get on to juries in order to wreak their vengeance on men better than themselves. This is frequently done, and is doing more than all other causes combined to bring our jury system into contempt. The filing of infamous law papers, in order to harken a man, but with no intention of trying them is one of the many outrages now perpetrated and at which the judges blink. Grand Jurors have in times passed perpetrated more malicious libels than all of our scandal loving newspapers put together. Hereafter, jury reports will have to be followed by indictments, or they will be per se libels. Jurors passing upon the charges for public utilities are practically declaring that some one is being allowed to steal. So grave a charge ought to be proven, and hereafter it will have to be, as is meet and right.

Holographic Wills.

When the holographic will of Mme. Saroni, who died in Alameda in January, was offered for probate before Judge Coffey last week, the acceptance of the instrument was opposed on the ground that it was not in legal form, and was therefore void. The testatrix, in dating her last testament, had failed to write in the full four figures of the year 1895. Following a general custom, she had employed an abbreviation: '95, rather than 1895. The contention of counsel was that this omission, which to the mind of the layman appears to be really trivial and unimportant, was vital; that '95" did not legally express the date of the will, and that it was therefore no will at all. Judge Coffey sustained this position, and in summing up, said: "It's a very astonishing thing, but every layman, every woman on top of the earth thinks that he or she can draw a will correctly. And not one of them can. I've no doubt that when Mme. Saroni drew that will, she imagined it to be perfect in every particular. Yet the omission of those apparently insignificant letters '18' in the date '1895' caused all this trouble. And it is an omission which is practiced by everybody, every day, too. . . . Why can't people obtain advice before attempting to draw such an important thing as a will." It has been held, and often truly so, that the tendency of courts is toward a technical construction and interpretation of laws; that this hair-splitting of sharp points frequently results in the defeat rather than promotion of justice. Our courts have often become, through the sharp practice of lawyers and the technical development of the bench, a means for the delay of relief, and sometimes its absolute denial. In the case of Mme. Saroni, whose intent appears to have been transparent and unmistakable, Judge Coffey was guided by the statutes. In the drawing of wills nothing can be taken for granted; the instrument can leave nothing for imagination or conjecture. The document must be complete within itself. In a comparatively recent case, one of the two witnesses to a will wrote his initials, but by some inexplicable mistake signed the surname of the testator as his own. The intent of the witness was clear and undoubted, and all the circumstances were susceptible of absolute proof; yet the court declared the instrument to be void. In another case in this State, the testator made a holographic will, in which every line was written by himself, with the exception of the year date, which was printed. He had taken a letter head with the figures 1880 printed thereon, but had in all other ways complied with the letter of the statutes. The court held, because of his failure to write with his own hand every character employed in bequeathing his property, that it was invalid. In any other instrument to which the man might have attached his name, the printed figures would have been sustained as sound and legal. The right to make testamentary disposition of property is not an inherent right or a right of citizenship, nor is it even a right granted by the Constitution. It rests wholly upon the legislative will, and gains its life and force from the statutes. In conferring that right, the Legislature has seen fit to prescribe certain exactions and requirements looking to the execution and authentication of the instrument, say the courts, and exact compliance with these requirements becomes necessary to its exercise. While the primary rule governing the interpretation of wills when admitted to probate recognizes and endeavors to carry out the intention of the testator, that rule cannot be invoked in the construction of the statute regulating their execution. In the latter case courts do not consider the intention of the testator, but that of the Legislature. Judge Coffey could have rendered no other decision with the least hope of having it stand finally.

A Telling Attack. Relief from the scourge of the new journalism seems not far distant, if one may judge from the systematic attacks now being quietly made in the East upon the Journal and World. As the venality and unstrained filth of these papers find justification in the unclean minds of their publishers in large sales, the only way in which the cure can come must be along similar lines. Realizing that no sense of shame or sentiment of self-respect could bridle those publishers, a vigorous boycott was inaugurated a short time ago by numerous societies, libraries, and other institutions. Among most recent additions to those that have purified their files by the exclusion of these sheets, we note the Omaha public library, public library at New Haven, Conn., New York Military Academy public library, the Brooklyn (N. Y.) Library, which is one of the largest in the country, and others. The total number of these societies that have purged their shelves number more than seventy-five. In themselves these amount to little; but their example and moral influence upon the general public in the East must be very great. No doubt thousands of individual subscribers have discontinued their support for similar causes. This is the only way in which the evils of unreliable, sensational, and fraudulent journalism can be bridled. It is idle to appeal to any other sentiment than that which controls the nickels. The business office receipts alone can settle the issue. When it becomes unprofitable to sink virtue and elevate crime, to outrage decency and heroize the low and brutal in man—then only will these shameless agents of immorality bend to a sense of right. To make wrong-doing unpopular with the new journalism it must be made unprofitable. The vigorous discipline undertaken in the East, which is a measure of self-protection, should continue. The new journalism should be made as odious as it is now odorous.

Against the Opera House. There have been many times within the past ten years when the need of a thoroughly equipped modern opera house in San Francisco has been felt. Before the approach of an opera company, or after its departure, the complaints have been loudest, and the demand apparently most insistent. This is natural, because at such times the painful object lesson is most clearly impressed upon the public mind. The recent French opera season in this city has again crystallized this dormant feeling, and grand opera house talk is heard among those who are patrons of the art. It is understood that the gentlemen who guaranteed a large sum in order to bring the French opera from New Orleans to San Francisco have been very seriously considering the advisability of organizing a company for the purpose of building an opera house in this city.

San Francisco is distant from other large centers, and pays the penalty of isolation whenever musical or other great attractions are obtained. This is particularly true of opera organizations where large numbers of people require transportation, necessitating an unavoidable and heavy expenditure, which must be guaranteed entirely independent of the merit of the companies or the support given them here. Thus we are compelled to secure the management against loss in the first instance, and in the second place accept good, had or indifferent artists as the case may be, and pay exorbitant fees for the privilege. Had the city a modern opera house, the two most objectionable and unjust features would be eliminated. The prices of admission would be reasonable, and the guarantee would not be necessary. San Francisco is a good show town, and is so recognized by every manager in the United States. If we had a suitable temple of music, meritorious companies, upon their own responsibility, would be willing to come here, depending upon the appreciation of a discriminating public for support, rather than a cast-iron guarantee in advance. Sufficient seating capacity would permit a popular scale of prices, so that, in very great measure, the cost of tickets in San Francisco would relatively be little, if any, higher than they are at the East. In fine, with a suitable opera house we should get infinitely better operas, pay much less for them, and would not be forced to guarantee expenses. Abundant money is here, and there ought to be little difficulty in stimulating the enterprise necessary for the construction of a grand opera house in this city—at once a broad public benefaction and an honor and source of profit to its promoters and stockholders.

A Good Road Fight. There is a fight in down right earnest in Kentucky over good roads. The populace is at war with private owners of public roads: This is the outcome of neglect in early days, and promises to recur here in our own State. The people were not enterprising enough in the past to make roads for themselves, so that this work was done for them by the corporations. In order to recompense themselves for the expense, the owners collected toll and paid themselves many times over. Is there not a disposition in California to procure our much needed roads in the same old way? Recently civilization has penetrated in Kentucky and citizens in that State who have traveled, have returned with tales of the ease with which farmers on Long Island now get to market over smooth, broad-highways, and how in even hilly New England and New Jersey, people may drive for miles without losing wheels, disabling horses or breaking vehicles. They have even witnessed bicyclers going to these regions, driving their wheels and spending their money among the inhabitants thereof. So the Kentuckians mean to have similar roads, come what will. As the private owners would do nothing and not sell out their rights-of-way, or their toll gates, the people have risen in their might and are burning the toll houses, driving away the toll takers, and, when resistance is offered, shooting the employees of the companies. In the end the people will have a larger bill of damages to pay than if they had paid an extravagant price for the right of way in the first place. The incident is instructive as it shows good roads to be a live subject. It is a most important matter to California, but we must begin right. We want good roads, but must tolerate no such thing as tolls upon them.

The Outlook Greece is not paying the deference to the so-called European Concert she once did, and Turkey is bent upon war no matter what else happens. This would seem to mean war all round, the extent and end of which no man may surely foretell. The European Concert will go to pieces, and divide according to their sympathies, or their supposed interests. Already both the Germans and Russians are showing their hands in favor of Turkey. The "Times" says that considerable comment is caused by the news from Constantinople that General Grumkoff, the well-known German military tactician, is going to Ellassona to inspect the Turkish military, and that Admiral Kallay of the German Fleet has gone to the Dardanelles to inspect the Turkish squadron and Flotilla there. The Russian Consuls have been instructed to do all in their power to influence Russian Christians to abstain from listening to evil counsels from their own countrymen, and to be patient and prudent. The Turks threaten to follow the Greeks into Thessaly and give battle at once. A despatch to the "Times" from Constantinople says it is evident from the Porte's language to the Powers, remains civil, but is tinged with scorn, and it renders clear that the concert of the Powers is not regarded there with the consideration paid to it prior to the wavering policy of Europe in dealing with Greece. A Vienna correspondent says that one of the least favorable consequences of the course of action taken by the Powers, is that it has not failed to overawe the Greeks, but there are unmistakable signs that it has diminished the prestige of the European Concert. All this means war with Russia and Germany on the one side, with, perhaps, England, France, Italy and Austria on the other. Denmark, Norway, Sweden and Greece will join in the fray on the one side, whilst, of course, Turkey will be expected to go with the other. It will be a terrible war and better the markets for American products. Our people are a mixed people, and will have mixed sympathies. Many will be for Russians who are esteemed friends, whilst not a few will be for England, although she is not as well liked as she might be. But we shall keep out of the fight, make money, and thank God it is an ill wind that blows nobody any good.

Striking at The proposed new tariff strikes sore discomfiture at Canadian industries, and would do more, were not the Dominion pretty well able to take care of herself. The Toronto Globe, the leading liberal organ of Canada, makes the point that "when the American tariff shuts out from the United States a dollar's worth of Canadian products, it does for all practicable purposes send that dollar's worth of Canadian products into the British market, there to compete with the products of the United States." But if we want that kind of competition, our neighbors declare perfect readiness for it. If we drive them to look to Great Britain for their market, it will be to their advantage to secure more favorable terms than are given to us, and therein reappears the Zollverein scheme of the Imperialists, which we practically force the Canadian liberals to adopt. We thus, without intending it, help to consolidate and build up the British Empire. It is not a proposal in the line of John Sherman's scheme to be content with three great republics, the United States, Canada, and Mexico. The more each buys from the others, the less there will be to huy from abroad. That is the way to build up American interests and cause pan-Americanism to thrive.

The Betterments How to make pavements good and of Pavements. keep them so, has been one of the live questions for San Francisco, time out of mind. The last movement has been to bring the Merchants' Association together with the teamsters, in order to devise the best possible pavements for the different portions of the city. They do not materially disagree. The teamsters are for basalt blocks for streets that carry heavy loads, and the association urged, whilst the carriers did not disapprove, of the use of asphalt and wooden block pavements, where the owners are not averse to that kind of street. The two plans ought to settle the whole matter, if the parties on both sides are really sincere in the agreement they have reached. But we doubt their sincerity. They both agree or rather rely upon "the pull" they individually have. The carriers are politicians to a man, and exercise the influence that all organizations of public men do. The Association yet lacks the power to pull together, and would be likely to get beaten every time. Stone blocks are favored in the heavy business part of the city, whereas the smoother, and less noisy pavement is desired in the quieter suburbs. These two interests have long clashed and are likely to fight it out on the same old lines. It will be every man for himself, with no promise of God for us all. The agreement reached, if there were any likelihood of its being adhered to, would give good results. The Belgium Blocks give fairly good satisfaction from the water front to Sansome, and for the first half of Market, but in all the region beyond that, they are a nuisance and out of place. Wooden, or stone blocks, laid on sand, and covered with bitumen, make the very best possible roads for the suburbs, and, if a vote were taken, would be sustained by an immense majority vote of the dwellers outside of the city proper. The city officials should take care to provide for due competition in building the different kinds of roads. Special attention should be given to good building and to good workmanship.

The Sierra The early construction of a feeder to the Southern Pacific railway system by an independent company, tapping the rich mining districts between Stanislaus and Mariposa Counties, will be of great benefit to the sections through which the rails will be laid, and will prove a valuable addition to the side lines of the greater corporation. The road will be 124 miles in length, starting at Oakdale in Stanislaus County and ending at Coulterville in Mariposa County. The line will be of the greatest value in developing the country through which it runs, and will very greatly stimulate all agricultural interests of those sections. The growth of interior California has been retarded because of the lack of trunk line feeders. This has in some measure been unavoidable, because railroads are constructed only when there is reasonable expectation of return upon investment of capital and payment of fixed charges. In the present case, the line will be of benefit to the two great interests of California—mining and agriculture. The road completed will reach the heart of the mining districts of Calaveras, Amador, and Tuolumne Counties. Touching, as it will, the great Mother Lode, the "Sierra Railroad Company of California" will open up a section that has hitherto been accessible only by tedious, expensive, and circuitous routes, but which has for many years been an immense contributor to the gold aggregate of the State. It is the most important part of California at present without railroad connection. Work is already under way, and several miles of track are now laid. Incidentally, the road will greatly shorten the distance to the Yosemite Valley from this city.

Letting Down The Republican administration is not keeping the pledge of its platform. It promised faithfulness to the Civil Service rules, but is violating them at every turn. "The present crush of office-seekers," says the fair and reliable Springfield Republican, "may have been equaled, but never has been exceeded in the past." Senator Cullom offers an interesting view of the situation. He left word with the house servant one evening to send callers up to his second floor. "In a short time every available chair in the room was occupied, and in sheer despair he suggested that an overflow meeting be held in the bedroom. This did not deter the horde of office-seekers, but they took the Senator at his word and proceeded to file into his sleeping apartment, where there were beds and sleeping chairs, and lounges, too. Those who could not be accommodated with chairs, sat on the sides of the beds until they broke down, and then waited until they could obtain an interview. Meanwhile, the Washington correspondents are sending home word that the civil service bars are being let down in all directions. The consuls are to go, because it is said there are inferior men (Democrats) who cannot be got rid of in any other way. This is not what the country expected, nor what the platform promised. Ere long the cry will be: "Oh, for a month of Cleveland!" The plain fact is that we have a weak administration, out of which very little good can come.

ART JOTTINGS.

THE artists have been industrious this spring. A good deal has been done in both in-door and out-of-door painting. Portraits in oil and pastel have come into fashion, and this once almost totally neglected branch of art has experienced a distinct revival.

Fred Yates has completed a portrait in oil of General W. H. L. Barnes. It has all the strength and peculiarities of Yates, and is of the distinct Rembrandtish type. The likeness is good, though perhaps possessing more sternness than the genial General usually wears, even when undergoing that ordeal of sitting for his picture. The shadows, a la Rembrandt, are so heavy that the outline of the perspective portion of the face is almost merged in the deep color. But Yates has made a hit in England, and those dark canvases are the correct thing in portraits.

Joseph D. Strong has no end of demands for his pastel pictures. He has completed portraits of Bruce Elder, W. H. Bagley, and Tony Hellman, the latter in full length. All three are admirable, and will bring more grist to Mr. Strong's mill.

Joseph A. Harrington, the Roman painter, has done up Andromeda chained to her rock, and awaiting the arrival of her faithful lover. While there are some fine points in this last work of Mr. Harrington, it is to be regretted that he was not more fortunate in his selection of a model. The face of the daughter of Kephens would not be likely to attract the regards of such a dashing fellow as Perseus, nor does her décolleté costume disclose any remarkable charms. A head of Archbishop Alemany is a gem; indeed, by all means the best portrait of that good prelate that has been executed.

In landscape, Joullin exhibits an Indian scene, a prairie with wigwams in the distance and two Indian figures in the foreground. It is a pleasing picture, delicate in tone and color, and shows careful study.

Charles Rollo Peters was in town this week, with some of his moonlights from Monterey. A lone and weird cypress tree outlined against a sombre sky, and a long streak of moonlight on the water, is a very clever bit of painting, and indicates how closely Peters has applied himself to the study and expression of moonlight effects. An old house, the moonlight falling on the gables, and dark grasses in the foreground, and moonrise on the water, will be hung at the spring exhibition of the Art Association. Peters sent some of his characteristic work to London recently, which was commented on by "The Sketch" in the most laudatory phrase. It is likely that this artist will leave for London in December, and make it his future home.

Cadenasso exhibits a landscape, showing much improvement on his last olla-podrida of sky and cloud. His sky is still considerably stirred up, but the trees in the foreground are good in color, and indicate how closely he is following Keith in his treatment of those subjects.

The artist members of the Bohemian Club have introduced a new and interesting feature, sketching in the wine room of the club on the panels, which has not only furnished much amusement, but has also produced many clever caricatures, some excellent portraits, and several charming bits of landscape. During the year this club has acquired in all twenty-six new pictures, which brings its art collection up into the hundreds.

The name "Maison Riche," at Geary and Grant avenue, at once calls up pleasant memories of hanquets and feasting. This restaurant is one of the landmarks of the Coast—noted alike for the completeness of its cuisine, the quality of its wines, its perfect service, and refined, polite attention. An elegant dinner is served at the Maison Riche from 6 to 9 o'clock every day, and the gratification of the taste is made more complete by choice selections played by a string band.

Board of Health's Investigation

MILKS and

CREAMS.

An Item of Interest TO MOTHERS

It has been disclosed by the investigation of Dr. Wenzell, the chemist of the Board of Health, that the so-called evaporated creams are nothing but pure and simple condensed milk, and in many instances very poor condensed milk at that, and while little or nothing can be said in favor of these evaporated creams by Dr. Wenzell still less is said in favor of most brands of condensed milk, which suffer equally under his searching analysis.

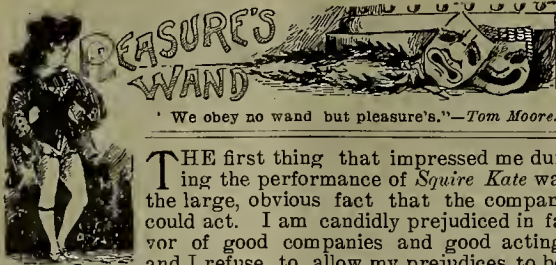

Amidst all this investigation and hue-and-ery one prominent fact has been brought out with unusual distinctness, and that is, the

of Condensed Milk has passed through the fiery furnace of investigation of a most searching character, with its usual great success.

Every brand, except the Gail Borden Eagle Brand, that has come under the attention of the chemist, has had more or less criticism bestowed upon it, but the Gail Borden Eagle Brand has been found to be without a single flaw, and has been pronounced to be the purest and the richest in quality of any brand on the market; superior to evaporated creams in richness; stronger than any milk now before the public.

The Pure Food investigation bids fair to be a most searching one, and the public have a great interest at stake, and it is with pleasure that we refer now to one brand that seems to have met with the approval of all.

'We obey no wand but pleasure's.'—Tom Moore.

THE first thing that impressed me during the performance of Squire Kate was the large, obvious fact that the company could act. I am candidly prejudiced in favor of good companies and good acting, and I refuse to allow my prejudices to become corrupt. Gaudy stars and cheap-Jack companies may come and go, but there will still remain persons who have seen good acting somewhere at some time, and will recognize craft of the same quality, or anything like the same quality, just as soon as they meet it face to face, and not a moment sooner, even if it takes a whole season. This form of stuhhornness is too common, perhaps, to give distinction to any one of its devotees, but in the instance of critics, say, it will at least keep the one kind from being confused with the other—those unconscious humorists of the press who promote the gaiety of the county by shouting such loud and loud esteem for every tramp show outfit which wends westward, that when something of real art value comes along it finds them hoarse and speechless.

For me there is some art in this fantastic melodrama of the soil, and much art in the earnest, competent acting of it by Georgia Cayvan and her associate players; and for the casual playgoer—the one who pays his money and expects to be entertained without worrying about the how or why of it—there is, it seems to me, capital diversion in the play and the acting. The manager of a theatre reverses this order of things by very sensibly considering his public first and his critics afterward; but in this instance he gets two strong elements of success either way: artistic value and popular value. At a first glance many persons, having seen much rustic scenery and not remembering how little a play they usually got with it, will say that what Squire Kate lacks is novelty—or they may even concede that the good acting constitutes that, and entirely overlook what, to us of Western America, is a suggestion of novelty in the way of dramatic literature. I mean by this that the average patron of the theatre will not note, or, possibly, care to note, the Ibsenite flavor of Robert Buchanan's play. And for two good reasons: one is, that the average patron, having unconsciously taken his Ibsen in small, diluted doses from small playmakers (who in turn had got their Norwegian essence from somebody else at second-hand) thinks no more of the cunning Ibsen sub-urbanity tincturing the play he witnesses than he does of the microbes making merry in the water he drinks; the other is that Mr. Buchanan, while in some respects a modern, is still far too respectable and usual a man to entirely disbelieve in the debilitated logic which taught our grandparents to reason, "if all the world's a stage, then all the stage's a world." Mr. Buchanan pins his colors to the New only so far as he can make them fuse with the Old. He has neither the foolhardiness nor the genius, nor yet the lack of romantic idealism to get his play so near to earth and close to humanity, so far from Stageland and all its pretty refinements and trustful traditions, that it would reveal a soul-exposure of ourself or our neighbor, which might be strong and absorbing, but surely not tasty or decorative. And if he had given us an expression of Life—Life as it is not lived on the stage—unfrescoed and unperfumed, it is more than probable that we would have received it frowning and blinking and wondering what it was all about.

It is because this play, with all its incorrigible optimism and picturesquely pathetic ending, occasionally comes so near to huge, unvarnished Truth that I have taken this round-about way of considering it. It were an easy matter to be brief and just, and say that Mr. Buchanan had written a play of strong dramatic incident and feeling, and written it vigorously and well in all acts but the last. But he has done more than that. He has given us a study of a big, sturdy, open-hearted, country-bred woman, who gives up all the rough tenderness of her heart to a man, who, instead of loving her, as she supposed, loves her sister; and her sister loves him—the softly-nurtured little sister whom she had mothered and cuddled and protected at every sacrifice to herself. With this for a theme, Mr. Buchanan set about the work of elaboration bravely, but with fatal disregard of his inability to cope with the last act. The strong sister—Squire Kate she is called, for she is the owner of the little Sussex farm where the scenes are placed—not only loves where it is hopeless, but is hopelessly loved by her farm overseer, a man of few words, much generosity, and many virtues. Besides handling the mortification, rage and passionate grief of Kate after she comes upon the lovers in the field and sees that George is not for her, and the diminuendo of all this high feeling—which must be accomplished before Kate reaches the hysterical calm of her renunciation scene—the author imposes upon himself the task of sustaining throughout the piece the tranquil, faithful, deprecating devotion of Jeoffery the overseer. And as this of necessity makes the psychologic contrast between these two hopeless loves one of the most urgently potent possibilities of the play, it is particularly exasperating that Mr. Buchanan realizes this possibility only by such flimsy make-shift as Jeoffery's weird suspicion that Kate had poisoned her little sister, and the gushing finale where Kate hesses the lovers, dowers them with every pound of her legacy, and permits Jeoffery to continue in his modest hope that some day she may be his. The ending is of course a compromise with those peculiar patrons of the drama who would not enjoy their after-theatre supper unless the play closed with respectable gladness. But it is bad art any way you take it.

For the rest of Squire Kate I have nothing but good will. If I have thought that it might have been a bigger play it is all the author's fault for writing something which is important enough to be taken seriously.

This is the first I have seen of Miss Cayvan in several years, and it seems even longer than that. I went to the Columbia Monday night remembering her as the feminine Herbert Kelcey of the Lyceum Company; a woman well grown and well groomed, always in the best of health, if looks counted. I used to wonder why some enterprising medicine manufacturer did not get out an edition of Georgia Cayvan's "System Builder," or "Pulmonary Balsam," or "Bloom of Life." It would have sold. It would sell still. But I had no such thoughts Monday night. I forgot the enthusiastic health of Miss Cayvan—in truth, I forgot all about Miss Cayvan. I was so absorbed in the girl Kate. And in the third week of Skinner, Skinner, Skinner, it was real refreshment to forget, even for a little while, that there was such an accomplishment as star acting. So far as I remember, Squire Kate is the best acting Miss Cayvan has ever given San Francisco. It seems to be limited only by the weak spots of the play, for if ever a part fitted an actress, this one fits Georgia Cayvan.

That effusive "womanliness" of voice which used to duet with Mr. Kelcey's high-bred elocution in the old Lyceum days now finds a character value in every word that Kate utters; those incurable gestures that once played havoc among the Lyceum scenery are now fitting the action to the word, as Mr. Skinner would say. In all seriousness, Miss Cayvan's work in this play is something to thrill to and remember. That second act! The farce-comedy situation of the little army of suitors rushing to Kate's farm so soon as she has got the legacy—the absurdity of the courting—the absurdity of George's old stepfather joining the ranks, asking her to marry him—the dramatic moment and swift surprise of his asking her to marry George—George, whom she has loved so long and silently, and who, she thinks, loves her. Then the exaltation, the shy, awkward pride when she meets George—for us who sit in front there is something unspeakably pitiable, cruel, tragic in her very bumptious coyness, as we look ahead and see the humiliation that must follow. It is a remarkable act in the first place, and it is remarkably acted in the second. In the third act comes the storm. Kate comes in at the log gateway in the twilight. Her sister is in the field in George's arms. Then breaks the fury of the woman scorned. It has the power of vulgarity, the strength of long repression; it falls with sheer, blind brutality on the lovers' heads. Nature may have been generous in equipping Miss Cayvan for these scenes, but I hend low to the art that knows when to let nature take its course

The last act is a sad drop. I will not discuss it.

My space is short. I cannot mention all the good acting in Squire Kate, but there is room for the bad. Frank Athery, as the overseer, does all the bad acting. Please remember, one bad actor in a cast of fifteen! Well, one Mr. Athery is enough. If I had the space I should make special paragraphs for George Woodward and Orrin Johnson. Their work was spotless.

Otis Skinner gave the rest of his repertory at the Baldwin during the week, and while I saw more or less of his Shylock, Richard III., Romeo and Claude Melnotte, I find myself in a poor way to write anything about them that Mr. Skinner's previous efforts have not inspired me to write before. Shylock being a part that, first of all, demands the semblance of age and a certain amount of unique characterization, was to me thoroughly unsatisfying, if for no other reasons than that Shylock's years were insufficiently suggested by several score, and his character stopped at the make-up.

It is Bernard Shaw, I believe, who says, "Richard is the prince of Punches: he delights man by provoking God, and dies unrepentant and game to the last." Mr. Skinner's Richard doubtless provokes God; not by incurate fiendishness and a devil's wit, but by the utter absence of wit appreciation on the part of the actor. Man is less tolerant than his Maker, so we are not expected to take kindly to a Richard whose humor is farce-comical and whose rage is bathetic.

Youthful Romeo, tingling with romance and heroism, found a happier life at Mr. Skinner's hands. But the surprise of the week was Claude Melnotte. He bounded from the grave, gave the jubilant ha! ha! to the critics who had written his epitaph so many years ago, and drew the biggest house of the Skinner season.

* * *

Somebody told me the Merilles Sisters were very naughty girls, so I went to the Orpheum to see for myself, intending, of course, to write them a few lines of Christian reproof if this were true. It is not true. The Misses Merilles are merely gay. Their skirts are short and their stockings are ebarged with curves that are all their own, and they dance with wonderful poise and fling, andsing a song of peaceful measure that is good to hear—even if you cannot understand the words—but the Misses Merilles are moral.

ASHTON STEVENS.

The Tivoli springs a sensation on the town with the announcement, for week after next, of Charles Villiers Stanford's new opera, Shamus O'Brien and Denis O'Sullivan, who created the title role in the English production. It is a timely stroke of enterprise, for it gives us a celebrated operatic work while it is still in the glow of London and New York success, and our townsman O'Sullivan, while he is still in the enthusiasm of his maiden fame. Dr. Stanford is essentially a modern composer, and this, his most ambitious work, has made him one of the celebrated tone dramatists of the day.

Georgia Cayvan plays Squire Kate at the Columbia until Monday night, when Mary Pennington, Spinster is the bill. This play is said to be a satire on the "advanced woman," showing that in spite of modernity and independence, a woman's heart, like murder, will out. Later in the week Miss Cayvan will present a double bill of Goblin Castle, a comedy by Mrs. Elizabeth Bisland, and The Little Individual, a comedietta by Thomas Haynes Bayley.

The Orpheum opens Monday with its big Easter bill. Sig. Achille Alberti, late baritone of Mapelson's company, and Mme. Annina Orlandi, late soprano of the same organization, will sing selections from the Italian operas. Marzelli and Millay, comedy acrobats; Ed Latelle, comedy musical artist, and our old friends, the educated monkey and the cultured baboon—who will exhibit Herr Graiss in friendly and scientific tricks—make up the rest of the newcomers.

In the meantime, Benedict's Irish opera, The Lily of Killarney—which, by the way, is not noticeably Irish, in music, flavor, or dramatic, either, but cheerful and melodious in the old, popular style—is doing so well that it will be continued until the coming of Shamus. There will be a wealth of comparison between these two works, the old and the new.

Primrose and West's minstrels open at the Baldwin tomorrow (Sunday) night. They gave an excellent show at the California last year, and we are promised even more this time. George H. Primrose, William H. West, George Wilson, Jimmy Wall and all the fluent favorites are on the bill, also the other baud of gorgeous gentlemen who are not colored but born that way.

Thursday afternoon, at the Columbia, gives us the last of the present season of symphony concerts. In addition to an attractive instrumental programme—which includes Rubenstein's 5th Symphony, a work new to San Francisco—Denis O'Sullivan, the hero of Shamus O'Brien, will sing.

GAYETIES OF FORTY YEARS AGO.—Third Paper.

AMONG the public balls of the '70 decade was the grand calico ball at Platt's Hall, February 1872, in aid of charity. Mrs. General Schofield, Mrs. James Otis, Mrs. O. C. Pratt, and Mrs. Cutler McAllister were among the ladies who received. Colonel Julian McAllister, John Middleton, Noble Eaton, James L. Beyea, Eugene Deuprey, Alfred VerMehr, Hugh Davidson, and A. J. LeBreton were among the floor managers. The ladies all wore cambric or calico dresses. Mrs. Lloyd Tevis and Mrs. Frank Hassey wore yellow; Mrs. Shorb, Miss Lotty Hall, and Miss Lizzie Miller in black and white; Miss Theresa Lawton and Miss Laura De Russey in blue; Miss Head' Miss Carrie Gwin, Lilly Tompkins, Fanuy Daniels and Mary Mears were in white. Mrs. Sam Wilson, Mrs. Frank Pixley, Mrs. J. R. Jarboe, Mrs. W. H. S. Barnes, Miss Flora Main, wore Dolly Vardens.

Another calico ball was given in Union Hall on January 8, 1874, which was also for charity; during the evening Mme. Anna Bishop sang several ballads, notably "Home Sweet Home;" and "the little sisters," twelve in number, sold boutonnieres. Mrs. Ralston wore corn color, Mrs. Lilly Coit drablineu; Mme. Gros, Mrs. Jos Spear Jr., Miss Mamie Reilley, Mrs. D. J. Staples were in white. The prettiest and most effective dress in the room was worn by Miss Lita Ogden, a charming combination of black and yellow.

A Dickens Ball was given at Union Hall in 1874, at which Sumner Bugbee personated Charles Dickens, Louis Townsend as Dr. Venus, George Bromley and Smyth Clark were the Cherryble brothers, Mrs. Sophie Macconochie personated Mrs. Luttrell, Mrs. de Haven, Dolly Varden, Carrie Wyatt, Oliver Twist.

On October 12, 1877, Senator Sharon gave a reception at Belmont in honor of General Sherman, when the Earl of Dufferin, Governor-General of Canada, and the Countess of Dufferin were also his guests. The opening quadrille was danced by General Sherman and Lady Dufferin, Lord Dufferin and Miss Sherman, Major-General McDowell and Miss Cameron, Secretary of War Cameron and Miss Sharon.

It must not for a moment be supposed that San Francisco's early day society was dependent upon public balls for its pleasures. Quite the contrary in fact, for not alone were there many delightful little home dances, weddings, and frolics of various kinds, but there were excursions by land and by water, every excuse being taken advantage of for one or the other.

It must be confessed, however, that water parties were the most popular, land travelling being a pursuit of pleasure under difficulties. Among the earliest of these water parties was one given by Messrs. Jos. A. Donohoe and John Y. Hallock of this city and Edgar Mills of Sacramento, who in June 1859, decided upon taking a tour around the world, and they made their departure the occasion of a most charming party d'adieu.

Of course this was long before the days of steamers across the broad Pacific Ocean and the voyage to the Orient had to be made by sailing ships. The vessel which was to bear these three gentlemen away, was the clipper ship "Storm King," and to see them sail and at the same time wish them bon voyage, they chartered the steamer "Surprise" and invited a number of their friends to accompany them on it as far as the Heads. The day proved a most beautiful one for such an affair; the water was like glass and of wind there was no more than a gentle breeze. The company assembled at the wharf, where the steamer lay alongside, at ten A. M., and on going aboard a band of music was heard discoursing a selection of inspiring airs which when once the steamer started was changed to dance music, so that while a tour round the bay was made tripping the light fantastic was indulged in by the three hosts and their guests. The dance was followed by an elaborate luncheon when champagne flowed like water, in which the departing ones were toasted again and again. In the mean time the "Storm King" had sailed down the bay and off Fort Point lay to for her passengers, and when they left the steamer's side in the Clipper's boat, cheer after cheer followed them across the dividing waters. The "Surprise" accompanied the "Storm King" as far as the Heads, reaching the city upon its return late in the afternoon.

An excursion which was of a combined public and private character, was the occasion of the launch of the first Man-of-War built upon this coast. This vessel was known first as "No. 2," then the "Toucey," and finally the "Saginaw." The launch took place at the Navy Yard, Mare Island, on the 3rd of March 1859, and as befitted the importance of such an event it was made a very gala affair. For the general public the steamer "Wilson G. Hunt" under command of Capt. R. J. Vandewater went up from the city with about four hundred people, reaching the Island about noon. Two other excursion steamers also carried passengers from San Francisco, and crowds arrived from Benicia and other parts of the country thereabouts. Captain James B. Alden, U. S. N. (afterwards Admiral Alden), then on this coast in command of the Surveying steamer Active, was ever on the qui vive for just such an occasion for the frolic on board his vessel, and several days previous to the third, printed invitations were sent from him and his officers to nearly all the best known members of the social world to witness the launch under their protecting care. It is almost needless to say there was not a single regret received in reply. The deck of the Active was covered in with flags and the band of the Sixth Infantry provided music for dancing, which was kept up unflaggingly until Mare Island was reached, about the same time that the "Hunt" arrived. There were fully five thousand people assembled to see the new ship glide into its future element which was done at precisely thirteen minutes to one o'clock, Miss Molly Cunningham, daughter of the Commandant of the Navy Yard, performing the ceremony of naming the vessel. As soon as the launch was successfully accomplished, Capt. Alden's guests were invited to the Commandant's house, where a handsome luncheon was provided for them. Over the entrance door hung a square of white linen on which was painted the words:

"Welcome to see
The Toucey to sea."

After luncheon the entire company joined the rest of the excursionists in the carpenter shop, which was very tastefully decorated with flags, and there was more dancing for a couple of hours. At half past three the signal gun was fired and a start soon after made for home.

An excursion of which mention should not be omitted was the one given by Collector John F. Miller in honor of Queen Emma of the Sandwich Islands during her visit to San Francisco in September 1866. For this purpose the Shubrick was called into service, the party consisting among others of Her Majesty and suite, Major-General Halleck and staff, Colonel Drum, Hawaiian Consul Hitchcock, Collector Miller and a number of ladies. Alcatraz was the first point visited, Major Darling receiving the party and doing the honors of that Island. Thence a trip round the bay was made, a royal salute of twenty-one guns greeting the steamer as she passed Black Point. General French was in waiting at Fort Point, where some target firing (with the big guns of those days) was done for the entertainment of Queen Emma, after which Angel Island was rounded. During the trip an elaborate luncheon was served, the military band on board providing the music for the occasion.

THE CENTURY CO. announces an educational competition. It is on a most interesting and original plan. Thirty-five prizes, amounting to $1000 (first prize $500), will be given for the best answers to 150 questions. The topics selected deal with matters of general information ; they are not scholastic, but are educational. Your training at school was only mental drill; you have forgotten all you learned there but "reading, writing, and arithmetic." You will never forget the information derived from answering these questions, because every one deals with a living and useful fact. No cube-roots, no parsing, no memorizing of dates; instead, the learning of things that every one ought to know. If you make an honest attempt to win, you will learn to concentrate your mind; sharpen your wits, secure most valuable information, and stand a good chance of making $500 (perhaps $ 000; see below). If you gain first prize, the knowledge you have acquired will be worth more to you than the $500 you receive.

To find the answers to these questions you must use the encyclopedic material in The Century Dictionary and Cyclopedia, because these, like thousands of others, can best be answered by reference to this great work. If you do not already possess a set, you can easily procure one. A limited number of clubs are now being formed for the purchase of sets at the lowest wholesale price. Each person joining a club (and those who apply at once can join) secures his set at a reduction of 40 per cent., and has the further privilege of paying for it in small monthly payments. A first payment of $5 will bring you the work and enable you to try for the first prize of $500, as well as the supplementary prize of $500 more.

The 150 questions are divided into three sets of 50 each. A month is allowed to answer each set. Try them at home. They will be an intellectual recreation for you and your family ; also a good test of your ability to deal with words and facts. Have your children try them; it will be a real education for them. Write to us for sample questions, to see how instructive and useful they are, or for a description of the work.

$500 MORE. We offer a further prize of $500 to the competitor who, laying aside The Century, succeeds most successfully in answering 90 per cent. of these questions from ten other works of reference, no matter in how many volumes each is published. This offer is made for the purpose of showing that The Century is superior not to any other one work of reference, but to any other ten.

MISS Julia Crocker is being pestered to death, her friends declare, by people asking her when her wedding is to come off, and why it is not to be a June wedding, which is the great fad just now. Apropos of June weddings, the list of army affairs is likely to be increased, says gossip, and the maid-of-honor at one of the weddings already announced for that date is spoken of as the probable bride number three. Not of one man bien entendu, but in the trio of pretty girls who will don bridal robes at that time.

There is a rumor that a very wealthy matron who has three daughters is meditating a trip to Japan with them and a party of young friends. A visit to Honolulu has become a means to the end of one or two matrimonial engagements in the swim, and there is no saying what an extended ocean voyage might not accomplish in swelling the number, there being an old saying about the wonderful results obtainable by propinquity.

A prominent member of society was complaining the other day upon the scarcity of nice tourist travel this year; but the trouble lies in the fact that "nice tourists" are not entertained and welcomed as of yore. A put-up at the club, and possibly a dinner by one's hanker, is all they receive from San Francisco society nowadays. So whose fault is it that our girls do not oftener meet agreeable, well-bred Eastern men on a visit to the Coast?

At length that incorrigible old bachelor, Claude Terry Hamilton, is said to be captured by Cupid's wiles, and surely, to judge from appearances at the recent wedding breakfast, things looked very much that way. Well, Claude is an awfully nice young fellow, and hence the woman and the lucky "she" is to be congratulated sincerely, if the thing is a go.

The numerous social friends of Mr. W. S. Jones are delighted to find that hospitable gentleman resuming the charming little musicales which have made his name famous. Mr. Jones has very powerful adjuncts in the singing of Mrs. McGavin and Miss Bowie, while his recherché suppers are feasts in themselves.

The people in and about San Mateo and B'lingham are in raptures over the acquisition to their neighborhood of Colonel Fred Crocker and family. The beautiful residence, erstwhile the home of the Willie Howards, will be occupied by the Colonel, his young family, and their grandmother, Mrs. A. M. Easton, during the coming summer.

How true it is that once Dame Fortune turns her head in your direction, she showers you with gifts. The genial Downey Harvey is an illustration of this, and his friends are joshing him as to who will be the next to leave him coin. But every one is glad to know of his good luck.

When a married man who is inclined to be flirtatious—to put it mildly—adopts the paternal tone with young girls of a breezy style, he should burn his boats behind him, and not let a jealous wife find documentary evidence in his pockets when he comes home o'ights.

If girls would only ever learn to be cautious as to whom they write and how they write, the "cute little notes," which are so dangerous in the hands of an unprincipled man. A well-known society girl can now acknowledge the wisdom of this.

One of the most attractive girls in society is the graceful young daughter of A. N. Drown, the well-known lawyer. Miss Bernie is very popular with her own sex as well as with the beaux, which is an evidence of her worth.

There is a lady in society whose great boast is that she can lure a man to the very verge of the proprieties and then bring him up standing in "haughty scorn." Men and boys, beware! Take warning by this timely hint.

DEAR EDITH: Nature, intended, no doubt, that woman should look beautiful, and the gay Parisians, I think, are justified in improving upon an adage that a woman has the right to look as young as she can. They hold that it is her duty to cheat old Father Time, rather than a passive privilege; and they all live up to the obligation with more than religious promptness. In this determination the modistes and dressmakers ably assist the fair Parisienne, so that the battle against old age is a winning one up to a period long after we Americans have resigned ourselves to the passé, the yellow leaf. A friend of mine, just writing from the French capital, describes most entertainingly her recent experience among the styles and the married ladies of Paris. She says:

"Let me describe a group of young matrons, among whom were Lady Terrence Blackwood and the Countess of Essex, trying on gowns for Easter. In Paris they have such a delightful way of showing dresses. You walk through the prettiest rooms, sip the clearest tea, and hear all the gossip while "trying on" the most beautiful French creations. Had there been no names mentioned I should have asserted that not one of these matrons was on the sunny side of thirty—nearer forty, most of them—yet their gowns gave them the delicate figures of young girls. The Easter gown of the Countess of Essex was of mignonette grenadine over green taffeta. A little green satin stripe ran through the goods. The waist had a vest and lapels of pale green satin-faced cloth, and the hat repeated the pale green shade and was set off with black plumes. Another dress, a black and white striped canvas goods, was made up over white silk. The material was not really silk, but that heavy imitation of silk which wears so well, and is called by so many names. These materials are patented, many of them, and very useful, being cheap and silky. The tiniest bolero of dahlia silk fell over the shoulders, and there was a belt and collar of dahlia. Another gown was of full primrose ladies' cloth, with a satin face. At the side there was a panel of white cloth, with gold embroidery, and the yoke was of the same material. Another dress was of the new royal purple, lined freely with changeable taffeta. These gowns were none of them marvelously elegant, but they gave a nice hint of the coming fashions in materials and colors. From them it might be learned that navy blue and seal brown have "gone out," and their places been taken by purples, greens, and reds. A very pretty gown, also of the X-ray variety, was of canvas plaid. This is silk stripes plaid in a field of openwork; the stripes are silk. This is to be worn on all street occasions over a brown taffeta. In the house, or for calling or dress occasions, it will be slipped over tan silk. This wearing of one X-ray dress over several slips is a trick much resorted to by economic matrons. The under slip is cut in princess shape, without a belt. The skirt has an ingenious arrangement of godet plaits in the hack that makes it set out well underneath the canvas outside. The waist is puffed in front for the same reason, but otherwise, in plainness of back and sides, the under slip is a princess. All of the gowns shown me had some pretty, soft finish of lace or chiffon at the neck and wrists. For French women insist on fluffy materials coming next to their faces and hands, especially if they are no longer young."

Mining Sharps.

There are some people in this city who have come to the conclusion recently that "there are others," when it comes down to accusing California mining men with sharp practice in promoting the sale of property on the market at home or abroad. For a time past an endeavor has been made to float a copper deposit alleged to exist on the west coast of Vancouver Island, and some fine specimens of ore have been received here. The bait was tempting enough to attract the most cautious investors, and a very prominent copper expert left to report on the property in the interest of a buyer, who was willing to take the mine if the ore in sight amounted to only one-half of what the owners claimed. He has returned disgusted and angry at what he terms a bold imposition on the part of the vendors. His samples taken are totally different from those previously received, and show no value whatever in the workings. He is now demanding the repayment of the money expended in travel there and back, threatening to sue for it. The only copper found was a small blow-out of little value, where the report called for a ledge of 270 feet in width. At another point where it was claimed the ledge was 1,500 feet wide, the prospect was absolutely valueless. This is one of the most extraordinary cases we have heard of for a long time in connection with mining promotion, for the reason that the owners are men of repute in other lines of business unless it is that mining is getting down to a par with horse trading, at which even a church deacon is apt to turn up a little shy now and again. Two of these men are well-known clothing dealers, one is a steamboat captain, another a big grocery man, and another a lawyer of good standing. Were it not that the reputation of the expert is above suspicion, a person would naturally suppose there was some mistake. As it is, it seems most outrageous to take a man so far away on a wild-goose chase. The case is one which we trust will be thoroughly investigated, for such conduct cannot but reflect most discreditably in the future upon our neighbors across the line. The properties in question are known as the Sareta River and Santa Maria Island, ou Barclay Sound.

Worrying Mine Owners.

The owners of promising properties all over the State are being literally worried to death by correspondents wanting an opportunity to dispose of their mines. The thousand and one promoters now engaged in mine selling on paper have a new system which is down to a very fine point. The plan is to look over the list of mines contained in the State Mineralogist's reports and the owners' address, accommodation in this line being arranged for on the last publication of the kind. He is then addressed a communication, setting forth the advantages to be derived by bonding his mine to the writer, who poses as a close associate of capitalists eager to own a California mine. Before the game became known, quite a number of mine owners fell into the trap, and paid the penalty by no end of annoyance and disappointment. It is needless to say that nine out of every ten of the writers are incapable of carrying out a single promise made in their haste to get bonds on property likely to attract a buyer.

Bankers in Convention.

The fifth annual convention of the California Bankers' Association will be held in Los Angeles, April 19th and 20th, in the rooms of the Concordia Club. The Executive Council will meet on Monday an hour prior to the assembling of the convention, which will be welcomed by General Forman, President of the Chamber of Commerce. Papers will be read by J. E. Baker of the Bank of Alameda, Frank A. Gibson of the First National Bank of Los Angeles, Charles Altschul of the London, Paris and American Bank (Limited), Lovell White of the San Francisco Savings Union, J. T. Burke of the San Francisco Clearing House, H. W. Magee, Bank Commissioner, and B. C. Wright of San Francisco. The Los Angeles Clearing House will entertain the visiting bankers.

The Market for Mines.

If one half of what appears in print could be believed about California mining, South Africa would not be in it, except as a graduation place for experts. The most extraordinary stories are retailed by the yard about strikes here, there, and everywhere, done up usually à la Margueritte, the Placer County bonanza, with its $75,000 assays. Mines of all sizes are on tap for the accommodation of the "leading expert" and the "prominent mining operator" with a grip on the Rothschild auricle, who are done up proud for a column or so as possible investors ready to perform the most extraordinary financial feats at a moment's notice. Wishy-washy bosh of the kind has become so voluminous that it is as nauseating as the cultured airs of the imported mining expert, particularly if he happens to have been a little successful. For all the talk and boasting going on, sales have been few and far between. The syndicated millions are in the air, bombastic conceptions of nickel-plated charlatans, posing for the edification of an untraveled class of people apt at all times to be deceived by appearances. Mine owners here are not so easily gulled as they were formerly, and they are, as a rule, about as approachable as a porcupine. Some of them are inclined to carry matters too far this way, although they certainly can scarcely be blamed, after the manner in which they have been trifled with and deceived. It is still possible, however, to dispose of $20 for $5 in property of this class, and any number of agents, or whatever they choose to call themselves, are on the look-out for the miner ready to sacrifice the labors of a life-time. The man with some money for legitimate development work on a small scale is still as scarce a commodity as ever.

The Pine-Street Market.

Enthusiasm is still dull in the local mining share market, and business is abnormally slow with the commission brokers. How some of the poorer men on the street hold on is a wonder to people outside the fraternity who have heretofore labored under the delusion that a stock-broker was a gilt-edged genius of expensive tastes, which had to be indulged at any cost. The mystery of it all just now is where a living could be made by one man in the business, let alone a hundred. Prices have firmed up a little in many instances of late, and would likely have done much better had it not been for the efforts made by men on the floor to turn a cent or two of profit on every opportunity. The speculative broker always gets ahead of the unfortunate outside operator, who pays a dollar each way to turn a few shares. A commission on one purchase and sale is not a bad day's work, judging from the lists, and a dealer on the floor can clean this up on a two-cent raise where the client could only come out even. With cross-cutting now well under way on the 500 level of Cbollar-Brunswick, and favorable conditions in Potosi and elsewhere along the old lode, better times might be looked for in the market, were there only some one to handle the stocks. Without a head to the game, it proves too monotonous to invite speculation. An assessment of 20 cents on Savage was levied during the week.

Big Electric Power Plant.

The most active mining operations in the State seem to center around the Rawhide mine of Tuolumne. Prospectors are as thick in its vicinity as flies around a cask of molasses, and from all that can be learned the travel in that direction shows no abatement. It is satisfactory to note that many of the mines are also looking very well, with no end of claimants for the distinction of being a "second Rawhide." It is a moral certainty that had it not been for this same Rawhide the chances are that the country side would have been as dull to-day as it was three years ago. There is no getting around that proposition. In the beginning of June work will be commenced and rushed through on the 1,000 horse-power electric plant for the Rawhide Company, which will be located either on the Stanislaus or Tuolumne river. The force generated will also be used in operating the machinery about the App mines.

THE total transactions of the Imperial Bank of Germany and its branches for 1895, were $30,000,000,000. This bank, in fact, performs in large measure the work of a clearing house for the business of the Empire.

"Hear the Crier!" "What the devil art thou?"

MISS Phoebe Couzius, a veteran in the suffrage war of Rebellion Against Tyrant Man, is railing at her sisters in general, and the San Francisco branch of the family in particular, because they do not pension her off handsomely. The unhappy lady is mad clear through because Doctor of Divinity and Envoy Extraordinary Anna Shaw is gobbling up golden shekels galore for her lectures, while she is laid up with the rheumatics, and can no longer hurl invectives from the platform at pantalooned oppressors of down-trodden woman. Her case should prove an awful warning to her sex.

A sorry sight, this, to behold—
A woman grown infirm and old,
Degenerated to a scold!

Behind her lies a wretched life
Whose loneliness and needless strife
Knew not the blessed name of wife.

'Tis true, mistakes are made; but then
The world, you know, is full of men,
And she who wills may wed again.

Oh, sisters, cease to tramp the earth.
Contented stay beside the hearth.
Fulfill the destiny of birth.

We men were made to love, not hate.
Take heed, before it is too late,
Lest yours may be poor Phoebe's fate!

MR. Dennis McCarty, who was to have banged Friday for "one of the bloodiest murders in the annals, etc.," has been so fortunate as to be discovered to be insane. The bloody taking-off of his victim is thus made the easier, and the Governor has granted the murderer a stay of execution for six months. It is pretty well recognized that we are all more or less insane—the only difficult problem is to determine just how intense this insanity must be to make murdering a safe occupation. Governor Budd has apparently fixed the point of demarcation, and can no doubt inform us.

THE career of Mrs. Carey Higby Dimond, erstwhile of Honolulu, who, as a preliminary step to going on the stage, gained considerable divorce court notoriety, does not loom up with the scintillating brilliancy that the frisky matron fondly expected, and which her name implies. A few more such fiascos will, it is to be hoped, have a sanitary effect upon other feminines who regard scandal as the easiest path to the footlights.

CHARLES Empey wants the Chutes to pay him the trifling sum of twenty thousand dollars because on the day that he visited the grounds he was whacked by a stick of lumber and bitten by a monkey. Some people are very unreasonable. Empey gets two distinct kinds of diversion not down on the bills, and wants to be paid for them into the bargain. He should have been charged extra by the management.

CAREFUL perusal of expert testimony in the Craven-Fair case ought to enable almost anybody to dash off a bogus will when the spirit moves him to thus acquire wealth that does not belong to him. The information gleaned might be compiled with profit to agents into a condensed volume entitled "Wills Knocked Endwise; or, Forgery Made Easy." Special terms to would-be widows.

IT does not really mar our joy
When grocers sell us bogus jam,
Nor do we kick if butcher boy
Palms mutton off on us for lamb;
We're used to fakes, and do not mind
Deceptions of a sugar kind,
But we will hang the dealer, sure,
Who does not give us whiskey pure.

DISSENSIONS among the brethren in the Presbyterian pow-wow this week would indicate to the ordinary layman that brotherly love is as scarce an article in the tents of the godly as it is in the haunts of unordained sinners.

A JILTED man, one Eragorri,
Now tells in court a painful story.
His lacerated bosom burns
To wreak revenge on Bridget Stearns
Who, as the fickle widow Ranage,
To his affectionous did such damage,
That he compels the dame to face
A lively breach of promise case.
Ten thousand dollars, he demands,
Be paid him at his rival's hands.
Coquettes, beware the worm who turns,
Or, like inconstant Bridget Stearns,
The man you gave the ha-ha to
May some day have the laugh on you.

WU TING FANG, the newly appointed and recently arrived Chinese minister to the United States, will depart from this city with a rather disturbed idea of California politeness. He finds himself unable to leave or enter his apartments without being subjected to a scrutiny and personal examination very much more earnest and persistent than gratifying. Gaping, wide-eyed crowds stand for hours gazing at his hotel windows, in the hope of catching a glimpse of the Chinese dignitaries; and the remarks heard by the Minister must make him thank the Deity of his land that the barbarians of the Pacific Coast are unlike his civilized fellow countrymen. The distribution of tracts, taken at random from Confucius, would exert an elevating influence among such people.

THE sudden and extraordinary activity in the hat pin trade, noticeable around town this week in the shops where those birds of bright plumage, women, most do hover, has puzzled the local merchants not a little, used as they are to the whims of their feminine patrons. While they are laying in a new stock of that innocent-appearing but deadly article of torture, the CRIER will explain the mystery. An Oakland man of an economical turn of mind, on suicide bent, waiving the purchase of sword or pistol, rammed his wife's hatpin down his esophagus the other day, and would have ornamented a slab at the morgue had not a minion of the law interfered and yanked the pointed weapon of destruction out again. It is not surprising that wives should offer every encouragement to the undesirable husbands in the way of nicely sharpened hatpins with which they can jab themselves to death at their pleasure. The idea naturally recommends itself to all neat housewives with a yearning for widowhood.

Why toil to pay drygoods bills
When husbands may shirk these ills
By a skillful stab?
A marble slab
May give one the cold, cold chills
But think of the peace it instills!

Why slave in a world of woe
I respectfully want to know
When one may slip in
At the point of a pin
To heaven—or slide below
To a climate not troubled with snow?

ALICE Edith Dickason Blythe is now the bride of one J. H. von Brahmstead, which goes to show that a woman may acquire questionable notoriety, become habitually intoxicated, and yet find some one to marry her. It is a discouraging outlook for spinsters who rely upon respectability and decorum to recommend them to the matrimonially inclined, but we hope that they will not be tempted to embark upon a dizzy career in consequence. The old tradition that virtue is its own reward must be maintained somehow.

IT is hardly right to give publicity to Durrant's daily menu at the Hotel San Quentin. The luxurious fare served to tempt that young gentleman's epicurean appetite may incite others in our midst to do that which will entitle them to play the role of star boarder at that caravansary.

WHEN millionaires lay down their lives
And "dust" to "dust" we have consigned them,
'Tis not good deeds the public strives
To count—it figures on the wives
The gay old boys have left behind them.

THE legal noose is coy and nimble, but Durrant is beginning to see that that persistent runner, Time, is destined to overtake it in the end.

PURITY AT PRAYER—TOWN TOPICS.

A MEMORY OF EASTER SUNDAY.

AN earnest face, with blue and humid eyes,
 Trustful and pure, yet innocently proud,
 Confronts me as the music slowly dies
 And heads in prayer are reverently bowed.
 The drowning priest intones his solemn lay
 With hands upraised, his penitents to bless,
 Whilst I, that came to dream and not to pray,
 Smile at the thought of my unworthiness.
 In the cathedral's consecrated space
 I, worldly, stand in mute irreverence.
 And in the hymnal of this slim girl's face
 For all my earthly ills find recompense.
 Regard her well; the golden head humbly bent,
 The red lips parted in her whispered prayer,
 The folded hands, so white and reverent—
 O sweet young saint, who stands so meekly there,
 I'll give my all—yes, all my mad past years,
 With all their splendor and with all their glow,
 Could my tired eyes the luxury of tears,
 Like those that tremble 'neath your lashes, know.
 Sweet maid, whose purity has kindly shed
 Upon a life all barren radiance new.
 From yon gilt crucifix I turn my head
 And bend it in humility to you.
 And why? Well, let me whisper it all low,
 And not this host of worshipers appall:
 You are so very different, you know,
 From the brown witch that holds me in her thrall.
 Loud peals the final hymn; the white, pure face
 Has disappeared; the crowds move slowly hence;
 I rise and yawn, and saunter from the place
 The better for a sight of—Innocence.

WITH THE TIDE.—ENGLISH ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE.

The tide went out with a sigh and a sigh—
 Speak low, my dear, speak low—
 Without word or tear was their last good-by;
 Yet hearts may break although eyes be dry—
 Speak low, my dear, speak low.
 What's for a woman except to wait—
 Winds are wild and nights are dark;
 Love's a fever that's fiercer than hate,
 It burned in her veins from early till late—
 Winds are wild and nights are dark.
 She watched the waves in their ebb and flow—
 Life is long to a waiting heart:
 And dreamed the story she dared not know
 All the dreary day till the sun was low—
 Life is long to a waiting heart.
 And one gray dawn when the cold night died—
 Speak low, my dear, speak low—
 An empty boat reached the old pier side;
 And a girl's soul fled with the outward tide—
 Speak low, my dear, speak low.

THE SISTERS.—WILLIAM EMORY GRIFFITHS, IN THE LOTUS.

Night, in the chambered east,
 Sits with Dawn at the door.
 Dropped from her golden feast,
 Star-crumbs scatter the floor.
 Mice, from behind the sun,
 Patter along the sky.
 Nibbling the crumbs they run,
 Touching with foot-prints shy.
 Echoes, of purring sound,
 Softly begin to grow,
 Nothing more to be found—
 Scamper—away they go!
 Dawn, in the chambered east,
 Sits by an open door.
 Night has gone from the feast:
 Barren of crumbs the floor.

SWEET Mamie was a fair young thing,
 But her papa was gamey,
 And when he heard the doorbell ring
 He softly said " Now, Mamie,
 " He's got to leave by half past ten!"
 Sure, he was not to blame; he Was getting rather tired by then.
 " Yes, dear papa!" said Mamie.
 But when it got to half-past ten
 The cool young man who came, he Stayed on, just like the other men,
 And pale and wan grew Mamie,
 There came a voice chock full of sand—
 She thought it said, " Obey me!"
 She up and told the young man, and—
 He said good-by to Mamie.
 Now, Mamie, as she went to bed,
 (She went, though, all the same!)
 She sobbed and wished that she were dead—
 So mortified was Mamie.
 Then she stole up to papa's door
 Before she said her lay-me—
 Alas! That noise was papa's snore;
 And oh! how mad was Mamie.—N. Y. Press.

A little girl about four or five years old was enjoying a slide upon the sidewalk, when to her consternation her heels flew up, and she fell with great force upon the stones. A lady who was passing by saw the accident and ran to the child's assistance. She picked her up, brushed the snow from her clothes, and asked kindly: " You poor little mite, how did you fall?" The tiny child looked up into her kind friend's face, and with the tears streaming down her cheeks, sobbed: " Vertically, ma'am."—Boston Watchman.

"In Maiden Meditation." By E. V. A. Published by A. C. McClurg & Co. Chicago.

This little collection of the musings of an unmarried girl consists of five chapters, entitled "After the Ball," "After Dinner," "After Church," "After a Wedding," "After One Summer." There is nothing particularly profound or specially original in any of the young lady's remarks, but they are often true enough, and are stated in a not altogether uninteresting, though occasionally rather slipsbod, manner. Evidently the relations of the sexes occupy a good deal of the thoughts of the writer, whose dreamy and rather highstrung imaginings are somewhat hard for a mere man to follow understandingly. The fair E. V. A. is fully possessed of the notion that woman is an enigmatical creature, too deep for the comprehension of man. She says: "If any man says that he understands woman, he is convicted of folly by his own speech." That women are "less logical, more whimsical, more uncertain in their mental processes than men" she admits—and so do we. We must confess that we have not much sympathy with this notion of the incomprehensibility of woman, and are inclined to the opinion that the dear creatures are by no means so deep as they like to think they are: indeed, often enough they are charmingly transparent. Why is it that we often group "women and children" together? Is it not because women always remain children in some sort? Woman is more precocious than man, attains her full development at an earlier age, most of her strength after maturity being reserved for the great end of her existence—maternity. High intelligence, exact reasoning, and correct thinking, are not necessary to the adequate fulfillment of her functions; hence, Nature has not dowered her with these characteristics in any marked degree. Her smiles, coquetries, and personal attractiveness have usually the very natural and obvious purpose of enchaining the affections of the opposite sex, and of securing support and maintenance thereby. To this end, as Schopenhauer points out, she is gifted during the years of early womanhood with considerable charms of complexion and figure, and these she enhances in every possible way. What is the secret of woman's long skirts and dainty clothing? Are they not intended to gently tickle the fancy of men? and do not men humor this feminine notion by pretending not to understand "the mysteries" of woman's apparel? Yet are not these same "mysteries" devised by men, or manufactured and sold in establishments directed and superintended by men? Nor must it be forgotten that men have much more unrestricted opportunities for studying and understanding women than women have for investigating men. What does the ordinary, well-brought-up girl know of men's habits compared with a young man's knowledge of women's habits. E. V. A. says that "women are not very mysterious objects to each other . . . the silliest girl can see through the most astute woman as though she were of glass." Do you not think that a clever man, with fair opportunities for observation, can see as far as "the silliest girl?" If women are really cleverer than men in affairs of the heart, is not the reason to be found in the higher development of their emotions, and in the greater importance to them of love and matrimony? All women like to hear, read, and talk of love, engagements, weddings, christenings; how few take any serious interest in politics, war, diplomacy, philosophy, or even literature, except in so far as these things concern men? But E. V. A. seems to be a "real nice girl," round whose chairback (to slightly adapt her own words) we should be pleased enough to reach an arm, and suffer our fingers to play idly with her curls; to clasp with our other hand her little white fingers, to draw nearer to her laughing, teasing, loving eyes: to clasp her rounded waist, and to feel the warm breath, growing warmer and warmer—.

Two weeks ago we referred in these columns to a theory of criticism (so-called) propounded by a Mr.

O. L. Triggs, of the University of Chicago, and we took occasion to remark that, if the theory were adopted, criticism would be an extinct thing. We are glad to see this frankly confessed by Mr. Edward E. Hale Jr., of Union College, who writes a letter in The Dial of March 16, strangely entitling his communication "The true critical attitude." In this letter he says: "To understand or appreciate anything you must surrender yourself to it entirely, and for the time being judge everything else by that one thing . . . this is the only way to criticize anything. Dismiss former standards, get wholly absorbed in what you are to judge, look at every thing from the point of view so gained, and then express your views. This is the only true criticism of literature, or of life: although I do not know that before Mr. Triggs any one ever stated it quite so definitely." Yet a little further on Mr. Hale says that Mr. Triggs "does shrink from going to the logical length of his theory." However, young Mr. Hale has no hesitation, and hegs to formulate the new gospel in the following propositions: or, as he naively expresses it, "lay down the following truths:"

"1. There is no such thing as criticism . . . or rather, if there is, it is cold, hesitating, niggardly, judicial, negative, professional, and no one need consider it.

"2. There is nothing but appreciation, which must be deep and widely sympathetic, without reservation, boundlessly enthusiastic, emotional, and various other things—in fact, absorption."

We do not know what the "various other things" are: perhaps they may be hysterical and absurd. Nor do we wonder that Mr. Triggs, if he wishes to preserve an outward appearance at least of common literary sanity, hesitates to follow his theory to its logical limit, which is, as young Mr. Hale sees and confesses, the abandonment of criticism altogether. Nor is young Mr. Hale content to apply his new theory of "absorption" to literature only: he wants to extend it into the domain of life. On this theory, when some new, revolting and hideous crime is committed, we must "dismiss all former standards" of right and wrong, "get absorbed in" the criminal, and "look at everything from the point of view so gained." What sloughs of unreason men fall headlong into when they abandon the cardinal principles, and follow will-o'-the-wisps! The truth is that the leading principles of human conduct and of literature are settled beyond all dispute, and we have no choice but to abide by them. If Messrs. Triggs and Hale are instructors, we pity the young people who sit under them. To adopt their theories of life and letters is to abandon sanity, and welcome hysteria. Is there anybody who in his heart imagines that sensible men and women are likely to reject Matthew Arnold, Saint Beuve, Andrew Lang, J. R. Lowell, George Saintsbury, Edmund Gosse, Frederic Harrison, Hamilton W. Mahie, and the whole army of critics, to accept Triggs and Hale? If The Dial is going to spread nonsense of this kind broadcast over the land, it should begin by removing from its title page the words "A journal of literary criticism," and should cease to quote in its advertising pages John G. Whittier and Sir Walter Besant's references to The Dial as the best and ablest "literary journal" in America. Some ingenuous young person may read this stuff of Triggs and Hale, and contract foolish ideas that will cost him years of painful struggle to get rid of.

We are sorry to find our good friend, Mr. Edgar Saltus, in "Our Note Book" in Collier's Weekly employing the barbarism "electrocuted." This is a monstrosity against which every friend of good English should set his face like a flint: it should not so much as be mentioned among decent people. To use it even in jest is a crime, for which the Lord High Executioner should be asked to devise a fitting punishment: say, hoiling in oil, or something humorous of that sort.

Mr. Edgar Fawcett has been recently guilty of employing the word "claim" in the sense of "declare," or "profess." Speaking of a recently published hook, entitled "Masses and Classes," he writes: "Mr. W. H. Mallock claims to have delved deep among statistics: why not 'professes'?" The word "claim" in this sense should be abandoned to embezzlers, detectives, reporters of the water-front and police-courts, and other lewd fellows of the baser sort.

Our good friend and contemporary, The Philistine, humorously quotes upon the cover of its April issue Charles Lamb's words "Here cometh April again, and so far as I can see, the world hath more fools in it than ever." After quoting some remarks from a recent NEWS LETTER, The Philistine goes on to say "The Coast is a long way from New York, to be sure, but I didn't know that the Golden-Gate-keepers had forgotten that Americans also talk English—even Yone Noguchi knows that." Now, we never undertook to be responsible for the ignorance of The Philistine, nor do we consider the points in which the young Japanese poet's knowledge surpasses that of the Philistine either very interesting or important. The Philistine must kindly spare us the recital of all that it doesn't know. There isn't time on this side of eternity to lend our ears to so long a tale. Ancient the reading of newspapers, we beg leave to quote the following: "We read too much. We have no time to think. How can men meditate who take a daily paper, four weeklies, and six monthly magazines? You subscribe for 'em and you've got to read 'em or else conscience will smite you for being a spendthrift. 'I've just canceled my subscription to The Outlook,' said George Dudley Seymour the other day. 'Why, don't you like it?' I asked. 'Certainly; the paper is all right, but it came every Friday with such damnable regularity.'"

Ella Wheeler, the poetess who cooled the fires of her passion by marrying a drummer named Wilcox, lately made a sensible remark when she wrote: "The free circulation of the 'literature' which reports all the criminal doings of each day is one great cause of our present crop of child burglars, shoplifters, and precocious criminals in all lines." Mr. Hearst and his peanut-vending editor have to answer for the production of a large number of the youthful criminals of California. If the existence of vast fortunes is a wrong to the community, surely a double wrong is inflicted when wealth is used not in mere high living and ostentation, but in unceasing efforts to lower the standard of taste, honor, and decency throughout the population of several States.

The frontispiece of the April Traveler is a reproduction of a photograph of Oakland estuary, showing an afternoon effect. An article by Charles Frederick Holder describes the wonders to be seen in Pacific waters through a glass-bottomed boat, and one by Arthur Inkersley tells of the animals in Golden Gate Park. Other contributions describe "Street Scenes in Mexico," the observance of Easter by the Spanish, and the University of California. There is a good half-tone reproduction of a photograph of Miss Corinne Tebault, a New Orleans girl who has lately been visiting San Francisco.

THE American Fibre Chamois Company of New York has inaugurated a novel system for advertising. The company will run a special full-vestibuled train of ten cars from New York to this Coast about the 1st of May, consuming six months' time and covering about 9000 miles before returning to the point of starting. The cars of this unique train will be fitted up for the exhibition of all manner of goods, and will give the public along its route excellent opportunity for examination of the exhibits. In short, the train will be a sort of advertising exposition, which will visit all principal points throughout the country. Exhibitors may send salesmen with their goods, who will in this way come in direct contact with the consumers. A second similar train will leave the East about December 1st. Full particulars by addressing the United States Trades Exposition, New York.

THE Mayor of Bridgeport has appointed Miss Susan Watson to the new and novel office of "hat matron," says the New York Tribune. Her duties take her to all the theatres, where she secures a commanding position and "views the landscape o'er." Any women wearing tall hats are immediately pounced upon and requested to remove them. If they refuse Miss Watson takes down their names and reports them to all the theatrical managers in town, who promptly refuse to sell front seats to them ever after. Of course, if they repent and wear low-crowned hats or none at all, they can get front seats. But until they do, the only reserved seats they can get are in the rear.

FOOLIES repeat themselves. It was Edward IV who decreed that a shoemaker making peaked toes more than two inches long should be fined twenty shillings. Now, untrammelled by such laws, one of our most fashionable bootmakers has introduced long-pointed toes, which have to be filled in with cork at the tips, and are mostly carried out in the finest patent-leather with small buckles on the instep. In the Tudor and Stuart time women desirous of rising in the world borrowed inordinately high heels from Italy, and these went by the name of "choppines"—Evelyn in his Diary calls them "scaffolds"—and the ladies who wore them to walk abroad had to have a servant on either side for support. This unpractical fashion is not likely to have any great following; but some beautifully made shoes, with heels varying from three to seven inches in height, are to be seen at a modern shoemaker's, rendered in the most costly stuffs, such as floral brocaded velvet on cream satin, and gold and silver brocades introduced on the high heel as well as on the upper part of the shoes. It seems almost impossible that the wearers could walk in them, but they do.—St. James Gazette.

ALL Bohemia will be rejoicing to-night because of a double anniversary within its portals—the twenty-fifth birthday of the Bohemian Club and the eightieth birthday of its patron Saint, “Uncle” George Bromley. Apropos of the twin celebration, D. J. Staples, the veteran insurance President, recalls a reminiscence which is characteristic of the idol of Bohemia.

In 1852, Staples and Bromley were fellow travelers from New York for San Francisco. As the party, dusty and begrimed, toiled on toward Panama in a slowly moving caravan, Bromley was suddenly missed. A careful search failed to reveal any trace of the missing argonaut, and the others feared some serious accident had befallen their sprightly comrade. At the entrance to the town, however, the missing traveler rejoined them as unexpectedly as he had disappeared. In marked contrast to his travel-stained friends, Bromley was freshly clad in an immaculate suit of white duck, within which he very comfortably carried a good quart of gin. He had got ahead of his friends, a happy faculty which has been remarked many thousand times in the succeeding forty-five years.

Something like four decades ago, “Uncle George” organized what he called the “Young Men’s Moral Reform Club.” Many religious people were much interested in the new institution, but they were somewhat curious about the fields in which the club intended to operate, for the reformation was scarcely perceptible at first glance. The scope of the organization was finally understood when some feminine unbeliever was an involuntary and much shocked witness at the solemn observance of the rites of the members. It was then discovered that the unwritten constitution and by-laws of the club consisted of a sacred mutual agreement on the part of the reformers to take nothing but straight drinks!

Among the many accomplishments of the gifted President of the Leland Stanford Junior University, is a highly cultivated ear for music. He came up from Palo Alto last Saturday especially to hear the French Grand Opera Company’s rendering of Carmen. After listening with much appreciation to the music, the great piscatorial authority studied with grave interest the graceful evolutions of the ballet. He recalled his condemnatory views concerning all forms of religious excitement. Dr. Jordan pondered a minute or two, and then, borrowing a pair of opera glasses, took another long look at the pirouetting females.

His companions, believing that the protector of the Pribyloff Island seals was taking a high moral stand, silently assented.

Then he walked out into the foyer.

Some social courtesies were extended, on his temporary return trip hither, to Bob Davis, who, a year ago, forsook this city to try his Western yarns on innocent New York editors. Among other compliments of this kind which he received was a visitors’ card to the Bohemian Club. Now, Bob prides himself on his Nevadan simplicity, and his manners are as fresh as his own windy stories about his breezy native State. He greeted all alike whom he encountered beneath the wings of the owl,—old and young, members or attendants,—for Bob is no respecter of persons.

“Here, Tom!” he would shout to a servant in the Social Hall, disdaining the use of a bell. “Come here, Tom. Bill and I want a drink,” Bill being a member. “What’ll have, Bill? A cocktail? All right, Bill. Make it two, Tom!”

Upon its expiration, Mr. Robert Davis’ card was not renewed.

Rollicking Colonel Pat Lannon, the jovial editor of the Salt Lake Tribune, and a well-known and unique character, is in town, as many of his San Francisco friends know to their sorrow. Lannon has all the natural wit of his race, and his fund of humorous anecdote seems inexhaustible. His appearance alone is a huge joke, for his corpulence is marvelous, and he is accustomed to quote his own dimensions as “four feet square.”

“To please my wife,” he says, pathetically, “I have been fasting for almost forty days. But it’s no use!” despairingly. “After all that mortification of the flesh,” with a sigh, “no one is stuck on me shape!”

Lannon has a new story about his former partner, who wrote the editorials for their paper, and whose caustic pen seemed perpetually steeped in gall. The partner bitterly attacked a prominent citizen, scorching him with frequent editorial denunciations. In the fullness of time this citizen died.

“Then I went to my partner,” said Colonel Pat, “and tried to soothe him a little. ‘Now, for heaven’s sake, let up,’ I says. ‘The man is dead’—he is in hell, by the way. ‘Now, you have assailed him often enough. Be a little magnanimous and give him a nice little send-off in the paper.’

“Pat,” replied he to me, ‘I am surprised at you! Would you have me tell a lie about a dead man? This fellow was a damned scoundrel, and I am going to print it. Lie about a dead man? Never, Lannon!’”

The old aphorism about the lack of honor accorded to a prophet in his own country, has been pretty well disproved in the case of Denis O’Sullivan, the fashionable London baritone, who came to his home by the Golden Gate a day or two ago, that he might share his laurels with his own people. His appearance at the Tivoli the latter part of this month, in the title-role of “Shamus O’Brien,” suggests his comical experience at the hands of the English critics.

Denis is a son of the late C. D. O’Sullivan, who, in early days, accumulated a fortune in the paint and oil trade, and was prominent in many mining ventures. The rapid rise of the young dramatic vocalist has been almost phenomenal, and his name and operatic associations gave force to the idea that he was born with emeralds in his eyes. The London critics gravely remarked on the natural odor of peat which pervaded his presence. They pointed out that much of O’Sullivan’s success in Irish operas was due to his Irish birth, adding that the nativity of his brogue was unmistakable. All this was amusing enough to the native San Franciscan for a time, but when, in touring the towns of Ireland, the perfection of his accent caused him to be hailed with delight as a native of Donegal, Denis thought the joke had become rather flat.

And then the critics triumphantly announced that they needed no further justification.

Collection Day has its terrors for cashiers, not alone because of the large payments involved, but frequently because of the myriads of petty accounts requiring settlement and entry, the bill for a dime necessitating as much clerical work as that for a thousand. George R. Maxwell, Paying Teller of the First National Bank, ordinarily the most urbane of men, was much annoyed this week by a succession of tardy collectors, each with a trifling account, and all delaying presentation until after the regular banking hours. Maxwell remonstrated with them, one after another, his normal supply of affability visibly decreasing with every fresh offender. About four o’clock in sauntered a whistling boy, who gracefully dropped a folded paper before the busy teller methodically balancing his cash.

“Bill?” queried Maxwell, curtly.

“Why in thunder did you not bring it here two hours ago?” demanded Maxwell, sternly.

Without a word the boy, still whistling, turned on his heel.

Then Maxwell opened the bill. It read as follows:

To fixing type on typewriter.

No charge.

It was too good to keep,—that story of the gold brick which Jim Corbett sold to W. R. Hearst of the New York Journal and the San Francisco Examiner,—and the details form an interesting chapter in the unpublished book, "How to get something for nothing." The episode concerns the "copyrighted" fakes before and after the Carson fight, the "news" which proved such a hollow mockery to Willie's subscribers and the ostensibly "exclusive" interviews, from which no newspaperman was excluded, unless he choose to accept the exclusion.

On the west bound train from Chicago, Corbett's party included Sporting Editor Hackett of the New York World. To lighten the tedium of the trip he, half-jocularly, offered the pomp-doured pugilist five hundred dollars if he would sign a contract for exclusive signed statements in the World.

"That's a good scheme and a handsome offer," remarked the wily Corbett. "I'll think about it."

At the next station the fighter sent the following telegram to Hearst:

"World offers me fifteen hundred dollars for exclusive statements."

Corbett rather expected a telegraphic reply the next time the train stopped, and he was not disappointed. Hearst's message read:

"I will pay you two thousand. Wire acceptance."

The alacrity with which Corbett obeyed this admonition convinced his backers that his condition was irrefragable.

"Long John" Wilkins, whose immaculate "gall" is only equaled by his Ethiopian cuticle, went up to Porter Ashe's office the other day, and after waiting for nearly an hour, finally secured an audience.

"How'd a-do, Mistah Ashe?" was "Long John's" greeting.

"Pretty good, John. How are you?" pleasantly replied the always gracious Porter.

"Oh, I'se fust rate, Mistah Ashe," said John. "I just come up heah to 'gratulate you, sah. I'se felt myself overlooking my duty, sah, hadn't I come up heah, sah. I'm so glad, sah, dat dat horse Ruinhart win, sah."

"Thank you, John, thank you," returned Porter. "Your kind feeling is appreciated," and Mr. Ashe started to go into his private office.

"I beg pardon, Mistah Ashe," hastily remarked John; "I almost fo'got, sah, to say dat I had a dollar bet on Salvation, sah, and I lost, sah. So if you could kindly, sah, let me have a dollah I'd feel very thankful, for, honest, Mistah Ashe, really I couldn't affo'd to lose de dollah, and—"

Here Porter interrupted the loquacious negro. "Take this dollar, John, and in the future never look for Salvation around a race track. Good-by, John," and he made his escape.

At the cathedral choral service in Grace Episcopal Church on the evening of Palm Sunday, the vested male choir had such arduous duties to perform that the singers deemed it proper, and even necessary, to fortify themselves in advance for their special musical efforts by such potations as are not customary in the sanctuary. Each of the numbers was creditably rendered. As the gowned choristers marched down the aisle, singing lustily the recessional hymn, all doubt was lifted from the olfactory nerves of the standing worshippers, regarding the character of the motive power behind their fervid praises. Carrington Wilson had attended the service to hear Clarence Eddy play the great organ. Someone solicited his opinion.

"It has been an intensely interesting service, I assure you," replied Wilson, with his British precision. "Why, I could discern spirits in the air!"

Now that the announcement of Jack Casserly's engagement to Miss Cudahy, the pressed-beef Princess, has placed a limit upon his bachelor days, his friends are recalling some of the pranks of his untamed era, from that interesting historical episode connected with the entertainment of the Gaiety Girls at the Burlingame Club, down to the current history of the present season. The latest story told about this vivacious youth concerns a dinner party at Joe Grant's picturesque cottage at "B'lingham." On that occasion Casserly was placed next a charming woman, whom he had not previously met, and of whose connections he was ignorant.

In the course of their somewhat confidential tête-à-tête, Jack gathered, incidentally, that his table companion's husband was an absent physician. By the time the cheese appeared her statements formed a jumble of recollections in the Casserly brain, and suddenly noting that her silk gown was black, he conceived the idea that he was in the presence of affliction. Believing it a case for that delicate sympathy for which he is famous, Jack bent over the fair "widow," and with moistening eyes, softly asked her a question, while a tearful thrill shook his melodious voice.

"And is the Doctor in heaven?" he asked tenderly and meaningly.

Jack supposes it was hysteria which caused the he-reaved woman to burst into uncontrollable laughter, in the midst of which the ladies rose, and the Casserly query is still unanswered.

To guard against all possible contingencies at Central Park this afternoon, when the second of the series of intercollegiate baseball matches will be played between the teams of the two big Universities, some solicitous friends of the players have provided a chest of all the liniments known to the patent medicine vendor. Charlie Elston, the popular Berkeley captain, suggested with quiet irony, that since the idea of a few bruises was so appalling, it might be prudent to lay in a large supply of wood alcohol.

"Oh! Don't get wood alcohol," objected Pete Karsberg, "the cowhoy pitcher," who comes from Fresno and who threatened to resign because he was not allowed to wear his sombrero during the game.

"Why not, Pete?" came a chorus of interrogatives.

"Because we would all get splinters in our legs," was the scornful rejoinder of the Fresno athlete.

A fussy lady walked into Stanton's studio one day this week, and brusquely inquired if the artist were in.

"No, madam," said Paul, the Indian painter, "if you call later you will find him."

She called again, and this time the statuesque Stanton was at home.

"Humph," said the dame, surveying the stalwart painter critically, "seems to me you don't look much like an artist."

This uncalled for insult sent the rich blood coloring Stanton's damaged cheek, and he replied in accents of ineffable scorn:

"Nor could I say, madam, that from your language and appearance, I should ever take you for an art patron. Paul, show the lady down stairs."

The sassy thing was crushed, and the honor of the Stantons avenged.

Joullin is a man of distinguished appearance, and that excellent artist has frequently been taken for a foreign count. Not so on Tuesday, however, for as he hoarded a Clay-street car, a big German considered himself discomposured by Mr. Joullin. When the latter came to his destination, as he stepped off the car he heard the German inquire:

"Who is dot hig fellow, anyhow?"

"Oh," replied the gripman, indifferently, "he is one of them waiters at Camp's."

The scowl from Joullin's dark, rolling eye, when this remark fell upon his ear, was withering.

THE last week of Lent brought us the first hot weather of the year thus far, which par parenthese caught us like a thief in the night, quite unprepared for it. Still, for that the week was welcome, as no doubt it has also been to a majority of our young people, who are glad that the penitential period, with its enforced quiet, has at last come to an end. Easter millinery has been the chief subject occupying the thoughts of the fair sex, and the indications are that to-morrow the churches will blossom like the most gorgeous conservatories; not only the buildings themselves, but the heads of most of the congregations, and will be sights worth seeing.

Gay doings have been scarce this week. Even dinners and luncheons have in a measure failed, and theatre parties one may say have not been "in it" to any great extent. But then there is a good deal on the tapis for the near future, and next week will lead off with some club dances, to say nothing of several weddings and minor affairs that have been kept waiting until after Lent; and there is a probability of some hops at the Presidio before the troops go off for the summer to Yosemite and elsewhere.

The Native Sons of Vermont gave a charming entertainment at Odd Fellows' Hall on Monday evening. The first part consisted of a musical olio, followed by Dream Faces, which was excellently cast and played; and then there was dancing until after midnight, a most enjoyable evening being passed. On Tuesday afternoon the Henri Fairweathers gave their series of Browning lectures at the Sorosis Club rooms on Pine street.

Wednesday this week was selected by several fair brides, both in this city and Oakland, for their nuptials. Among them was an evening wedding, which took place at the First Unitarian Church, the Rev. Mr. Stebbins uniting in marriage Miss Mae Belle Green and George Lipman. The handsome bride, who was robed in white satin trimmed with lace and orange blossoms, was attended by Miss Ada Young as maid-of-honor, and the Misses Clementine Allardyce and Edna Donaldson as bridesmaids, and T. H. Ramsay officiated as the groom's best man. After the church ceremony there was a reception at the home of the bride on Hawthorne street, followed by a handsome supper.

One of last week's weddings was that of Miss Edith Kittridge and Henry A. Sargent of Portland, Oregon, the ceremony taking place at the Howarth residence on Laurel street, where the Reverend John Hemphill tied the nuptial knot. This was a yellow and white wedding, the elaborate decorations of the house being entirely in those tints, and the costumes of the maid-of-honor, little Geraldine Howarth, and of the bridesmaids, the Misses Kate Durhrow and Amy Swain, being of white mousseline de soie, and their hand bouquets yellow roses. The beautiful bride wore a robe of white moire trimmed with chiffon, a tulle veil, and pearl and diamond ornaments. She carried a bouquet of brides' roses. The happy pair left for their future home in Portland last Saturday.

The date for another of the spring weddings has been set this week, and it is now announced that the marriage of Miss Quita Collier and Atherton Macondray will take place during the first week of June.

There will be a number of weddings next week, chief of Wednesday's ceremonials being the one in which Miss Mattie Whittier will be the bride. It will be a home function, taking place at the Whittier residence on Jackson street Wednesday evening.

At San Rafael the entertaining season has been inaugurated already by Mrs. W. F. Babcock, who last week gave a most delightful luncheon in honor of Mrs. Whitelaw Reid, who left for her Eastern home last Saturday. The dinners of Colonel Fred Crocker and of Horace Davis, the musicale of W. S. Jones, and the luncheons of Mrs. Davis and Mrs. J. B. Crockett were among recent pleasant gatherings, the menus of which were scarcely what one would call Lenten. A delightful piano recital was given at Beethoven Hall on Saturday afternoon, when Miss Helen Hager charmed the large crowd of friends who were present by the brilliancy of her playing. She was assisted by Miss Caroline Little, whose sweet voice was heard in a number of German and English songs. Both young ladies were most becomingly costumed, one in Nile green, and the other lavender and white, and were the recipients of a profusion of beautiful floral tributes.

The managers of the Women's Congress are making great preparations for the annual meet, which will be held in the First Congregational Church the week after next. The programme of the speakers and their subjects, which has been given to the public, gives also assurance that it will be well attended.

The long anticipated bal masque at Ebell Hall, in Oakland, on Tuesday evening; the last dance of the Saturday Evening Cotillion Club at Native Sons' Hall, and of the Winter Cotillion Club at Beethoven Hall on Friday evening, are some of the pleasures in store for young society next week.

It having been decided that the projected Golden Gate Carnival is not to materialize next month, as anticipated, many of our residents have betaken themselves to Los Angeles to view the beauties of the Fiesta in that city of orange groves as a slight compensation for their disappointment at home, one large party leaving last Wednesday.

There are likely to be a number of changes at the Presidio ere long, and among the losses none will be more regretted than the Misses Young, who during their stay at that post have been among the most popular ladies ever in residence there.

George Boney has gone East en route to Europe for a passage. Among the week's overland passengers were Mr. and Mrs. Lloyd Tevis and Miss Florence Breckenridge for Kentucky and Gotham, this being the first visit Mrs. Tevis has paid to her old home in the South for many years. Mr. and Mrs. Horace Davis have been passing the week at their country home in the Santa Cruz mountains, preparing it for their occupancy this summer, as it is likely they will spend the greater part of the season there.

Mrs. and Miss Quita Collier have come down to the city from their home in Lake county, and will remain here for several weeks. Mrs. Daniel Roth and the Misses Roth, who recently returned after a year's absence passed in foreign travel, will be "at home" on Saturdays and Sundays during April at their handsome residence on Baker and Hayes streets.

Recent returns of absentees from the East and Europe include General, Mrs. and Miss Houghton. Mr. and Mrs. Henri Kahn leave Paris for home next week. Mr. and Mrs. Albert Raas and Mrs. E. G. Lyons are visiting in Los Angeles.

Mizpah Charity Club will give an Indian picnic on the evening of the 24th inst. at Golden Gate Hall, for the benefit of the fund. The hall will be decorated in rustic fashion, and baskets with lunches for two will be sold. A farce, vocal selections and dancing will fill out the evening. Tickets, 50 cents, to be had of the officers or members of the club.

Alfred S. Gump left for the East and Europe this week to visit the art centers for the firm of S. & G. Gump.

One of the most prominent social events of the season will be the grand Parisien fete, called the "Gingerbread Fete," for the Children's Hospital during the month of May, which will be under the personal direction and management of the Lady Managers of the institution. The elegant mansion and grounds of one of the leading families of the city have been tendered the institution, and the entire proceeds from the fete will pass to the General Fund of the Children's Hospital and Training School for Nurses.

The Concordia Club nominating committee has at last completed its task. Mr. Leopold Michaels has been selected for President and Mr. Chas. Hirsch for Vice President. Both gentlemen have been prominently identified with the club's management for many years. Many changes are looked forward to, and a new policy favorable to the younger members is being planned. The finances of the institution are in a most flourishing condition.

Buena Vista Parlor, No. 68, Native Daughters of the Golden West, will celebrate the fifth anniversary of the parlor by giving a ball at Native Sons' hall, on Mason, between Geary and Post streets, on next Tuesday evening, the 20th inst.

Mr. Wadsworth Harris, of the Otis Skinner Company, gave enjoyable dramatic readings at Irving Institute on last Thursday afternoon to the young ladies of the institute and their friends.

The Esberg dinner, which was given at the family residence on Pacific avenue on last Wednesday evening, was greatly enjoyed by those present. Miss Edith Esberg very gracefully assisted her mother as hostess. Covers were laid for twenty guests, and the hours were late before the adieux were said.

The boulevard fund will be the worthy object of a second lecture, to be delivered next Monday evening, April 19th, at Y. M. C. A. hall, on Mason and Ellis streets, by Mr. Henry A. Butters, the noted South African mining expert. The lecture will, in addition to treatment of the gold fields, review the recent political disturbances in that country. Tickets, 50 cents, to be had at the hall or of the Boulevard Committee.

Mr. and Mrs. Geo. E. Morse arrived Monday evening from Washington, where they have been the guests of President and Mrs. McKinley at the Executive Mansion since the Inauguration.

The P. D. Club will give its sixty-fourth party on the evening of April 27th at Odd Fellows' Hall.

THE Pacific Coast Syrup Company is one of the manufacturers of syrup and jellies in San Francisco that courts the fullest investigation, not only into its methods of manufacture, but the quality of ingredients used. The company makes a raspberry syrup which will hereafter be known as "Imitation Raspberry Syrup." All the materials of which this product is made are certified as wholesome, clean and nutritious. They are: Granulated sugar, water, citric acid (lemon juice), extract of raspberry, red fruit color. It is a wholesome, healthy article of food. The company, in order to meet Eastern competition, is also making a jelly composed of apple stock, glucose and sugar. This jelly is also wholesome, and has been used with satisfactory results for years on this coast. The company labels this jelly: Fruit, sugar, glucose jelly, or jam, as the case may be. It has obtained a large sale and is an excellent product. The company also make the celebrated Tea Garden Drips—an unexcelled article. The Pacific Coast Syrup Company is proud of the large business it has built up; it misrepresents nothing, invites everywhere and at all times the fullest investigation of its plant and products—all of which have a valued and recognized place in the grocery trade of the Pacific Coast.

The Lenten season is over. Dinners, parties, and banquets will be the order, and at this time it will be well to remember that Max Abraham, caterer, at 428 Geary street, is prepared to take complete charge of these functions, and his wide experience and constant attention guarantees perfect success in this most important feature of entertaining.

BEECHAM'S PILLS for wind and distress after eating.

AT INGLESIDE.

RACING will be resumed next Monday, the 19th inst., at Ingleside, and continue for the following two weeks, ending May 1st. The programme indicates an unusually high-class entertainment for the lovers of this sport. On opening day the Corrigan stakes, five furlongs, will be run. This is a handicap sweepstakes for two-year-olds, with first purse $1,000. On Saturday, the 24th, the Spreckels' Cup race, one mile and a quarter, will be run—a handicap for three-year-olds. The first prize for this great race will be the Spreckels Cup, valued at $1,500, and a purse of $5,000; second, $2,000; third, $500. This will bring out the best horses on the Coast, and result in a battle for first place worth going a long way to see. The California Stakes, two miles over eight hurdles, will be run on Wednesday, the 28th inst., for $1,200 first money, $200 second, $100 third. On Saturday, May 1st, the Ingleside stakes, four miles, for $3,000 first money, $500 second, $300 third, will be run. The general racing for the two weeks will be fully up to the standard, which, with these special additions, will make up a programme exciting enough to satisfy the most exacting sportsman.

FERD. T. HOPKINS, Prop'r,

37 Great Jones St., N. Y.

ELOISE seemingly smiled to her righthand neighbor at the dinner-table, but in reality to herself, as she felt on the opposite side a nervous touch against the hand resting on her chair-arm.

"Poor boy!" she thought, smiling still at his opponent, yet she could hardly restrain an impulse to yield a warm clasp to the hand so dumbly begging, but she did resist. Twenty-eight years was too late an age to dally with youths.

"I have done with them long ago," formed her thought in the midst of the conversation; but rose odors, light, and champagne always floated the senses of Eloise away in a luxurious dream, and to-night the warmth within, and hovering spirit of love with its inevitable memories, made it easy to flash worlds almost unconsciously into the eyes of the boy at her side. It was a long time since she had met this same sweet boy love, so tender and reverential. A dew clouded her eyes, but musical voices and the motion to leave the table broke her momentary wanderings.

As for Harry Hastings, he understood, in the mysterious way of hudding passion, that some softness lay within Eloise for him. The blonde collegian thrilled with sweet doubt in all his live young heart and flesh. True, he hardly dared touch her or speak to her. For what would she say to him? She with her beauty and dignity, the center of those favored men. One of them would take her to the hall to-night, while he would have no share in her, except for a glance. His heart beat tumultuously as Thurston, her dinner partner, gradually and entirely absorbed her attention—Harry's helplessness was so patent to himself against the man of years, position, and self-poise.

When his mother spoke he was glad, even to the sending of their fair guest from his presence. "Eloise, you girls must sleep before the ball; your long morning drive and two afternoon receptions will necessarily involve a return in the way of rest."

"Yes, I for one am a little weary," she answered languidly, amidst the protests of her companions, in her eyes that bright promise of something to come that always left behind her the greatest desire for her return. The girl knew sleep did so much for her these days, and some-way a feeling of sadness disquieted her. She did not like the looks of those hurt young eyes across the room.

"I want to be alone; then I can decide." She could have laughed at her affection for the boy. The other girls had passed on out, but Thurston still kept Eloise dallying over some flowers he had sent her for the hall. His confidence racked Harry's very soul, and he moved away from them down the hall.

"If I speak to her perhaps that will lull the longing," thought he in smothered and fretting suppression.

"I must go," came to him in her clear tones.

"For two long hours," answered Thurston, then light footfalls passed the recess in which Harry stood.

"Should he follow her? Would it only make things worse?" Swift pursuit avowed his decision. Eloise felt rather than heard his coming. An inexpressible softness crept over her. Five years gone since she had been so warmed by the presence of any man. He was like Hubert—but Hubert had taken all her heart and left her eating out her soul with bitterness. Her succeeding thought in these few steps was:

"Yet how sweet even a semblance of the dear, engrossing love! It would be hard, though, for the boy."

They were at the head of the stairs now; still she had not turned. Faint odors of violets floated down to her pursuer from the flowers on her bosom. They electrified and mastered Harry for a moment. As he reached Eloise his arm closed strongly round her waist. The very soul of the girl cried in recognition:

"Hubert! My Hubert!"

Flinging back her head to him, she received Harry's fresh, pure lips, quivering in one wild instant upon her own—and fled—to Hubert.

Harry stood there, dazed with his newly discovered delight. She loved him! She had given that kiss. The boy's blood flowed with renewed power in great warming waves, and with eyes turned inwardly upon his own unexpected happiness, he sought solitude. The sight of those men below, with their cynical jokes and world-gathered disbeliefs, was shameful to him in this time of his sacred and almost incredible triumph.

Oh! what an hour of Heaven to Harry!

In her room, Eloise, wrapped in her dressing-gown, loosened with tender fingers the hair Hubert loved. It brushed her face like Hubert's own caresses. The boy outside was forgotten, but for a guilty sense of betrayal. That kiss was not his. It was Hubert's. She drowsed away in an utter lethargy of happiness. Hubert held her to his breast; her lips and eyes trembled to his enchanted fondling. She sunk in the pillows lost, steeped in the old love. Oh! he had come back to her—with him time had no beginning and no end.

Eloise shivered. The maid wakened her by stirring the fire. How chilled she was, and how cold to be torn from her paradise!

"A delusion," she murmured; "he is gone forever, and I have been faithful so long!" Two burning tears soaked in the pillow. "Oh, how my arms ache for his beloved care! It is there, and will not leave me, but he has forgotten!"

Still the hot stream trickled down her cheek. She sat up with cruel impatience of her mood.

"Why not solace myself with some advantageous marriage? Why not accept Thurston, his money and his selfishness? It was my purpose, why suffer pangs for this boy, Harry? Did Hubert pity me?"

But Harry's sweet, boyish faith and love tugged at her tenderness. Again she saw the reproachful eyes and felt in some cold and far-off way that she had tacitly accepted him.

"I am fond of him," she murmured dreamily. "He brings back my youth that seems so long gone," and she rose with almost a sob. Suddenly Eloise missed the opal pin she wore that evening. She remembered pressing it against her breast as she threw back her head at the top of the stairs. It must be in the hall, and then she went to look for it.

"Ah!" and as Eloise rose with the recovered pin, she came face to face with Harry on his way down the stairs. The boy hesitated; his eyes grew luminous as he took in the girl's slim figure, dressing gown, and flowing hair. She had given him before: now he would claim. Instantly his young arms gathered close and gently her soft, round body. His cheek flamed against her veil of hair, and kisses fell like flowers upon her face. She clung there weakly.

"You love me a little?" he whispered. Her face nestled close in his throat for answer, and then, in the quick way peculiar to her, she tore herself free. It was no place to wait.

The ball went like some unreal and dazzling hour met once in life. Harry stood off in the palms, following with his eyes and soul the girl who after to-night would be his own. After this he would claim her against those men who floated about the room with her as if she were a part of themselves. He fumed at the thought.

"But she is so fair and glad. Ah, for to-morrow! just for to-morrow, the beginning of my reign!"

He waited, meaning to see her last that night, but, annoyingly, she passed out unmissed by his watchful eye, and on searching for her, it was only to find that she had left the ball. When Eloise reached home, the ball-room effulgence had long since sunk from her face.

"After all," she murmured, in painful concentration, I cannot do it. I cannot take either Thurston for my own sake, or the boy for his. I must go at once before seeing them again. Mamma's letter will come in the morning. Upon that I can easily frame an excuse."

It was a girl of weary body and sore heart that tossed and cried that night in sleep, but morning broke in the end, and hours crawled and doubled upon themselves till rising-time.

The letter came. A sudden illness of Eloise's father called her home immediately, amid the sympathies of Mrs. Hastings' family. Harry, down in the city, counted the minutes to luncheon, when, obstacles or none, he would see Eloise again. Midday found him at home—and waiting for him, a note from Eloise.

"Forgive me! It was a mistake. I love someone else. E."

A hundred miles away with the pleading thought, "If he will but thank me in the end," she sped southward to loneliness and Hubert's wraith.—Lucy S. Orrick in Lotus.

PICTURESQUE SAN FRANCISCO.

THE supplement accompanying this issue of the NEWS LETTER gives the Christian an idea of the Celestial's place of worship, with its weird, grotesque object of adoration. There is no absence of imagination in the image or the furnishings of the interior of the Temple, which in a way affords one something of an idea of Chinese character.

An article well bought is half sold. J. F. Cutter Whiskey is always well bought, because it is of the highest quality, and to sell it once is to sell it always. For many years this fine liquor has held a first place in every first-class bar. E. Martin & Co., at 411 Market street, are sole Coast agents for J. F. Cutter Whiskey.

The flowers that bloom in the spring, tra la, are all very well; but Leopold, at 35 Post street, has the choicest buds and blossoms to be found in San Francisco, and at prices that defy competition. Look at them.

D. E. Miles, Assistant Manager of the London & Lancashire, is in Honolulu.

The Marine Underwriters Association held its regular meeting on the 15th.

H. K. Field, General Agent of the New England Mutual Life, with his son Charles K., attended the reception given in honor of the fiftieth anniversary of President Stevens' official connection with the company on the 9th inst. in Boston.

Charles F. Wilson has been appointed a special by General Agent Medcraft of the Scottish Union and National.

The Helvetia-Swiss has been admitted to Washington and Montana.

Manager J. G. Conrad has returned from a business trip to Chicago.

Manager L. B. Edwards, of the Manchester, has gone to Chicago to confer with representatives of the home office.

Mrs. D. W. Dohrmann, of Stockton, has been appointed Agent of the Standard Life and Accident Insurance Company by Manager Biggs.

The passage of the County Mutual law, providing for the organization and management of county fire insurance companies, will probably act as a great stimulus for the growth of irresponsible wild cat schemes for cheap insurance throughout the State. It will be perfectly safe for those who contemplate insuring to look twice before they insure in the coming county insurance companies.

Boston is to have a horseless fire engine, of a pattern practically valuable. It will be remembered that Chicago tried the experiment, and horses had to pull the engine out of the street.

Seattle has introduced the latest improved fire alarm boxes with glass fronts.

J. L. M. Shetterley, Manager of the Fidelity Mutual Aid, was some time ago married to Miss Kate V. Heavey, an accomplished young lady from Tehama County. The secret was so carefully guarded that the fact has just leaked out, and his many friends are showering him with congratulations.

MR. WENDELL EASTON delivered a very interesting lecture at Golden Gate hall last Wednesday evening on "California's Country Homes." The lecture was illustrated with colored stereopticon slides, and was both entertaining and instructive.

Vol. LIV.

SAN FRANCISCO, APRIL 24, 1897.

Number 17.

Printed and Published every Saturday by the proprietor, FRED MARRIOTT
 54, Kearny street, San Francisco. Entered at San Francisco Postoffice as Second-class Matter.

The office of the NEWS LETTER in New York City is at Temple Court;
 and at Chicago, 505 Boyce Building, (Frank E. Morrison, Eastern Representative), where information may be obtained regarding subscription and advertising rates.

THE Board of Health should stand firm in its determination to prevent the sale of adulterated foods.

IT is now estimated that more than 20,000 Christian Endeavorers will visit San Francisco during the national convention in July. They should be made welcome, for they represent the very best elements of practical Christianity. The Endeavorers stand for an earnest purpose that commends itself to every man who respects character and sincerity. Before they leave us, they may be able to help some of our churches that are short on piety and salvation and long on creed and sensation.

THE milkmen of this city, who have been compelled to sell milk without water, are crying out against their sharper brethren of the can without cream, and declare that they adulterate their lacteal fluid with choice Spring Valley after their wagons are turned loose by the inspectors. These newly-honest dealers desire that all shall fare alike, and are anxious to aid the inspectors in detecting the milk and water criminals. All of which shows that enforced integrity has sometimes a keener nose than native honesty.

THE death of an aspiring young pugilist resulted at San Jose Wednesday night from a "terrific right-hand swing," which landed on his jaw, which also knocked the life out of the athletic club at the same time. It may be noted that the police were present to see that the fight was properly conducted! It is nearly time for some muscular bruiser to awaken the sleeping conscience of San Francisco by peaceable slaughter of a fellow pugilist in the presence of the police and a few tender-bearded Supervisors.

MILLIONAIRE Bradbury of San Francisco, who was fined for having expectorated upon the floor of a Sacramento-street car, says he will spit wherever he may choose—at least, until the highest tribunal in the country denies him the right to inflict his mouth upon those about him. The ordinance violated by the obstinate citizen rests upon a foundation of good sense, good health and good manners. Possibly Millionaire Bradbury might defeat his persecutors and win his case by setting up that the Supervisors did not intend the order to apply to bogs.

THERE is room for extending the business of San Francisco with West Coast centers of South America, and certain gold awaits it. There is nothing new in the statement; but it is possible that the business men of the city will organize for the purpose of trade development with South Pacific peoples. Germany and England have long dominated the commerce of those countries, have become opulent, and have amassed millions upon millions of money by exercising ordinary adventure and energy. Their conquest has been unobstructed and unchallenged by one of the richest cities of its size in the world—San Francisco—which has the better right, and which comparatively lies within hail of this passing commerce. This matter has been talked about here for some time; and notwithstanding the warm weather, it is announced that the Chamber of Commerce has published and is distributing a circular calling for a future meeting for more talk.

THE great sugar industry of this State is to be stimulated by the addition of large Eastern capital. The American Sugar Refineries Company has purchased an interest in the Spreckels properties; and although the industry was being rapidly developed, the new deal will increase this activity. California has within its own borders every element necessary to the erection of a prosperous empire. The future holds permanent development and material progress for the people of this State.

THE fight for pure food meets with general approval, but the result of the chemist's work shows that sale of adulterated jelly goes sweetly on, notwithstanding. The gelatinous stuff bearing the strongest guarantees of purity is found to be the worst. The mixture in many cases is harmless, but that fact does not lessen the fraud. These local purveyors of impure foods have shown that they can meet Eastern competition. Their consciences are diluted quite as much as their goods. Truly, this is a wicked and adulterated generation, and the man who knows what he is eating hath wisdom.

IT is announced that President McKinley will appoint Judge McKenna to a position on the Supreme Bench, upon the retirement of Mr. Justice Field; and the Washington dispatches say that the aged jurist would step down at once except for the desire of his wife to accomplish certain brilliant social functions before sinking to the level of private life. The gallantry of the distinguished octogenarian will be regarded with deep grief by Judge Waymire, who expects to warm the chair now occupied by McKenna, when the Attorney-General steps up higher. Recent political vicissitudes have painfully sharpened the apprehensive faculties of the Alameda statesman.

MR. AMBROSE, Superintendent of Streets, will be given an opportunity by the Supervisors to deny that he has men on his pay-roll who do nothing but draw their existence from politician Graney and their salaries from the tax-payers. Also, why others are paid $4 and $5 per day for services that are worth not to exceed $2.50? Graney and Ambrose, the Supervisors think, are operating as a close corporation, and have no respect for a square division of the spoils of insolent office. The street committee of the Board of Supervisors will smoke out the unfeeling Ambrose by refusing to agree to his appropriation for next year unless he develops a disposition to recognize their rights in appointments. Really, Ambrose seems to have forgotten the old adage that there should be honor among—politicians.

MAYOR PHELAN has called the attention of the Board of Supervisors to the fact that cemetery associations are continually selling lots for burial in the city limits, in utter contempt of resolutions of the Board. The Mayor further has expressed a decided objection to these places of sepulture, for the reason that they obstruct progress, and are to be condemned upon sanitary reasons. The Mayor's views are those of intelligent understanding. Sentiment is all right in its place; but it is nothing less than amazing that we continue to inter our dead in the precincts of the living. The cemeteries should be condemned as a positive and growing menace to health. The sacred dead should be removed to more distant and harmonious place. We may justly reverence the memory of the departed, and consecrate the ground where their bodies sleep, but we should not forget the living, nor allow a false sentiment to raise up and maintain a certain menace to health and life at our very doors: We love the dead—but do not wish to join them.

THE ERRATICS OF THE NEW TARIFF.

THE new tariff is a mosaic which no man can piece together. The House, under the lash and whip of Czar Reed, has hurried it on without regard to its symmetry, form, or applicability to the existing condition of things. It has gone to the Senate where the whip and spur are being applied with vigor, and some chance of success, as it is understood that deals have been made by which the silver Republicans are to "stand in," as it was expected they would. The passage of the bill is therefore assured, but a crop of amendments in the Upper House are pretty certain. The proposed tariff was incubated by a Committee not yet sworn in as members of the present House. All accounts agree that if the House had been permitted to vote on these amendments most of them would have carried. But it was not allowed to vote upon them. Thus a committee drawn in its entirety before the present Congress met, has been imposed from the outside upon the inside without adequate debate or opportunity for amendment, and then the Senate and Country were told that this was the spontaneous voice of the House of Representatives! Who framed this tariff bill? Accurately speaking, the tariff beneficiaries pulling the strings that move their puppets on the Committee. The solid trusts "that had the fat fried out of them" for campaign purposes are palpably now leading the country by the nose on the great tariff question. We are all to be over-taxed to pay the cost of Major McKinley's election as President. The whole bill is full of inconsistencies that can neither be explained or argued away. Mr. Dingley, for instance, is on record, as bitterly opposed to the principal schedule of his own bill. His bill of last session with duties on wool and woolsens at about half the rates now proposed was his idea of what the tariff should be. But now he has been outvoted and humiliated in his own Committee and is forced to get up in the House, and defend schedules which he privately denounces as monstrous. The articles of perfumery and especially hair tonics, dentifrices and similar alcoholic preparations are practically shut out of this country altogether, and are not produced here. Take for instance eau de quinine and we find that whereas the duty under previous tariffs was but 31 per cent, it is proposed that it shall at once jump, under the new law, to 150 per cent. To point out all the absurdities and irrational proposals of the new law would take several pages of the NEWS LETTER, and no little fun could be made out of even so dull a subject. But it is not going to pass as it is. The Senate contains men who will not stand it and mean to amend it out of all recognition. Many of them have records and will stand by them. If the so-called house committee had three months to work on the tariff bill, the Senate Finance Committee may well demand two. A sub-committee of four is, in fact, already at work on a measure of its own. To oppose a tariff framed in the House by practically six men, a tariff will be offered in the Senate made by three men. This Committee will do well to take advice from a source that Mr. Dingley and his advisers have strangely neglected. We refer to the recorded views of Wm. McKinley. He said in a speech in the House upon the adoption of the tariff that bears his own name: "If a new policy is hereafter to be inaugurated, and new departures made, it is to be hoped that the change will be made sufficiently remote from the present time to enable business men and trades people to prepare for the new order of things and adjust their new trade conformably to it. A law passed presently to go into operation at once, or in the near future would be without justification on the part of the House, and, I may almost say, would be an act of criminality."

Remodeling Governor Budd has just appointed three the Codes. new Code Commissioners, who supersede the old ones. The men who have just left office patched up the existing codes rather gingerly, but were conservative and safe. Some good and no evil would have come of their handiwork, and the Legislature might well have accepted it en globo. But for some reason hard to fathom it was emphatically opposed to the commission and all its work. It took revision into its own hands and added about three hundred amendments to the existing codes, rendering confusion worse confounded. We do not yet know, because of the trouble with the printing office, what changes have been made. The evil to be cured is about as bad as it can be, but to remedy it by special legislation is a mistake from whatever point of view it is looked at. The codes ought to be so framed that they will stand criticism, ensure justice and equity, and made so clear to the Appellate Court that cow county Judges will either administer them as they are, or suffer such reprimands from the higher court as could not fail to have a due effect. It does not seem to be generally known, but it is nevertheless the fact, that a persistent refusal to follow the rulings of the court above renders the Judge below amenable to disbarment and removal from his bench. We are not of those who cry out against our highest appellate court. It cannot accomplish the impossible and keep abreast of its calendar, but it can and it does straighten out the crooked law of many an inferior court. There are counties in which no man's life, liberty, or property would be safe if it were not for the existence of a higher court. Said the late Professor Calhoun Benham to the writer: "Thank God we have a Supreme Court, as otherwise the judiciary of the interior would mean chaos." The main difficulty of the upper court is to keep decisions below from unsettling determined principles of law. If the new Code Commissioners succeed in giving us a code that will remain intact on the statute book, they will deserve all the honors that can be showered upon them. We fear such a consummation impossible, because the Legislature will not have it so. It will amend and amend every session over again, so that no possible code will remain definite and settled. If we all are to know anything whatever of the laws under which we live, those laws must not eternally be undergoing changes. The New York code has won such approval that it is well nigh impregnable. California hadly needs something like it. We have the belief that Shanahan of Shasta, ex-Congressman Caminetti, and Bulla of Los Angeles, are a head and shoulders above the average Legislator, but that they are just the men to give us a permanent code we somewhat doubt.

The Present Position Of Italy. The present position of Italy is to some people an enigma. She is yet in the Dreihund but not of it. She is not adrift from the Concert of Europe, yet she is not for it, because her high spirited people decline to be put on record as favoring the Turks against the Greeks. The Italians have had many soft words, which hutter no parsnips, said to them, but they decline all advances from that quarter. They refuse all overtures from the Mussulmans and adhere to the cause of their kith and kin. Blood is thicker than water even on the shore of the Mediterranean. The ultimate attitude of Italy is not in doubt. Already it is given out from Germany that she is to be put out of the Dreihund, because she cannot keep step to the needed expeuses. Germany is the head and front of the reactionary influences of Europe at the present time, and Austria is her shadow, in the Greek matter. Italy's place will be fouud with France and England, the other great powers in which the Government is amenable to the popular will. Russia ought to and probably will, take the place in the triple Alliance which she had when that combination was first formed, and which, on her withdrawal was taken by Italy a league of the three Emperors, and an Alliance of France, England and Italy would end the present artificial arrangement, in which there is neither heart, or soul, or true feeling or real interest. There is nothing in common between Italy and Germany or between Russia and Italy, or between Russia and England. Germany is going her own road, and that is incompatible with everything French. Germany kept England and France apart for awhile, but the exposure of the Bismarck secret treaty with Russia ends all that. Germany has made the mistake of the last decade, and her hot headed Emperor is to blame for it. Not during this generation will Germany and England be found on the same side again.

Is Cuba Sold? If there be anything in appearances, it would seem that Spain has sold Cuba to somebody representing the insurgents. Spain is withdrawing her troops to a mere handful. The insurgents are doing little or nothing, and the helligerants are not saying the ugly things of each other that they were a few days ago. The financial strain on both must be severer than either can bear. Spain is virtually bankrupt, and the Cubans are in debt beyond the possibility of their ever making repayment. Yet the story that has the appearance of truth is that they have bought their independence for $100,000,000. No doubt the merchants and owners of large estates could find the money in return for profitable concessions from the new Government. But it is hard to believe that the money power would have faith enough in the negroes, ereoles, and mixed races of Cuba, totally unacquainted as they are with the art of self-government. It is easier to believe that Spain would sell than that the Cubans can find the money. It is said that they can procure it in New York by mortgaging their rich sugar estates, but that will involve the United States in some sort of interference sooner or later. There will ere long be trouble among the people that will lead to much the kind of differences that so frequently occur in the worst parts of South America. The interests of our people must be protected, and our Government must protect them. That italicized must means a great deal. It will mean civil war in the first place, and to interference on our part in the next. There will soon be local hatreds, strifes, and even war. In that pretty certain event, the American money loaners can do nothing better than lean upon Uncle Sam, and all the time we shall practically be collecting English bonds, held in American names. The ramifications of money are multitudinous, and the coin that goes to Cuba will pretty surely be, in fact, English. Collecting Cuba's English debts will be a newer and more agreeable way of "twisting the British lion's tail." Although in many aspects undesirable, annexation ultimately may become the lesser of two evils. As to the pride of the Spanish, which is undoubtedly at home, has not cut much of a figure abroad. Her great colonies she has let go one by one, upon very easy and even humiliating terms. In view of her past, there can be no great loss of pride in her selling Cuba now. We regret that it should be so. We should like to see the Mother of Colonization retain the little that is left to her. But that seems hardly possible now. A want of frugality has been the cause of most of her troubles. Once the world's storehouse of gold, she has not saved enough to protect herself from foes at home and abroad.

The Torrey Bankruptcy Bill.

Congress has been promising the Country a Bankruptcy law for many years past, but, as the promise had no money at the back of it, and no lobby, what was everybody's business proved to be nobody's business. But something is going to be done this session. The measure has been given an early start, and as it has the support of almost all the Boards of Trade, and Chambers of Commerce in the country, it appears to have a good chance of enactment. The repeal of the old law in 1886 without substituting another for it, was a dirty parliamentary trick which was severely denounced at the time. The South has kept the matter hung up ever since and has not improved her credit thereby. The disposition to evade passing such Bankruptcy laws as are found in other States, and to prevent the Federal Government passing a general law, has been regretted by the best Northern friends that section has. All the great business centres have for years urged the enactment of the Torrey bill, but with surprising non-success. The sooner it gets on to the statute book the better. It is essential to the restoration of business confidence.

The Trouble In The Transvaal.

England never seems to be out of one trouble until she is into another. Her membership in the combine known as the "Concert of Europe" is enough, in all science, for one power to attend to. It might well break down half a dozen statesmen to meet the numerous difficulties that wait upon existing European conflicts. But the British foreign office is not only able to attend to them all but is ready to give attention to whatever corner of the world in which others may turn up. In all these affairs our popular papers predict that she is going to get the worst of it, and the very mischief is going to happen as a consequence. Yet as a rule she comes out something more than even. At present she has a pretty considerable affair looming up in the Transvaal. The foreign miners, consisting mostly of British and Americans, will either have to abandon their mines, or Kruger will have to change his policy. In that case about three men of Anglo-Saxon blood would have to fly before one Boer, and abandon their property. It is pretty safe to predict that no such thing would happen. That the Boers are becoming more and more determined to drive the Uitlanders out, by means of adverse legislation, is perfectly clear. They are a people very stubborn and fixed in their views. It is hard to make them see either the inevitable, or accept it. They will fight with splendid valor, without hardly knowing why. The task before England ought only to be one of diplomacy, but the Boers know little and care less about blandishments of that kind. They know what they want, and do not care for much talk about it. They want the Uitlander out of the country in fact, as well as in name. As the Uitlander will not go voluntarily there seems nothing left to the Boers but to try and make him. This they are seeking to do by indirection: that is by legislation under which it is impossible to live and conduct mining operations. It would, under these circumstances, seem inevitable that there will be a fight, the result of which can be in no manner of doubt this time. The strength and temper of the Boers have been tested, and England knows how to make the means equal to the end. Her great Indian army are only a little way off, and would be found much more than equal to the emergency. If Oom Paul can only induce his people to see that the Uitlanders are there to stay, the peace may not after all be broken. But that is not the outlook at present.

These figures represent the yearly total of sugar we buy from foreigners. It is a vast sum. Last year every pound of wheat and flour we exported was required to pay for the sugar we imported. That is a startling fact that must seem hardly credible to the uninitiated. There is no reason why such a huge sum should much longer remain on the wrong side of our commercial ledger. California alone is abundantly able to produce the whole, with profit to herself and with advantage to the nation. It has been considered a misfortune that our fertile plains and valleys have so long remained comparatively uncultivated, but it begins to look as if a kind Providence had preserved the virgin soil intact for the production of the sugar beet. Beet sugar has become of so much importance to the farmers, manufacturers, and merchants of Germany and France that they are engaged in a sort of protective duel over the first place in its exportation, for which both countries pay a bounty. Supplying sugar to the world is clearly a profitable business. Our own cash payment averages $274,000 a day, which is proof enough that there is money in sugar from this one customer alone; and that average will necessarily increase with the greater canning output. We produced last year about 40,000 tons of beet sugar of the best quality, which is not much, to be sure, but it is an excellent beginning, and shows that time will do wonders for us in this direction. The new tariff has been fixed just as the sugar growers wanted it, and will undoubtedly give a great impetus to the production of this wonderfully money-making article of commerce.

Collector of the Port.

The appointment of Colonel John P. Jackson to the position of Collector of the Port of San Francisco, on Wednesday, by President McKinley, and his prompt confirmation by the Senate on the day following, was an expected and deserved recognition of the Colonel's services to his party in this State. There is no one in California better known than John P. Jackson; and his services to the Republican cause in the last campaign entitled him to substantial remembrance by the President. The appointment will meet the approval of his party generally, and of the business community, and what is more, will give this port the services of a thoroughly competent and faithful official. Colonel Jackson was a candidate for Collector of this Port when General Harrison became President; but failing to secure the Senatorial endorsement of the State, was appointed to the United States Sub-treasury by Harrison. That was the only office the Colonel ever held, notwithstanding his prominence in the party and valued services in the ranks. The new appointee will take office on the first day of June.

Adulterated Food. The vigorous and persistent efforts of the Board of Health to protect the consumers of San Francisco from adulterated foods put up and fraudulently sold for pure products, are to be commended. It appears that in no other way can the wholesale manufacture of adulterated goods be prevented or even partially suspended. The plea made by California makers of jellies, etc., that they have been forced into the manufacture of impure food by the unchecked competition of the East, is not worth a moment's consideration. If they were aware of the frauds, they should have warned the public against them, rather than attempt to meet fraud by fraud, for the imposition upon the consumer can be no less harshly described. The NEWS LETTER is particularly pleased that the city has a Board of Health that cannot be influenced by improper motives, nor turned aside from performing a valuable service to the people. The Board should be provided with every assistance promptly for the effective prosecution of its work, and the money just appropriated for a special attorney will be well spent. There is sufficient work to justify it, and the tax-payers will endorse all necessary expenditure in this or any other legitimate direction by the Board in its crusade.

Years ago the NEWS LETTER, alone and unaided, took up the fight against adulterated goods, spent money freely in making analyses, obtaining information, and exposing frauds in food products, with most beneficial results. The Board of Health, with the power at its command, can accomplish an almost inestimable public service, and while the temporary commercial loss to manufacturers will be something, if they will co-operate hereafter with the authorities in their work, will find that this just reformation will result in their direct and lasting benefit. It is unfortunate that innocent retailers should suffer for the wrong-doing of the makers; but there appears no other practical method of reaching the really guilty—the manufacturers. Appended is a list of those whose goods were examined by the Board of Health chemist, W. T. Wenzell, during the month of March, and found impure:

Private Jugs That Belong To The State. Down in South Carolina the State owns and runs the whiskey business and has a right to enter a private dwelling to examine the contents of a demijohn or of a smaller measure, such as a jug. Finding it to be a profitable traffic she is just now paying special heed to it. A startling instance of her vigilance, has just presented itself. A like case in California, would, we think, create somewhat of a ruction. A citizen was convicted of having in his possession a jug of whiskey which did not bear the certificate of the State Liquor Association. For this offense he was adjudged a criminal and sentenced to serve three months in the chain gang. The case was appealed to the Supreme Court of the State, and that body, on a division of its members, confirmed the decision of the Court below, and committed the offender to serve his sentence. A man's house is held to be his castle, but in South Carolina his jug is the State's. This on its face is a harsh and outrageous decision, but it is consistent with the Gottenberg system, which has been adopted by more States than South Carolina. If the commonwealth has a right to create a monopoly of the whiskey business for the nominal purpose of raising revenue, it has by implication the right to protect its monopoly, even to the extent of invading the house in quest of the unlicensed jug. The house is sacred from intrusion, but the jug is not. The rain may descend upon the one, the wind may blow through every crevice, and the sun may shine through every aperture, yet the President may not unbidden so much as lift the latchet. Yet if there be a suspicion of a whiskey jug being in it a petty officer may enter, rumage through every corner, and finally attach the owner for three months to the chain gang. Verily! We have some queer laws in parts of this country!

The Fate of the Greater Charter. San Francisco has defeated four charters, and would be likely to outvote another to-morrow if she had a chance.

Nor do charters fare any better at the hands of an individual than at those of the mob. Mayor Strong has just vetoed the proposed charter for the Greater New York, which the people and both houses of the Legislature had approved. All through the battle he himself warmly advocated it, but changed his mind at the last moment. He now wants only one chamber, a single Police Commissioner and a full Board of Election Commissioners, with the Mayor's veto to stand as it was. There has been an immense amount of work done, with all of which Mayor Strong has appeared to agree, but suddenly he has gone back upon himself, and two or three years' work has to be done over again. The Mayor promised in advance to support and sign the Greater Charter, and many are the guesses as to his ignoble recalcitrancy.

Durrant's Case. The statement is heard on excellent authority that an effort will be made to secure commutation of the death sentence passed upon Theodore Durrant. There appears no just cause for such attempt. The statement that the prisoner did not have a fair trial finds no foundation in careful review of that celebrated case. In fact, it is admitted that the Judge before whom the trial took place was, if anything, more than fair to the defendant. Circumstantial evidence sometimes plays us false, but in the case of Durrant there appears no possibility of mistake. Not one crime alone was thus proved, but a second, although not at bar, carried double conviction, and pointed with equal certainty to the defendant's guilt. The proceedings were regular in every particular, as was determined by the ruling of the Supreme Court. There has been nothing produced to show that the verdict was influenced by the press or public opinion. It is natural for the relatives of the condemned man to desire the commutation of his sentence. The record of crime furnishes no instance where all ties of blood have been broken, no matter how dark the deeds of the criminal; and that some effort would be made to save Durrant from the gallows was to have been expected.

The petitions for executive interference with the sentence of the Superior Court, now said to be abroad in the State, will doubtless have very little influence with Governor Budd. Petitions of general and indiscriminate signatures are not entitled to serious consideration, for the reason that there are in every community a considerable number of people who will sign almost anything so long as it costs them nothing. That sort of sympathy is inexpensive, and a few well-chosen words will frequently awaken it in the hearts of the thoughtless or emotional. These facts are known by no one better than Governor Budd. He will not look at the number of names or any petition for clemency addressed to him, but at their quality. Being himself a lawyer, the Governor will review the evidence in the case, if it ever comes officially before him, and from the facts that induced the verdict of the jury, make up his answer. More than two years have elapsed since the awful crime for which Durrant has been declared responsible was committed; and nothing has occurred to shake the verdict given or remove the belief, doubly clear, that at his death only should the slow steps of justice halt.

The Boulevard. More than $26,000 have been subscribed to the boulevard fund, and with the exception of the small balance remaining in the hands of Daniel Meyer, have been wisely expended. The work done has kept many people from actual suffering, and if the few thousand dollars still necessary are obtained, will complete a permanent and valued public improvement. The responses to urgent appeal have been fairly free, and more than one generous citizen has given twice; but there are a considerable number of large estates and wealthy individuals from whom nothing has been obtained. The fact that the poor we have always with us takes nothing from the urgency of the present moment. Actual want has in hundreds of cases been averted by this charitable work; but the funds gathered are nearly exhausted, the boulevard is not yet completed, and the season is not so far advanced that the congested idleness of the city can find employment in the interior. To perfect and preserve the admirable improvement already accomplished, and to save the city from the charge of actual want within its borders, more money is required. Contributions, to be of the most value, must be promptly made. It is certainly the duty of all who can afford little or much to send in their subscriptions, and send them in at once.

A PETITION is being circulated for signatures, to be presented to the Board of Regents of the State University, asking for the establishment of a chair of "Norse language and literature." It is justified by the rich mythology, history, language, and literature of the far north of Europe, and is doubly worthy a place in the State's educational institution.

A MONK'S DISCOVERY.

It is not generally known that the sparkling wine which takes its name from the French province of Champagne, was not made until near the end of the 17th century, when Dom Perignon and Dom Ruynart, Benedictine monks, who had charge of the cellars of St. Peter's Abbey at Haut Villiers, gave to the world this valuable discovery.

Dom Perignon conceived the idea of marrying the products of one vineyard with that of another, and found that by his method a white wine could be made from the blackest grapes without turning yellow, as it had always done. He also substituted a piece of eorktree bark (cheve de Bouchon) for the flax dipped in oil, which had formerly been used as a stopper for a bottle; but the greatest of all his discoveries was the method by which the sparkle or "mousse," as the French call it, was obtained. This effervescent wine naturally became more popular than the old-fashioned still wine formerly used in the province.

These monks died in the first quarter of the 18th century, and in the floor of the old Abbey Church at Haut Villiers, close to the altar, two black marble slabs, side by side, mark to this day the last resting places of Dom Perignon and Dom Ruynart, to whom the world owes a debt of gratitude for the discovery of sparkling champagne.

"Dom Ruynart" imparted this then secret process to his nephew, Nicolas Ruynart, who in 1729, at Rheims, founded the house of Ruynart, the first establishment to produce champagne for the public market, and which house has been presided over by an unbroken line of Ruynarts from father to son, until to-day we find directing the firm of Ruynart pere et fils, Andre de Ruynart, Vicomte de Brimont, the seventh generation since that of the old Benedictine monk, cellarer of the abbey at Haut Villiers.

As this house made the first champagne, it seemed eminently proper that the jury at the World's Fair, Chicago, in 1893, should have given, as it did, the highest and the only award for "Brut" champagne to Messrs. Ruynart pere et fils.

The word "Brut" means that no artificial sweetening is used in the preparation of the wine, and is used in contradistinction to the terms "Dry" and "Extra Dry."

In America, champagne can hardly be too much iced to suit the general taste, some epicures going so far as to drink it frappe. This practice is probably open to criticism, although it greatly assists sweet wines in making them palatable, as they are generally made from inferior grapes. The "Brut" wines can only be made from the finest selections of the best years, and require no sweetening to hide deficiencies in flavor and no extra chilling.

Joseph Gillott's Steel Pens,

Gold Medals, Paris, 1878-1889. These pens are "the best in the world." Sole agent for the United States, MR. HENRY HOE, 91 John street, New York. Sold by all Stationers.

ON Monday night Georgia Cayvan separated herself from the weather-stained, passion-stirred humanness of Squire Kate and appeared in the stiff, smart groomery of Mary Pennington, spinster, an impossible and uninteresting young woman who is the central figure in a comedy of that name, written by W. R. Walkes, of London. Miss Cayvan's press agent says that Mr. Walkes is a well-known young London author. All I know of him is that his comedy lasted through one afternoon performance in London. Miss Cayvan bought this play and produced it, early in the present season, in New York. It failed there almost as fleetly as it had failed in London. I knew all this before I went to the Columbia Monday night—and still I had hopes. I remembered some of those New York "successes," which had come all the way to sunny California to find themselves below zero, and I thought it was a poor rule that couldn't work the other way around once in a while. Now I have seen the play, and in it Georgia Cayvan—whom, under such conditions as those of last week, I regard as an artist. And now I am sad. For Mary Pennington, Spinster, is a new woman joke—written by a man—a coarse, unsympathetic man—and an English man at that. Why, oh why, I say to myself, did Miss Cayvan go shopping in London for such goods as this? Does not her true American heart tell her that America is the home of all such jest and pleasantries—that the new woman, together with the mother-in-law, the plumber, and the rejected manuscript jokes, belongs by all the rights of discovery and conquest to us?

Mary Pennington, Spinster, is an alleged satire on the woman of advanced ideas. As satire, or as anything else that people go to the theatre to see, it fails: first, because the author has no story to tell, and, second, because he has no cleverness of pen with which to conceal that fact from the audience. Almost half of Mr. Walkes's work consists of those uncivilized parts of drama known as the Soliloquy and the Aside. Being paid to witness the performance, I was possibly more attentive than the man who paid for the same privilege. Out of the Soliloquies and Asides, and the cheerless patter which limped between, I was able to glean that the author was struggling to portray Mary Pennington as a sex-sufficient Amazon, who takes man on the broad basis of brotherhood, provided he acknowledges woman's equality and independence. To accomplish this, Mr. Walkes gives Mary the ownership of a paper manufactory, and a masculine junior partner. By means of the accustomed physician of the stage, who has no visible practice besides that of diagnosing the personal affairs of the people about him, it is discovered that Mary and her partner, Geoffrey Armstrong, are the subject of much gossip over the village teacups. The sly process of awakening femininity is, I presume, supposed to commence when Mary harks to this gossip; for, sooner than have Geoffrey leave the mill—as he intends doing, to save her fair name, although he is suffused with vast, unspoken love for her—she follows out the physician's prescription by proposing marriage with him, in a cordial, business-like way. He would take her to his bosom on the spot, but she gives him the senior partner's eye; so they shake hands on it and close the bargain.

Of course there is another woman. Lady Maitland is her name. She would have been worldly, cynical and epigrammatic, if Mr. Walkes had known how to make her so. As it is, she is impossible, impolite and insistent. She jilted Geoffrey several years before the play begins, to marry money. Now she is a widow, and seeing him again, in the glory of grizzled hair and paste "side-boards," her heart re-flames. She wants him for herself. "You sell yourself to Mary Pennington," she says; "sell yourself to me—I can pay you a better price." She repeats this tactful phrase to Mary, adding that she saw him first, had always loved him and is willing to pay whatever his loss costs the firm. Lady Maitland pleads, and Mary consents to release him—just when she has found her heart and the fallacy of feminine sufficiency. She bids Geoffrey go—it had only been a business proposition in the first place, she tells him—somebody else loves him and he loves somebody else. Geoffrey is heart-broken, hut proud. He goes. Then somebody rushes in to say that the mill hands have struck. "What do I care for the strike!" cries Mary. "He's gone! Geoffrey's gone!"

Another act is necessary to bring the bruised hearts together. The paper business has gone to smash. Lady Maitland and her hulging wallet trail Geoffrey to the doctor's dwelling (where Mary is). Again she offers to purchase him at a handsome figure. He is about to accept—to save the business—but the good doctor holds him back. "This is a firm affair," he says, "and the senior partner must be consulted." Mary is called in, and she promptly hustles Lady Maitland and her money out, and falls into the eager arms of Geoffrey—where, it may be imagined, she finds adequate felicity, to say nothing of the glad consciousness that at last the suspenders are on shoulders strong enough to bear their weight.

As I have hinted before, the play is devoid of dramatic invention. The situations, characters and dialogue are heavily, obesely, Britishly banal. If our best plays come from England, so do our worst. And what can even a good company like Miss Cayvan's do with such a piece as this? Nothing. Miss Cayvan plays Mary in a half-hearted, hopeless way, as though she were saying, "It's not my fault, I'm doing my best; I wish you could like it, but if you don't, I won't blame you a bit." The company is not so amiable. Orrin Johnson perceptibly sulks at the part of Geoffrey; and George Woodward, whose misfortune it is to be the doctor who has so much to say and nothing to do that counts, can be heard muttering in his teeth, "And me a character actor!" Anne Sutherland takes it out on the author by making Lady Maitland even worse than she really is. Mary Jerrold is too young to know just how bad a part she has.

There was a time when old-fashioned Methodist minstrels were good enough for San Francisco; hut times change, and now it is high church minstrels or nothing. The Reverend Doctors Primrose and West, at the Baldwin, come high enough, I think; still there is trouble in the congregation. It is all about the music. "Listen to that stuff!" said a pew holder to me during the Easter services. I listened. One of the choir was singing what appeared to me to be touching moral on the impotence of gold. A young man and a young woman were in the song; his name, strange to say, was Jack. Jack bade her begone—"Another will be my bride," he said, "and gold will help you to forget." And she answered bravely:

Take back your gold, for gold can never buy me,
Take back your gold and promise to be true;
Give me the love, the love that you deny me,
Make me your wife—that's all I ask of you.

And there was another song which pleased him even less. In it there was a young man who spoke right up to his father, saying, "Father, she's my sister, I don't care what she's done." He followed that up with the dread alternative, "If you turn my sister from her home, I'll go too." "Did you ever hear such rot?" the pew holder growled. "Why, it's worse than that fellow Sankey's sniffing. Bah! I'd like to throw an Easter egg at him."

I cannot understand it. Nobody complained last year when these same minstrels sang the same songs, or almost the same songs—"It don't seem like the same old smile" and "Tell them that you saw me." This culture is sudden. It must be the result of that French opera season.

However, there are other songs and other things besides songs which will offend no one. George Wilson's Rock-of-Ages humor is still inspiring and intact; the eccentric musical trio has found some new post-office harmonies, and the club swingers do many neat turns. Mr. Primrose sings a graphic song about the "Hot time in Old Town to-night." The Primrose legs have lost none of their eloquent address. And the Primrose Easter vesture—well—hountiful, gorgeous, intoxicating, does not describe it. I observed Mr. James Swinnerton taking it in with a hungry eye. But Primrose is not the only bud in the bouquet. There is Bea Brummel West, for instance

Denis O'Sullivan faced an ordeal at the First Unitarian Church on Wednesday night—he faced his friends. It is one thing to go abroad and win success, and quite another to come home and prove it. Mr. O'Sullivan's distinct success in England was in opera. It was found that he could not act as well as sing—possibly not better than he sings, for it is said of him that he is a remarkable actor. So amid glum church surroundings, under the zealous, proprietary scrutiny of his friends, and with twenty songs to sing—songs running all the way from Schumann's "Dichterlieb" to Boito's Mefistofele, via Rossini, Dvorak, Cornelius and Korby, to say nothing of the Irish pieces—it must be understood that his task was not an easy one. And to have come out of it as gracefully as he did is not to be regarded, by Mr. O'Sullivan, or by any one else, as the least of his several triumphs. I have noted the conditions and restrictions of Wednesday night, and now, in all fairness, can lay aside localism, let slip the dogs of criticism, and consider Mr. O'Sullivan as an artist—which he certainly is, and, as such, merits nothing less than absolute sincerity from his reviewers. Mr. O'Sullivan's voice has not lost the old tremolo that, so far back as I can recall, has always marred the full beauty of his tone. He steadies it most of the time, but it is still there, to sound upon you when you least want it and to be regarded as an inevitable drawback to the singer. It is not an aggressive tremolo, not a "nanny," but just enough of a tremulous injustice to a big, frank, swinging barytone to make one think what this voice might have been without it. Even with it there is much to admire, and at times something to thrill to; for the rich, virile quality is there, the enthusiasm of power and the caress of magnetism. And where he once charmed us by the bounding generosity of these good characteristics, he now charms us by the discriminate, musicianly manner in which he marshals his forces. Not that Mr. O'Sullivan is freed from the healthy animal spirit which so often impels a singer to shout out a good, strong note for the good, strong note's sake, and no other reason in the world—no, indeed, he is not; we read about singers who are, but they seldom really happen. But he has acquired the sense of values. His imagination is finer; he has the character appreciation of the man who has acted and who feels what he sings, and something of the musician's decent respect for his instrument, even though not enough of it to always keep him from blaring uneasily on his high notes or falling into bad breathing when the song calls for a special gush of tenderness. To my thinking, Mr. O'Sullivan's best work was in the "Fischio, Fischio," from Mefistofele, the Zegeuner Melodie by Dvorak, the first of the Schumann songs ("Im wunderschönen Monat Mai"), Rossini's "Gia La Luna," and the Irish air, "Kitty Magee." The nervous dramatic power of the Boito, the safe agility of the Rossini, and the tender grace of the Schumann and Dvorak, marked splendid singing and broad versatility. And "Kitty Magee" promises some rare Irish humor for next week in the lighter parts of Shamus's music.

The symphony season closed creditably at the Columbia Thursday afternoon. Denis O'Sullivan sang; Horace Platt made a speech, urging the subscribers to come out strong and early for next season; and Hinriehs played the band with exceptional fluency. Although the novelty—Rubinstein's fifth symphony—turned out to be a palpably ungreat work as a whole, it is beautiful in the slow movement, and it was beautifully played. Mr. O'Sullivan was at his wavering worst in the Don Carlos aria, but he pulled himself together in the Pagliacci prologue, singing with firmer tone and convincing dramatic feeling.

ASHTON STEVENS.

Monday night, at the Tivoli, will tell the tale of Shamus O'Brien. Denis O'Sullivan will sing his great role Shamus, and San Francisco will be among the cities which have witnessed Dr. Stanford's famous Irish opera. The Tivoli has gone into this enterprise with a generous hand, new scenery and costumes modelled after the originals, two weeks' rehearsals, and everything that is available to make the production a big success.

The lady-like baboon with dainty gold didy, the plucky donkey, and the beautiful Herr Grais are again making merry at the Orpheum, where they are undoubtedly the stars of the week. Next week we are to have Tachianu, the gentleman soprano, the Midleys, who do a juvenile burlesque, and Al and Mamie Anderson, flat foot buck dancers, plantation warblers and cake pedestrians.

Farce comedy pure and simple at the Columbia Monday night. No subterfuge this time. The author says of his work. "A Run on the Bank is an invasion of the drama, an unassuming effort to present in a few character sketches in an amusing form." Such modesty could not travel with anything but a good show; besides, Ward and Vokes, the stars, are reputed to be among the cleverest farce-comedians extant.

Primrose and West's Minstrels will have a change of programme for next week at the Baldwin, which includes a bona fide cake walk by eighty prancing niggers.

NO SAFER OR MORE EFFICACIOUS REMEDY can be had for Coughs, or any trouble of the throat, than "Brown's Bronchial Troches"

THE EXHIBITION AT THE ART ASSOCIATION.

THE San Francisco Art Association opened its doors on Thursday evening for its annual spring exhibition. The motives which prompt the presence of the usual crowd who gather on such occasions is a matter for speculation. From the perfunctory attention given the exhibit, it certainly cannot be love of art which brings the people together. Love of mankind would seem to be the actuating impulse, judging from the manner and attitude of the majority of the lookers-on. No one, however, can be blamed for turning a back on the collection of pictures which the Association has had the effrontery to dub an "exhibition," and, furthermore, invite the public to its inspection. There have been poor exhibits in the Hopkins Institute of Art before now, but this is by all odds the very worst. They say it was a disputed point as to the advisability of giving the exhibition this spring, and that the question was carried by two small votes. It would have shown good judgment and common sense on the part of the committee to have overlooked those votes when they saw the material offered for admission. To have "hung" jury and "hanging" committee instead of the pictures would have been a meritorious deed. The committee certainly had poor material with which to work, but even so, they could have attained other results than the indiscriminate massing of oils, pen and inks, pastels, water-colors and sketches, which make the spectator, if he knows aught of the canons of art, gasp with horror.

Good pictures are hidden in dark corners, while poor ones flaunt their imperfections in the light. In fact, the whole exhibition is bad, and would be a rank failure were it not for a few paintings carefully scattered among the poor ones, with the probable object of encouraging the gazer to continue his inspection with the hope of finding another after unexpectedly meeting with the first meritorious work.

The portraits are a saving grace to the collection. Fred Yates has three excellent pieces, particularly interesting, as they are the counterfeit presentments of well-known men. It is worth while to compare the three and note the differences in treatment.

A new aspirant has entered the portrait field, and shows remarkable talent in that direction. Elizabeth Curtis O'Sullivan has returned from her European study with evidences of her improvement in every stroke of her brush. She bids fair to hold her own against the more mature work of her accomplished aunt, Mrs. Mary Curtis Richardson.

Arthur Mathews' painting holds the place of honor in the rotunda. The subject is the sentence of banishment pronounced by the Angel upon Adam and Eve. Mathews is a hard and conscientious worker, and his drawing is beyond criticism. He is undoubtedly the best figure draughtsman in San Francisco. The reflected light from the flaming sword of the Angel is a nice bit of work, well handled.

Keith is represented by one of his delightful compositions, "From the Berkeley Hills," which makes one conscious of green pastures, blue skies, and fresh spring breezes. His other contribution, "A Warm Morning," is in the same vein of out-doors, and glows with the touch and atmosphere of nature.

A new name on the list is that of Sidney Yard, who sends in one modest canvas, "Hillside in Spring." This man knows Nature, and can interpret her, for it is a hillside up which one may ramble, sure of a glorious view at the top. Mr. Yard arouses one's expectations as to what he will do in the future; there is promise in this little bit he has given us.

L. P. Latimer is another artist who paints close to Nature and follows her moods carefully. His large picture, "Solitude," is full of harmony and quiet tones. He has two sunny little canvases in another room that are charming in their freshness and delicacy.

A marine, "Coast Near Santa Cruz," by Chris Jorgenson, attracts the attention as an interesting piece of work. A close inspection, however, reveals carelessness of handling which should not be found in the work of so good an artist. In fact, that criticism can be applied to the paintings of several of the artists from whom better things are expected.

The impression received, after a view at the collection, is one of no effort, ambition or energy. It would be much better to have but one exhibition in the year, and give the artists the opportunity of sending in something worth looking at. To call public attention to such work as is now on the walls of the Hopkins' Institute, is to fully warrant the verdict that San Francisco knows nothing of art. A stranger, judging only from the "Spring Exhibition," would be justified in thinking so.

One word more: Among the pen and ink drawings is the original sketch of an illustration which recently appeared in a daily paper. While no one can deny the excellence of the work, one can only deplore the excessively poor taste which displays in such a place an illustration recalling to the memory the committing of an atrocious crime.

TRAUMERIE.—CAROLYN WALDO WADE.

All happily I drift;
And see, with half shut eyes, the willows reach
Over the water's edge, where you and I
Are wont to linger, caring not for speech.
Expressing our contentment with a sigh,
Or glances deep and swift.

Ah! but the world is fair;
And white the lilies that you love so well;
And azure all the ripples 'neath the boat.
The dear old story still is sweet to tell.
I listen for your low words as I float,
Stirring the fragrant air.

Sweetheart, row on and on,—
What! may I not my joyous dreaming keep?
For one glad moment I had bridged the years
That long have held you in your dreamless sleep,
The lilies on your breast wet with my tears.
Now all the sunlight's gone.

THE Realty Syndicate, whose attractive advertisement appears on the title page of the NEWS LETTER, has some of the most desirable property across the bay for sale. The properties of the syndicate are all located upon the line of growth of San Francisco. Its tracts in Berkeley and Oakland are desirable for permanent investment and for residence, and have been selected with excellent judgment as to future growth. The wealth of the syndicate and its large interests enable the smallest holder to enjoy the profits and advantages that come from concerted action by great capital. Full knowledge of the Syndicate properties, its methods of doing business and the safe opportunities offered by it for both small and large investors will be furnished upon application at its principal office, 14 Sansome street, this city.

THE Easter display of flowers at John H. Sievers', 25 Post street, on last Saturday, was a most beautiful exhibition of bloom and bud. Azaleas, Bermuda lilies, rhododendrons, roses, huds, violets—in fragrant profusion—delighted the eye and taste. This successful florist's place of business was thronged during the day, and its handsome display a subject of general remark by those who saw it.

A NOVEL EDUCATIONAL COMPETITION

Combines Pleasure with Information and Mental Training.

The Century Co. announces an educational competition which it is hoped will arouse very general interest. Three examination papers, each containing fifty questions, have been prepared; the competitors have a month to answer each set. The prizes are as follows: $500 to the person sending in the best set of answers, $100 for the second best, $50 for the third, two of $25 each for the fourth and fifth, and thirty of $10 each for the next thirty in order of merit. For another and further offer of $500, see NEWS LETTER of April 17th.

wheels for one that uses dumb-bells. The reason is perfectly evident. Bicycle riding combines pleasure with mental exercise; the use of dumb-bells is drudgery. So with these questions; they combine pleasure with exercise. You cannot start work on the first one without continuing on to the last, and when you finish them you find that you are repaid a hundred fold.

An analysis of the first fifty questions shows that they deal with or touch upon a very large number of different and distinct points or bits of knowledge. That is, in answering fifty questions you have investigated fifty subjects, and in addition have touched upon hundreds of others. History and literature, the Bible and Homer, travel, machinery, and law, operas and music, Shakespeare and Scott, Paris and Boston, art and architecture, grammar and arithmetic, earthquakes and the heavens, cards and the stage, Napoleon and the North American Indians, the Amazon and the Mississippi, gold-mining and puddling, questions of home and of business—all these and a multitude of others are covered by these questions. Thus, in addition to the pleasure and the mental training comes the new knowledge that will broaden you as Greely said it broadened Lincoln. On request, we will forward you sample questions and full particulars of the competition.

If you do not possess a set of The Century Dictionary and Cyclopedia, address us and we will send your name to one of the few clubs that are still being formed, each member of which secures a set at a large reduction from the regular prices, and has the privilege of paying for it in small monthly payments.

THE CENTURY CO. (Dept. Jo.) New York.

THE QUESTIONS in these examination papers are based on the supposition that a public school graduate of average intelligence can score 75 per cent. if he gives ten minutes of serious application to each question. Any one, therefore, who devotes to them three hours a week should make a better score and stand an excellent chance of winning a prize.

The aim of the questions is to impart knowledge and to lead to a habit of investigation that will be of value through life. This they do in an astonishing degree. If you gain first prize, the knowledge you have acquired will be worth more to you than the $500 you receive. But whether you win that prize or not, you learn to concentrate your mind, sharpen your wits, and secure most valuable information.

Do not cease your education when you leave school or college; keep on learning. Horace Greely said of Lincoln that his success lay largely in the fact that every day he lived he acquired new knowledge and therefore broadened. Get the information that is in these questions. They are not the kind that are found in school-books; they deal with facts that men, women, boys and girls ought to know. No university extension lectures, no course of reading can help you as these questions do, because the lectures and the reading deal with theoretical knowledge, these questions with practical every-day knowledge.

Dumb-bells and bicycles may be equally useful in physical development, yet a thousand persons ride their

"HOW like all earthly things," say the girlies. "Here we have been looking forward to such a festive time after Easter, and there ain't a thing but a lot of old teas." It looks as though there was some cause of complaint in there being no Eastertide cotillion. No dancing class even. The truth is, coin is not superabundant anywhere, and parents who have to get their daughters "in shape"—i. e., fresh outfits for the summer campaign, with hotel bills at rural resorts looning up, are not very enthusiastic about cotillion subscriptions. Then the beaux have had an expensive winter. French opera, theatre parties, club suppers, etc., make big holes in salaries, and the average society beau lives on a salary. However, the buds will soon have the out-of-town pleasures to engage in—lolling on the broad veranda of the Hotel Rafael, tennis, paper chases, moonlight rides and straw rides, picnics, and the like, which result in far more genuine fun, and profit, too, than a dozen cotillions and hops. By the way, speaking of the Hotel Rafael reminds me that Manager Warfield has made more extensive preparations than ever before to entertain his many guests this season.

Evidently our esteemed fellow townsman, George Bonny, does not take old Weller's advice in regard to "vidders," for if rumor speaks truly, 'tis a widow who has been the attraction in his recent Eastern and European trip. Well, 'tis time for the old fellow to take upon himself the responsibilities of married life, and a right glad welcome will be get from his friends should he bring a wife back with him when he returns to the Coast.

Gossip says a very funny incident of the bal masque at Oakland was when a well-known clubman from this side of the bay made fierce love to his own wife without being aware of her identity, and it may be serious, as he "let the cat out of the bag," to use a homely old phrase, most beautifully when he called the unknown mask by tender names!

Apròpos of hops, the Presidio is to be congratulated upon the success achieved by the success of their delightful dances. Our prettiest maids and matrons are always glad to go out to them, and the military circles of the different posts hold many pretty and attractive women as well. So that the hop-room is a brilliant scene independently of the glitter of gold lace and buttons.

Miss Laura McKinstry seems to have taken the place left vacant by Miss Millie Ashe, when she became Mrs. Harold Sewell, in the affectionate regard of the B'ingham matron. But although Miss Millie—as was—was always ready for jollity, Miss Laura is by far the more brainy girl of the two. Hence, a delightful companion, whether du voyage, or in a country bouse.

How pained one of our prettiest belles must have been on Easter day by the way the weekly falsifier served up to its readers her Easter hat brilliant in scarlet and green. And the young lady in deep mourning for her mother! So much for "news."

It looks now as though the Fred Sbarons will not make their yearly visit to San Francisco until winter—if then. The Queen's Jubilee will be the attraction in London first, and later a visit to Mr. Sharon's sister Flora in her English bome.

Society is wondering if it is true, the report that comes from New York, of Wilcox being engaged to Miss Keeney.

Rumor goes that a popular belle has but to speak the word to Winn a soldier for a husband.

What is the matter with the slim young bud, Miss Florence Breckenridge, that the newspapers in announcing her departure Kentuckywards with her grandparents, Mr. and Mrs. Lloyd Tevis, persistently styling her a "little miss," and she just on the verge of coming out next season.

What a jolly couple Harry Benson and his wife make, is the general comment of their numerous friends. But wait till Bent brings his bride to the Presidio, and you'll see ideal wedded bliss, is the dictum of society in general.

It was a sight to behold to walk along Van Ness avenue on Easter Sunday, and see the Easter gowns, hats, and wearers! Surely California may well boast of its beauties in many forms.

The appointment given Colonel W. R. Smedburg by his friend Alger, of visitor to West Point, has elicited many expressions of approbation from the popular Colonel's friends.

What a lot of buzzing will go on at the Woman's Congress. An inveterate woman hater of an old bachelor wants to know what is the good achieved by them, anyhow?

DEAR EDITH.—It is evident that the trick of building up dresses and wraps high about the throat that prevailed all winter long is to be continued into summer. Of course there is a change in the materials, but collars will touch ears just as they did in midwinter. A new gown just shown well illustrates this point, yet it was intended for wear in weather that necessitates little protection for the most sensitive throat. Its material was shot Nile green silk, and the skirt was banded with narrow black Chantilly insertion that met in points in front. The fitted bodice was trimmed with lace bands and fastened invisibly at the left side. Its sleeves and stock collar were green silk, covered with lace, but the puffs were from the plain material. Nile green velvet gave the wide girdle and long ends.

One development of the coming swathing for the throat is entirely new. The limit to the upstanding possibilities of the neck ruff, or other kindred arrangements, seems to have been reached, so, as women still wish the building about their throats to rise, they have taken to ruffled veils. These deceptive ruffles are set on the veil along the lower edge, except the little portion where the chin shows through. This ruffle, therefore, hangs high on the very top of the collar elaboration, and seems to be part of it, thus extending it at least a half inch higher. If the ruffle crossed the chin, the deception would betray itself.

Embroidered grass lawns are dainty and beautiful, but after one wearing they will not be nearly so attractive, so there's no need of turning covetous over them. Lace striped liens are not so dainty, perhaps, but they will make up charmingly and were never shown in such profusion. Figured muslins come in black, with bright roses or vines sprinkled all over them. Very artistic and pretty gowns can be made of these over either black or a color that is suggested in some part of the design. A black muslin lasts better than do the lighter ones.

No doubt you have heard that skirts on yokes will be popular. The yoke is usually made pointed in front and rounded and shorter in the back. It fits stiffly and close, sheath-like in its exactness of surface. The skirt that flows from under this sheath-yoke is attached to an under yoke, for it would never do to risk pulling the outer yoke out of line by fastening the rest of the skirt to it. A skirt thus planned can be worn by a really stout person and allow them the full and sweeping lines of a wide skirt at the hem, while their hips are not in the least widened. To such women this sort of a skirt offers a rare advantage, while to a slender woman the style is all the more becoming.

Skirts shirred on to the edge of a bodice belt are extremely pretty. The bodice thus outlines the figure from just below the bust line to just above the hips, the skirt falling very full from there. Thus the wide hips, at present rather favored by fancifully fashionable women, are secured and the contrasting small waist demanded is emphasized.

A broad the modern ball glove is considerably shorter than the one worn heretofore. It reaches only just above the elbow, leaving the fair upper arm well in view. In color the glove follows the dainty gown with which it is worn and often is trimmed or embroidered to match. Narrow lace insertions adorn the glove to be worn with a gown profusely trimmed with lace, and with ball costumes embroidered or studded with spangles and glittering stones the glove must be equally studded and embroidered. The soft suede glove has fallen into disuse and the glace is universally favored.

Many Millions
In the Air.

The annual report of the London Exploration Company is disappointing, in its way—very much so, indeed, to Californians who read it and learn that, outside of the Oneida, not a property in the State is represented on the list of the company's possessions. This, too, after having been introduced through the press to so many gentlemen acting as its agents as men hocked with plenary powers to place millions in gold here, there, and everywhere, at their sweet will, whenever a mine took their fancy. At one time, between this and one or two other high-falutin concerns, it looked as though there would be nothing left of the "Mother Lode" for plain, ordinary folks, but ideas have changed considerably since then. The much-vaunted allegation that the concern had gobbled up a slice of the Mariposa estate is not even borne out by this report, while one thing is morally certain from the financial statement: they not only have not money enough, without enlarging their capital, to purchase the whole of this graut at the price set by the owners, any more than they have millions for distribution elsewhere. While undoubtedly the Exploration Company is a well-managed and prosperous concern, operating on a scale of the highest magnitude, it is but a shadow of the estimate placed upon it by the "spielers" at this end. But this belongs to another chapter in the future. Suffice it, however, to say that with the figures now in print there will be no further necessity for information second-hand about the financial position of the company. Another notable feature of the report is the absence of any reference to men who were put up here as the pivot upon which the whole concern evolved. Of all those, Captain Mier alone is mentioned. It would be hardly fair to hold the company itself responsible for the wildly exaggerated statements which have appeared about it and its operations here from time to time. It seems altogether unlikely that its every movement should be blazoned out all over the country with the consent of its managers, a method rather unusual by people who mean business. The wonder is, however, that after so much trumpeting and noise of all kinds that there is so little to show for it in the way of investment. It has been another case of "much cry and little wool" all through.

Still Gathering
Them in.

If all the sales reported on paper from time to time were genuine, there would not be a ghost of a mine left in the State to haggle over. Scarcely a day passes but an announcement is made of a sale in some district, and modestly does not usually set a limit on the price paid. When it comes down to money changing hands, however, it is a horse of different color entirely. There have been more "turn-downs" than sales, if the truth were told, and this is probably the best thing that could happen in the long run. It will make our people more self-reliant, and lead to the investment of home capital in legitimate development work, putting a stop to the trickery and sharp practice of the company promoter and his ally, the parasitic mining tout. There are few mine owners in California who have not gained in experience during the past six months. They have read a lot of bosh about the money at command abroad for mining investment, and wasted months in proving the utter unreliability of such reports. Men have visited their mines alleging an ability to put up certain amounts at a given time, but invariably they have fallen down at the crucial moment. This has served to make mine owners very guarded in their dealings with strangers, and it is high time that this was so. The State is infested with a plague of schemers, ready to promise anything to make their game. No sales of note have taken place recently. Some dickering is going on Mr. P. Diederheimer experted the Confidence mine last over the Keystone and a group of mines in the vicinity. week with the representative of a prospective buyer, but so far nothing has come of it. It is said now, on the best authority, that the London Exploration Company has finally decided to withdraw from the State entirely.

Webbs of Mining Illusion.

It is evident that the tales from California of mining romance which appears from time to time in an old and highly respectable British financial paper, to some of which attention was drawn by the NEWS LETTER a few weeks ago, have not escaped notice in other quarters. The Mining and Electrical Review, an up-to-date paper of this city, says in its recent issue: "The London Mining Journal can be relied on for saying something concerning the mines of California which has been said before undoubtedly by some uninformed Pacific Coast paper, whether it is true or not. A recent report of some of the mines in that sedate old journal, though exceedingly flattering to the State, is also excruciatingly funny. The reason the parrot causes us to laugh is the sober and sedate expression of its countenance, while giving expression to the most atrocious statements." We might add that this foreign paper does not surpass in entertaining matter of the kind some of our home journals which, in catering to the subscription end of the industry, evolve in competition a series of fairy tales covering a stretch of country from Siskiyou to San Diego, lurid with millions in either strikes of gold or the investment of foreign capital. Like all other tales of the kind, they end with the delusion. They also carry about the same weight even with the novitiate in the art of mining, and strangers who have arrived within our gates ready to credit almost anything they are told about California wonders, from the Breyfogle phantasy down to the missing Pegleg and other nuisances of the space fiend. Continued disappointment in after results acting as an alternative, is, however, the safest self-cure in such cases of mental hilarity.

Where the Biter Got Bitten.

A Tuolumne correspondent writes: "I note with interest your remarks on Tuolumne mines, and agree with you that the Rawhide is the hub, and that Captain Neville has done more to boom our county than all the other mine owners together. In your issue of the 2d inst. you poke fun at some of the statements in the London Mining Journal. Now, I can assure you that those about the Fish Commissioners were not far wrong. They paid $25,000 for the mine (the Norwegian). The owner had left a streak of gold at one end of the shaft as an inducement to buyers, and on taking this down the fortunate buyers extracted more than they paid for the property. If you will take the trouble to go round to the Bank of Commerce in your city you will see the results of two blasts put off one day last week. About half of it is in bars, the rest as it was crushed in a hand mortar, that being the only mill they have finished. The Black Oak mine, I am glad to say, is looking so well that the owners refused a second payment (which did not come to time) from the New York and Belgian people, they being satisfied that their mine is the best investment they could make with the money. I omitted to state that at the Norwegian they estimate that they have fully $50,000 in quartz, which is not rich enough for a hand mortar, lying on the dump, and which is awaiting the completion of the mill." A person can be excused for considering anything connected with this commission as rather fishy in character, but our correspondent does well in rescuing so estimable a proposition from a maelstrom of absurdities such as we mentioned in the article to which reference is made.

The Bank of England.

A meeting was held recently at the Bank of England for the purpose of electing a Governor and Deputy Governor for the ensuing year, in place of Mr. A. G. Sandeman and Mr. H. C. Smith. Mr. H. C. Smith was elected as Governor and Mr. S. S. Gladstone as Deputy. The new Governor, Hugh Colin Smith, of Hays Wharf, Tooley street, is Chairman of the Ceylon and Oriental Estates Company, and a Director of the Alliance Insurance and Australian Agricultural companies. Mr. Samuel Steuart Gladstone, a member of the old East India firm of Ogilvy, Gillanders & Co., is a Director of the Peninsula and Oriental Steam Navigation Company.

A little movement in Con.-Cal.-Virginia Pine-St. Market, and a higher range of prices for Chollar, were the features of the local mining market on Pine street during the week. Business was active for a time, and the hope is general that the movement will widen out into something like old-time speculation.

Don't Crier

"Hear the Crier!" "What the devil art thou?"
"One that will play the devil, sir, with you."

WARDEN Hale is being severely criticised for permitting two convicts under his jurisdiction to engage in murderous warfare. There is another view of the case, however, that recommends itself to the thoughtful observer interested in the survival of the fittest. It would save an infinite amount of expense—to say nothing of suspense (from a scaffold)—were the variously distinguished eight hundred gentlemen now doing time at San Quentin as guests of California tax payers, lined up in battle array and permitted to indulge in their murderous instincts in a fight to the finish. Besides, it would prevent maudlin sympathy on the part of the tender souls who condemn hanging as an unchristian-like form of punishment.

REVEREND W. D. Williams, D. D., who for some years has been doing his clerical sprinting toward the pearly gates via the Congregational road, has shaken the creed that shackled him and turned his ministerial toes into the Episcopal path of righteousness, along which he purposes to cavort hereafter. Whether the influences that caused Pastor Williams' sudden change of faith were of a spiritual or financial nature, the CRIER cannot say, not being posted in matters ecclesiastical, and not enjoying the gentleman's confidence on either mundane or ethereal topics. It is exceedingly puzzling in these days to tell which is hardest hit, the pocket or the conscience, both being invisible to the naked eye.

WILLIAM D. BRADBURY, the pugnacious millionaire, has had his pride humbled this week by the imposition of a five-dollar fine for expectorating with malicious intent upon the floor of a street-car. Mr. Bradbury labored under the delusion that the moneyed aristocracy of this city could secure transportation and cuspidor privileges by dropping a nickel into the slot. He now finds that the vulgar rich are subject to the same laws as the respectable poor. Mr. Bradbury would better study the ethics of politeness as practiced by any honest hod-carrier. The elderly millionaire is not too old to learn.

A HOWL has gone up from the Merchants' Association in general and W. S. Chapman in particular against what is claimed by them to be a monopoly in the garbage line. Even the ash barrel in one's back yard, it seems, is not exempt from corruption of a political as well as vegetable kind. The arm of the law would fain penetrate to the family doorstep. It is now in order for a man to secure a license from the municipality before shying a bootjack by moonlight at the f-line intruders who may make night hideous on his back fence.

A NEW tamale plant and a pickle factory have been started this week, but it is not true that their incorporators are physicians. The rumor to make the latter accessory to the crimes is clearly a malicious one. It is a well-known fact that the fraternity has its hands full already, without an increase in either the tamale or the pickle trade.

ARTHUR Sears and Nellie Covington sued Belasco, the actor-maker, for $150 because he failed to fit them with the intellect necessary to a successful career on the stage. These aspirants to footlight glitter and mimic life imagined that they were entitled to brains as well as elocution, carriage, and articulation; but Judge Barry ruled that grey matter was not included in Belasco's contract.

THE joy we Californians naturally feel at the prospect of advanced prices in wheat, should Europe become involved in war, is somewhat dampened by the fear that the excitement may awaken that windy demagogue and political weathercock, T. V. Cator, and incite him to again let loose the valves of his leather lungs.

IT may be merely a coincidence, but statistics show that during the week when the attention of the Medical Society of California is absorbed by its annual session, the mortality record of the city is at its lightest.

DURRANT has been dubbed "The Criminal of a Century." No wonder. It takes a century to hang him.

MEDICAL science has received another boom in Carrasquilla's leprosy serum cure, and Dr. Winslow Anderson asks permission of the local Board of Health to make experiments with it free of charge. The sight of a doctor doing anything without the inspiration of a fee will be quite as novel in its way as the new cure which is arousing so much professional interest. But while it is about it, why doesn't wisdom-endowed Science turn its goggles upon the moral lepers that infest civilization? An experiment tried upon Durrant, for instance, might have saved the lives of two pure girls, as well as a vast expense to the city. Hanging is, of course, efficacious, but it fails miserably as a prevention of crime.

THE Congregational Minister Rev. Mr. Rader is a bold mau, and has challenged the brethren's shuddering attention by declaring that one may get through heaven's pearly gates without believing that Jonah resided for several days in a whale's interior. In fact he intimates that a man should not be condemned for employing common sense in scouting out the steep and thorny way; nor be sent post haste to perdition because he declines to believe that everythug between the Bible's lids is literally true. If the worthy and reverend Wm. escapes the fangs of the brethren he need have no fear of the displeasure of God.

THE scientific portion of this community sympathizes deeply with the irreparable loss sustained by Professor E. W. Hilgard in the recent fire which destroyed the College of Agriculture at Berkeley. A large and extremely choice collection of stuffed bugs, representing the scrambles of a lifetime and dangerous encounters sufficient to fill a volume, went up in smoke, uninsured. Had the blaze started, instead, at Sacramento's capitol during the late disrespected Legislature, the occasion might have been fraught with more or less good. It might have destroyed some of the prolific bugs in the bills.

MISS Frances Lane, Oakland's young lady lawyer, who has turned the "God Bless Our Home" motto in the Lane household to the wall, and proposes to camp in the more congenial environs of the Police Court hereafter, is ambitious to secure the release of Convict Wood, who has been languishing at San Quentin for thirteen years. San Francisco has several specimens of the emancipated sex, but heaven has kindly denied us the pain of this petticoat lawyer, Frances Lane. The women on this side of the bay are content with sending men to jail, not getting them out again.

ATTORNEY W. D. Grady, the Fresno lawyer charged with masticating a San Francisco waiter's ear, has been adjudged not guilty of mayhem. Down where Lawyer Grady hailed from it is so ordinary an occurrence for people to get bitten that he had no idea he was infringing upon our ideas of decorum, and pleaded ignorance of the law as his excuse. As a matter of protection to our citizens, an ordinance should at once be passed requiring all visiting Fresnoites to go muzzled.

W. A. CLARK, superintendent and resident physician of the Alameda County Infirmary, is being rudely chided by Secretary Godchaux, of the San Francisco Board of Health, for supplying Cooper College with ten bright, new cadavers within the past year without having obtained the Board's permission. The Secretary should not be so critical. If Alameda wants to furnish San Francisco with material for hospital service, there should be no objection so long as the subjects don't kick.

AT the Congregational Bay Conference, which celebrated a sort of religious Spring Opening this week, Brother Rader is reported as having asked his confrères if it were "time to build for Congregationalism an ark of safety?" This lack of progressiveness is indeed astonishing. Only fancy trying to steer another Noah's ark through Golden Gate! She would founder before she struck the Farallones. What's the matter with an up-to-date gospel air-ship, Brother Rader?

"THE Celtic Union is determined to have a hall of its representatives in politics, and its general strength of "push" and "pull," the sons of Erin hereabout come devilish near having a City Hall of their own, be jabbers.

MARTHY VIRGINIA'S HAND.—GEORGE PARSONS LATHROP, IN CENTURY.

"THERE, on the left!" said the colonel; the battle had shuddered and faded away, Wraith of a fiery enchantment that left only ashes and blood-sprinkled clay—
 "Ride to the left and examine that ridge, where the enemy's sharpshooters stood.
 Lord, how they picked off our men, from the treacherous vantage-ground of the wood!
 But for their bullets, I'll bet, my batteries sent them something as good.
 Go and explore, and report to me ther, and tell me how many we killed.
 Never a wink shall I sleep till I know our vengeance was fulfilled."
 Fiercely the orderly rode down the slope of the corn-field—scarred and forlorn, Rutted by violent wheels, and scathed by the shot that had plowed it in scorn;
 Fiercely, and hurning with wrath for the sight of his comrades crushed at a blow,
 Flung in broken shapes on the ground like ruined memorials of woe; These were the men whom at daybreak he knew, but never again could know,
 Thence to the ridge, where roots outtrust, and twisted branches of trees Clutched the hill like clawing lions, firm their prey to seize.
 "What's your report?"—and the grim colonel smiled when the orderly came back at last.
 Strangely the soldier paused: "Well, they were punished." And strangely his face looked, aghast.
 "Yes, our fire told on them; knocked over fifty—laid out in line of parade.
 Brave fellows, colonel, to stay as they did! But one I most wish hadn't stayed.
 Mortally wounded, he'd torn off his knapsack; and then, at the end he prayed—
 Easy to see, by his hands that were clasped; and the dull, dead fingers yet held
 This little letter—his wife's—from the knapsack. A pity those woods were shelled!"
 Silent the orderly, watching with tears in his eyes as his officer scanned
 Four short pages of writing. "What's this, about 'Marthy Virginia's hand'?"
 Swift from his honey-moon he, the dead soldier, had gone from his bride to the strife;
 Never they met again, but she had written him, telling of that new life,
 Born in the daughter, that bound her still closer and closer to him as his wife.
 Laying her baby's hand down on the letter, around it she traced a rude line:
 "If you would kiss the baby," she wrote, "you must kiss this outline of mine."
 There was the shape of the hand on the page, with the small, chubby fingers outspread.
 "Marthy Virginia's hand, for her pa"—so the words on the little palm said.
 Never a wink slept the colonel that night, for the vengeance so blindly fulfilled,
 Never again woked the old hattle-glow when the bullets their death-note shrilled,
 Long ago ended the struggle, its union of brotherhood happily stilled;
 Yet from that field of Antietam, in warning and token of love's command,
 See! there is lifted the hand of a baby—Marthy Virginia's hand!

VIOLETS.—EOTH MAUDE OUNAWAY, IN PALL MALL MAGAZINE.

I bring thee Violets all dew-pearl'd,
 As fresh and sweet as the awakened dawn
 Which found them hudding into fragrant bloom,
 Like thoughts of Love, from gentle Pity born.
 And if thou wilt—I fear to ask too much—
 I pray thee have them nestle on thy breast;
 Since fade they must, let their last perfumed sigh
 Be one of Peace, at such a perfect rest.

SHE had received a letter in the morning begging her to somehow procure him a little money. Things were going badly, and he had been ill. She thought of it all day long, having dispatched the little she had, and, for the thinking, things looked no better. Her brother had not enough to live upon, and there was an end of it. Fate was niggardly with them all. During the afternoon the girls came in, and Mrs. Hamlin. Mrs. Hamlin was always delightful and cheery. Her lovely dresses and sweet face and fragrant elegance reminded Maisie that at least she was the right person in the right place—with fitting surroundings, and the beautiful things of life that all women instinctively claim as their right, hers. She did not mean the actual material possessions, but these others, that, after all, in these days at any rate, wealth alone can procure.

"Maisie, you look preposterously dejected. What is it? Are you in love with an Anarchist or is it only general aspirations towards the impossible?"

"No, I am not in love: but I am thinking of proposing to some one."

"Why?"

"Because I am in a hurry. Fred, you know, is frightfully hard up."

"But why don't you accept Mr. Howard, when he's so devoted, poor man?"

"That wouldn't be fair, because, you see, he is devoted and I—no, I think a fat man with a beard and glasses is the sort of thing—in the abstract."

"Oh, excellent in the abstract. Protects you, is kind to you, and gives you cheques. In the concrete he—"

"Dear Mrs. Hamlin, don't! The matter is not discussable in the concrete."

"Fancy Maisie proposing!" said one of the girls.

"You don't know what I am capable of," returned Maisie.

"I'll dare you, Maisie!" Mrs. Hamlin twinkled, "twenty pounds on, and I'll give you a month."

"Twenty pounds!" repeated Maisie, and there was an odd sound in her voice.

"Twenty pounds."

"Done!" she said, to the astonishment of the room.

"It's a bet!" Everyone sat up and bristled with delighted curiosity. Maisie, of all people, who invariably treated her swains with a good tempered scorn that was the envy of her friends.

"I will do it now!" she went on excitedly. "Mabel, give me those telegraph-forms. Of course, I won't undertake to carry out the contract if any one accepts," she added.

"No, no; but a bona-fide proposal!"

She then sat down and addressed seven telegrams and dispatched them by the maid. "Reply paid," she said.

"And now we'll have tea!"

"What have you done?" questioned Mr. Hamlin.

"I have asked seven men to marry me!"

"Seven?"

"Yes. Law of averages, you see."

"Maisie!"

"Well, seven gentlemen will hardly be able to say that I am pining for them all; and they'll exchange notes."

"Men never do that."

"Ah, what men never do, that surely man always," she laughed. "Honor with them is a collective virtue that has no honor in the singular. You shall read the answers."

* * * * *

In due course of time the answers came. One by one the girl opened them before her expectant friends, who refused to go till all had come. "Regrats," quoth Maisie, holding up one, with mock gravity. "Next, please. Ah! thank you, Susan. 'Sorry, previous engagement,' 'Alas! impossible!' 'Circumstances over which I have no control!' 'I would if I could, but I can't.' 'No!' That's rather impolite, and he really—well, one mustn't be kissed and tell. 'Twas so long ago, too. You see, ladies, how devoted my lovers all are; but I have won my bet. Ah! here is another one more polite refusal. No? 'Of course. I am honored,'" she read. A crimson flush of shame spread over the girl's laughing face. The wild impulse of that moment's joke—the daring that had made her on the instant accept the challenge, and act upon it before time could sober the uncontrollable spirit of fun that had come to her in a mood too despairing to care for any result so long as she could gain the twenty pounds for her brother—had passed. Oddly enough, consciousness of what she had done came to her whimsical soul only on the receipt of an acceptance. "That's chivalrous of him," she said, trying to hide her embarrassment. "And now to invent a polite refusal to my own proposal."

* * * * *

Horace Sands was in chambers when Miss Maisie's telegram—reply paid—arrived. He was smoking a cigarette with Max Welby. They generally smoked together after lunch, in a kind of sympathetic silence. He read it slowly and then said, "God!" and then (it must be recorded) "Damn!" After which, for him, unusual ejaculations, he went out of the room. On returning, his friend noticed an expression of most pathetic woe upon his placid features, and such a hang-dog look that he refrained from putting any questions from fear of intruding on private matters. Horace, after some fidgeting said, "You know, after all, it's a dreadful thing, but what could a fellow do? She's a charming girl, of course—but I don't think of exactly—in fact, I am not a marrying man, you know—I never thought of marrying—don't know anything about it." He got up and paced the room. "I couldn't do anything else—a man would be such a beastly cad—but it is appalling, all the same. I feel rather inclined to run a—"

"If you'll explain what you are talking about, I may be able to understand."

"Well, the fact is, Miss Maisie wired and asked me—don't you know; and I, of course—"

"Asked you what?"

"Well, I suppose I oughtn't to say," he said, suddenly flushing crimson.

"Did she propose to you?" asked Welby with an incredulous look of amusement. "Answer paid, too. The devil she did! And you have accepted?"

"What else would you have me do?" returned Sands, stolidly.

For the next few days Horace Sands experienced a general sense of bewildering depression. He was an engaged man—to a very lovely girl, it was true, but nevertheless he was engaged, tied up, as it were—somebody's property. He must buy presents and rings, and think of furniture. Never in his life had he thought about furniture. Even at college he had not, as many of the men did, troubled how his diggings were arranged. He passed a man in the street carrying a kitchen safe. He tried to think what a safe was meant for, and realized that they would certainly have to have a safe. Some perambulators in a great shop caught his eye, and he blushed and looked obstinately on the other side of the road. He had postponed calling—he had not dared yet. He would never summon courage to behave as a lover should to such a wonderful piece of femininity. He remembered now that her eyes were grey and serious, and laughing all at once; that she had a delightful, petulant mouth. The thought of her was sweet. The reality at present was terrifying. He could not yet face his betrothed. He must have time to get used to himself under these new conditions. If she had only hit on Welby—Welby was an awful decent sort. Still he wouldn't do, perhaps. Welby wasn't really good enough for her. Would she want a flat? No, he couldn't bear a flat. A little house, perhaps, with a garden, would be nice. They might live in the country part of the year. She would look awfully sweet in a flower garden! Another day passed. On the fourth he dressed himself in a frock-coat, adorned his buttonhole with a bouquet, and started for her house. When he arrived as far as the street in which she lived he turned round and went to the club. There, there was a note from her—three days old. Again he flushed, and thrust it into his pocket. He went out, and, in the busy traffic of the streets, read his first love letter from Maisie. "Dear Mr. Sands,—How chivalrous and nice of you! It was a lot, you know." He did not read any more, but strode homewards. He had been a pretty kind of fool, anyhow—a vain ass, too. As if a beautiful girl like that—then he began to laugh. At any rate, he was free again, free!—but somehow he wasn't quite sure that he wanted to be so very free. The furniture had begun to interest him.

They met the next evening at Lady Vaughn's. She received him with a very bright smile, and they danced. They danced several times and then he said at the end, "I suppose you couldn't care for me, could you?" And she colored all over, and said, "Oh! no, I couldn't, not anyhow in the world!"

Fate threw them together. They constantly met. She tried to avoid him, but he would not let her, and she ceased at last to try. At the end of three months he again asked her to be his wife. The tears crept into her eyes then, and she said, "You are very kind and chivalrous, and I am very grateful, but I can't, indeed I can't!" So that he went away conscious that there was a barrier between them he could not break down. He went abroad with Welby, and proved a preposterously dull companion.

"She will never have me!" he said one day irrelevantly. "I believe it's all because of that confounded telegram!"

"Most likely."

"What shall I do?"

"Forget her."

"That's what I have been trying to do, but she's crept somehow into my heart, and I can't."

"Wire, then!"

"What?"

"What she wired to you."

* * * * *

Maisie was sitting with Mrs. Hamlin, and her pretty face was even paler than on the memorable occasion of the sending of the telegrams. "Ah!" she said, "it is a pity. I care for him so much—so much—and it could never be now! Could it?"

"It's rather difficult," said Mrs. Hamlin. "How mad of us all to have let you do it! We didn't realize till the things were gone. Your spirits carried us away. He's abroad, isn't he?"

"Yes, and I can't bear it, but I must; that's life isn't it?" she said, with a little sad smile. "We all manage to bear what we can't." And then a telegram came, reply paid.

"What is it?" said Mrs. Hamlin.

"He has wired. Look!"

"And what are you going to say?"

The girl sat down upon her heels, on the floor, and looked first into the fire and then at Mrs. Hamlin. "I think I ought to be polite, don't you?" she said. "He was to me."

"Yes," said Mrs. Hamlin, "I think you should be polite!"

And Miss Maisie was.—Westminster Gazette.

ONE of the difficulties about a suburban residence is the promptness which marks the departure of last trains from the city. When Paul Jarboe sought and obtained domestic permission to attend the anniversary dinner at the Bohemian Club last Saturday night, he really intended to keep his promise to return to his Burlingame cottage on the 11:15 train. But the cheer was good, and the stories were better, and Denis O'Sullivan's singing was very soothing, and—when Paul first thought of the hour, and took a surreptitious peep at his watch, he was amazed and dismayed to find that it was long past midnight. As he could not possibly reach home, he consoled himself as best he could with the sympathetic companionship of other belated husbands at the club. He might have taken the early Menlo Park train on Sunday morning, but he preferred the Sabbath quiet of the city.

Some time in the afternoon he began to realize the enormity of missing last trains, and, procuring a trap, he started to drive to his country house. On the way he met a hoy on a small gray hurro, and purchased it on the spot as a propitiatory offering to his own household gods, for the legs of Paul's son and heir are just long enough to straddle the back of such an animal. The journey home with his new acquisition formed the most exciting episode in Jarboe's adventurous career. Having seen calves taken to market with their legs tied, Paul similarly fastened the legs of the jackass with a strap and dumped him into the bottom of the trap. After the dashboard had been kicked out and the trap otherwise damaged to the extent of about $40, the captive was released, and the tardy Jarboe essayed to drag him along behind his conveyance. It was hard work, but they made some progress until they came to a steep hill. The hurro pulled as hard as the horse, but in an opposite direction, and all efforts to advance were futile. Finally the strap broke, the hurro disappeared in a cloud of dust, and Paul went home empty-handed.

The worst of it all was that his story of the burro was regarded as a wild dream, and his explanation of the damaged trap was received with such tolerant incredulity that he fears that nothing but his resignation from the club will suffice to square his transgressions.

After dreaming all night that he was in Hades, where his inconsiderate master had set him the difficult task of swallowing a football, Gellett Burgess awoke one morning to a realization that he was still trying to gulp down that impossible leather sphere. The artist-poet consulted a specialist, who made a cursory examination, and promptly informed him that he possessed an ulcerated throat. The doctor forbade smoking for a week, and prescribed the usual remedies. Burgess wandered out in great dejection, affectionately clutching his roll of forbidden cigarette papers. While he lay moping on a divan in the Bohemian Club, Harry Dimond came in briskly, and slapped the prostrate figure on the back.

"What's the matter, Gell?" he said, cheerily. "You look like a dead man. Brace up, my hoy, and have a cigarette," extending his box of Turkish favorites.

Burgess languidly waved a declining hand. "No—can't do it—not allowed," he answered in a lifeless tone.

"Why not," demanded Dimond, in amazement. "Because I have an illustrated throat," pathetically answered the artist, the ruling passion strough within him.

Harry Dimond says privately that the committee really ought to prohibit the supplying of absinthe frappe in the club to persons of nervous temperament.

There are many things which Richard E. Kelly can do well, such as managing mining companies, but among those accomplishments which he does not possess is the sailing of a boat. With not unusual perversity, Dick longs, above all else, to achieve nautical excellence, although he is in actual terror whenever he is afloat. Some friends who have bestowed on him the honorary title of "Commodore Dick" invited him to go on the first cruise of the season in the yacht "Nita," a few days ago. Having sacrificed his nerves to his ambition, he stepped into a small hoat to be rowed out to the yacht, and was alarmed at noticing that the skiff was leaking freely from a hadly calked seam.

"I say," he remarked, warningly. "Do you fellows see that this hoat is filling fast?"

"Oh, that's nothing," airily replied Jack Finlay, who was skipper. "We never pay any attention to a little thing like that. If the water gets up over your ankles, you can bail her out, hut leave anything short of that alone. You know," he added, with preternatural gravity. "Water makes fine hallast."

The others solemnly corroborating this, Kelly dared make no further remonstrance and sat with his feet in water until the jolly tars hoarded the yacht. The yachtsmen say it was a mere coincidence that the "Nita" also had considerable water about her center board. Dick said nothing about this new danger, but set vigorously to work with a bailing car, a self imposed task which kept him occupied during the entire trip. The wind was rather fresh, and the yacht shipped a good deal of water,—accidentally, they protest. Matters grew so hazardous on Kelly's eyes, that he hegged to be put ashore on Alcatraz, and was with difficulty restrained from taking a header and swimming for the Island.

When he reached home that night, Richard discovered a new field of gray hairs under his hat, and he did not go to bed until he had drafted a hill for presentation to the next Legislature, prohibiting yachting as a pastime. If anyone secures a discarded title of Honorary Commodore he can secure it upon his own terms by negotiating with Mr. Kelly.

Members of the canine family have no more loyal friend than Jack de Ruyter, vice-president of the San Francisco Kennel Club. Once or twice a week, he resolutely turns his back on the wheat market, and joyfully hies him to Livermore, on an inspection tour of the Verona Kennels, where he spends many happy hours. De Ruyter's florid complexion suggests a degree of dissipation not at all justified by the facts, hut it occasions Jack no worry to hear the reputation of a bacchante. When women look him over and sadly remark: "What a hard drinker that young man must be!" Jack recklessly pulls his hat down over one eye and assumes the wicked air of a had huccaneer. On one of his regular trips to his Kennels, he encountered a party of acquaintances, as he was hoarding the train at the Oakland mole.

"Oh, Mr. de Ruyter, are we to have you as a travelling companion?" they ask with flattering eagerness. "Where are you going?"

"Going to the dogs!" replied Jack, desperately, as he turned to enter the smoker.

And now those shocked ladies, whenever de Ruyter's name is mentioned, shake their heads sadly, and will tell you, in mournful confidence that "he is going the pace!"

That Harry Wise is inaptly named is the practically unanimous conclusion of his most intimate friends. But Harry does not suspect it, considering his cognomen singularly appropriate, while his father, the Collector of the Port, sanquinely considers his pert offspring a rising young statesman. On the floor of the Merchants' Exchange, the other day, young Wise encountered Philip Alston Williams, who was smoking his inevitable cigar. Phil shares the general opinion regarding the extent of Harry's wisdom, an unflattering estimate of which the latter is serenely unconscious.

"Lucky dog, you are, Williams," he said, with a complacent leer at his own facetiousness. "The vilest weed doesn't care who smokes it, does it?"

"That's so," quickly responded Williams, as if suddenly convinced of a great truth. "Have one, Harry?" he added, pointedly, though with apparent cordiality.

And young Wise, who is never known to refuse, mechanically hut eagerly extended his hand for the proffered cigar, and then withdrew to puzzle over the reason why every one laughed at him.

Attorney George A. Knight is not noted for piety, and his attendance in houses of worship throughout a long and brilliant legal career has occurred at distant intervals. For the sake of appearances, however, and possibly to propitiate the Almighty, who is suspected of being prejudiced against him on account of his record as a criminal lawyer, Mr. Knight is in the habit of assuming a thoughtful and repentant expression, which illumines his countenance like a sunset glow on Mount Tamalpais, and hincing himself to divine service once a year, on Easter Sunday. According to tradition, he therefore betook himself on the Sabbath just passed to a sanctuary which, out of consideration for that edifice and his friends, shall be nameless. Now, music hath such charms to soothe Mr. Knight's savage breast that it was not long before the melody invoked by the choir had wooed him to slumber as peacefully sweet as that of an infant, and the scriptural eloquence which, alas, he so much needed, fell on unheeding ears. When the pastor engaged in prayer befitting the beautiful Eastertide, the lawyer was seen to stir as though about to awaken from his comfortable but ill-timed nap. Perhaps the unaccustomed supplications for sinners disturbed his repose. At all events, the preacher had just uttered the solemn and impressive words, "Thy will be done," when the attorney electrified the assemblage and broke the prayerful hush by springing to his feet and exclaiming: "Your Honor, I object! The will is a forgery and I can prove—"

Kind hands bore him out into the spring sunshine, where the mortified Knight explained that he had been dreaming he was in Judge Slack's court-room.

The delicate sensibilities of the men on 'Change were so much offended by Sim Erlanger's little black pipe, with its two inches of stem and its unmistakable characteristics of the dudheen, that they took up a private subscription and purchased him a substitute of the orthodox German type, the chief feature being a stem with as many curves as a baseball pitcher. Sim accepted this gift without demur, and the other brokers chuckled complacently at the pointed reproof they had administered. A day or two later, however, it was remarked that young Erlanger was smoking an atrocious mixture of tobacco, no leaf of which had ever seen Virginia. Even the beans turned yellow at the pungent odor, and the indignant commission men threatened all kinds of disinfectants and the use of a hose, but they subsequently concluded to present the offender with a five-pound box of the choicest fine-cut, as the most effectual mode of abating the nuisance.

This generous feat was duly performed, to Sim's huge delight, although he made a faint display of rather tame resentment when he received a season's supply of tobacco. He is now wondering whether the wearing of the most disreputable garments obtainable, on the floor of the Call Board, would secure him a present of a new suit of clothes of fashionable cut. In view of his recent experiences, he considers the experiment worth a trial, anyhow.

On the day of the departure for Washington of Wu Ting Fang, the new Chinese minister, the apartments of that functionary in the Occidental Hotel contained a large number of his countrymen from the local Chinese colony, anxious for a final word of supplication or suggestion in the ear of their ambassador. One villainous-looking highbinder who, through some mistake, obtained an audience with Wu Ting Fang, after grovelling for several minutes on the carpet, so far recovered his assurance, as to invite the Minister to be his financial hacker in a plan he had purchased from a white huncoman for the manufacture of a new kind of flying machine. The great diplomat politely declined the opportunity to make his fortune, but the highbinder was insistent. As he peremptorily closed the interview the Minister explained that he was too poor to embark in such a speculation. The common Chinaman looked over the retinue of his uncommon countrymen and noted the evidences of wealth and luxury with a kindling eye.

"Oh, no," he replied, jauntily, but with an added touch of sarcasm. "You not poor. You only saving."

His ability to talk tender sentiment to an indefinite number of girls at one and the same time, with absolutely no danger to himself, is an accomplishment which Dr. Harry Tevis has thoroughly mastered. But he was caught at his own game the other day, and was very nearly brought up with a round turn. Handsome Harry was in a comfortable sitting-out place, his companion being a particularly pretty girl. How could he help saying the sweet little things expected of him?

"You have the most beautiful eyes in the world, Miss Fannie," he said, softly.

Just then the cosy tête-à-tête was interrupted by the approach of the young lady's cousin. The new-comer was the last person in the world Tevis desired to see at that moment, for he remembered that he had been making rather violent love to her also an hour or two earlier. He tried hard to conceal the discomfiture he felt, but his companion's remark hardly increased his composure, and made him feel that he had strewn his pearls inadvisedly.

"What do you suppose Dr. Tevis has been telling me, Nellie?" asked this unappreciative young woman, with a sly glance at her cousin. "He says I have the most beautiful eyes in the world."

The debonnaire Doctor, with feigned sincerity, glanced critically from one pretty girl to the other, inwardly wishing both were far removed.

"And so she has," he protested, vehemently—"barring yours, Miss Helen," he added, in an undertone.

HOW gladly the Eastertide has been welcomed this year, the entire week being well filled with festive gatherings, which were of the most varied character. Among the earliest to celebrate were the Colonial Dames of the Sequoia Chapter, who enjoyed a breakfast at the Occidental Hotel on Monday in commemoration of "Lexington Day." In the evening the Mouday Night Club had their last dance of the season, which was well attended and altogether delightful. The athletic sports at the Presidio drew a large crowd of spectators on Monday, but the turn-out of society thereat on Tuesday was something quite remarkable, and several very pleasant little luncheon parties were given at the post. Mrs. W. D. O'Kane's pink dinner, which was a very elaborate affair, was given as an adieu to Peter Donahue, who left for the East on Thursday; and the bal masque in Oakland was a brilliant scene and a great success. Some of the costumes worn by the ladies were extremely handsome, and their wearers much admired. Wednesday was largely given over to Hymen, and on Thursday the Philomath Club gave a tea. Yesterday's gay doings included a tea at Mrs. Jewett's and one in Oakland at the residence of Miss Holt, who, with the Misses Kitteridge and Simmons, were the hostesses of the occasion.

The Eastertide is always a favorite time for weddings, and this year has proved no exception to the rule. On Monday, at noon, Miss Minnie Bradbury, of Los Angeles, and Isaac H. Polk were the bride and groom whose nuptial knot was tied by the Rev. Father McSweeney at the residence of Mrs. Bradbury, on O'Farrell street. The decorations of the house were decidedly Easter in character, lilies and white roses being used in great profusion, with other sweet-scented blossoms. The bride's robe was of white satin and tulle, with trimmings of point lace; a wreath of orange blossoms and a sunburst of diamonds held the feecy tulle veil, which quite enveloped her pretty figure, and she carried a bouquet of white violets. Miss Laura Bradbury, who was one of the attendant maids, was gowned in white dotted muslin over a slip of yellow silk. The other bridesmaid, Miss Mary Vernon, wore a similar gown over green silk. Two pretty children, the Misses Marion and Louise Winston, officiated as flower bearers, and James Winston was the groom's best man. A dainty wedding breakfast followed the ceremony, and later Mr. and Mrs. Polk left town on their honeymoon trip, their destination being a profound secret.

In Oakland, Miss Alice Kimball and James Campbell, of Honolulu, were joined in marriage at the noon hour on Monday, in the Tenth Avenue Baptist Church, which was prettily decorated for the ceremony. Miss Helen Campbell appeared as maid-of-honor, and the Misses Georgia Emerson, Fanny Bently, Louie Pierce, and Daisy Kimball as bridesmaids. The Hawaiian Consul, Charles Wilder, supported the groom as his best man. After the church service a reception was held at the Kimball residence.

Alameda's wedding was an evening one at the First Unitarian Church, when Miss Gertrude Peck and Herbert Atherton Page were the bride and groom. Miss Maud Miller was maid-of-honor, the Misses Olita Lunt, Carrol Baldwin, Edith Brown, and Edna Gillis the other attendants of the bride. Willard Francis appeared as the groom's best man. A dancing reception followed at the home of the bride on Central avenue.

Another of Monday's weddings was performed at the residence of Archbishop Riordan, where the Rev. Father Mulligan united in marriage Miss Thama Dickenson and William K. Speed. It was a very quiet affair, the bride's family alone being present at the ceremony, and later the happy pair left for a honeymoon trip East. They expect to make California their future home when they return several months hence.

Wednesday was another popular day with the brides, to judge from the number who selected it for their nuptial ceremony. Among the day weddings were those of Miss Helen Sutro and Samuel Schwartz, Dr. Voorsanger performing the marriage service at the home of the bride's mother on Pine street; and of Miss Maud Alberger and Lieutenant E. J. Dorey, which was another home ceremony, taking place at the house of the bride on Pacific avenue, the Rev. Dr. Chetwood officiating. Those of the evening included that of Miss Minnie O'Neil to J. J. Baumgartner, and Miss Margaret Daily to Charles B. Tomson, who were united in marriage at the residence of Mrs. Harry Hunt on Geary street.

The Wednesday evening wedding of chiefest interest was that of Miss Mattie Whittier and W. B. Weir, of New York, which was solemnized in the Whittiers' handsome brown-stone mansion on Jackson street. It was a pink wedding, and the floral decorations, which were both profuse and beautiful, were chiefly of that tint. The bridal party was also an extremely pretty one. Miss Lottie Woods was the fair bride's maid-of-honor, the Misses Hattie Jackson, Harriet Griswold and Jessie Weir, the groom's sister, officiated as bridesmaids, George Danforth, of New York, appearing as the groom's best man. The ceremony was witnessed by comparatively a few relatives and most intimate friends only; but the reception, which followed later, was very large. It was in a hower of green palms, Bermuda lilies and white snowballs that the Rev. Dr. Church tied the nuptial knot, the bride wearing a robe of white satin elaborately trimmed with point lace, a tulle veil and wreath of orange blossoms, and her hand bouquet was of lilies of the valley. The bridesmaids were gowned alike in pink tulle over pink silk, and they carried clusters of Bon Silené roses.

It would seem as though the Easter season is to be as prolific of engagements as of weddings from the way in which they are being announced. First on the list this week came two, of which the bride-elect of one and the groom-elect of the other are well-known residents of San Francisco. Miss Addie Mills, who will wed Chester Holcombe, a member of the Chinese Legation in Washington, was, after her debut, one of our belles during a couple of seasons in San Francisco society.

Joe Grant is one of the most popular young men of the swim, and his future bride, Miss Macleay, is not quite unknown in our social circles, having made several visits both here and at Burlingame during the past two years. It will be a disappointment, however, that neither wedding takes place in San Francisco, as that of Miss Mills will probably be at the home of her uncle, D. O. Mills, in New York, and of Miss Macleay at her home in Portland, Oregon.

Oakland contributes an announcement this week, also, Miss Lillian Mastick and Oliver Ellsworth being the interested parties, with the wedding to take place in the very near future. And from New York comes the news of the engagement of a former Oakland beau, who has for a couple of years past been a resident of Gotham. William H. Little is the groom-elect and Miss Anna Boelter of New York will be his bride. The date for the postponed marriage of Miss Belle McKenna and Peter Martin will no doubt soon be announced now, as it has been decided that the wedding shall take place in Washington city as soon as the family of Judge McKenna become settled there. The 2d of June is the day named for the wedding of Miss Quita Collier and Atherton Macondray.

The review which General Forsythe held at the Presidio last Saturday recalled the many similar turn-outs of troops during General McDowell's regime as Commanding General of this Department. He was particularly fond of showing foreign visitors of distinction what his boys in blue could do, and as a general thing the reviews at the Presidio were followed by a luncheon and a dance at Black Point (Fort Mason), where he and his family resided, at which the beauty and fashion of San Francisco participated. Among the visitors thus entertained were H. R. H. le Duc de Penthieve, Sir Arthur Keunedy, Governor of British Columbia; Earl Dufferin, the Governor-General of Canada; Princess Louise and the Marquis of Lorne, whose entertainment at Black Point was in the form of a tea.

The Sandwich Islands promise to be a popular place to visit this year, judging from the number of folks whom 'tis said contemplate a voyage thither. Mr. Thomas Brown and his daughters, and Miss Leta Robinson, were the members of a party which sailed on the Australia last Thursday. That steamer on her recent arrival brought back quite a party of San Franciscans from their visit to the Islands, which they all declare was most delightful from first to last. Among the returners was Sam Boardman, greatly improved in health by the trip. Ed. Greenway has been taking in the beauties of the fiesta and the gaieties of Los Angeles this week. Miss Jennie Flood has gone East on a month's visit. Mrs. Webb Howard will soon be with us again, after a lengthy visit East and abroad. Mrs. Sherwood and her son Will, and A. B. McCreary, are guests at the Hotel Rafael.

Among the affairs on the tapis for next week is the reception and tea to be given at the Nursery for Homeless Children, on Harrison street, on Wednesday, between the hours of 3 and 5 o'clock; and on Friday evening the Entre Nous Club will give their last cotillion of the season in Maple Hall of the Palace. The "Gingerbread Fête," for the benefit of the Children's Hospital, which is to be an accomplished fact next month, is awakening much interest in the swim. The idea is new, and everything novel takes. It will be held at the Clark Crocker house, on Sutter street, and will last an entire week.

Among the notable wedding feasts of the week were those given on Wednesday last at the O'Neil residence, on the occasion of the marriage of Miss Minnie O'Neil and J. J. Baumgartner; and at the residence of Colonel W. C. Alberger, when Miss Maud Alberger was married to Lieut. J. E. Dorey. The elegant dinners served were prepared by the well-known caterer, Max Abraham, of 428 Geary street.

The Country Club has made a new departure this year, whereby the members can take their wives and a few lady friends with them to enjoy the pleasures of life at their comfortable quarters for a few days in the middle of the week, reserving the "over Sunday" portion for their bachelor frolics.

Hotel El Monte, the favorite summer hostelry of Sausalito, will open for the season to-morrow, the 25th inst., under the management of J. E. Slinkey.

THE TRANS-SIBERIAN RAILROAD.

RAILS on this road, we learn from Cosmos (Paris, February 6th) are laid for a distance of 8,000 kilometers (5,000 miles); the section of Western Siberia is ready for service, as well for freight as for passenger traffic, but the bridges over the Irtysh and the Obi are not yet finished. These rivers are crossed on the ice in winter and by means of ferry-boats in summer.

"The line from Cheliabinski to Ekaterinburg was opened in 1895, but with temporary wooden bridges that are now being replaced with iron ones. In Central Siberia only the short section from the Obi to Bolotna (about 75 miles) is in service; but that from Bolotna to Krasnoiarisk is almost finished, all bridges east of the Obi being built provisionally of wood. The iron bridge over the Yai is finished, but it will be at least a year before the 1,760 kilometers (1,094 miles) of line that crosses Central Siberia will be completed.

"Beyond Irkutsk, as far as Listvinitchna, the preliminary work has not been done. Nothing more than this has been accomplished in the basin of Lake Baikal, except an enormous embankment not yet finished.

"In the Amoor region, the preparatory work has been almost completed; in this region there is more than the average amount of difficulty, and it will be necessary to construct at least one long tunnel. In the Lower Ussuri, 400 kilometers (249 miles) of line have been built. This section extends from Vladivostok to Grafksa; and from this latter place to Juran it follows the bank of the Ussuri for about a dozen kilometers.

"In official circles it is believed that there will be uninterrupted communication by rail between St. Petersburg and Vladivostok by the beginning of the new century."—The Literary Digest.

America and the Americans, from a French point of view. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons. New York. 1897.

The preface tells us that this clever little volume with the poster-ornamented cover is a transcription of the notes made by a Frenchman for the benefit and amusement of his sister during two visits to the United States. But, notwithstanding these prefatory statements, we are decidedly of the opinion that the book was written by an American horn and hred. Though the writer has some acquaintance with the French character, and makes many criticisms such as might well enough be made by a Frenchman, yet one feels that he is merely assuming a virtue, though he has it not. For, if he were really and truly a Frenchman, and writing for the delectation of his sister, living in France, he would write in French. But his hook is in English. "Ah!" but you say, "it has been translated. You know that M. Paul Blouet writes in French, and Madame Blouet translates for him into English." Quite so: but this hook bears none of the ear-marks of a translation; while it does bear clear marks of being an original work, written in a language native to the writer, who has merely fitted a pair of French spectacles on to his Yankee nose. Several phrases seem to us clearly American, and clearly not French: e. g., on page 18 we read of a party of four at a hotel, "two gentlemen and two ladies, the ladies decolleté (sic) to the point of emharrassment." Why not decolletées? On page 141 we read of the "holders of American securities in Europe literally dumping them hack upon the market here." Elsewhere we find "claim" used in the thoroughly American sense of "profess, declare, assert," and mention made of "a sandy chin-whisker"—an expression utterly unknown to a Frenchman. The book is full of sharp comments upon the society of New York, Boston and Chicago, upon class distinctions in the United States, upon children, and their manners (or their lack of them), the newspapers and many other matters. Perhaps one of the most amusing things in the book is the description of the "imp of infernal origin, who wends his way up and down the aisles of the railroad cars offering newspapers, magazines, fruit, chewing-gum, smelling-salts, cigars, candy, for sale, and shouting the while at the top of his lungs." The author professes himself unable to understand the continued existence of his "peripatetic fiend." The writer pays his respects to the traveler "who at one of the stopping-places, in seven minutes by a watch, ate two little bird-dishes full of raw oysters, four ham sandwiches, a large section of pie, which looked as though it were stuffed with insects—mince-pie they call it—and drank one glass of beer, and two bowls of café au lait, and then hurried to the train with two doughnuts and an apple." If the traveler swallowed the "two little bird-dishes" in addition to the oysters and all the other dainties, he certainly made a surprising meal. The author makes lots of fun of the "clubmen," the "society women," and the talk about "old families" in this new country. He certainly touches the right spot when he says that what is called "society" in the United States is a poor thing indeed compared to the society of Paris, London, Vienna or Rome. In those great cities you meet in society eminent men of every kind—soldiers, sailors, diplomatists, statesmen, painters, writers, physicians and explorers. In "society" in the United States you meet the wives, sons, and daughters of wealthy porkpackers, patent-pill-venders, and such like. You never see the men who are really making the country. At the great watering-places and "summer resorts," our author says, "the women make the laws, and the men put up with the manners of the women." The hook is lively and sparkling throughout, and satisfies us that the thorough knowledge and understanding of the United States which it exhibits could not have been acquired by a foreigner in the course of two visits. To feel sure that the hook is not the work of a Frenchman, one has only to turn to Max O'Rell's vivacious notes upon Jonathau and his continent, which are genuinely and unmistakably Gallic. But, though the book is not what it professes to be, it is full of amusing and clever remarks, and decidedly interesting.

The Atlantic Monthly for last month contained a forcible plea by Irving Babbitt for the rational study of the classical languages of antiquity. Hitherto the tendency of American scholarship has been to become too minute, pedantic, and philological: the broad, humanizing, cultivating effect of the study of the great writers of Greece and Rome has been missed. The literature of Greece, especially, supplies the best antidotes to many of the most serious faults of American civilization: it teaches men to respect and honor the past, and strips them of the mischievous and grotesque idea that each decade represents a gain over the last decade. The first step the average American "has to take in the path of culture is to realize that movement is not necessarily progress, and that the advance in civilization cannot be measured by the increase in the number of eighteen-story buildings." But in order to render the study of the classics fruitful it is necessary that they should be taught by men of high and broad general culture, by men almost as familiar with modern literature as with that of the ancient world. The teacher should be able to show that human nature has at all times been essentially and fundamentally the same, harassed by the same doubts, tormented by the same anxieties, puzzled by the same mysteries. The Greek spirit, with its sweet reasonableness and never-failing sense of proportion, tends to counteract the most dangerous tendencies in American character, viz., the lack of the power of sustained and concentrated attention, the proneness to hysteria in religion, politics, and social economy, and the inclination to apply a purely materialistic standard to all the concerns of life. No man who has to any serious degree become imhued with the teachings of Plato and Aristotle can ever be inoculated with Bryanism, Bellamyism, Edenism, or any other of the intellectual dehaucheries and spiritual harlotries into which so many millions heedlessly plunge.

The Pall Mall Magazine (London) seems to us the handiwork of the monthly magazines. The paper is of the best, and the etchings, sketches, and reproductions of photographs are excellent. The April issue is of somewhat special interest to Californians, for the list of contents displays three names very well known to readers on the Pacific Coast—Geraldine Bonner, Horace Annesley Vachell, and the late Robert Louis Stevenson. Miss Bonner's story is entitled "The Strange Adventures of Joan Archer;" Mr. Vachell, whose "Quicksands of Pactolus" first appeared in the Overland Monthly, contributes "The Breaching of Sammy," while chapters 16 to 18 of Stevenson's last story, "St. Ives," are given. The sport of the month is "Trout Fishing," by the Hon. T. W. Legh, M. P. Mr. A. T. Quiller-Couch is in charge of the department headed "From a Cornish Window," a record of the personal impressions of a very genial and clever critic. "The Jubilee Cup," a poem of some thirty verses, by Mr. Quiller-Couch, is a delightful hit of irony on the "pieces" that professional (and alas! amateur) elocutionists are so fond of trying on us whenever we are so foolish as to permit them to do so: it has plenty of "go," and is really better "by a whole jugful" than many of the compositions it satirizes. A particularly well-illustrated article in the issue deals with Honiton lace, which is made in several small Devonshire towns, and derives its name from one of them.

The "popular" ten-cent periodicals have a strong family likeness: in almost every one of them we find articles on beautiful women, ambitious young actresses, and the bicycling mania. Of course, the wide prevalence of these features is largely to be explained by the fact that they are producers of revenue. For twenty dollars or so Miss Tiny Tintype may pose as the helle of Tinville, or Miss Gay Spanker as a brilliant tragedienne. For twice that sum you may have a half-page portrait and be called a "society leader" of Leadville, Colo. Who would refuse fame on terms so easy? The April Godey's contains all these indispensable features, and also well-illustrated articles on rose culture and the development of the reed-organ. In "The Bookery" are some remarks upon the mechanical, perfunctory, and professional humor of that dreary and now happily defunct journalistic jester, Bill Nye. One phrase in this article puzzles us: "The antipodal Walter Pater." If this means an Australian philosopher, we may say that there is no Walter Pater in Australia, nor will there be for several centuries. Besides these matters the issue contains the usual fashion article and hints on the toilet.

The Sportsman's Magazine for April is a "fishing number," containing articles on angling in various regions for various kinds of fish. We also find the usual departments of amateur photography, current topics, and editorial notes. In the photographic department, reproductions of the pictures to which were awarded the prizes in the recent competition for flashlight studies are given, with comments upon them by "Professor." The entries for the next competition close on June 1st.

The International Magazine for April furnishes four articles translated from French magazines, three from German, two from Spanish, one from Dutch, and one from Italian. In addition to this, there is Chat from foreign journals, also notes on books, American travel, etc.

The Easter number of Life is full of interesting matter. Its pictorial features are unusually strong. There are various articles—humorous, satirical, and sentimental, and short sketches and poems in the best vein of Life's contributors.

INSURANCE

THE Aetna Indemnity Company, of Hartford, has been organized to do a surety and plate glass business. Percy T. Morgan, President of the California Wine Association of this city, is a stockholder in the recently organized National Surety Company of New York, and will probably be made a director.

Foreign home office figures of all insurance companies doing business in this State must be filed with the California Insurance Department before the first day of next month.

E. S. Rich & Co., of Denver, will hereafter manage the business of the Frankfort Marine Accident and Plate Glass Insurance Company, they having received the appointment from United States Managers Voss, Conrad & Co.

A. M. Smiley, of Denver, will do special work for the Thuringia Fire Insurance Company.

In all probability the action of the New Mexico Legislature, in compelling a deposit of $10,000 from all foreign insurance companies, will have the effect of driving fire insurance companies from that State. The fire business in New Mexico has proven very unprofitable to the companies, and this hostile legislation will have a discouraging effect. Similar results are not improbable in Washington, owing to the recent hostile enactments of a Populist Legislature.

It is noticeable that as the business of the giant insurance companies in this State declines, that of the smaller companies together increases in volume. The battle for supremacy during the past five years between the three giants has been very expensive, the price paid for new business forcing the less wealthy companies to lie on their oars. A return to business principles has enabled the smaller companies to enter into competition on an equitable basis, and will result greatly to their advantage.

M. R. Higgins, the recently-appointed General Superintendent of the Mutual Life, enters upon the discharge of his duties on May 1st. He leaves on that date for a trip through the Eastern States, to appoint agents and otherwise supervise the business of his company.

General R. H. Magill, once prominent in the management of the Home Mutual Fire Insurance Company of this city, is said to have a new company under way in Alameda County, where, no doubt, under the privileges of the recently enacted County Mutual law, a profitable business could be done.

The Frankfort will deposit $50,000 with Ohio, and enter that State for business.

P. B. Armstrong, the California fruit grower and ex-fire insurance man, is in New York, resisting the efforts of the Mutual Life, of that city, to change its name. Mr. Armstrong at one time controlled that company, and still holds an interest in it.

A company has just been organized in England to insure parents against twins; this is the natural sequence of the Old Maids' Insurance Company, which has been in successful existence in England for years.

The rate of compensation to agents in all cities on the Coast, excepting San Francisco, Oakland, Alameda, Berkeley, and Portland, has been fixed by the new compact at 15 per cent.; the rate for San Francisco 25 per cent. on preferred and 20 per cent. on ordinary business. Under the old compact Los Angeles, Sacramento and Stockton were also "excepted cities," with a higher rate to agents, and much dissatisfaction is expressed by them at the new apportionment.

Webb McNall, Superintendent of Insurance for Kansas, who ruled out the Mutual Life, New York Life, and Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Companies from that State for refusal to settle the Hillmon claim, which has been in the courts of that State for eighteen years, has been indicted by the Grand Jury for an attempt to obstruct the administration of justice.

There is a new experience and unexpected pleasure in store for the man who has not yet tasted Argonaut Whiskey. This is a drink fit for the gods and for men who know a superior article. Argonaut is the finest liquor made, and all connoisseurs endorse it. E. Martin & Co., 411 Market street, are sole Pacific Coast agents.

SAN FRANCISCO
NEWS LETTER
 California Advertiser.

Vol. LIV.

SAN FRANCISCO, MAY 1, 1897.

Number 18.

Printed and Published every Saturday by the proprietor, FRED MARRIOTT
 54 Kearny street, San Francisco. Entered at San Francisco Postoffice as Second-class Matter.

The office of the NEWS LETTER in New York City is at Temple Court;
 and at Chicago, 303 Boyce Building. (Frank E. Morrison, Eastern Representative), where information may be obtained regarding subscription and advertising rates.

SUPERVISOR Smith says he opposes improvements in the disreputable districts of this city. The Supervisor should make himself clear. Does he object to the completion of the City Hall?

IT is said that the ballot-box stuffer Sternberg, now serving a three-years' sentence at San Quentin, is trying to escape punishment through the sympathetic offices of the Board of Prison directors. Pardou is not for Sternberg, who deliberately debauched the ballot-box. He is now valuable as an example of the fact that election frauds in San Francisco are sometimes punished. That he was the instrument of others should count for nothing. His guilt was clearly proved, and pardon for such a man would be a monstrous outrage.

POLICE-CLERK Foley, of Department 2, Police Court of this city, has made himself the subject of investigation by the Grand Jury and the Board of Supervisors. It is alleged that Foley has been accepting bonds of straw, and that in consequence criminals who should be doing time go unwhipped of Justice. That straw bonds are popular in San Francisco is no news; but if Foley has been guilty, as now seems probable, he should be sent hunting a bond to keep his own precious hide outside the prison bars. And care should be taken that no straw bond need apply in his case.

SAMUEL J. Ruddell, Deputy Surveyor of this port, has been weighed in the official balance and found wanting. Ruddell was charged with being neglectful of his duty, and found guilty. He permitted forty-two Japanese to land at this port before they had been regularly examined by Dr. Jordan of the United States Quarantine Service; and now he is likely to lose his head and be compelled to work for his living. If Samuel had been as prompt in discharging his duties as he was in drawing his salary, he would have been entitled to honorable mention rather than dishonorable discharge.

JAKE RUDOLPH has twice within two years escaped San Quentin and found shelter at Stockton Insane Asylum instead, for attempting to commit murder in this city. His method is simplicity itself: He drinks whiskey, which makes him crazy, and when he is crazy he tries to kill people; is promptly sent to the asylum, where he recovers his reason and regains his liberty—and his pistol. This beautiful illustration of the applied perfection of human reason—which is the law—may be expected to continue until the whiskey is all gone, Rudolph dies of old age, or shoots all his enemies.

THE Chicago mechanics are growing restless, and the dispatches indicate that they are likely to strike for higher wages soon; and even the plumbers are thinking of further confiscation. It is time for labor to lift up its horny hand and grasp the throat of enterprise. The country is not yet beyond the depression of the past few years, but the indications of returning activity are quite enough to rouse the unions to ask for the profits on their employers' business, without sharing their uncertainties; and now we shall hear the blatant voice of the walking delegate, whose overworked jaw has had a few month's rest.

A GENERAL investigation of Police Court methods is promised by the Grand Jury and Supervisors. No one will doubt that there is enough legitimate material for fumigation about the City Hall to absorb all the disinfectants in town. The hope is expressed, however, that the work will be done and the dead buried before the arrival of Christian Endeavorers in July next.

MISS Harraden, the authoress, has written a story, "Hilda Stafford," whose plot is laid in Southern California. The writer literally roasts the country south of Tebachapi, and declares it to be unfit for the habitation of ladies. "Only men and animals should live there," says the author of "Ships that Pass in the Night." Miss Harraden's ideas of good literary work are about as accurate as her knowledge of the country she describes.

THE proposal to give the $3000 usually voted by the city for observation of the Fourth of July to the unemployed fund, now being expended in building a boulevard, is a good one. The money is worse than wasted in the celebration. These natal day jubiliations have degenerated into noise and bluster—into sound and fury, signifying nothing. They drive people with nerves out of the city; teach nothing grand, inculcate no permanent lesson. Parades, plumes, and politicians incite to more profanity than patriotism. If it can be done, let the laborer and the boulevard have the old flag and the appropriation.

SUPERINTENDENT Webster, of the public schools, is in favor of practical studies. He intimates plainly that too much attention is being paid to branches that are not useful to the average school boy or girl. He is right. Our children are taught all manner of nonsense, and their time is taken up with questions and studies that are never heard of outside the schoolrooms. There is such a thing as too much education—and San Francisco's taxpayers are getting it. Better go back toward the three R's of our forefathers; otherwise we shall soon require the services of an interpreter in order to communicate with our own children.

COMPLAINTS are made that there is unnecessary delay upon construction of the new Hall of Justice. It appears to be absolutely impossible to secure the attention, energy, and business ability on municipal work that goes begging for a chance to earn an honest dollar on private enterprises. The moment contractors come in contact with the city, complete metamorphosis ensues, business methods are thrown to the winds, and the systematic cinch of taxpayers begins. San Francisco has been a sufferer from delayed Justice in a hundred courts; and it would be little less than marvelous if the hall of the blind goddess should fare any better.

AT the Unitarian banquet at the Palace the other evening, Professor Joseph Le Conte, in the course of an address, uttered these prophetic words: "I call upon you, you cultivators of art and you teachers of religion, to hold up your end. Science wins because all scientific men work together. You must all work together. If you do not, and if you do not hold up your end, there will come such a landslide as the world has never yet seen." And the landslide is coming; for at that very moment the editor of the Occident, the Presbyterian organ in this city, was writing a blistering editorial, roasting before his time the Rev. Wm. Rader for intimating that eternal salvation does not depend upon the fable of Jonah and the whale!

CONSTANTINOPLE AS THE KEY.

MUCH has been written about Constantinople, and much remains to be written. It is to-day the Key to the European Situation. Let Russia possess it, and at once she becomes the mistress of the world. The greatest naval and military authorities of the century have held it to be the best site on Earth for a great dominating centre, which, in a sense, might become a world's capital. Its possession gives control of the Mediterranean and largely of Southern Europe, Northern Africa, and South Eastern Asia. To prevent that prize falling into the hands of any one dangerous power, we have the policy of the "Concert of Europe," and with it the maintenance of the "sick man," too feeble to take advantage of the centre of power he possesses. If that can be maintained as a certain, fixed and governing policy, the peace of Europe must continue to be kept, and, out of some evil, not a little good must arise. But it requires great good faith among the contracting powers for their agreement to be strictly kept. It is doubtful if there be more than an ounce of sincerity in the whole of the powers in the concert, and that ounce is to be found in the warm hearts of the people of France and Italy on this subject, who abhor even the appearance of maintaining the unspeakable Turk. They, regardless of personal profit, or gain, would drive him into Asia bag and baggage, and in short order, but they cannot do it alone. Russia and the German Emperor, strange to say, are for keeping the sick man where he is, until they are ready to divide his effects. England, at heart, is with France and Italy, but, whilst protesting against the course of the two Kaisers, takes care not to diplomatically break with them. The exact why and wherefore of all this, the blue books in due time will disclose, but allowance is being made for the delays of diplomacy, and for posing for position, but the great heart of England is as sure as to where Salisbury will ultimately stand, as it is of any known fact in life. It is certain that the war is now on, and that it will not be declared "off" in a hurry. The longer it lasts, and the wider it spreads among the people, the greater the certainty that it will become "the great war" that has so long been dreaded. Kings and Emperors do not always make hattles, any more than they fight them. The spirit of the age and of the people, have now practically the initiative. Neither Salisbury, nor the President nor the King of Italy combined, could make war in favor of the Turk at present. Their people would simply take hold of the reins of power and drive over to the other camp.

The diplomats keep a keen eye upon Constantinople as the key of the situation, and the ultimate prize to be fought for. The people for the time being, are for flesh and blood, kith and kin, the preservation of the earliest center of the arts and mid culture, and for the christian faith of the Armenians as against the hutchery of the wretched master of the Harem. It is idle for the two tainted sons of Russia and Germany to think of staying the tide which is stirred by such issues as these. Let these "two youthful despots," as Mr. Gladstone calls them, order as they may, civilization is against them, and, in the end, the triumph will be for truth and justice, against which they are warring. A power has arisen greater, higher, better far than that of autocratic rulers. A press with a conscience, combined with a telegraph that does not fear to transmit the news; bring the people together, cultivate their thoughts, unify their minds and raise them to a standard that will not permit the world's greatest revolution to turn back upon itself. We see how this is in the present prompt change of allies in Europe. France no longer goes wild over the mere prospects of an alliance with Russia. England takes no interest in whether the Czar visits Edinburgh, or stops at home, and Emperor Williams pops in upon the sick man, gives him a dose of courage, and then hastily departs, nobody caring why or wherefore. But let three Parliaments talk, and some seven or eight newspapers thunder, and the world is all attention at once. The listening to these powers of moral force is the way that decisive wars are brought on these times. Kinglake in the opening volumes of his history of the Crimean war, tells the story as perhaps no other man ever told it. It is a good book to read at this juncture. It tells of the same issues as those now uppermost, and demonstrates Russia's aims and ends from the beginning. What he shrewdly guessed, is now clearly apparent. Use Turkey as an earth-work to fight behind; when she is exhausted, step forward and secure the plunder. That is the programme. It means first the crushing of the christians, because they are liable to give trouble in the final settlement. Will such a game succeed? We think not. The temper of the world is against it.

The Progress of the War.

The tug-of-war between the Turks and Greeks is located partly in Macedonia, which was declared a neutral zone by the Berlin Conference, and partly in Thessaly, which is undoubted Greek territory. During the passage from Macedonia into Thessaly the Turks are reported to have had the best of it, although the Greeks fought most valiantly, contesting almost every point of advantage. The native population were not as well organized as was hoped, but since Thessaly has been reached and become the scene of operations, the Greeks have given the Turks a far different reception, and have generally heated them gloriously. If the war could be confined to that particular region, and it is said to be the intention of the European concert to prevent its spreading any further, it is almost beyond a doubt that Greece would much more than hold her own. But there is talk of the Dardanelles being passed and Constantinople entered, and if matters once proceed that far, the general war is on, and no man may predict the end. The war spirit is up, and blood is in the eye throughout South and South-eastern Europe. Men are massing together everywhere, hegging for leaders, ammunition and organization. When 20,000 imperfectly organized Macedonians fall in a day, and are still as eager as ever for the fray, there can be no doubt about the blood being up, and the dogs of war being loose in dead earnest. The navy of Greece, small as it is, is showing wonderful efficiency. The Balkan provinces are still to be heard from, and sympathy for the Greeks is liable to break out in several different quarters. The Roumanian Government is plainly strengthening her credit and her armies, and talking fight against Turkey. The rage and discontent of the Greek populace because of the failure of their arms, and the formation of a new Cabinet by King George, make the future still more dubious. Rumors of peace and European intervention are not to be trusted. From latest information the contest will not be prolonged; but the whole truth as to this question has not yet appeared, and prognostication as to the future must be subject to constant revision or total change.

Grant's Final Resting-Place.

The remains of the great American General were placed in their final resting-place on the bank of the Hudson last Tuesday, in the midst of a demonstration such as has rarely been witnessed in any land. Soldiers, citizens, statesmen, diplomats, Americans and foreigners, paid reverent respect to the memory and name of Grant. The impressive ceremonies were made the occasion of a spontaneous outburst of affection for the dead General that can leave no doubt as to the place held by the hero of Appomattox and Shiloh in the heart of the nation. A third of a century has elapsed since these stirring epochs in the world's greatest struggle transpired; but the deeds and their chief actor are fresh in the memory of the people, whose estimate of their import and regard for the great Captain found expression on last Tuesday.

During his life General Grant was accorded the highest honors that have ever been conferred on an American citizen. In his journey around the world he received one continual ovation, and was hailed by the crowned heads of the earth with entertainments and honors without parallel. Time has revealed in brighter light the services rendered to his country by General Grant, and has made his place in the history of the nation and the world more secure. Those qualities of character that made him great on the battlefield and in the councils of the nation shone out as he neared the end of life in touching splendor. As a citizen, a statesman and a soldier, he filled up the full measure of all, and he will forever hold a place in the hearts of the people of the nation as a patriot and a hero.

Pure Foods Congress. If one may determine from the number and earnestness of the delegates attending the Pure Foods Congress now being held at Pioneer Hall in this city, adulterations of food products have received a body blow in this State from which they are not likely to recover. The interest taken in this first meeting shows clearly that the public is thoroughly aroused, and that hereafter the question will be one of quality rather than quantity. The vigorous attack that was made upon all adulterations of articles of food by the San Francisco Board of Health is shown by this congress in the interest of healthy, honest goods to have been timely. The abuse has grown rapidly in recent years, and if it had not been met by drastic measures for eradication, would in a short time have driven pure foods entirely out of the market. The arguments made by the local manufacturers of adulterated goods, that they were forced to resort to these extremes to meet Eastern competition in similar products, is fallacious and vicious. Prompt and vigorous exposure of imported trash would have made a complete and abundant protection. The adulterations were made so perfectly that nothing short of chemical analysis and expert testimony could prove their character. In taste, color, and general appearance the good stood no higher than the half bad or wholly fraudulent. Their effect upon health is quite another and more serious matter.

Of all States in the Union, California has the least right to indulge in such business. The prolific soil, quality and quantity of crops, and the cost of labor remove the necessity—waiving the question of integrity—of resorting to such methods. Competition from the East could prove to be only a temporary embarrassment. The moment that the tests of purity were applied, the sale of Eastern trash would have been stopped. The proof that California goods were pure would have endorsed them in the larger markets of the world, and have forced an honest competition.

The Pure Foods Congress carries with it the weight of the State's name; and in its moral effect lifts the issue out of the circle of mere locality and stamps it with the endorsement of the commonwealth. It will carry into the different parts of California something of the interest existing in San Francisco, and will stimulate and make general the sentiment and action which had their birth in the Board of Health of this city. In their native state the qualities of California fruits are second to none in the world; they should lose nothing of their excellence, no matter what form they take, in reaching the table of the consumer. This fact once known and applied, an immeasurable service will have been accomplished.

The Poster Nuisance. The NEWS LETTER has frequently called attention to the outrageous abuse of privileges by the various bill-posting companies in this city. There is no limit to their greed or care for appearances. They began by erecting modest advertising walls along the streets wherever they could secure permission from the owners; but as competition increased and available spaces were occupied, the bill-posters began building their fences higher, until at the present time there are many places where these frail and dangerous walls are fully twenty feet in the air. The city begins to present the appearance of one vast bill board. These poster advertisements disfigure every residence portion of the city, shutting out the view and interfering with adjoining property. They are a nuisance, in the first place, and in many instances a serious menace to life and limb in the second. They glare on every street, and obtrude themselves upon the helpless view from every point of the compass. Erected in the cheapest manner possible, the walls are liable to be torn from their insecure fastenings by the high wind and thrown upon passing pedestrians or vehicles. That some such accident has not already occurred is due to good fortune alone. The Supervisors have taken up this nuisance at the request of the Merchants' Association. It is a matter of considerable importance, and it is to be hoped that it will receive serious attention. Fece advertising should be restricted to a safe height; and some consideration should be given to this imposition from the standpoint of ordinary municipal pride in the general appearance of the city.

The Woman's Congress. The Woman's Congress, just closing an interesting session in this city, has become the very glass of fashion and mould of form in the eyes of sensible men for all future conclaves at which the female presence may be profitably invoked. The woman of this Congress has not taken hold with a masculine grip and strident voice the male person at scruff of neck and seat of trousers; she has not proclaimed that man is a tyrant and lovely and lowly woman his slave; she has not intimated that there awaits her in the field of politics and at the ballot box the conquest of a world and the regeneration of a race. She has not turned her back upon the kitchen furniture nor scorned the care of her offspring as beneath her ambitious notice. The harness of the Amazon has not once clanked grimly upon the scene, neither have ideas arrayed in bloomers and short hair, and armed with claws, charged down the stage in a mad tilt against the sweetness and modesty of woman's character. The Congress, with rare good judgment, has turned away from the clamorous host whose plaint of political inequality and personal wrongs, have divorced them from the gentler attributes, and has shown the way where the worth of woman and the grace of her mind really lead the world and best adorn the field of human advancement.

The Congress has discussed the subject of education, in its practical application to the young, and has taken up and intelligently treated the questions of manual training and their relation to the requirements and conditions of to-day. The essays have largely covered the entire sphere of woman in the struggle for permanent progress, and have borne a direct and pertinent relation to the environments of the present. The organization of the "California Home and Child Study Association" is one of the prominent accomplishments of the Woman's Congress; and its title indicates admirably the spirit and character of the gathering. The mothers and the teachers of California are facing in a direction of promise, and a field of limitless possibilities and expansion. This gathering of California women obtained an added strength from the presence of men prominent in educational, religious and business matters. It has accomplished much, and its influence will be wholesome and lasting.

Wheelmen. It is time now for the bicyclists of the city Attention! to speak out in a body, and by their prompt assistance assure the completion of the Balboa boulevard upon the lines originally intended. The grading is almost done; the asphaltum surface alone is necessary to make the long stretch of road a permanent source of pleasure and recreation to the fifteen thousand wheelmen in San Francisco. The merchants who have liberally contributed to the fund have done so because of a pride in the work and in answer to the call of charity. But every man, woman, or child who rides a wheel has a personal interest in the boulevard; for they will, as a class, be the first to enjoy it. It will become a daily highway for every one who can get out, for the road is designed on ideal plans for the bicycle. The grade on the first two miles beyond the Park and to the highest point on the boulevard, is not great, and once at the top there follow three miles of beautiful descent to the beach, where the rider need never touch foot to pedal. The smooth asphaltum surface is absolutely necessary to the purpose of the wheelman, and now it is the time for him to come forward. If each rider in the city should give but one dollar to this fund, the committee would have abundant money to complete the boulevard in first-class shape. Horses and carriages can get along without much care as to the surface of the roads, but the wheelman must have smooth highways if he would enjoy his outing. The finish is in sight; there is no time to waste. If the boulevard is to be completed to the liking and pleasure of the army of wheelmen in San Francisco, the contributions must come in promptly. Let every man who knows the delights of the bicycle put his foot to the pedal and help out this work. The club officials should take the matter up at once, bring it to the attention of their members, and urge them to contribute one dollar each. The unattached riders, of whom there are thousands, should immediately send their subscriptions to Daniel Meyer, at 214 Pine street. Let the wheelmen be heard from now.

Federal Authorities Major H. A. Moore, special agent
After the Traffic at this port of the U. S. Treasury
In Chinese Women. Department, promises to root out the shameful curse of importing

Chinese women for evil purposes. The present traffic amounts to about three hundred per year, and never before has it been known to be so low. We know whereof we speak when we say that it has been the fruitful field of official corruption, the cause of the fights between the rival tongs, and the source of evils unmentionable to white girls. The new Chinese Minister has been taken into confidence, and professes to be shocked at what he has seen and learned. Like many of his predecessors, he will probably not long remember the shock. Secretary Gage is reported to have "received representations from certain of the missionary societies, who, however, have not supplied him with evidence of sufficient weight to justify a resort to drastic measures." No, and they never will. Their principal work consists of maintaining certain homes for these people, which are paid for chiefly by New England philanthropists, with more heart than head. These homes kidnap the Chinese slaves, and then marry (that is sell) them to other Mongolians at low prices, and, of course, where the differences goes may be imagined. We have had occasion to learn of some very bare-faced tricks in this connection. The missionary business of "house to house visitation" by young white women, has produced a thousand times more evils than the whole hand of missionaries have done good. This is easily susceptible of proof. It is at least doubtful whether the missionaries can claim the conversion of a single Mongolian, whereas it is too painfully easy of proof that Chinamen have captured women of the white race, and from among the missionary fold. The matured ladies, of most excellent intentions, who undertake to meet once a month to look into the management of the homes, are deluded and deceived by many of those whom they trust, and the Chinese habits of lying and deceit prevail, rather than the true, frank, honest utterances of a Christian home. Chinese exclusion has not yet reached its obvious and necessary limit. Their permanent abode must be without the city, and ways and means can be found to accomplish this. Major Moore need not look far afield for useful information.

The Yukon Country. It appears that the United States has a new mining region on its hands but in such an inaccessible location, that it is difficult to tell how to reach and work it. The Yukon country has been known to be of exceeding great promise ever since it came into the possession of the United States. In 1867 a strong party were sent out to explore the country by a company that intended to connect the United States with Siberia by means of a telegraph cable, via British Columbia, Alaska, and Bering Straits. The company started out big with promises but soon fell through for lack of capital. The members of the exploring party were all able men and one of them, Mr. Fred Whympier, subsequently became a member of the NEWS LETTER staff. He was the artist of the party and published the first valuable and detailed report of the Yukon. It remains to this day the fullest and most authoritative work in regard to that region. The Yukon was explored to a considerable distance and valuable facts put on permanent record. Mr. Whympier was strong in the faith that it would ultimately be found to be a vast and valuable gold region. His opinions are now being justified to the letter. From recent press despatches, by way of Portland, we learn that discoveries have been made in the Clondyke district of the Yukon, that promise a repetition of the great mining districts of California and Australia. Gentlemen well known in Portland have just arrived from the new gold field and give particulars that are really astonishing. One pan of dirt taken from a crevice in the bed rock actually yielded $293. On the Rhodes claim the pay dirt at the surface runs an average of $2.47 per ton and at the bed rock at an average of $4.90. The depth from the surface to bottom is an average of nine feet. If there be much country like that, and we are told there is, it must be an almost incomparable gold field. With the severity of the winters, the difficulty of transit and the uncongeniality of the place generally, it will be a hard locality to mine, but American pluck and energy will "get there."

The Kind of Citizens
Who are Unworthy
Of Protection.

We are all, of course, in favor of "protecting" bona-fide American citizens who are ready to fight for their own flag, and, in order to be able to do that, are mindful not to imperil their lives by fighting for another. A dead soldier is of little use to the United States. We want live men, and the more of them the better. When a man joins a foreign army, whether it be rebellious or regular, he has cast aside his American citizenship, and should, as a soldier of fortune, abide whatever betides him. We have more than once stamped and raved, and threatened Spain with war, and all because soldiers of that sort have lost in the chances of battle. We may be sorry for the man, and may even use our good influences on the side of mercy, but beyond that we have no more right to dictate than when an American in a foreign land has disobeyed its laws by fighting a duel. A few days ago we were ready to rush to arms if Spain did not at once release Sanquilly. He was reluctantly released by reason of our pressure. He swore not again to give aid or comfort to the rebellion. Yet within three or four days he was captured on board of a filibuster attempting to land troops and munitions of war for use against the Government that had so lately pardoned him. This places our Government in a plight that our best citizens must regret. It ought to put the jingoes to shame. And it may be remembered that while the Spanish war vessels were taking part in the splendid exercises at Grant's tomb, a big filibustering party was just clearing the Atlantic coast with arms and recruits for the cause of "Cuba libre."

Panama and Nicaragua. The publication of an article in an Eastern magazine by Cyrus Adams goes far to show that the French are slowly but surely pushing the Panama Canal to completion. The prominence given a year or two ago to Nicaragua has served as a stimulus to the Panama concern, and, in well-informed quarters, was intended to subserve that very purpose, and at the same time to give the American people a little scare over the prospect of an isthmian canal under the control of a foreign power. But if France has the money and the will to finish her big ditch, why not let her do it? If France can build a canal at Panama, let her build it. When completed, our people will take good care that it is not used to our disadvantage. We shall have our money, too, and France will have the experience. We observe that England never objects to the building of such works by other powers at great expenditure of resources. When the canal is dug, however, she uses it more than any other nation, and gets the most benefit from it. She waits to see what dividend it earns, and then buys up the stock at its earning capacity. France ardently desires the honor of being the great canal builder. She has achieved much, and has spent a great deal of money, and is still pegging away, notwithstanding her losses. Why not let her have the glory she seeks? It will please her and hurt nobody else.

The Gold Commission. President McKinley has kept faith with the platform, and appointed the delegates who are to represent bimetalism in Europe. That was the programme of the Republican party at the late election. It was taken as a joke then, and puts on no other appearance now that it has taken on official form. It is not taken as a serious proposal by any of the great powers. Russia has just announced that her resolve to go to the single gold standard is not to be changed. Germany declares that she will make no move unless England does. Japan is, by the payment of the Chinese war indemnity, enabled to go to a gold basis, and very jubilant she is about it. England, as a great gold producer, sees nothing but loss in her falling in love with the white metal, besides pretty nearly all the gold there is in the world is either hers, or due to her. Where we are to find 50-cent dollar allies does not anywhere appear. Our delegates will go to Europe, be treated hospitably, talked to nicely, and come home wiser but not more outspoken statesmen. The subject will then be dropped. Simply that and nothing more. Silver may give trouble in the Senate for some time to come, but it will hardly be heard of elsewhere until 1900.

GRANT'S MEMORABLE VISIT TO SAN FRANCISCO.

THE dedication of the Grant Memorial, and the consequent ceremonies which took place in New York this week, recall the arrival in San Francisco of General Grant after his tour around the world, which with its rites and the honors bestowed upon the hero in every country which he visited, resembled more closely a triumphal march than the ordinary pleasure trip of a private citizen of the United States as it was supposed to be; so a brief resumé of the main incidents of his visit here may prove interesting.

Seldom has San Francisco been seen in such gala attire as its streets presented for the welcome of General Grant on his homecoming. Committees of various kinds had been hard at work for days before, and most thoroughly did they carry out the work assigned them. Among others were Mayor A. J. Bryant—who was chairman of the executive committee—Colonel Sam Mayer looked after the music, Governor F. F. Low had charge of the finances, and of the ex-confederate soldiers J. C. Maynard was chairman.

The steamer Tokio, which brought the honored guest, was looked for on Wednesday, the 17th of September 1879, but it was not until twenty minutes past three p. m., on Saturday, September 20th that eleven strokes from the fire-alarm bell—the signal agreed upon—gave notice that the long expected Tokio with the conquering hero, General U. S. Grant, on board, was off the Golden Gate.

The bay was fairly alive with excursion steamers, tugs, yachts, and craft of all kinds going out to meet the incoming ship; the steamer China, gay with hunting from stem to stern had on board at least three thousand people, the Humboldt, St. Paul, Ancon, George W. Elder, and Parthenius, being also crowded with guests. The Millen Griffith carried among others, U. S. Grant Jr., Frank Pixley, General J. F. Miller, and ex-Senator Cole of the invitation committee; the receiving committee were on the St. Paul; the Government steamer McPherson carried General McDowell and staff.

At 5:40 the first gun of welcome was fired from Fort Point; then followed salutes from Angel Island, Alcatraz, the Presidio and Black Point, the smoke effectually hazing the incoming vessel as well as the fleet that accompanied it, the increasing darkness clouding the hopes of all who had spent hours waiting to view the water pageant, in vain. It was amid a din of steam whistles, clanging of bells, music, and explosion of gunpowder that at half past seven General Grant set foot upon his native land again, and as he came down the gang plank, arm in arm with General J. F. Miller, was received by Mayor Bryant, Governor Irwin and staff, the Board of Supervisors, etc.

After an address of welcome by the Mayor, and a brief response by General Grant, he and General Miller entered a barouche drawn by six bay horses, which was followed by another carriage drawn by four horses, in which were seated Mrs. Grant, U. S. Grant Jr., and Frank Pixley, chairman of the Marine parade. Behind these came other carriages conveying General McDowell, Governor Irwin, the Foreign Consuls, Supreme Court Judges, State Officials, Army and Naval Commanders, etc. The rest of the procession consisted of a grand turn out of all the federal and State military, Board of Supervisors, Fire Department, Foreign military Companies, Clubs, Musical Societies, etc., it requiring one and a quarter hours for it to pass a given point.

Grand Marshall W. L. Elliott, wore a yellow sash; Chief of staff, Colonel A. W. Preston, a crimson sash; Chief Aides Major Smiley and Colonel Stuart Taylor wore blue sashes; the other aides, some fifty in number, had on white sashes.

The line of march was up Market to Montgomery, to Montgomery avenue, to Kearny, to Market, to Sixth, and back Market to the Palace Hotel, where their rooms, beautifully decorated with choicest flowers, were ready for the party. The court yard of the Palace presented a brilliant appearance, with its bright illuminations; and every balcony from the ground to the roof packed with an enthusiastic crowd of ladies and gentlemen. A chorus of voices from the second balcony sang, "Lo He Comes Triumphant," as the General alighted from his carriage. Later, General Grant appeared for a moment on the first floor balcony, and bowed his thanks to the cheering which greeted him.

During the period of their stay in San Francisco, General and Mrs. Grant had little time for rest. Sunday morning was passed at the Palace receiving calls from friends; in the afternoon the General drove to the Park and Cliff House with Mayor Bryant, taking in Chinatown on their return. Monday evening General Grant and party witnessed the Color Guard at the California Theatre; and on Tuesday he and Mrs. Grant were guests of honor at a reception at the City Hall, and in the evening they were present at a ball given at the Pavilion for the benefit of the Widows and Orphans of the Police Department. On Wednesday General McDowell gave a reception in their honor at Black Point, when Mrs. McDowell and Mrs. Grant were assisted by Mrs. F. F. Low and Mrs. D. O. Mills; and the Baldwin Theatre was visited in the evening. On Thursday Oakland was the objective point, and in the evening the party was present at a masquerade ball got up for their entertainment by Colonel A. A. Andrews at the Pavilion. On Friday a special train conveyed the party to San Jose to attend the Fair of the Santa Clara Agriculture Society, where they were the guests of Mayor Archer. On Saturday the Stock Exchange gave General Grant a reception in the morning, and in the evening he and Mrs. Grant heard Pinafore sung by Emelie Melville and Company at the California Theatre, after which he attended a camp-fire meeting of the Veterans at the Pavilion.

On Monday General and Mrs. Grant dined with Mr. and Mrs. D. O. Mills at Milbrae; and on Tuesday, October 1st, they left town for the Yosemite, the party including, among others, Miss Flora Sharon, Miss Dora Miller, Miss Jennie Flood, Miss Nellie McDowell, U. S. Grant Jr., and John Russel Young. It was after the return of General and Mrs. Grant from Yosemite that Senator Sharon gave the famous "Grant hall," at Belmont, on the 8th of October, a special train conveying the guests from town, the General and his party having gone down there the day before to rest. They returned to town the day after the hall, when the merchants of the city gave them a reception in the Chamber of Commerce, when M. P. Jones, James de Fremery, W. F. Whittier, and J. C. Patrick were the special committee of reception. Governor-elect George C. Perkins delivered the address of welcome, and General Grant's response to it was received with rounds of cheers.

A large party, which included ex-Governor Low and wife, Fred Crocker, General Miller, wife and daughter, Miss Flood, Hon. A. A. Sargent, Louis Sloss, J. P. Hoge, Captain Hasbrouck, and George W. Dent, accompanied General and Mrs. Grant to Oregon, sailing on the St. Paul on the 10th of October. They returned on the 21st, and the same evening were present at a reception given by Mr. and Mrs. Charles Crocker.

The 22d of October included a reception at Mills Seminary, a visit to the Oakland race track, and in the evening a banquet at the Palace Hotel at which two hundred and thirty-eight gentlemen were seated. The invitation cards bore the monogram, "U. S. G." interwoven with a vine of laurel and the names of the executive committee—A. J. Bryant, Charles Crocker, W. M. Bunker, Charles Kohler, R. P. Hammond, Charles Main, J. P. Jackson, D. F. Verdenal, George Hewston, Colonel W. E. McArthur. General Grant was seated between General Miller and Mayor Bryant, the latter acting as toast-master on the conclusion of the feast. The first toast offered was "Our honored guest," to which General Grant responded at some length, in which he expressed his gratitude for the hospitality and cordiality with which he had been received, and that while it had been a quarter of a century since his last visit, he hoped it would not be another quarter before he came again. The other toasts were: "California, the Golden State," responded to by Horace Davis; "San Francisco," F. F. Low; "The Press," M. D. Boruck; "The South," Colonel Stuart Taylor; "Nevada," Senator Sharon; "The American Bar," J. McM. Shafter; "Our Volunteers," A. A. Sargent. At eleven o'clock the "Exempt Firemen," with a band of music, arrived to escort the city's distinguished guest to Oakland, where General Grant and his party took the train for Virginia City, en route East—this time never to return.

WITHOUT in any way belittling Mr. Denis O'Sullivan's excellent work in Shamus O'Brien on Monday night, I will venture that where one person went once to hear Mr. O'Sullivan, two persons will go twice to hear Professor Charles Villiers Stanford's Irish opera. For Shamus O'Brien is an absorbing work. It has the two-fold value of appealing to the appreciation of the laic listener and to the respect of the musician. It gives color, circumstance and romantic reality to a type of Irish melodrama that even Irishmen have come to regard as stale entertainment.

When I first read through the book and score, I thought that Professor Stanford had builded his music on an infernally cheap text; when I saw Shamus O'Brien acted I changed my mind. The triteness of the characters, the obviousness of the situations, the time-worn greenness of the whole hook are the very body of Stanford's themes; for the themes are typically Irish, the essence of that trustful, traditional Ireland familiarized by the Irish drama. I cannot but regret that Mr. George H. Jessup did not get an occasional good joke into his hook. If Professor Stanford's academicism did not shy at the bad jokes, surely it could have stood a few good ones. Besides, Mr. Jessup was no slouch of a humorist in the old days when he wrote for the NEWS LETTER, and it is sad to think of him now with the fun running out just so soon as fortune runs in.

But Shamus does not depend much on its fun; the comedic element is purely incidental to extraneous moods of the opera, and it flags perceptibly only in the spoken lines. The real value of Mr. Jessup's hook lies in its admirable proportions, cumulative skill, the swift address with which it fits the music to the action and the action to the word. There is such thorough inter-blending of composer and librettist that, except in the spoken lines, one never considers the two apart. Anyway, a librettist's lot is not a happy one. Harry Smith says with as much truth as wit: "If an opera is a failure, everybody says, 'What a stupid hook!' If it is a success, 'What clever music!'"

The music of Shamus O'Brien finds the real spirit of Irish defiance. It celebrates the ascendancy of the Irishman's pulse over his reason; it flings the jeer in the teeth of death; and in the hopeful, superstitious background it sounds the harbinger of death—the banshee. The opera is candidly melodious; the melody runs in stirring Irish meter, but it is written in the modern idiom with tense, dramatic scoring for the orchestra, so that even in the most detached melodic bits you feel the onward sweep of the drama. It is this oneness of the work, the suspense it excites from the rattling opening of the prelude until the final crash of that oft-used phrase, "Listen to Shamus!" that stamps the power of the music. It is a melodrama boldly told; and throughout its three acts it has that compact excitement which heretofore has been monopolized by such one-act composers as Leoncavallo, Mascagni, and Massenet.

Of course all this means Wagnerism, more or less. All new music seems to mean that now; the new composers either revel in the power of speech that Bayreuth has taught man is in him, if he will only give it free expression, or else they fly to the other extreme of lyric absurdity. There is no pre-Wagnerian music being written today; it is either Wagnerian or anti-Wagnerian.

Professor Stanford, who is at heart essentially a classicalist, the director of the Bach Society in London, and heaven knows how many academic things, is possibly the last man in the world from whom a new opera with new life, new light, and new color was to be expected; and possibly he never would have given it to us if he had not gone to a new field—old enough in itself, mind! old in farce-comical comic opera and all sorts of ballad mélanges, but absolutely new for the new method of exploiting it. And this was where the familiar story and the familiar heat of Irish rhythm were the accessories of genius: they made the characters unmistakable, the colors unmistakable. Stanford had but to dip his pen in the green ink, forget that there had ever been such musicianettes as drawing-room and houdoir opera builders, and write in the new tongue to the limit of his invention. A bigger man might have made a bigger opera of it, but Shamus O'Brien is not to be sneezed at for a generation at least. It is the best operatic work that has come out of England in many a day. In fact, it is the only recent English work in the romantic or comic class that has not turned out to be a comic oratorio or a musical farce.

When a man does as much as Stanford has done with this Irish subject, it is only human nature to ask, Couldn't he have done more? I doubt if Stanford could have gone in much deeper without imperiling the popular value of his work; for, even viewed from the most fastidious modern standpoint, the only thing he did not do was to build up a counterdistinction for every one of the characters, and exploit the leit motif to a more generous extent. Shamus has a character value of his own; Trevor, the British officer, is moderately removed from the Celtic taint; Mike, the informer, is villainized in a deliciously grotesque vein, and Nora and Kitty are given unmistakable moods, if, indeed, they have no striking musical personalities. Sure, it is hard enough to criticise a composer for what he has written without bothering with what he has not. And no one can write a comparative review of this Irish opera without fetching the comparisons a long way from posterity—for Shamus is an ancestor.

I do not know whether or no the orchestration was "contracted" to fit the modest dimensions of the Tivoli band. To me it sounds full and satisfying, and is a lesson in structural symmetry. I am glad to say that in it there is not a single instance of freak instrumentation—no hardware or firecracker effects. Professor Stanford focuses attention to the stage. The play is the thing; the story is in the songs, in the action, in the people. The shifts of color, the commemorative voices, the harmonic sympathy, are in the orchestra. And the orchestra is subservient, suggestive, assistant to, rather than dominant of, the drama. Even where Stanford melodizes most scrappily, giving free vent to the pace of Irish 6-8 time, there is a note of deeper significance in the orchestra, a warning of impending disaster. The songs, the stage, are the luminous expression of a deliberate, symphonic scheme.

But after one has been keyed up during three acts to all this musical portent of dire fatality, one cannot but feel some disappointment that the banshee has done such a might of witchwork to no better purpose than the death of Mike, the informer. Stanford's good music, it seems to me, would have more than justified a little extra conjuring with the Fanu poem. Shamus could die a game and glorious death, the reliability of the O'Brien banshee could be preserved, and we would not feel that a false alarm had not been rung on our creeps.

To all appearances the Tivoli has a cast-iron monopoly on the opera patronage of San Francisco. But it is not without a rival in the form of its past record—a rival that has so pampered the Tivoli patrons that now nothing short of an exceptionally insane extravaganza or a particularly well-arranged legitimate piece will fire them to anything like grateful enthusiasm. Shamus O'Brien adds to the dangerous precedent of good productions. It is well managed, staged and sung. And the chorus sings its difficult music with real Irish zest and ginger.

Mr. O'Sullivan finds his very own in the part of Shamus. It calls for strenuous, melodramatic singing and acting, and he does all that is called for—and even a little more. What I wrote about his singing last week will hold good in Shamus. The tremolo is there, and very frequently he forces his tone, but there are warmth and vitality and a splendid width in his voice withal; and his acting is the better for its wild enthusiasm.

Miss Millard has suddenly developed a wonderful state of wakefulness. She has a modest little tremolo of her own, but her Nora is abundantly dramatic, and, in parts, excellently sung. Miss Myra Morella, a new Tivolite, does rather neatly with the part of Kitty, and Mr. Thomas is quite an ideal figure of a man for the British officer. Mr. Thomas has a good voice, and he sings as well as a bad method will let him. Mr. West, reliable for anything from low comedy to oratorio, dispatches the Priest's part easily. Nimble Mr. Darcy has the role of his life in Mike; and, after O Sullivan, Darcy is the sensation of the cast. I never dreamed that so much character appreciation was in him.

There is a wild, irresponsible farce-comedy at the Columbia Theatre that will make you laugh. It may have other virtues, but I did not discover them. It is called A Run on the Bank, but that does not matter. It is funny. It is an avalanche of seething, disordered fun, which never stops during the first act, and only slows up a bit during the second and third, so that you may catch your breath. A few of the jokes that travel with this show have been here before, but they are still in good health, and all the others are strangers. Many people take part in this silly show. Particularly Mr. Ward and Mr. Vokes, who owe it, and who, no doubt, feel glad that they have such a good thing. These gentlemen own the show, but Miss Lucy Daly makes them divide on the audience.

ASHTON STEVENS.

DeWolf Hopper, Edna Wallace Hopper and the big company which made such a success of El Capitan in New York, come to the Baldwin Monday night for a two-weeks' season in that famous Sousa work. From all accounts El Capitan is one of those Eastern successes which will stand the climate of a Western audience. We know the value of Hopper and the charm of dainty Edna Wallace, and with a good company and a good show the Baldwin returns to swiftness.

This is what one gets for missing a week at the Orpheum: Haven't seen you this week, and am sorry. Alexander Tacianu, the female impersonator, is the greatest artist in his line who ever struck the town. He has a combination soprano and baritone voice that beats anything in the register. At the end of a long programme, he gets six and seven encores, and then the people want more. Next week he will have several new songs. Mlle. Fleurette and her "Four Fleurs-de Lis," direct from Paris, who do a dainty dancing act coupled with songs, and Mlle. Ani, a European aerial marvel, will make their first appearance. Ed Latell, the musical comedian, plays a great banjo. The parquet in the Orpheum has been raised, and new settees, accommodating two persons, are being put in.

Yours for health,

PHILIP HASTINGS.

Mr. Otto Bendix, who is one of the foremost, if not the very first, of our local pianists, will give a recital at Byron Mauzy Hall on Thursday evening. The programme includes Schubert's Fantasia, op. 15, Schuman's novelette, No. 8, several of Brahms's shorter pieces and Chopin's Sonata, op. 58.

A Run on the Bank has another week at the Columbia. Then Rice's big burlesque, Excelsior Jr.

Shamus O'Brien is up for a good run at the Tivoli.

A MEETING of Englishmen was held at Scottish Hall on Wednesday evening, and preliminary arrangements made for the Queen's Diamond Jubilee, by the appointment of several committees. It is evident that Her Majesty's loyal subjects here will celebrate in enthusiastic and appropriate manner the Jubilee. Three days will be devoted to the occasion, and sports, feasting, and literary exercises will be the order. The Jubilee will occur on Saturday, Sunday, and Monday, the 19th, 20th, and 21st of June.

THE inaugural bench show of the San Francisco Kennel Club, which takes place on the 19th, 20th, 21st and 22d of this month, promises to be a great success. The show will be held at the Mechanics' Pavilion.

Many changes have taken place in San Francisco; but at the "Maison Riche," at Geary street and Grant avenue, that famous French restaurant of the Pacific Coast maintains its high excellence for the perfection of its table. An elegant dinner is served at the "Maison Riche" every day from 6 to 9 o'clock, and stringed instruments make fitting music to the sparkling wines and the good cheer.

"CARMELITITA, Carmelita, mia bonita, sing to me." The little village of San Louis Rey is drowsy with the feeling of a perpetual summer afternoon. Long shadows and a golden yellow atmosphere are over all.

There is a faint humming as of bees. There is nothing doing.

There are few things worth striving for, and one of them is peace. The peace which, to some degree, may come in this world is nearer idealization in these old Franciscan Missions among the olive hills of California than anywhere else. The peace here cannot be put into words or painted. It is in the air, and breathes the feeling that the past has not yet gone away.

The dust lies thick in the crooked paths, and one almost looks to find a print of sandals.

The voices of the natives—inherited from the Spanish conqueror—are soft and musical. There are glimpses of bright shawls over black tresses; feet shod, but stockingless.

There is no wind, no noise, until the evening comes on, bringing that cool breeze, stirring the beautiful palm and pepper trees, which all through the hot day have remained motionless.

The rambling and roofless adobe, its brown walls crumbling with age, is near the Mission. The Padre's dwelling—being a little better than the others—is on the banks of the little river.

"Sing, sing to me, caro mio." This from a swarthy ranchero, bent and old, with hard, drawn features, which soften only when his eyes turn to the beautiful child near him.

The child is little Carmelita—his only treasure. Left to him—left before the door of his adobe—with no name, no dowry, save her peerless beauty and a voice like the song-birds.

Pico, oldest and poorest of the poor beggars of this summer village, has for eight years spent his earnings on Carmelita—Carmelita, with roses in her hair and cheeks—Carmelita, dancing, laughing, praying, and weeping with an inconsistency that is bewitching.

The tinkle of the guitar and a silver voice ring out. Old Pico listens and dreams and is content.

Carmelita must marry—yes, and some handsome caballero would, bye and bye, come along, and this flower, this gem of budding womanhood, would be a happy wife—a mother; but now his little one must cheer his old days. He would not be here long. Yes, he would work for her—he would—

The song dies away on the soft evening breeze. Pico sleeps peacefully, with a smile upon his face. The birds are still and the insects' hum is hushed.

* * * * *

The fierce sun pours down again. The old man awakens and drags his weary limbs about to prepare the breakfast of fruit and milk. He goes softly towards Carmelita's bed.

"Carmelita, Carmelita! Sweet one, where are you?"

The bed has not been touched. Carmelita cannot be found. No one has seen her.

Only the little red dress, the coarse lace mantilla and comb thrown carelessly near the door, and—what is that? A glistening object—a bright gold-piece. Yes, yes, the kind the tall, insinuating Americano yesterday offered Pico for a draught of native wine.

Poor Pico is alone—a fever seizes him. For months he is at death's door, and rises a mere shadow of the man he once was. Still ever the cry, "Carmelita, Carmelita! my little one, let me find thee."

The way is long and rough to the great city, but old Pico sets out on his way, haggard and working as best he can. For eight years we hear of him wandering about the gay city—living God knows how; a poor, bent cripple, haunting the cafés and open gardens, looking vainly for a dear lost face.

He listens to the voices in the great churches, hoping to hear the sweet, familiar tone.

"Mother of Christ, help me to find her, my Carmelita!"

It is night. Pico, bowed by grief and utter dreariness, creeps past the gay plaza where, coquetting and laughing, are women clad in rich satins, of bright colors, sparkling with gems, their white shoulders peeping above the lace; rich caballeros, in velvet and silk, with fiery eyes looking out beneath the black sombreros.

Creeping along, he crouches in the shadow of the walls of a palatial house in the rich American quarter of the city. The rays of light from one of the windows fall upon his drawn face as he sleeps on the cold, damp stones.

Hark! Is he dreaming? Can it be—the beloved voice—the rich, deep notes?

"Madre de Dios, look!"

Staggering to his feet, he gazes in at the open window: A brilliantly lighted room, filled with luxurious works of Oriental art. A table with luscious wines and fruit crowded upon it. Half a dozen men, their faces showing the wine they have drunk and the lives they have led. The jeunesse dorée, representing American capital in this half-Spanish town. A guitar—a woman once beautiful, now hollow-eyed and hardened, rough cheeks, blackened eyes, and tinsel dress that tell their own story.

She sings—holding her wine-glass high—a seductive love-song of old Spain.

The men cheer and drink again.

The old man falls against the wall.

"Carmelita, Carmelita! Mother of Christ! Why did I find thee?"

In the gray dawn the wine-sleepy revelers reel from the house. They stumble over an old man by the gate—dead, his hands clasping his heads, his eyes fixed as though in prayer.

OBITUARY.

THE death of Mrs. Mary A. Ellert, which occurred on the 26th ult. at the residence of her son, ex-Mayor L. R. Ellert, in this city, takes away a pioneer of 1854, and a widely-known and most estimable lady. Mrs. Ellert had been ill for two years or more, and her death was not unexpected. She had reached the age of seventy-five years. The remains were interred in Mountain View Cemetery, Oakland, on Wednesday, and were followed to their last resting place by a large number of sorrowing friends.

A MOST interesting paper was read before the California Bankers' Association, which completed its annual meeting at Los Angeles last week, by Mr. John J. Valentine, President of Wells, Fargo & Co.'s Bank of this city. Mr. Valentine's subject, "International Bimetallism," was a review of that question, which contained an array of facts against the proposed international agreement for the coinage and circulation of silver, as seems to be contemplated by the present administration. The Bank President address has been published in a pamphlet of twenty pages, and, as may well be supposed, contains a mass of expert opinion in opposition of this movement. Mr. Valentine has given a great deal of study to the subject, and his address presents unanswerable argument, not only against the contention of the so-called Democratic party for its adoption in the United States; but as well shows the impossibility of favorable international action. The paper is a valuable contribution to the bimetallic literature of the day.

MIRA MONTE COUNTRY CLUB.

FANCY expecting to come across a perfectly appointed club house in the midst of a wide stretch of Marin marsh land, perched on a knoll well wooded with old oaks—and incidentally, twelve miles from a lemon. Yet here a dozen young men, enamored of hunting, fishing and kindred quiet sports, pitched their tents. Later the tents were transformed into a beautiful club house, with the thick, stuccoed walls and leaded casements, the low, flat roof and wide wings, the heavy column supporting the roof of the wide veranda, all so faithfully carrying out the Spanish style of architecture that seems to be part and parcel of California, so completely does it harmonize with the landscape.

To be entertained at Mira Monte is a joy of delightful anticipation, for it means an entrancing diversion from the rush and bustle of this windy city to the hushed solitudes disturbed only by the curlew's cry or the quail's measured call; and if rest is what you crave, those piazza chairs, inviting couches, hospitable rockers, woo to sweet repose. And to enjoy the doler far niente of this idyllic spot one has only about one hundred minutes' trip to the station at Burdells' and thence, across the marsh but a few hundred yards. Then, too, several of the members own vapor launches which can carry a party from this city, via bay and river, up to the very threshold of the domain, which is by far the more romantic mode of transportation, and well suited to the charm of these moonlit nights. But in no case must the mandolin and guitar be forgot, for the serenitas would be as lost without this finishing touch to the scene as without the flirtatious fan. Which brings to mind a charming house party that assembled within the hospitable walls of the Mira Monte club house recently, gracefully chaperoned by Mrs. Thomas Magee, who, with her husband and the Misses Genevieve Goad, Mary Belle Gwin, Belle Hutchinson, Clara Crockett and Mamie McNutt, were, with Mr. Ed. M. Greenway, the guests of four of the club members: Messrs. Geo. A. Martin, Nat N. Wilson, L. S. Adams Jr., and Milton S. Lathan. The entertainment was, of course, in keeping with former social affairs for which the members have established an enviable reputation, and upon arrival, after refreshing themselves, the guests were invited to the dining room where an elaborate dinner was in waiting, after which the cool piazzas and cosy nooks under the oaks or down by the water's edge were in demand. Then came music—and there is plenty of talent in the Mira Monte club—piano, mandolin, banjo, guitar, and a tripping to waltz measure or deux temps. "Tired nature's sweet restorer" finally claimed a hearing, and the party dispersed to their rooms, after viewing by moonlight the miles of surrounding hills and lowlands from the roof observatory. Next morning, after a meal wherein the oft-quoted "speckled beauty" was ruthlessly sacrificed and other dainties provided to make it an ideal country house breakfast, the party set sail (to use poetic license) in the launch Olompali, stopping at Point Pedro for luncheon, thence to Tiburon, from which point the remainder of the trip was made most prosaically via ferryboat.

Besides the above four members of the Mira Monte Club the list includes J. B. Burdell, its president; W. H. Fairbanks, secretary and treasurer; J. H. Follis, A. H. Whitney, W. K. Hill, J. Downey Harvey, Harry B. Houghton. The death of Colonel Fred F. Follis last December depleted the list of original members. The retirement of W. R. Whittier, one of the charter twelve, on the occasion of his recent marriage to Miss Carroll, may be only temporary, the delight of domesticity being a very powerful rival to the pleasures of bachelordom; but his former confreres hope to make him see the error of his ways, and bring him back into the fold; Mrs. Whittier would make such a delightful chaperone, too, for the young ladies who know the delights of this suburban retreat.

But these young bachelors are by no means mere society butterflies, else why would they lease the shooting privileges, for ten years, of the 1,600 acres of marsh land and ten or twelve thousand acres of high land on the famous Burdell rancho, two leagues in extent? The gun racks in the big living room are not merely ornamental, by any means, and the young sportsmen could tell tales of some big game secured in the chaparral of the mountain side—the club name, by the way, being suggested by the grand view of the mountain just back of the Burdell ranch house.

Upon entering the big ohlong hall or living room of the club house, the first thing noted by the feminine eye would be a certain masculine solidity of things in general, and especially to the great fireplace that fairly wants to embrace the assembled company in its wide hospitality. Then there are no stupid little footstools to insist upon waylaying the unwary, no fragile tables with spindle legs to everlastingly argue the point of right of way; but plenty of big, comfortable rockers, and arm chairs and an immense, pillow-laden divan—this latter usurping the veranda side of the room. Above this couch, along the entire side, are wide windows from which a view of the river—yes, even the bay—is obtained. From this room, on each side, a wing extends, containing the sleeping apartments of the members. The narrow halls stretching into the perspective, the thick, plaster covered outer walls with the projecting roof beams, the heavy columns supporting the veranda roof—all help to suggest the fantastic idea of a nunnery. Could anything be more absurd—a bachelors' club house like unto a convent! Suppose we liken it to a monastery, instead?

The most delightful room is the dining room, opening out of and two steps higher than the living room, with entrances on each side of the fireplace. This room has one side and corner given over to windows, from which such a superb view is obtained that the pen halts in the telling. On two other sides are the fireplace and the handsome oaken buffet built into the wall. In the basement is a fully equipped billiard room.

The site of the club house is historic, being the scene of the battle of Olompali, between General Fremont, (when he was returning to San Francisco after the capture of Sonoma), and Chief Carmelo. The story goes that while Fremont was placidly ambling along with his command he encountered the gallant chief with 200 braves at his heels. A two-hours' battle was fought before Carmelo was convinced of the error of his ways and with his henchmen ignominiously routed. Perhaps if it had ended differently we might not be telling the story with so much gusto. There was great slaughter, so runs the legend, but legends take on a surprising elasticity sometimes, and the club members say they've never come across any Indian bones. But then Indians had a peculiar post mortem fad of perching in trees, so perhaps the crows could tell a different story.

"The King, the Knave, and the Donkey." By Pythias Damon.
Published by T. L. Denison. Chicago. 163 Randolph street.

This book resembles a wasp, in that its sting is in its tail, the tail being a vocabulary, wherein certain terms in common use in the United States are defined, after this fashion: "Lobbyists; very smooth persons, male and" (? or) "female, who infest capitals to influence legislation in the interest of corporations. Their methods are simpler and much easier than 'laying salt on a bird's tail.' The Lobbyist gently passes a roll of 'fat' before the eyes of the Legislator to be operated upon, and immediately the subject passes into the condition described under 'out for the stuff.' The subject is then completely under the influence of L., and is ready to sell his vote or his soul, if the latter had any market value." The ten chapters which make up the body of the wasp tell, in a rude way, how, since the world's dawn, the "plain people" have been robbed, abused, hoodwinked, and fleeced by the knaves for the benefit of the rulers. Though the volume does not give indications of any considerable degree of cultivation being possessed by its writer, it is yet by no means so badly written as most tirades against the injustice and inequality of men's worldly conditions. The writer asks what the remedy is for the constantly growing discontent of the "plain people," who, once splendidly oppressed by emperors, kings, and nobles, are now ignominiously ground beneath the heels of vulgar millionaires, too cowardly to fight in the open, and too tricky to be caught by the law. The writer suggests education as the remedy, though he admits that the rudimentary education furnished by the public school, and the superficial, pretentious education supplied by the University, are not what is wanted. He says that the system of education in the United States tends to turn out a vast horde of underbred, under-educated, and imperfectly-trained lawyers, doctors, and parsons. What is needed is education of character. As Matthew Arnold, though pre-eminently the man of culture and high training, and often spoken of by persons utterly unfamiliar with his work as a mere academic, was never tired of insisting, "Conduct is three-fourths of life." Knowledge of grammar, science, art, history, jurisprudence, political economy, government, is not the really important matter; what a country needs is not well-informed rascals, smooth of tongue and slippery as eels, but honest men. A quite well-informed man does not know on any given subject as much as can be enclosed within the covers of a moderate-sized volume, and it is not necessary that the majority of the citizens of a State should be even well-informed. The possession of a varied stock of information by no means saves a man from falling into the most deadly heresies about Government, social and political economy, and a hundred other things. But let a man have a few principles of right conduct thoroughly implanted in his mind and heart, and it is surprising how correct his ideas will be on almost all matters of daily life. Abraham Lincoln was a man of very moderate intellectual attainments and of very narrow culture, yet by his firm grip upon a few cardinal principles he became a nation's hero. Did the history, the geography, the science, the art he knew make him what he was? Certainly not. Fortunately for the hulk of mankind, an exceedingly moderate degree of knowledge is sufficient for the purposes of life: it is not knowledge that counts, but character. And the main principles of conduct are as well understood by an honest man who does not know the meaning of the word "ethics" as they were by Aristotle himself. The misfortune is that most people think that the only difference between an ordinary man and a great man is that the great man knows more facts. One might have supposed that Matthew Arnold, a type of academic training and the highest culture, would have been inclined to exalt knowledge above all else, yet no one in our time has so persistently, or so effectively, taught the comparative worthlessness of mere knowledge, and the surpassing value of conduct.

As Mr. E. L. Godkin has recently so well pointed out, the idea is almost universally entertained in the United States that one man is as fit as another for the performance of almost any function. A deduction from this is the notion that official plums should be distributed evenly among applicants, without any impertinent inquiries into their fitness for the work to be done. This notion is now being further extended by some ingenious person into the domain of literature. From a recent issue of a periodical we extract the following: "As the January issue of your magazine contained a poem from this city, it might be desirable to you to represent some other section at this time. If so, my address might be printed — instead of —, as — is my home when not in school here." This poet evidently has the notion that the publication of verse is, or ought to be, based on population, or on residence in particular "sections." Of course, besides the wild absurdity of this notion, there is also the dishonest suggestion of a change of address, so as to make the readers of the magazine believe that they are reading the work of another writer, resident in another town. Yet this absurd notion is only a strictly logical deduction from the idea commonly entertained and acted upon in public affairs, and shows that, the more nearly correct the reasoning from wrong premises is, the more entirely erroneous is the conclusion. Logic is indeed a two-edged sword, which should be handled only by experts.

Every Month is a magazine of literature and music for women; it is published by Messrs. Howley, Haviland & Co., New York City. The Easter issue is a handsome one, containing profusely illustrated articles on the ladies of the present administration, Easter flowers and decoration, the Havemeyers at home, and other topics. There are also some original pieces of music. An article entitled "Photography at its Best," gives reproductions of several photographs by Mr. M. B. Parkinson, which show much skill and artistic feeling. We are, however, by no means at one with the writer in thinking that the portrait painter is in any danger of being superseded by the photographer; the limitations of the photographic art are so numerous, obvious, and apparently insurmountable. The photographer, however skillful he may be, cannot give us color, and has only a limited power of excluding undesirable details. People would scarcely pay artists like the late Sir John Millais, for example, ten thousand dollars for a portrait, if it were only equal in value to a photograph that can be produced for a dollar or two. Photography has risen above the level of a mechanical trade to that of an art, but it is not yet, and, so far as we can see, is not likely to become, a fine art. It is far easier to make a good photograph than a good watch, yet no one calls watch-making one of the fine arts.

Perhaps no one to-day more thoroughly understands the value of a famous or notorious name than the smug, self-complacent, enterprising Editor of The Ladies' Home Journal. Whether the bearer of the name can write or not is of little or no moment to young Mr. Bok—it is the name he wants. He has discovered, and turned to great profit, the fact that, in democratic circles at any rate, the utterly undistinguished niece or daughter (till she is married and done for) hears the same name as her distinguished father, and for advertising purposes is nearly as valuable. Acting on this great principle, Mr. Bok tempts the young woman, by the offer of a substantial check, to put down on paper her impressions of something or somebody, and (after proper editing) these impressions are printed in Mr. Bok's paper. In an early issue Mr. Bok promises an article from Miss Olga Nethersole, whom everybody believes to be an actress, but whom nobody suspects of being a writer. Her article is to be entitled "The girl who aspires to elocution." May the good Lord grant that Mr. Bok's enterprise may not be the cause of inspiring any ambitious girls to indulge in those elocutionary performances that have made so many evenings a horror and a nightmare. For goodness' sake, kind Mr. Bok, don't spring the amateur elocutionist on us!

MOTHERS, be sure and use "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup" for your children while teething.

THEAS seem to have broken out again and the buds are in despair. Why don't some one give a dance? is the question heard on all sides. Gossip says Mrs. Louis Parrott will soon have a lawn party at San Rafael; and indefatigable Baron von Schroeder is credited with the most elaborate designs for the summer gaieties at the Hotel Rafael, being a most efficient aid to Manager Warfield in planning and executing pleasures for the guests of that favorite caravansary. The June weddings will delay the exodus to country resorts a few weeks, but by the middle of June the swim will be disporting itself in various localities.

What a change a few months will oftentimes make with some, while with others monotony reigns supreme. As an example of the first stands Captain Marion Maus—that gallant soldier, whose flirtatious ways brought woe to more than one bud of the swim—who, after sipping sweets from the flowers in his path here, took himself and his fascinations to Coronado, and is now going to see real warfare between the Greeks and the Turks, having been detailed to accompany the General of the army on his European tour. Our belles are wondering if some Greek maideu will capture the elusive Captain, or will he inspect the Turkish harems in preference to Grecian abodes.

Sometimes it happens in life that one sees a person placed in a position which recalls a square peg in a round hole. In the case of the recent appointment of Mr. Harold Sewell as Minister to Hawaii, however, nothing of this sort of thing is apparent, for if ever any one was fitted to fill a place in the jolly, pleasure-loving society of Honolulu, it is the new Minister's wife—our own popular Millie Ashe—who will, beyond doubt, be the center of fun and frolic in the Islands. And equally without doubt many a party of her San Francisco friends will be made up for a trip to the Islands to visit the United States Minister and wife.

The attendance of beauty and fashion at the recent tournament held at the Presidio reservation goes to prove how much San Francisco needs some place for the beau monde to congregate, as in Europe at flower shows. What a good idea a lawn party at the Park would be! Not the Sunday music for the people at large, but an afternoon in the week when the band would play—say near the conservatory—and the élite would assemble for a chat or a stroll while listening to the music.

The owners of rural abodes at and about B'lingham are jubilant over Joe Grant's impending marriage; for the settlement at that aristocratic locality have had the charming bride-to-be among them for some time past as a visitor, and as the young lady is thoroughly versed in the art of entertaining, they look forward to Joe's cottage being a head center for much that goes to enliven a rural locale.

There are to be several functions in honor of the two pretty brides-elect, Minnie Burton and Ethel Cohen, during the month of May. Some one has suggested that the dejected bachelors who have been "left" should unite in tendering them a farewell dance. Needless to say, the future bridesmaids are all in accord with this idea.

Among the novel ideas propounded by society is one that Mrs. Pixley should utilize her lovely place for a garden party. She is almost the only one possessing grounds extensive enough for such a purpose in the city.

Surely the happiest young mother in the city is Walter Hobart's fair wife. One of the prettiest sights imaginable is the baby's daily outing, with its beautiful mother superintending the proceeding.

The Jewett tea exhibited, as all that lady's receptions do, a wonderful mingling of the past and present in the guests, more especially observable in the entourage of ladies "receiving" with the hostess.

One of the possible announcements of the near future, we are told, may be that of two young people who recently made the trip from Honolulu on the same steamer.

Gossips are linking the names of the maid-of-honor at an approaching wedding; and one of the military ushers at the same who bears the name of a famed trapper.

Boyd is the favorite soldier beau of the newly arrived at the Presidio, and bids fair to take the place so long left vacant by the popular Strother.

The proof of the pudding is in the eating it. The proof of good whiskey is in drinking it. And J. F. Cutter whiskey is pronounced by people who know, to be a liquor of the finest quality. The Pine-Street Market.

Little spurts which take place in the market for Comstock mining shares show a latent life in the business, dead and although it may appear on the surface, which cannot but be reassuring to dealers, almost worn out under the burden of expense incurred in carrying on the work of the mines. One of these flare-ups may kindle some of these days into a flame which will bring the old regime of operators back to the street. The whole of the Pacific States are hungering for another era of mining speculation. Talk of activity in legitimate mining about ends there. Where money can be obtained in dribbles and hegrudgingly for legitimate work, it comes in an overwhelming flood for speculative purposes. The dull times in this city, and all over the West for that matter, cannot be ascribed to any lack of money. There is a plethora of wealth here, and people are literally famishing in the midst of plenty, simply for the want of something to put surplus funds in circulation. The only channel available for the purpose is the mining market on Pine street, and if the men backed with money for heavy investment could only be persuaded into operating different lines of Comstocks, their profits would exceed those of previous boom periods in history. Wheat speculation does not come natural to our people as a rule. A few understand the game and play it, but it is not popular with the masses, who now content themselves with lotteries and schemes of the kind. The scope of mineral territory in and around Virginia City render the chances for important discoveries of ore absolutely inexhaustible, and new mines and new districts can be depended on to keep up public interest once it is again awakened. Would it not be possible to get a syndicate of wealthy operators together to stir up the dying embers of local mining speculation?

Possible Mining Sales.

The latest among the possibilities of the future in the way of mining sales is a reported deal between the London Exploration Company and the owners of the De la Mar mine, known and transcribed as "The Great" in the territory where a nod from the man who honored it with his haughty cognomen ranks next to an autograph letter from the President. This surmise is based upon a recent examination of Victor Clement, who, strange to say, has hitherto been attached to the African caravan of the Gold Fields Limited. It is only a few weeks since an almighty bluff was made at closing down the mine, "it might be for years, and it might be forever," because His Altesse objected to a miners' union in his neighborhood. Small blame to him for that. The threat carried the day in the demesne, and was followed by retrenchments and changes in the staff. Next comes the visit of Clement and the rumor of a sale. The latest report made to the Tax Collector for the quarter ended on January 1st last, discloses the fact that during that period 20,677 tons of ore were worked, the gross value of which was $575,462. From this, $77,000 was taken for extraction, $22,000 for transportation, and $372,186 for milling, leaving a net profit of $100,000. With all respect to the De la Mar mine, it would need be a high-grade proposition, if this return is correct. Low-grade ores could not stand such charges for any great length of time. And yet the figures are presumably official.

Drawing the Long Bow.

A New York correspondent of a big local daily, in praising a highly promising prospect in a Tuolumne mine, speaks of "three-foot ledge of gold ore that sampled over $50,000 per ton from the grass roots down." This almost equals the Placer County daisy which blossomed out with $75,000 a short time ago. And yet people wonder why California gets a name abroad for exaggeration in mining reports. The first to condemn such statements in the $50,000 case, at least, would be the owners of the mine to which reference is made, as they are not fakers in any sense of the word.

All the preaching that is done about the wealth of Arizona mines does not seem to entuse people to the point of investment.

Arid Plains Of Arizona. A few go into the territory, but outside of the one or two big copper plants in successful operation, one has yet to learn of any marked success. Experience is gained at the expense of capital, and monuments in the form of abandoned plants are to be found in all directions, marking the march of outside investors, as skeletons are wont to do along the highways of the American Sahara. The Salt Lake Tribune, one of the recognized mining authorities of the Coast, in commenting on a recent trip of well-known mining men through the diggings of Arizona, says that it was "fraught with more hardship than fancy can possibly paint. They (the prospectors) rode over barren acres, tramped among frogs and snakes, and ate their lunches beneath suns that were almost unendurable. They did not find the claim to which their attention had been called what had been represented to them, and came back like others have come, to resume the search for copper in this State, Nevada and Idaho." All of which is very complimentary indeed to Arizona.

The State Gold Product. Charles G. Yale, Statistician of the U. S. Mint in this city, has furnished his report of the product of gold and silver in California for the calendar year of 1896, which has been forwarded to the Director of the Mint for subsequent publication in his report, which will appear at a later date. The report shows a product of over $17,600,000 for the year, of which $17,181,562.70 is gold and $422,463.60 in silver, against $15,934,108 in 1895, of which $13,863,282 was in gold and $297,331 in silver. This is the largest yield in several years. In 1896 the total yield was only $14,160,613, of which $13,863,282 was in gold and $297,331 in silver. Thirty-three counties in the State contributed to the total last year. Seven of these counties reported a gold yield of $1,070,142 to $2,380,756, the last named total coming from Nevada County. Anador, Calaveras and Placer Counties reported $1,523,357, $1,546,399 and $1,674,844 respectively, and Siskiyou, Tuolumne, and Trinity upwards of $1,000,000 each.

Local Stocks are Active. The efforts to influence and change existing tariff rates on sugar have had the effect of stimulating speculation in the stocks quoted on the local Stock Exchange.

Prices have dropped considerably on account of heavy sales by the bearishly inclined, but a large contingent of bull operators stand ready to absorb the shares when the point of value reaches what may be considered hed-rock. The chance for money-making eventually on the long end is emphasized by the possibilities that no decision will be reached regarding the trusts in this session of Congress, and perhaps never. Other stocks are in fair demand and generally firm. In May, interest will be due and payable on the following bonds: United States fours (new issue), quarterly; Edison Light and Power sixes, quarterly; Natoma Viueyard first mortgage sixes, semi-annual; Sacramento Light and Power sixes, semi-annual; Southern Pacific Railroad of California first construction (guaranteed in gold) fives, semi-annual, and Spring Valley Water fours, quarterly.

A Nevada Mining Deal. The passing of the Charman mine, of White Pine, Nev., into the hands of such an expert miner as Charles Lane will be watched with much interest.

The property, which has been experted by some of the best men in the West, among others by John Hays Hammond, has heretofore proven a most rebellious subject. The quantity of ore is great, and the facilities for working, in the way of cheap power, etc., are excellent, the difficulty experienced being in treating the ores, which can be mined for almost nothing. It is not likely that Mr. Lane would have taken hold of the mine without some idea of the difficulties in store, and his success will be another proof of his ability to cope with a ticklish mining proposition over which so many failures have been recorded in the past. It is understood that to begin with he will put in an elaborate electric plant.

Town Crier

"Hear the Crier!" "What the devil art thou?"
"One that will lay the devil, str. with you."

SERGEANT Puckett, of the Presidio, started out to be a Gay Lothario on $20 per month, and has already come to grief. A wronged maiden has appeared upon the scene, and the glory of the scintillating sergeant's military achievements is rapidly fading, while his brass buttons are looming up as brilliantly as ten-cent pieces in a Farallone fog. Moreover, the sorrowing sergeant is accused by his associates at Uncle Sam's reservation of hoarding his princely income in miserly fashion, and lending out sums of six-bits and less at exorbitant rates of interest. This is truly infamous. Puckett's dual career of crime as a seducer and usurer should be promptly nipped in the bud. It is preposterous that the accomplishments of our millionaires should thus be usurped by a $20 infantry officer.

THE sympathy of the devil is due to the unprotected people who worship at the sanctuary of the Green-street Congregational Church in Chicago. Dr. C. O. Brown, who disgraced the name of decency, to say nothing of the name of religion, in San Francisco, has become the pastor of the Chicago flock. To say that all the charges made against Brown in this city, and which resulted in his dismissal, were true, would be to repeat that which is everywhere known. The people of Iowa and Illinois—more particularly those of Dubuque and Chicago—require attention. That they receive with open arms this direct representative of Satan should quench the foreign missionary spirit of weak-headed and soft-hearted philanthropists, and direct their contributions to the Windy City instead.

CHARLES Montgomery, savior of San Francisco souls, is busily baptizing local sinners in the bay, ducking as many as eleven per day in the same spiritually-purifying briny that yields up its wealth of tomcods and other finny delicacies to more worldly fishermen. There is a large and notable assortment of sinners, however, that the CRIER fears Evangelist Montgomery will never get his boly clutches on. They are to be found at the City Hall and in other municipal places, as well as among the legal fraternity. The CRIER recommends that they be so effectually doused they will never come up again.

THE Gavigan person is desirous of filling his belly at the sociological crib of the San Francisco School Department, and is preparing through the Supreme Court to compel Governor Budd to show cause why the Gavigan appetite should not be appeased. This enterprising citizen was a lawyer until he became a doctor, and he became a doctor in order that he might fill the position of sociological instructor in the city schools by means of a bill that be caused to be passed by the last Legislature. Budd vetoed the bill, which fact cuts off the salary and promises to set Gavigan killing people in some other way than by sociological injections. Hence the Gavigan wail.

MILLIONAIRE Finigan, of Marin County, who is now embellishing with indifferent success a cell in the San Rafael jail, declared that he preferred the quiet of his quarters to the domestic felicity of his home; but it is noted that he spoke as a false witness. He is already making overtures to escape further punishment by the payment of alimony to his wife and attorneys' fees in her suit for divorce. Gnawing a file is hard on the teeth, and Finigan now prefers the turmoil of female contact rather than the introspective silence of the jail.

ONE Floethe, a conductor on Suto's railroad, has been accused by an elderly school teacher of squeezing her hand while collecting her fare. The CRIER does not see that the lady has any kick coming. Many a lonely bachelor of the gentler sex would think it a bargain were she, by the dropping of a nickel, to get transportation and love-making too.

SOMEBODY interrogated the TOWN CRIER the other day as to "what was to be seen at the theatres?" And the CRIER, being a modest man, blushed.

THE Missionites, with George D. Shadburne as President of the movement, demand a park of their own. In getting it, 'tis to be hoped they will not be hampered by propositions from that antiquated nuisance, Cogswell, the Fountain Fiend, to erect thereon another school and a job lot of drinking fountains surmounted with cast-iron facsimiles of himself. Should this calamity occur, however, the CRIER suggests that the irrepressible Doctor be gently but firmly conveyed to the city pound, and there fatally immersed in his favorite fluid.

IT will be a ministerial miracle if the unfortunate fate of young Lehmann, who missed his footing and was drowned in the bay while yachting last Sunday, does not furnish the parsons hereabouts with a text for to-morrow's sermons. The righteous landlubber who sits piously in his pew o' Sabbaths, may not find a watery grave, it is true. He elects to take his dampness in another form later in the week. Perhaps it is the dryness of the discourse that induces his terrible thirst.

SOME one stole a few pages of a Grand Jury report in Los Angeles which reflected severely on two Justices of the Peace in that community. Upon discovery of the theft, the heartless secretary of that inquisitorial body filed with the Judge an exact copy of the sheets stolen. In San Francisco the theft would never have been discovered, or if it had been, there would have been no official memory on hand to reproduce it. Bad memory and official integrity are rarely twins.

CHARLES O. BROWN, late of the First Congregational Church in this city, but now of the Windy City, will preach in Chicago, where his paramour, Mattie Overman, is engaged in rescue work. When Charles and Mattie have joined forces to redeem Chicago, Satan's anxiety about that particular section of the country will be at rest, and His Majesty cau redouble his attentions to San Francisco, knowing that Chicago is in the safe hands of his emissaries.

DR. John Fryer, professor of Oriental languages at the State University, who so successfully juggles with the Chinese language that the Mongolian Government has given him the lucrative job of translating its scientific works into English, sailed on Wednesday for China. It now transpires why Joaquin Miller declares that he "will sing no more." No one but the gifted Fryer has ever been able to interpret the hard's manuscripts for the printer.

IN the programme of the Woman's Congress this week, in the name of Professor Griggs, Doctor Anna Shaw's "ideal man," is conspicuous by its absence. The Professor is a brainy young man, who should have more backbone than to go into hiding because a spinster with a yearning to be a bloomed policeman has fixed her glittering eye upon him in admiration. He should be lured from his lair, and Anna bound over to keep the peace.

"THE Hall of Justice has been delayed," quoth a contemporary this week. The statement savors of irony. Justice herself having suffered delays interminable throughout her career in San Francisco, it is but in the order of the eternal fitness of things that her temple should share her fate. It is too much to expect, anyhow, that Justice can make a haul of any kind in this neck of civilization's woods.

"JOAQUIN MILLER will sin no more" is the startling statement made by a contemporary. A mere typographical error, this; just the dropping of an insignificant little letter; yet those who read will labor under a grave misapprehension. No such miraculous reform will cloud the bard's interesting, if not strictly orthodox, career. It is not true that Joaquin will sin no more, but that he will "siug no more."

WIDOW ARCHER, the fair speculator who won $1,555 at the race track this week, has had no less than nineteen matrimonial offers since her accession of luck. Times are indeed hard when men will resort to such desperate means as marriage in order to gain wealth.

ARTICLES of incorporation were filed this week by a Teapot Company, whose capital stock is $1,000,000. A million-dollar tempest may be expected if the directors disagree as to the manner in which it should be boiled.

Uncle Reuben was visiting the metropolis for the first time. "What do you think of New York?" asked his city nephew. "Waal," replied the old man, "it's a mighty big place, hut it don't seem sified. I hain't seen a telegraph pole in the hull town." "The wires are underground." "Underground?" "Yes—in conduits." "Conduits? What's them?" "Suhterranean passages." Uncle Reuben was thoughtful. "Waal," said he, "they must be powerful deep to take in them tall poles."—New York World.

The club of old was, we've been told,
A den of wickedness,
And e'en in Lent the members bent
Toward sipping B. and S.
But now they say men hail the day
When gone are things infernal,
For everywhere the clubs forswear
The World, the Flesh, and Journal.

OUT OF ALEXANDR' BAY.

A JANUARY FISH STORY.

POKE the fire a little, yonkers, till the log begins to blaze,
For the January blizzards hev a lot of chilly ways;
Bring the apples an' the doughnuts, an'—the cider, understand,
An' he mighty sure to place 'em some at handy to the han';
An' I'll string you up a story illustrative of the way
That I used to go a-fishin' out of Alexandr' Bay.

First, I asked the wind an' current fur to furnish me a lift,
Then I sailed away a distance in my double p'inted skiff;
An' I tuk it when desirous of a half a day alone;
For the biggest of the fishes doesn't like a human tone.
An' I recollect I anchored on one mornin' bright an' clear,
Where the basses used to gather in that season of the year.

When I found 'em, they was huddled near a little islan'-beach,
An' they measured—O, my gracious, twice as much as I ken reach;
(An' I don't believe there's any hev their arms in a posish Fur to stretch 'em more than I ken, in describin' of a fish;)
An' the mornin' was so gentle, an' the water was so clear,
I cud see 'em smell my minny jus' as if they all was here.

But a lot o' rich New Yorkers hed their summer-housen nigh
An' my gracious them 'er fishes was a-eatin' cake an' pie!
Cooks had throwed it in the river when it cluttered up a dish,
An' f's'pose it tasted hetter to the fishes, than a fish;
An, I whispered to my conscience, "Yon are very near a fool, Ef you waste your time a-danglin' overneath a boardin'-school!"
Then my conscience answered, "Stiddy; keep a-givin' 'em the bait!
There is al'ays blessin's comin' to a feller that can wait."
An' I kep' a peekin' down'ard so 's to see how matters stood,
An' I held a lively minny jus' as near em as I could;
An' I meant it as a primium for the scholars; hut alas!
Not a single one would offer fur to jine my cookin' class!

Then they sort o' laid an' rested in the water still an' deep,
An' they dropped their noses down'ard, an' appeared to go to sleep;
An' they nestled near an' nearer to the river's sandy floor,
An' I listened till I reckoned I could hear the fellers snore!
An' I says, "Lie still and slumber; I'm a-watchin' o'er your bed;
If you'll only wake up hungry, here is blessin's on your head!"

Bye an' bye the leader started, scratched his forehead with a fin,
An' he stretched an' yawned a little, an' my minny wiggled in;
('Twas a knowin' breed o' minny's we was rearin' at the Bay.)
An' the bass he shut his mouth up, an' the hook got in the way;
An' before he had the priv'lege fur to yell a single note,
He had left his loved companions, an' had started for the boat.

Then I winked unto the minny, an' I thought I see him grin,
An' I 'magine he enjoyed it, so I sent him down ag'in;
An' he run among 'em lively—like a wiggler in a cup;
An' kep' knockin' at their doorways, till he woke another up;
An' the fish embraced his caller, more in passion than in love;
An' immediately started for the happy land above.

One by one the others wakened; an' the word was passed aroun'
There was somethin' there fur nothin' that hed jus' come into town;
An' they soon was crazy fur it—an, the smartest of 'em led (Fur a fish is partly human, as I think I al'ays said);
An' may Ananias' spirit come and visit me to-night,
Ef them everlastin' fishes didn't stan' in line to hite!

An' my boat was overloaded till it sort o' sagged an' stuck,
An' I sold 'em out in messes to some fellers scant of luck;
An' some fifty reputations as a fisherman, no doubt,
Was established on the fishes I'm a-tellin' ye about;
Anyhow, the rich New Yorkers, they was buyin' all the way
From the islan' of the basses into Alexandr' Bay.

—Will Carleton in Every Where for January.

THE Chinese wall is the most extensive fortification in the world. According to the surveys made within the last few years, this wall is 1,728 miles in length, and it passes up steep mountains, down into gorges and ravines, crosses rivers, valleys, and plains, seemingly regardless of obstacles. It is 25 feet thick at the bottom and 15 feet at the top, and from 25 feet to 30 feet in height, with turrets or towers 35 feet to 40 feet high every 200 or 300 yards during its entire length. The exterior walls are of well-cut granite block, the interior is filled with earth and stone, and the passage-way is paved with bricks 1 foot square. The erection was begun in 211 B. C., and it was designed to protect the northern frontier of China against the savage tribes of Siberia.

All manner of beautiful buds and blossoms are kept by Leopold, at 35 Post Street—fresh, dewy, fragrant. It's a pleasure to drop in and see the lovely bouquets he makes up—and so reasonable. Small prices appear to have little to do with the excellence of his flowers.

DEAR EDITH:—The Queen's Jubilee has brought into prominence for this spring a new kind of a bonnet—or rather, an old style under a new name. They are quite the vogue in New York. The are called "Jubilee" bonnets but are really nothing more or less than pokes, newly named because Queen Victoria wore a poke when she ascended the throne; not, perhaps, at the very moment when she walked up the steps, unless she had the crown made over for the occasion, but pokes were in fashion that year. This being jubilee year, poke bonnets are made the fashion again, just to remind Victoria how she used to look. They are very becoming to young faces, and the reason that they are not more generally liked is that so many women like to be dashing instead of demure. If you are going to wear a poke, you must be demure; not to be would be like going to church on roller skates.

Demureness should win new converts, however, when women see these chic affairs with a little row of pink rosebuds under the brim against the hair and framing the face. They have white or delicate green moire ribbon laid quaintly over the outside and drawn down under the chin in a great big bow that could tie at least half a dozen hearts within, such hearts as the men have these days, anyhow, which are much more likely to succumb to a bonnet than to a girl.

For her who neither wants to be dashing nor demure, there is a host of medium-sized hats in gay New York, most of them striking because of brilliance of color or through their masses of bloom. One of this type was shown, its puffed crown and its brim, composed of violet glaze taffeta, the brim almost hidden by masses of violets. Separating brim and crown was a full twist of violet velvet. On the left side was a high loop of the taffeta supported by an aigrette of violets and foliage, and a corresponding loop without flowers was on the other side. The back was filled in with small rosettes of velvet, violets and leaves.

I have just seen a bride's gown fresh from Paris. It was made of white poplin with a little boero jacket of white chiffon. It was trimmed all around the edge with pearl embroidery, upon white satin. There was a big collar-like effect, front and back; something like a sailor collar, and the pearls were continued on the ruffle around the neck and upon the heavy ruffling that fell over the hand. Two short, pointed panels of the pearl embroidery trimmed the skirt.

The sleeves were rather peculiar. They were shirred upon the inside seam and pulled up to give a puffed effect. Short gloves could be worn with this dress, or, as the style is here, none at all. The bridal veil was designed especially to go with this gown. It was of the thinnest chiffon, caught at the head with a beautiful ornament, which matched the embroidery upon the dress. Should the bridegroom in this case be so inclined he can substitute something of his own buying in the place of this pearl ornament.

You are hardly prepared for cloth wedding dresses, yet I can describe one to you that was certainly the prettiest thing that I have seen this year. It was of a very light-weight ladies' cloth, satin-faced, and not any one, even an expert, could tell it from heavy satin in the effect.

This skirt was elaborately trimmed with heavy lace, of the kind that looks as though it had been cut in a pattern. It was a kind of point lace, being undoubtedly made with the point of a needle, and yet it was not the Irish point. It was, perhaps, the new Brussels point, which you hear so much about. It was very open, so that you could put your fingers through the mesh anywhere. There was the heavy, pointed yoke, front and back, and a little bolero that began at the armholes and went around the sides and back. It was scarcely visible from the front, and hung most gracefully in the back.

Which costs most, a sick baby, or a package of Pearline? Without the Pearline, there's always the prospect of sickness, and perhaps worse for your baby or for any other baby. It comes from nursing bottles that are imperfectly washed. This is a source of infant trouble that can't be watched too closely. Pearline will set your mind at rest. Nothing washes them so thoroughly as Pearline. One of the largest makers of nursing bottles sends out circulars with his goods, recommending Pearline for washing. He is wise, for milk in any form cannot adhere to anything, if washed with Pearline. 520

INSURANCE

N. T. JAMES, formerly general agent of the Alliance, has been appointed city agent of the marine department of the General Insurance Company of Trieste, Austria.

Chas. McLane, Pacific Coast manager of the New York Life, is visiting the home office of the company.

The fiftieth anniversary of the Penn Mutual Life Insurance Company will be celebrated on the 25th of next month.

The North British and Mercantile Insurance Company, of London and Edinburgh, will follow the example of other British companies, and form an American company of the same name, with $200,000 capital and $100,000 surplus.

The tabulated results of fifty-five American life insurance companies, from their organization down to January 1, 1897, show that they have received in premiums $3,167,-380,734, which has been increased by interest and profit earnings to $4,013,126,352. Of this amount $1,246,378,340 is held in hand to provide for future obligations, and $2,043,858,429 have been distributed to policy holders and their beneficiaries.

Thornton Chase, superintendent of agencies for the Union Mutual Life, has been visiting the California agency. He returned to Chicago last Wednesday.

Mr. A. Dalton Harrison, manager of the Union Assurance Society of London, has gone to England for a three months' visit.

The Palatine Fire has deposited $100,000 with the Ohio Insurance Department.

The newly-elected officers of the Utah State Board of Fire Underwriters are Hugh Anderson, President, and E. W. Watson, Secretary.

The two biggest fire engines in the world belong to the Liverpool Fire Department.

The Mutual Life, of New York, will hereafter make no distinction between the sexes, so far as rates are concerned. Hitherto women have been compelled to pay $5 on the $1,000 more than men.

In the two $20,000 damage suits brought by the New York Life and the Mutual Life of New York against the Kansas Superintendent of Insurance for refusing them licenses to do business in Kansas, McNall's bondsmen are made co-defendants.

From the first day of last January up to February 27th, various English marine associations lost $10,000,000 in shipwrecks.

The Ocean Accident and Guarantee Corporation, Limited, of London, has absorbed the Marine Credit Guarantee Company of New York.

The First Municipal Bond Insurance Company of America has been organized in New York, with a capital of $1,000,000 and a surplus of $500,000.

Mr. Thos. W. Aisbitt, manager Coast Department National Life of Hartford, with headquarters at Louisiana, will be in this city until June.

The Senate bill authorizing the New York insurance companies to invest in the stock of other companies, has been signed by the Governor, and is now a law.

The cash in surrender value of life insurance policies will hereafter be assessed in Indiana.

The Frankfort will deposit $50,000 with the Ohio Insurance Department, and enter that State.

The Aetna Indemnity Company of Hartford has been organized.

Edward M. Needles, of the Penn Mutual Life, has resigned the presidency of that company, and is succeeded by H. F. West, formerly Vice President.

The Germania Life, the only American life insurance company doing business in Germany, will be ruled out of Prussia, owing to the New York retaliatory law.

D. E. Miles, of the London and Lancashire, is spending his vacation in Honolulu.

Manager L. B. Edwards, of the Manchester, is in Chicago.

E. S. Fowler, Pacific Coast manager of the Preferred Accident Insurance Company of New York, died at his home in Oakland last Tuesday. He had been here but three years, and was popular among his associates, besides making a most successful manager for his company.

A GOOD story comes from the Produce Exchange anent the threatening weather of the past week. At lunch in the University Club, last Monday, George P. Morrow, the ex-President of the Exchange, thought the prevalent cloudiness indicated rain, but Ed Eyre, with bearish instincts, said no.

"Tell you what, Eddie," said Morrow, "if you want to back your judgment, I'll lay you twenty that it rains before 1 o'clock to-morrow."

"That's a go!" said Eyre. "You can settle with me here at lunch."

During the next twenty-four hours there were clouds, no sun, but neither was there rain. George Morrow demanded no storm. All he asked was a trace—a single drop. When noon passed without precipitation from the hovering clouds he grew desperate. And then his inspiration came to him. It cost him only one dollar to induce a boy to walk several times slowly by the University Club with raised umbrella about 1 o'clock.

"You're a good thing, George," chaffed Eyre in the club a few minutes later. "Your own bet, too," he chuckled.

"I have not given up all hope yet. That cloud looks pretty black," replied Morrow hopefully. "But I tell you what I'll do," he added suddenly. "I'll give you $5 right now for your bet, and we won't go to lunch for ten minutes yet."

"Oh, no, George," was the sarcastic rejoinder, "I wouldn't take your money. Why, man, the bet is as good as won."

Morrow carelessly threw himself into an easy chair near the window, with his back to the glass. Eyre, following, glanced toward the street. He rubbed his eyes. The boy's umbrella was certainly up. It must be sprinkling. He had lost his bet!

"Well, Morrow," he said, trying to steady his voice, and silently praying that his friend would not turn around, "you can have that bet for two fifty if you like, seeing it's you."

Without a word Morrow passed over the amount of the compromise. At luncheon he ordered champagne, and they had more than one bottle.

"You had better sign these," he remarked casually at the end of the meal an hour later, tossing the lunch cards toward Eyre. "This little feast is on you."

"Why, what do you mean?" asked Eyre in surprise.

"Well, you see that boy with the umbrella—he is an unprincipled young scoundrel—put up a job on you."

What are known as observatory clocks are planted in several offices about town, all connected by a telegraphic circuit wire with the Western Union. They are all supposed to ring a bell simultaneously at noon, and perpetual motion is one of their properties. During an exciting scramble for water front jobs, one of these clocks, located in the office of the State Board of Harbor Commissioners, stopped, and a message was dispatched post haste to the headquarters of the telegraph company to seek the repair of the mechanism.

"That's a department charge," said Billy Martin, manager of the clock department, and incidentally of a number of wires and poles and things, when he received the complaint. "That clock is strung with wires to the sun, and it never stops itself. It would have kept going all right if you had not had so much nervous agitation in the office."

Not without some secret misgivings did George Hoffman, fresh from the University course in mineralogy, accept his father's commission to assume the active management of the Red Point mines in Nevada County. The miners were reputed a particularly hard crowd, and his friends thoughtfully predicted trouble for him. He arrived at the mines prepared for an unfavorable reception, and he was not disappointed. He determined to preserve a bold front, however, even when the gang, after a series of petty but annoying actions, openly jeered at his opinions, ignored his orders and worked about as they chose. The hardy mountaineers made no effort to conceal their contempt for the book-taught and youthful foreman. After a few days of this, and just as they were flattering themselves that they had "broke in de kid," young Hoffman caused them no little amazement by discharging every man in the mine. They marvelled at his nerve, but they were confident he would soon realize his dependence on them, for there were no other available miners in the district.

"No, thanks; I can swing a pick myself in the meantime, and in a few days, I shall have a new crew here," said George, as he refused the application for reinstatement of the malcontents, who perceived their mistake, and suddenly abandoning their dignity, made a wild break for cover.

He was as good as his word, and temporarily constituted himself the entire working force of the mine. When his new crew arrived, there was no necessity for a word on the subject of discipline. Hoffman now operates his mine, for the most part, from his comfortable offices in the Nevada Block, but when he goes up to the Red Point for a periodical inspection, he is greeted as a king by the hardy prospectors.

While travelling recently in a part of the country where his quaint costume was no identification, Joaquin Miller was regarded in silent adoration for a time by an old woman who was a fellow-passenger. She seemed anxious to speak to him, fidgeting about in her seat and sending imploring glances at the Poet of the Sierras. Finally she mustered up sufficient courage to address the old man with the long beard, and the curling locks which fell to his shoulders.

"Please,—will you,—may I—touch your hand?" she stammered, pleadingly.

"Why, certainly," replied Joaquin, as he extended his brawny fist. "But why should you wish to touch my hand?" he added, much gratified at this evidence of his widespread fame.

"Because—you look,—so much—like Jesus Christ," explained his admirer, slowly.

Joaquin is very fond of relating this story to his friends, a party of whom he recently entertained at his house on Oakland Heights. The poet had been dining much better than wisely, and finally collapsed.

"That old woman would hardly perceive the fancied resemblance if she could see Joaquin now," was the ill-mannered comment of one of the guests, as they made an unceremonious departure.

Three newspapermen have encountered the enemy, and he is theirs. Representing the three morning papers, they were simultaneously interviewing T. R. Price, the South African railroad king. While the four were talking together Tom Mein, agent of the London Exploration Company, entered the room. Mein is an ex-resident of Johannesburg, sinned in company with John Hays Hammond et al., was brought into captivity by Oom Paul and is now obliged to find an abiding place outside the Dark Continent. Journalistic comments on his career have given Mr. Mein an antipathy of a peculiarly healthy growth toward everything that is printed.

"Who are these fellows, Price?" he shouted, courteously. "Reporters are they? Well, look out for them. They'll garble you. They're no good! Look out for them, I say, or you'll regret it."

The suddenness of the attack caught the interviewers at a disadvantage. President Coe of the Press Club, who does hotels for the Call, was the first to recover his breath.

"Well, Mr. Mein," he said, significantly. "We may be hard game, but we have never been in jail."

"And we have not been exiled for treason," chirped "Birdie" Hunt.

"Nor fined for conspiracy," solemnly chanted Sam Ewing.

"You are well named, Mr. Mein," added "Birdie."

"And if—"

But the enemy had retreated, precipitately.

If there is one thing Judge John Hunt likes better than unwinding his reel, it is spinning a yarn. If anything can arouse him to greater enthusiasm than catching a fish, it is to catch a friend napping. The Judge went fishing on Sunday, and as he returned home late in the evening, he encountered Aleek Vogelsang on the train. The judicial costume caused no uncertainty. It was of the fish fishy.

"Well, Judge, what luck?" asked the Fish and Game Commissioner, with the erudition of the sportsman.

The jurist slowly opened his creel an inch or two, thrust in his hand, and produced a fish about four inches long.

"That is the smallest one I caught," he said modestly.

"Did you get many others?"

"Oh, yes," said Hunt, impressively. "By the way, I have to decide an important motion to-morrow."

"Let's see one of your big ones," persisted Vogelsang, not to be turned from the practical subject on hand by the sunny ways of the specious occupant of the Superior Bench.

The judicial arm again dived into the angler's basket, a small fish was momentarily held up for inspection, and then hastily consigned again to the depths of the creel.

"Yes, it's very import—" began Hunt again.

"Now, produce the biggest fish you caught," ordered Aleek, impatiently.

Very slowly and carefully was a fish brought to the light. Very quickly and suddenly was it popped back to its receptacle.

"I thought so," was Vogelsang's quiet comment. "It's the same fish."

Dressed with his usual elaborate attention to details, Henry Redington was descending the stairway of a California-street office building, the ancient interior of which was being rejuvenated by a corps of painters, a few days ago. He picked his way somewhat gingerly down the darkened stairs, his progress made doubly uncertain because of the dubious light from the entrance. In spite of all his precautions, he splashed into a large pot of paint, carelessly left in the middle of a step. From his waist to his heels, Henry's trowsers were instantaneously dyed a beautiful ceru, but his language was much darker.

After the painters had given the dabbler in futures a benzine bath so thorough that the corrosive liquid removed not only the paint from his trowsers, but likewise the skin from his legs, Redington was placed on the edge of the sidewalk to dry. John Dempster McKee passed by, without apparently having noticed the mishap, and to avoid comment on his helpless plight, Henry inquired unconcernedly if the other had noticed any one run foul of the paint.

"Well, I should say so," replied the bank cashier, who is somewhat shortsighted. "It was the funniest spectacle imaginable. I was passing a few minutes ago, while some fellow was coming down stairs, and the blithering idiot walked deliberately into a paint pot, splashing his clothes from head to foot! Served the duffer right, too; he should have watched his bearings."

Not for one moment does Dr. George L. Fitch cease to regard the woman suffrage movement with disfavor and its advocates with dislove. Passing a clothier's window with a brother medico, his attention was drawn to a placard which generously proclaimed that "These pants are only 85 cents. Worth $2."

"Happy Anna Shaw!" exclaimed Fitch, in seeming ecstasy. "That will be grand news for her. Victory is now within her reach! Equal rights for all! Hooray!"

J. J. Jamison, the jovial Assistant Grand Secretary of the Native Sons, the order now engaged in painting the Redwoods a still redder hue, is fond of a good time, and, with true Californian frankness, doesn't care who knows it. In the various entertainments promulgated by his especial parlor, Jamison is a leading spirit, and loses no opportunity to boom the parlor in question. The other day, just before the grand lodge convened, he met a reporter and buttonholed him confidentially.

"I say," said he with the engaging persuasiveness that has made him popular throughout the order, "give our parlor a good send-off, will you? We had a glorious time last night—big attendance, lots of enthusiasm and a splendid programme."

"What did you do?" asked the scribe.

"Oh, somebody made a speech and somebody else played a pino solo. Come to think of it, I believe there was a vocal solo, too. We had an elegant entertainment, though. Never had a bigger time in all my life," and the Grand Secretary beamed benignly at recollection of the previous evening's hilarity.

The reporter looked puzzled. "Wasn't there anything else on that programme?" he asked.

"Betcherlife, my boy!" was the enthusiastic response; "one hundred gallons of beer."

EFFECTS OF WAR ON AMERICAN GRAIN.

A CONTRACT by cable has just been made between an English syndicate and the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad to transport 5,000,000 bushels of wheat from Buffalo to New York. A New York Central standard freight engine will haul a train of fifty-five loaded cars, each of which, without load, weighs 30,000 pounds, and has a capacity of 60,000 pounds of grain. The weight of grain in such a train is 3,300,000 pounds. The weight of the cars is 1,650,000 pounds. Total weight of train loaded, 4,950,000 pounds. This means that it would require one hundred such trains to fulfill the above contract. The New York Central claim that they can land the whole amount in New York thirty hours after it is delivered to them in Buffalo.

PRINCESS Louise and her niece, the Duchess of Fife, are, according to a contributor to the April "Woman at Home," the two royal ladies who affect as much as circumstances will permit the role of private ladies. The former delights in the society of literary and artistic people, and one day her Royal Highness made arrangements to take a country drive with a distinguished literary lady. When about to start Princess Louise said: "I do not wish to be treated as a Princess. Pray let me drive with you just as any other of your lady friends would do." All ceremony was accordingly dropped, and the two ladies drove off a tête-à-tête, stopped at a village through which they passed to make purchases and call upon some poor people, and her Royal Highness confessed to having had an unusually delightful time in thus escaping from her rank.

THE Palace Hotel subscribed $250 to the boulevard fund last Thursday. This is not pointing the way, but leading it. Other hotels should see in Manager Kirkpatrick's action a pertinent and timely suggestion for personal application.

Moore's Poison Oak Remedy

cures Poison Oak and all skin diseases. The oldest and best remedy, which has cured thousands At all druggists.

BICYCLE Sunday racing begins at the Velodrome to-morrow, and a number of exciting events have been arranged for the opening day.

PROSPECTIVE brides are so busy with their trousseaux, and the helles in preparation of bewitching toilettes for their summer outing, they do not seem inclined to give time or thought for much else, and as a consequence it has been very quiet in social circles this week. The Woman's Congress drew a goodly sprinkling of society to its inaugural ceremonies on Monday morning, and the Tivoli was the great objective point to which all the fashionable folk of the city found their way on Monday evening to give welcome to Mr. Denis O'Sullivan, and incidentally enjoy his rendering of Shamus O'Brien.

Mrs. Jewett's tea last week was her final entertainment for the season, she and her family having gone to their country home in Sonoma County for a few weeks prior to a trip to Alaska. Mrs. M. R. Higgins gave a tea in her rooms in the Wenhan on Monday afternoon of this week. On Wednesday a very pleasant tea was given at the San Francisco Nursery for Homeless Children, on Harrison street. The Andrews concert at the C. A. Auditorium on Thursday evening was another fashionable crowd, the young beneficiary being a favorite in the swim. To-day Miss Wilkinson gives a tea at her home in Berkeley, and Mrs. W. A. Magee one at her residence in Fruitvale.

Church receptions the other side of the bay have been quite a fad of late. Among them was one given to the Rev. J. K. McLean on Tuesday evening, in the parlors of the First Congregational Church in Oakland, in celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of his pastorate, and on Thursday evening the ladies of Christ Church, of Alameda, gave a reception in honor of their newly arrived rector, the Rev. T. J. Lacey.

Weddings have not, however, failed, and this has been another week well filled up with them. The Coleman residence, on Post street, was the scene of the marriage of Miss Martha Washington Coleman and Mathias R. Fleischman last Sunday afternoon, the Rev. Dr. Nieto tying the nuptial knot beneath a floral hower placed in the how-window, in the presence of a large number of guests. The bride wore an exquisite gown of white organdie over white satin, a tulle veil held in place by a diamond sunburst, the gift of the groom, and she carried a bouquet of lilies of the valley. Miss Alice Oppenheim, as maid-of-honor, was gowned in lavender tulle over silk of the same hue, with pearl ornaments. The other attendants were Florence Cleve and Arthur Stoltre, and Louis Newherger, who was the groom's best man. An elaborate dejeuner followed the ceremony, and the young couple have been spending their honeymoon at Coronado.

Miss Adele Rottanzi and Professor J. B. Argenti were united in marriage by Father Mulligan at St. Mary's Cathedral at seven o'clock on Tuesday morning; Miss Ottie Sotarie was maid-of-honor and Frank Argenti best man.

Tuesday evening's wedding was at the residence of Mrs. Goodman on Post street, when her daughter Lillian and Leon Lewin, of San Salvador, were the bride and groom. The Rev. Dr. Nieto officiated, the ceremony being performed beneath a floral canopy, which was suspended by white ribbons held in the beaks of numerous white doves. The bride looked charmingly in a robe of rich white satin and point lace, and her tulle veil was fastened to her coiffure by a diamond sunburst. Dancing followed the elaborate supper which was served after the ceremony. On Wednesday the bride and groom departed for a year's tour abroad.

On Wednesday, at noon, Miss Elizabeth Vero Wate and Dr. James Albert Brown were married at St. John's Church on Valencia street, by Rev. Dr. Spalding, and the ceremony was followed by a reception at the home of the bride on Pierce street.

The wedding of Miss Loretta Cook and J. C. Appelwhite was a home one, at the residence of the bride's mother on Turk street, on the evening of the 23rd ult.

The marriage of Miss Grace Young and Francis Churchill Williams will be solemnized at the home of the bride-elect, on Pacific avenue, at half-past eight o'clock next Wednesday evening.

Mr. and Mrs. S. Schwartz, née Helen Sutro, who were recently married, left San Francisco last Sunday evening for Costa Rica, where they expect to remain for about two months. On their return here they will reside at the Sutro home on Pine street.

The engagement of Miss Hattie Bastheim, of this city, to Mr. L. Frankenheimer, of Stockton, has been announced.

Recent pleasant entertainments included Mrs. Thos. Watson's coaching party to San Mateo; Mrs. W. P. Buckingham's luncheon, at which twelve ladies were seated at table, and Mrs. J. F. Merrill's dinner, at which Miss Georgia Cayvan was chief guest. Last Saturday's affairs included the first "Meet" of the season at Burlingame and the opening of the yachting season by the Corinthian Club.

On Thursday afternoon Mrs. Lowenberg was the guest of the Philomath Literary Club at a high tea given in her honor at the Beethoven Hall. Mrs. Lowenberg has for many years been President of both the Century and Philomath Clubs, whose members have often been her guests; but this was the first chance the members of the Philomaths had of reciprocating. The affair lasted till late in the afternoon, and if numbers constitute a success it was indeed one, as well-nigh the entire membership was represented in the gathering.

The entertainment for the Children's Hospital and Training School for Nurses will begin on May 11th, continuing throughout the week, afternoons and evenings, at the house of Mrs. Clarke Crocker, corner of Sutter and Octavia streets. It will be very novel as well as instructive, being a sort of Midwinter Fair in miniature. There will be varied entertainments afternoons and evenings, and Wednesday and Saturday afternoons will be specially devoted to children. There will be an Oriental Room, an Art Treasure Room, where Toby Rosenthal's last picture will be on exhibition, and an Indian Room, in which there will be specimens of Indian work, baskets, blankets, etc., from Oonalaska to Mexico. In the grounds, which will be illuminated at night, there will be a shooting gallery, kinelescope, anamatiscope, etc. It is to be hoped the public will generously respond for the many sick children for whom the lady managers are working so hard. Admission to the house and grounds will be 50 cents in the evening and 25 cents in the afternoon.

The news of the appointment of Lieutenant Cloman to succeed Lieutenant Winn as Military Instructor at Berkeley has been received with much favor by our helles who, while regretting the loss of one favorite, will be glad to welcome back another. It is probable that Lieutenant Winn will go abroad for a vacation when his term of duty at Berkeley expires in August. Another Army Officer popular with our helles, Lieutenant Strother, is at present stationed at New York as Aid to the newly appointed Commanding General, Wesley Merritt, who is General Ruger's successor at that post.

The summer resorts are all preparing for the coming season and "Opening days" will soon be in order. Society as yet seems to be rather undecided as to which shall be the place selected by them for their locale, but the Hotel Rafael is decidedly in the lead as favorite, and from now on a steady stream of guests may be looked for, the hegrira having already begun, and what is something new over there, the arrivals include a long list of Eastern visitors. The Whittell's have gone to the Hotel Rafael for the season, and Mrs. J. A. Folger goes over next week. Mr. and Mrs. D. N. Walter will also spend the summer there. We may soon now have a visit from Mrs. Harold Sewall who as Miss Millie Ashe was such a popular helle in our swim. Mr. Sewall has received the appointment as Minister to Hawaii and they will of course spend some time here en route to Honolulu.

The last assembly and german of the seventh season of the Entre Nous Cotillion took place at the Palace Hotel last evening, and was most enjoyable. Three beautiful and intricate figures were danced "Parisian Novelty," "Grecian Cross, and "Sleigh Bells." The german was led by Sanford G. Lewald and Miss Mabel Hollis. Those in the first set were Mr. and Mrs. George D. Graham, Edward G. Carrera and Miss Emily Herzer, W. W. Funge, Jr., and Miss Louise Hoppner, Mr. and Mrs. Chas. W. Spalding, A. H. Meussdorffer and Miss Leah Young, Geo. W. Craig and Miss Beatrice Hughes, Wm. Westfeld and Miss Mizpah Frederich, J. J. De Haven and Miss M. T. Alexander, Mr. and Mrs. Jas. P. Whitney, Robert F. Haight and Miss Felice Kingsford, Herman H. Herzer and Miss Frances Burtou, Wm. G. Barr and Miss Emma Prosek, Chester Judah and Miss Mae Folsom, Wm. Hochseher and Miss Sadie Gardner, H. C. Warwick and Miss Nellie G. Martland. The eighth season of the club will commence early the coming winter.

Arrivals have been quite numerous of late, including Mrs. Daggett who comes to be present at the wedding of her sister Miss Ethel Cohen; Mr. and Mrs. Henri Kahn who have spent the last two years in Paris, and Mrs. and Miss Delmas from a lengthened absence abroad. Miss Alice Boggs is looked for to-morrow after an absence of several months in the East. Mrs. and Miss Blakeman and Miss Ethel Keeney are expected home in a few days. Dr. and Mrs. W. J. Younger will come out in June from their Chicago home to visit their daughters during the heated term of the East. Mrs. L. F. Ralston has been the guest of her son, W. C. Ralston, at Georgetown for some weeks past.

Mr. and Mrs. Jno. D. Spreckels have gone East for a visit of several weeks. The Rev. W. H. and Mrs. Moreland, left last week for a visit to relatives in South Carolina. Other recent departures included ex-Senator C. N. Felton; Mr. and Mrs. Rounseville Wildman for the other side of the continent, and Mr. and Mrs. Homer S. King for the City of Mexico. Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Watson are on the eve of departure for a trip to Oregon.

Mr. and Mme. Adolphe Roos have been giving a series of dinners. One of these took place on Tuesday evening last at their home on Post street, and, like the others, proved itself a most delightful affair. While Mme. Roos has long been looked upon as a queen of hostesses, Roos, senior, took this occasion to tender his guests the choicest selections from his cellar, which is stocked with rarest old wines. The decorations, as usual, were rich, and were beautified by the handsome background the house itself affords. Covers were laid for twenty.

Tuesday, the 11th of May, is the date finally set for the opening of the "gingerbread fête" for the benefit of the Children's Hospital. Next on the tapis is the concert which the Saturday Morning Orchestra will give on the 15th of May at Golden Gate Hall, under the direction of W. A. Sabin, which will be for the benefit of the Episcopal Old Ladies' Home; and Mr. Denis O'Sullivan has promised his valuable assistance.

Rumor has it that the Calliopean Club is not to be outdone by its older brothers, nor will it let summer interfere with its entertainments. President Triest has been anxiously scouring the country for a suitable place where the members and their lady friends may enjoy a pleasant day's outing and seclusion from the city's turmoil.

A SMOOTH and velvet skin is an essential to beauty, or even good looks. Dr. Dupuis, at 713 Post street, near Jones, treats these hemishes and facial disfigurements on scientific principles, and has given permanent relief and perfect satisfaction to many of the ladies of this city. Information gladly given by the Doctor, or Mrs. Dupuis, at their office.

The season of jollity, dinners, weddings, suppers, and banquets is at hand. Max Abraham, the popular caterer, of 428 Geary street, is the busiest man in town. His knowledge of his art is complete, and he is in demand at almost every swell function in the city. He takes complete charge, with the happiest results to all concerned.

The Rio Grande Western Railway and connections are offering low rates and superior accommodations to all points East. Before purchasing tickets, call at 14 Montgomery street.

TO KNOW HOW.

"SUNDAY'S a dull day," remarked Elton.
 "Yes. What are you going to do this afternoon?"
 inquired Tibbets from the other side of the club-stove.
 "I think I'll take in the Louvre," answered Elton.
 "Want to come?"

"No. I'm going for a stroll on the Champs-Élysées."
 So they met, an hour later, in Miss Auber's drawing-room, on the Rue Boccador.
 "I suppose you've both been working hard all the week," said Miss Auber.
 "Work," Elton said, airily, "in Bohemia! It's a country of play."

"What do you do in that giddy land?"
 "Live. To work is to exist."
 "How nice!" Miss Auber exclaimed, "I must go exploring over there."
 "H'm. I wouldn't," Elton answered. "I don't think you'd—I mean I fear they would not appreciate you."
 "I know I am not very clever."
 "Ab, modesty has a great charm. But you see, while they admire beauty, they are apt to be prejudiced critics of the spiritual."

"And she weighs one hundred and forty," remarked
 Miss Auber's cousin.
 "I don't either, Tom. But, by the way, Mr. Elton, you intend something for the Salon, do you not?"

"Certainly."
 "Aren't you doing anything on it?"
 "A little; but there's more than time in a picture."
 "Still, you might spend more on it. Just think how you'd feel if your work was refused!"
 "I have no fear," said Elton, confidently. "They accepted a piece last year that I had skimmed off in a few weeks."

"Is there nothing beyond acceptance to be had at the Salon?" inquired Miss Auber's cousin, whose name was Jones.

"O, mentions and medals come in due season. 'I'm so young that if I took one now it might dull my ambition.'
 "Don't permit such as that to occur," said Mr. Jones.
 "May I smoke?"

"Certainly," responded Miss Auber. "Won't you all do so? I enjoy the odor of tobacco. Here's a match. Mr.
 Tibbets—I'm sure you deserve one for listening to us so long. You have been working, I know."

"Yes," said Tibbets, "I have."
 "And is your picture for the Salon?"
 "I hope to have it exhibited."

"Nothing more than hope?" Mr. Jones asked.
 "No."
 "That's refreshing. But I must be off now, Maude.
 Good-day, gentlemen."

"Well," he continued, as he turned into the Avenue de l'Alma, "a woman with two minds and two men with one each. A comedy that needs no funny man."

* * * * *

It came about at a dance. Mr. Jones, with cousinly forethought, had left Miss Auber to sit alone in a secluded place while he went off to the smoking room. On the other side of a screen which hid her were two young women students from the Latin Quarter, busy tearing people up.

"Did you see that awfully handsome Mr. Elton at the club dance, the night before last?" asked the fair girl in blue.

"Yes. Isn't he lovely! I danced with him three times," answered the sweet thing in yellow, red, pink, green, and every other color that could be put into five feet three inches.

"They say he's such a great painter."
 "And he's got lots of money."
 "Altogether very eligible. I heard he was in love with a wealthy American girl on this side of the river."

"Yes, but he's got a rival, that What's-his-name? who can't say a word, and only sits and stars—oh, Tibbets."
 "Is that why Mr. Elton sticks so closely to him? But I don't see what he's got to fear from Mr. Tibbets. He looks like an old-clothes shop."

"No one is negative to jealousy, my dear. But Mr. Elton will be sure to get her. He knows how."

"They say he's rather gay."
 "Yes; I heard he went down to the Café d'Harcourt the other night, and—"

When Mr. Jones returned he found Miss Auber sitting alone near the screen, gnawing her fan.

* * * * *

"You're not looking very well this afternoon," said Miss Auber.

"No," answered Tibbets, "I'm feeling blue."
 "It was too bad of them to refuse your picture."

"How did you know?"
 "Oh, Mr. Elton was here last evening." She smiled.

"Did he tell you?"
 "Yes."

"And that his work had been accepted?"
 "Yes."

"And that Carolus Duran has said that he'll probably receive a medal?"

"Yes."
 "And that he expected to go home soon?"

"Yes."
 "Did he say anything else?" he asked very earnestly.

"Yes." Her smiles had increased.
 "Then I won't." He arose.

"Why not?" Her smiles vanished.
 "What's the use?" he asked, wearily.

"If I had anything to say," she said, decidedly, "I'd say it."

"Then I will."
 And he did.—EDWARD BEDLOE MENDUM, in Quartier Latin.

ANCIENT RUSSIAN JEWELS.

AMONG the most precious jewels in the treasury of the Russian imperial family are a few relics of olden times which are no longer used. The old hereditary crown of the Russian czars is one of the most interesting and at the same time one of the handsomest of these antique pieces.
 It is worked in wonderfully fine gold filigree, says the Jeweler's Circular, bearing on the top a massive golden cross, the four ends of which are adorned by large and very valuable pearls. The upper part of the crown is formed of a large topaz, a sapphire and a ruby set between three large pearls. The lower part of the crown, consisting of eight fields, is adorned with four immense emeralds and four rubies, about twenty-four pearls set in golden caps surrounding these gems. Like all Russian crowns, this crown is bordered at the bottom with beautiful sable fur, and on the inside lined with red silk. It is a notable work of art. The most interesting piece, probably, is the old imperial orb with a large cross. No less than 58 diamonds, 89 rubies, 23 sapphires, 50 emeralds and 37 beautiful pearls go to make it the magnificent jewel it is. Miniatures painted in enamel adorn the orb. The pictures in the four fields represent the anointment of David; his victory over Goliath, his return from the fight and David pursued by Saul. Between these miniature symbolic figures of heraldic animals are arranged. They are the eagle, lion, griffin and unicorn. This orb authentically belongs to the period of the latter Byzantine Empire and was brought to Russia from Constantinople probably in the eleventh century.

THE official stamp of the great World's Columbian Exposition, since sustained by the Supreme Court, gave the final award to the Anheuser-Busch Brewing Association for the quality of its beer. This beer has stood the test of experience and time, and the efforts that are made by belated competitors to obscure the facts or to deceive the public, are futile and useless.

LOVE'S LARCENY.

As Cupid, on a summer's day,
In idle sport was flitting
From place to place, he chanced to stray
Near where my love was sitting.

"Now, here's a face," Dan Cupid cried,
To shake my filial duty,
For mother Venus foudns her pride
On far inferior beauty;

"I'll paint a picture, ere I go,
Of these enchanting features,
And thus admiring Gods shall know
The loveliest of their creatures!"

From out his quiver then he drew
His palette and his brushes;
Then from a rose-leaf stole the hue
To paint my lady's blushes;

To catch the color of her eyes
He hesitated whether
To rob the violet, or the skies,
Or blend their tints together.

That problem solved, another vexed
His mind, and set them racking
His feather-brains, for sore perplexed,
He found his canvas lacking.

Impatient to display his art
(His subject well excused it),
The roguish God purloined my heart
And as a canvas used it!

LOVE AND MAYTIME.—NATHAN HASKELL DOLE, IN CURRENT LITERATURE.

LOVE, gentle Love, I am weary of waiting!
Why hast thou lingered so long on the way!
Birds 'mid the hoshage are wooing and mating,
It is May!

Cold was the winter with snow-plumy pinions,
Holding our hearts in his insolent sway.
Now he has gone to his icy dominions.
It is May!

Brooks down the hillsides are leaping and singing—
What makes their laughter so-rollicking gay?
Why are the hedges with merriment ringing?
It is May!

Love, gentle Love, I would welcome thee gladly,
Yet far aloof from my roof thou dost stray.
I cannot sing, for my song would sound sadly.
It is May!

Come, gentle Love, bring me joy without measure,
Make me thy debtor this jubilant day!
Here is my heart in exchange for thy treasure.
It is May! It is May!

—MEMORY.—CHARLES C. NOTT JR., IN SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE FOR MAY.

Upon a night long after I had died
I rose and passed the portals of Her heart,
Therein no wreck nor ruin I espied,
But fair and quiet its dim-lit chambers lay
And a sweet silence breathed in every part.
And I, who once had dwelt there, stood and sighed
And thought, "While I have slept in the cold clay,
How soon the stains of grief were washed away,
That soon some tenant new might here abide."
And as I thought, one quietly entered in,
And in his hand a key to every door.
I bowed my head and turned away and said:
"Pardon me if I return here from the dead;
I dwell here once, though I dwell here no more."
But he the keys did place my hands within,
And said, "Whate'er thy steward's is, is thine;
My name is Memory, and this place is mine."

CLOSE TO SPRINGTIME.—FRANK L. STANTON, IN THE CHAPERONE.

Gittin' close to springtime—know it by the way
The sun is streamin', gleamin' in the middle o' the day;
Know it by the river that is lazyin' along,
An' the mocking-birds a-primpin' o' their feathers fer a song.

Gittin' close to springtime—know it by the signs;
Hear it the whisper o' the maples an' the pines;
Feel it in the blowin' o' the breezes, singin' sweet;
See it in the daisies just a-dreamin' at my feet.

Gittin' close to springtime—hope she'll come to stay;
Got a million kisses for the red lips o' May.
Wearyin' to meet her, list'nin' all the time
Fer the twinkle o' her footsteps, her roses an' her rhyme.

LONGING.—VALERIC KOHUT, IN CHAPERONE MAGAZINE.

I lean from my western window,
As darkness falls on the sea,
And the white sails pass in the distance,
Stately and proud and free.

To what fair ports are they tending;
To what fair lands do they go;
As their white wings fade in the twilight
And die in the afterglow?

My spirit yearns with a looqing,
Never to be expressed,
To follow the paths they are tracing,
Toward the distant, luminous west.

Forever and ever to journey,
Toward the gleam of the evening star,
Toward the luminous west in the distance,
Tender and faint and far.

PICTURESQUE SAN FRANCISCO.

A BEAUTIFUL specimen of Chinese carving appears in this issue of the NEWS LETTER, in the shape of a bedroom set, purchased years ago by Senator Stanford, and now owned by his widow. It is without doubt the most interesting, elaborate, and artistic work of the sort in the country; and is very valuable. The entire series of these Chinese subjects are furnished by Taber, and that one which was given last week—a Chinese opium den—by an oversight failed to give credit to him.

THE investigation of Police Court methods of releasing prisoners upon personal recognizance, in the hope of curing the evil, will be likely to accomplish very little good. The aim of the Grand Jury is commendable; but it were better engaged in attempting the possible.

THE boulevard fund is still below the mark necessary to the completion of that fine road upon the plan originally intended. The wheelmen, from whom something handsome was expected, have signally failed to come forward. No concerted effort has been made by them, notwithstanding the fact that the boulevard will contribute directly to the pleasure of every person about the city who rides a bicycle.

AN example of the influence of organized effort in municipal matters is found in the work being accomplished by the various improvement clubs throughout the city. The latest to enter the field is the Mission Club. The Mission has been sadly neglected in everything aside from the collection of taxes, and an organized demand is now made for a division of the moneys paid into the City Treasury. The fact is, the tax-eaters have only been dividing with the Western Addition, and supplemental provision will have to be made for that part of the city lying south of Market street.

WITHIN the last year a half dozen penny-purchase Clubs have been started—and stopped—in this city, every burst-up being followed by wild outcries of those who have become members—and also victims. The daily press of Wednesday recorded the last failure of one of these penny-purchase agencies. Doubtless the necessity of purchase of a penny's worth of brains as an original investment, never presented itself to the members of these clubs.

THE Southern Pacific has made arrangements to give the fruit growers of this State excellent freight service, in getting their products to the Eastern markets. Special fast fruit trains made up of refrigerator cars will be hurried through with the utmost dispatch—reaching Chicago at an early hour in the morning for immediate distribution, and points further East will be handled in the same satisfactory manner. California's fruit crop promises to be large, while unfavorable weather beyond the Rocky Mountains will greatly curtail the home supply. This new arrangement means many thousands of dollars to the fruit growers of California.

THE Rev. Dr. McLean of the Congregational faith has reached the conclusion that there are too many churches. This good minister at a meeting of his co-laborers declared that there are one hundred more churches in this State than there should be; and that "if they should die off it would be the best thing for the Kingdom of God." The Dr. claims that there should be more inter denominational unity; that religion should be of more importance than any sect or creed. All true. But with our friends, the ministers, it is always the other fellow's denomination that should be sacrificed. The Dr. is facing in the right direction; but we fear that the hundred ministers and Satau would object.

THE ladies of the recent Woman's Congress are making more of the breach of the peace between an Indian night robe and the United States than the occasion warrants. The character of the Congress was an abundant guarantee that the hitherto distinguished guest of the ladies received the respectful attention and courtesy due his rank. That the bucking B. Bodarhoskshu lost his temper and his manners should be no concern of theirs. The young man of the nightgown should have been cordially spanked and sent to bed.

THOSE who have investigated the mysteries of hypnotism, say that in the hands of irresponsible and unscrupulous persons it may be made a potent influence for evil. During the present week an instance of hypnotic power has illustrated the uses to which it may be put. It became necessary for the parents of a boy eighteen years old to obtain a warrant for their son's arrest before they were able to rescue him from the clutches of Dr. H. M. Thornton, in whose "hypnotic institution" he was profitably used as a "subject." If the allegations concerning this institution be true, its proprietors should be given an opportunity to study their occult science in quiet and at the city's expense.

THE Directors of the Merchants' Association have adopted resolutions favoring the transfer of the municipal $3000 appropriation for celebration of the Fourth of July to the boulevard fund. These gentlemen represent nearly one thousand of the leading business firms of San Francisco, and the Supervisors should accept their opinion as the conclusive voice of the people. They should not hesitate, if the transfer can be legally accomplished. Three thousand dollars' worth of valuable, permanent improvement with incidental bread and meat for deserving labor, against a day of windy chestnuts, distracting tumult, brass-banding and meaningless parade! There is no room for honest argument here.

THE giving of a silver service to that noble patriot, Samuel Rainey, by his admirers in the Fire Department demonstrates the fact that gratitude has not yet fled the earth. Mr. Rainey was the virtual (not virtuous) author of the legislation which increased the salaries of the department, and added another straw to the back of the ass—that docile animal in this instance being the people of San Francisco, who tamely submit to the burdens of the place-hunters, the politicians and their unclean benchmen. The resolutions which accompanied the silver service give an added flavor to the offering of the appreciative firemen; and they are simply returning service for service when they chip in for a memorial celebrating the venality of a legislature and the adroitness of a rogue.

AS the windy season advances, the great need of sprinkling the principal streets is again pressed upon the public attention, and into the public's eyes, and hair, and nostrils. The present street sprinkling combine is a most unjust, unequal, and monstrous grab. Some merchants pay $5 per week, where others who have equal frontage and have the same service, pay but half as much, or even less. The whole arrangement is a fraud on the public, who are outraged by it, the store keepers who pay for it, and a disgrace to San Francisco which allows it. The sprinklers in some manner—certainly not by the giving of bribes—defeated the efforts of the Merchants' Association to have the sweeping and sprinkling done by the same contractor, and as a result the filth deposited on the streets is literally forced down the throats of those who walk abroad.

HAWAIIAN RECIPROCITY DOOMED.

THAT reciprocity which is genuine is a most excellent thing. That which is reciprocity merely in name is a fraud, and in fact a downright steal. It is obtaining something for nothing, and securing benefits by false representations. The Hawaiian planters loot the people of the United States out of about $4,000,000 a year in the shape of rebated sugar duties. Since 1890 the sugar duty remitted has amounted to $24,586,900; the duty remitted in Hawaii on goods arriving from this country has in the same period amounted only to $1,848,600, or nearly 12 times greater benefit to that country than to our own. That kind of reciprocity is like Mr. Curran's cheek. Coming into Court one morning with the side of his face greatly swollen, the judge who, by the way, always ruled for the crown, said: "I congratulate the prisoner on the counsel he has this morning; you will today surpass yourself as a pleader, Mr. Curran." "How is that?" quoth the eminent counsel. "Because you have plenty of cheek, Mr. Curran," replied the impertinent and always unfair man on the Bench. Promptly came the retort that "as times go I think my cheek would better qualify me for a Judge." "How is that?" queried Lord Clonmel, for it was he who was on the Bench. Quick as a flash Mr. Curran flung back the retort: "because my cheek is all on one side, my Lord." Just so it is with Hawaiian reciprocity. It is all for a small band of island planters, and nothing for the people of the United States. Since the treaty first went into operation we have given that hand remitted sugar duties to the amount of $80,478,272. It is a mighty sum to have put around among such a pack of hungry and ungrateful wolves! No wonder that these tropical weaklings are becoming rich beyond any needs or merits of their own.

Whilst all this is true, it is also true that we have an infant but promising industry that needs fostering and caring for. Our great valleys are proving preëminently fitted for the growth of the sugar beet. There is no reason on earth, except the so-called Hawaiian reciprocity, why all that region of our country West of the Missouri, should not be supplied with home made sugar. Its production means employment to many millions of capital, and to hundreds of thousands of laborers. From every stump the doctrine has gone forth that we must above all things preserve the home market for the home producer. That is the key stone of our whole tariff policy at present. To extend protection to Hawaiian sugar, as against our own, means the making of foreign planters rich, at the expense of what otherwise can be made the greatest industry of our State. The Hawaiians are gorged with our 80 millions of remitted duties. They are now abundantly able to go it alone, and should be permitted to do so. They have the wide world for a market and are very well able to compete in it. There is no hardship in letting them do so.

The Senate appears resolved to follow nearly the course, in regard to this matter, which the NEWS LETTER has for many years advocated with vigor and effect. It perpetrates a mistake, however, when it hesitates to make a clean sweep of this wretched Hawaiian treaty business. There is no logical reason why Hawaii should still be made a present of $\frac{1}{2}$ of a cent per pound. Her trade will come here anyhow, because she has nowhere else to go with that part of it which already comes to us. Our law-makers are worried to find revenue and are at their wits ends to make the National ledger balance. In view of that condition of things there is no sense in sending away to the islands \$1,500,000 per year for nothing. It is high time that our charity began at home. The population of the islands is but 109,000. Of these 24,407 are Japanese, 21,616 are Chinese, and 15,191 are Portuguese, whilst 47,806 are Kanakas. There are but about 8,000 people of other nationalities, consisting mainly of Americans, English and Germans. Except the latter and there is little hope of finding among such a population a further purchasing power for our products. Moreover, theirs is not a kind of population that we should care to help at the expense of our own. Looking at this question from every practical standpoint, and more particularly holding in view the interests and prosperity of this State, the treaty should be abrogated. The Islands are near enough at 2200 miles.

Will Durrant Be Governor Budd, may, if he so chooses, Hanged, Or Not? take council with the Board of Prison Directors, as a counsel of advice merely, as to whether Theodore Durrant should be hanged, or imprisoned for life. But the responsibility for ultimate action rests with him and him alone. It is a terrible responsibility, very hard to bear, and should render the Guernatorial office unendurable to sensitive minds. There are ugly duties to perform in this world, and as somebody has got to be hanged, it is necessary that someone should be equal to the emergency. The late Governor Booth was not. His clear intellect believed the man guilty, but his hand felt as if it had become paralyzed, and his heart forbade the signing of the warrant. When the time came he couldn't do it, and signed a reprieve instead. He sought the forbearance of his critics, said it was a plenary power placed in his hand for the use of which he was responsible to no one but his God, before whom he some day expected to plead for mercy for himself. He begged those inclined to condemn him to first put themselves in his place. For the moment public feeling was against him but, ere long, the great heart of the State went out towards him, and said he had done right. Newton Booth lost nothing by that reprieve, and it may be believed that the God before whom he has since gone has held it as a sin against him.

We are not, however, of those who believe, with Victor Hugo, that "the worst use a State can put a man to is to hang him." We believe that if by hanging him such a deterrent, example is set as to prevent nine other murders; the greatest good to the greatest number is accomplished by the hanging. John Stuart Mill, the most sympathetic humanitarian this age has produced, being elected to the House of Commons for the great constituency of Westminster, made his first and perhaps his best speech on the subject of capital punishment. Up to that time there had been annual motions for the repeal of the extreme penalty and the time had arrived when it was believed that the repeal would surely carry. Mr. Mill rose to his full strength and delivered an address so full of sound philosophy, that from that day to this no one has ventured to renew the subject in the House of Commons. He showed from well determined statistics that the deterrent example of hanging was the only proven preventive of murder. It saved lives, and those the innocent and the best ones. We do not pretend to any occult knowledge of what will be the final decision in Durrant's case, but there are two signs that appear to us indicative. His parents are self-contained and apparently satisfied, as if they were resting upon a promise, and Governor Budd is casting around among Prison Directors and others to procure aid in bearing the responsibility of a reprieve with him. Public opinion is clearly in favor of permitting the law to take its course.

Farmers and The law directing the Harbor Commission-
Commission ers to establish and put in operation a free Merchants. market at some convenient point on the water front, and the real or apparent inactivity of those officials, has awakened earnest inquiry among the growers of garden truck and fruit, the season for which is now at hand. The NEWS LETTER has been, and is now, an advocate of a free market for this specific purpose. where the grower and the consumer may be brought together. But it will not do to assume because in this matter the middle man may be ignored that the principle applies with equal force in other directions.

As a matter of fact, and as a general rule, the farmer looks upon the merchant, the commission man, and the agent who stands between him and the consumer, as a privileged character—a sort of licensed robber, who sits in his office all day over schemes how he may gouge the seller and defraud the buyer of the articles in which he deals. The farmers imagine that all their ills are the result of studied intent upon the part of the merchant; and whenever half a dozen of these sons of toil assemble in the grange or at the corner store, they pass sanguinary resolutions condemning the city merchant as a Cræsus—a sort of hold huccaneer who wrongfully piles up as his thousands the money which by right of creation belongs to them. The markets and the merchants—which to the average farmer are convertible—he holds are put up with a definite design to get his products for half of their worth and sell them for double their value. No class of people are so intolerant or so dumb to the appeal of reason. Their experience comes out of the ground with their grain, rather than from the world where their harvests find a market. The legitimate and all-powerful law of supply and demand has no place in their economy, and all their misfortunes are promptly charged up to the commission merchants, who live on the fat of the land by fleecing the simple-minded and innocent tiller of the fruitful soil. The cause of this misapprehension lies in the mercurial temperament of the farmer as applied to prices, and intolerance of combines in any other direction than his own. Let the telegraph announce an advance in grain or dried fruits, or let the forecast for short foreign yield reach him, and he walks on air—fancies that he owns the world and the merchant in the bargain. When the result does not materialize, he seeks the commission dealer as the object of his wrath, the cause of all his misfortunes. This fact has been proved over and over again in San Francisco. The commission merchant is as necessary a part and parcel of the business routine of to-day as the railroad and the steamship. He is the invaluable and unavoidable connecting link between the farmer and the consumer. He simplifies the problem of sale and purchase; and instead of clogging the wheels of commerce is the ready lubricant that smoothes the way. The efforts that are from time to time made by the producers to override the established lines of trade and enjoy the fancied wealth of the commission barons, are always met by crushing and disheartening failure. The organizations of farmers who feel that they are simply wearing their lives and lands out for the enrichment of the merchant, should look at the merciless competitions of the city, the money involved, and the chances taken by those who stand between their granaries and the mills and mouths of Europe. And lastly, if the complaining and incredulous farmer were to apply the method and precision, the intelligence and judgment, to his acres that the commission dealer does to his business, he would find himself to blame for nearly all his misfortunes.

After the Pure Food Congress. The Pure Food Congress has met, had a good time, and adjourned without accomplishing much worth placing on record. It simply relegated the pure food question to the different Boards of Health, which in effect leaves the whole subject matter just about where it is. Much more is needed. The Boards of Health are very well in their way, but they are not so constituted as to take up this matter and push it until pure food is everywhere the rule rather than the exception. Medical gentlemen have not the time nor the aptitude required for the active performance of the duties involved. Unsalaries officers as they are, too much is already expected of them. The way to do a thing is to do it. The way to regulate the sale of the food of the people is no new thing. It is now, and long has been in successful operation in most countries we know. New York has a very excellent department in operation, and Ohio has a still better one. What is needed is a thoroughly equipped department, with a few energetic detectives to procure samples, a few analytical chemists, and earnest prosecuting officers. We cannot do better than pattern after the plans that are elsewhere in successful operation. A State department is found to work better than a municipal one. Local "pulls" and influences are less potent in the former case than in the latter. California, of all places in the world, has need of food inspection. We export largely, and it is essential that our customers should be guaranteed genuine articles.

The Tariff Mixture. The party now in power is in dire straits over its tariff mixture. Chairman Dingley admits that imports are being rushed in at such a rate that little or no revenue will be realized through the Custom Houses for over a year. Thus, if no change were made, the deficiency would go on increasing, which would mean the political ruin of the new administration. Accordingly, the tariff, as it left the House, has been thrown aside, and a substantially new measure improvised by the Senate. Protection for protection's sake, which was the cry of the campaign, has been practically abandoned, and the additional revenue needed is now to be almost solely raised from internal products. The tax on beer has been raised to $1.50 a barrel. On tobacco it has been raised from six to eight cents a pound. Hides are to bear one and one-half cents a pound. Sugar is to pay one and one-half cents, with a differential in favor of Hawaii and other countries with which we have reciprocal arrangements, of one-eighth of a cent per pound. Lead ore is to be dutiable at one and one-half cents per pound. Tea, which is now on the free list, is to bear ten cents per pound. The higher grades of wool have been reduced. The free list has been greatly enlarged and now exceeds that of the Wilson tariff. Of 1000 changes made in the House bill, nearly all represent cuts. And so it comes that the need for revenue is driving McKinleyism as near as possible into free trade. It is a most curious condition that confronts the party in power, the outcome of which will be watched with more than passing interest. The long-drawn-out discussion upon the tariff seems doomed to reach a most wondrous, strange, and impotent end. These changes are what the Republicans have up to date agreed upon, but their opponents have yet to be heard from. The Democratic members of the finance committee of the Senate will not agree to the proposition of their Republican colleagues to allow the tariff bill to be reported back without being discussed by the full committee. In this it seems to us that they are only doing the duty for which they were put upon the committee. If a majority of a committee may prepare a bill in secret, and the minority then withdraw, and agree that it shall be reported without their looking into it or considering whether it is good or bad, or what kind of measure they themselves would recommend, there is obviously no reason for their being on the committee at all. The object of having the different parties represented on the committees is that a thorough preparation shall be made for debate. Hence, there is much talk ahead over the tariff, and in view of the state of parties in the Senate, it is pretty certain that further changes will yet be made in the bill before it can become a law. At the Reform Club banquet, which took place just two weeks ago, Senator McCaffery indicated what was coming in this tariff matter in language that seems to mean a reconstruction of parties. He said: "There are many Republicans who do not believe in erecting the 'Chinese wall' of protection so high as both to keep out foreign imports and to keep in domestic manufactures. These forces ought to unite with the gold Democrats for the weal of a common country, whose prosperity lies so close to their hearts." Importers are paying little or no attention in the retroactive clause, because they know that it is utterly illegal. There can be no authority for collecting taxes not yet authorized by law.

The Cause of Spain's Weakness. If Spain had kept her forests she might now easily keep Cuba. When her woods were cut away she lost her springs and rivers; therewith she lost her farms and schools and arts; her population diminished, her initiative disappeared; therefore she is to-day a weak nation, unrecognized among the powers. All this is the truth of history, and should bring home to the people of the United States an important lesson. We are denuding our forests at an alarming rate; for which senseless act of spoliation those who are to come after us will pay only too dearly. Keep the forests that we may have rivers, keep the birds that we may have crops, and we shall continue to be a great people. Save the big trees, save the redwoods, the pines, the spruce, and all the rest of the forest giants, and then the rains will come in due season, the soil will bring forth abundantly, and wealth will remain and increase throughout all our borders. Let us learn all this from the present impoverished condition of old Spain. She will lose Cuba because she has no money. Her debts are crushing her worse than are the arms of the Cubans.

Overman Brown Reinstated. The Chicago Congregational Conference has voted fellowship to the notorious C. Overman Brown. To be sure, the majority was not great. Sixty-seven members voted for Brown, whilst fifty seven voted against him. This is doing pretty well for Chicago. It shows that the immoral congregationalists only exceed the moral ones by hardly nine per cent. Of course if that showing were for the whole population it would not be so bad, but as it applies to a picked assemblage of strict religionists, it shows that Congregationalism in the windy city is not what it ought to be. It is enough, however, to save it from the application of the words that were applied to Sodom and Gomorrah: "there was none found good there, not one." The Chicago Conference, it is to be presumed, knew Brown's character, or they had no right to pass upon it. Knowing it, they have condoned in a clerical brother the sins of adultery, perjury, and subornation of perjury. The public trial held here in San Francisco, which was reported with great fulness in the daily newspapers, shocked this community and drove Brown to seek fresh fields and pastures new. In an incredibly short time he has found what he sought in the wicked city of Chicago. The rehabilitating of him into the Congregational church, is a shame to the conference that admitted him, and a sad blow at religion itself. If these things may be done in a green tree, what may not be done in a dry? If religionists have no discipline for a man like Brown, how may the common dehauchee be held up to merited scorn? In other words, how can religion be respected and society protected? If the church can see no evil in these things, how is a sound public opinion to be cultivated, and purity of life maintained? Certainly no such Congregationalism can be reckoned among the forces for good. Its influence can only be baneful. All of which we feel constrained to say with more of sorrow than of anger. Yet it is a case about which it is very possible to wax indignant and sin not.

Tests of Newspaper Popularity. Circulation and advertising are not, as the Examiner claims, true tests of a newspaper's real popularity. A newspaper may be widely read for a combination of incongruous causes that in no manner constitute popularity. A crowd may be attracted by a freak parading the streets, but that does not prove that he is in any true sense popular. Mere curiosity to look upon a deformity, or to watch for scandals, or libels upon men you know, may bring nickels to the counter, but it is not popularity. It is very possible to attract attention without inspiring respect. Half the State would like to go and see a celebrated murderer hanged, but that would not indicate that they were his admirers, or that he had enlisted their good will. Popularity, in its true sense, means the good will, approval and respect of the populace. It does not mean the mere attraction of attention by doing things out of the way, or scandalous, malicious, or startling to the sense of right. There is no respect in that sort of attention, and without respect there can be no real popularity. For years the old Bulletin ruled the politics of this city and State. The people believed it sincere and trusted it; that meant popularity. The Examiner cannot rule even its own party, and is profoundly distrusted by it. Many read it, but no one trusts it, which clearly means unpopularity. When the Examiner has any influence upon the judgment of thinking men, on serious matters, it will have to be about everything that it is not now, and then it may be on the way to become popular. At present its ways are those of the gutter-snipe. The mere winning of nickels, as times go, more often means the telling of things which are not, rather than the things that are. The number of nickels thus gained are almost invariably in inverse proportion to the amount of respect inspired.

The Pending Treaty Of Arbitration. We seem in California to have pretty nearly forgotten the great treaty of international arbitration. The case is very different, however, in the East. Petitions in its favor are pouring in upon Congress from all quarters. A very suggestive and neatly worded one comes from the Confederate veterans of Louisiana, representing that these veterans "have intimately known the actualities of war and forcibly realizing its evils" respectfully ask to be heard "as an authority against it as a method of settling disputes between peoples." They say that "the recent proffer of a powerful kindred nation to substitute, in the adjustment of international differences, the arbitrament of a calm and mediatory tribunal for the inflamed passions of partizan or popular prejudices, offers an opportunity of inaugurating a rational and radical revolution of international procedure which, if now repulsed, may never recur." They therefore ask the Senate of the United States to ratify the treaty, and conclude by saying that as they have accepted in good faith the result of the civil war, they now ask for clemency, not for themselves, but for the generations of both sections who are to come after them. When we compare the tone of this simple and solemn memorial with the vaporings of Senator Morgan, we marvel that demagogues can get into Congress whilst the brave and sincere are kept out. The arbitration treaty is not meeting with the treatment in the Senate that its merits and importance demand. Since the foregoing was written, the treaty has been defeated in the Senate by a vote of forty-three for to twenty-six against. It requires a majority to make it law of two-thirds. It is a wicked and had ending to a great measure.

The Libel Law. It does not seem to be understood as generally as it might be that there is a vast difference between libel trials and those of other suits. In all cases, save those of libel the jury is bound to take the law from the court and are judges only in the facts. The exact opposite is the rule involving the freedom of publication. Our State constitution provides "that in libel cases the jury shall be judges of the law as well as of the facts." The court may rule out question after question, and counsel may keep on repeating them, because in the end the jurors are sole judges of whether they were proper questions or not. They and they alone are the sole judges of whether the matter sought to be brought out was material to the issue or not. If the questions be not put, despite any ruling of the court, there is no law before the jurors upon which they can exercise their constitutional right of passing an opinion, and hence the necessity of bringing out both law and facts. We doubt very much the right of the court to charge the jury at all in libel cases. If they, and not he, are judges of the law what remains for him to talk to them about? Anything he may say is merely ex Cathedra and to which they are bound by their oaths to pay no attention whatever. Upon them alone rests the responsibility of what is law, and what are legal rulings in cases of the nature we are referring to. Judges endeavor to try these cases as they do others, they rule in and rule out questions as if they alone had control of the law, but, as we have shown, that is far from being their right. In fact it is a mere usurpation of power, not warranted by the constitution. As a matter of dry fact, we believe that, if the law were strictly followed, the jury ought to be polled every time the competency of a question is involved. This of course would be inconvenient, but it would be the law. This strong buttress to the liberty of the press we come by in a grand historical way that leaves no doubt of the original intention. The Kings of England in other days had the power of packing the benches with their creatures, who, in most cases, were selected for the express purpose of preventing free discussion. They declared that "the greater the truth the greater the libel," and would let no testimony go to the jury except as to the fact of publication. After a long and stubborn fight, the House of Commons was induced to see the necessity of changing the law of libel, taking away from the judges and giving to the jury, all power to decide what was law and what was not. This safeguard all American constitutions have copied verbatim et literatim. It is in the fundamental law of California. It is the Supreme law of the State. If jurors were to ignore it, they would be forgetting how they came by the rights and liberties they possess, and would be recreant to their oaths.

ON last Saturday morning Clay W. Taylor, a well-known politician and attorney, died at his residence in this city. During his life he was frequently called to fill many important positions, and was held in general and high respect by all who knew him. For some time, Mr. Taylor's health had been bad, but his death came as a surprise to his friends. He was a prominent Mason, at one time having been Grand Master of the order in this State.

A ONCE FASHIONABLE QUARTER OF THE CITY.

THE recent sale of South Park to the city recalls to many old-timers recollection of the period when it was the fashionable residence quarter of the city. South Park was designed and laid out after the plan of English Crescents, about 1853, by the late George Gordon, an early pioneer, than whom there was never a man better known among the business fraternity of this city. George Gordon was an erratic genius. He was very fond of rushing into print on the slightest provocation, and loved to air his opinions in the daily press. He knew well, also, how to drive a sharp bargain, and one of them is in connection with this same South Park. He retained in his own name the title to the plot of ground which formed the Park of the enclosure, and when the different parties to whom he sold lots and houses in the Crescent refused to take a share in the expense of keeping it up, he threatened to build a market thereon, which speedily brought them to terms. It was for many years the nucleus around which gathered a goodly portion of the social lights of that decade. Within its limits were the dwellings of its founder, George Gordon, Colonel B. F. Washington, Commodore Watkins, Horace P. Janco, John H. Redington, Lloyd Tevis, Isaac Friedlander, Charles de Ro, Alexander Forbes, the agent of the S. S. Co., Russian Consul Kostromitnoff, James Bell, founder of the house of Falkner, Bell & Co., (now merged into Balfour, Guthrie), R. P. Ashe, George C. Johnson, Mrs. M. Ritchie, James Otis, Wm. M. Lent, T. J. Polterer, etc. The colony, for it was one, far removed from the other parts of the city, was very sociable within its own circle, and among other attractions boasted three young ladies whom one of the three dubbed "the World, the Flesh, and the Devil"—Miss Lottie Hall was the first, from her fondness for dancing; Miss Rosa Gore was the second, owing to her plump form, and the sponsor, Miss Patsey Ritchie, completed the trio, her sharpness of tongue being proverbial. She sometimes met her match, however, as an instance will show. Miss Patsey was remarking upon the size of Miss Pauline Hoge's nose (now Mrs. Delmas.) That young lady at once replied: "I'm not always looking at it, at any rate,"—referring to Miss Patsey's oblique vision. South Park still remains, but fashion deserted it ages ago.

THE APPROACHING DOG SHOW.

DURING the current week entries for the coming bench show have been coming into the office of the San Francisco Kennel Club at the rate of a hundred a day, and from now until the close—next Monday night—the rate will probably be doubled. Among the number thus far claiming place no particular class or breed has come forward with prominence. The club at the outset declared itself out for dogs, and it is securing them. Cash prizes have been offered to the amount of $1,500; silver cups—many of them of magnificent design—valued at $750; and gold and silver medals worth $500 more. And yet the entrance fee remains at $3, as in previous years.

Among the most notable features of the exhibition will be the number of kennels benched. The vast number of new dogs entered will not only lend much to the speculative interest in the disposition of the ribbons, but in the end will afford to the San Francisco Kennel Club the satisfaction of having given a bench show never before equalled west of St. Louis.

THE "Hygienic Ralston" is the name of a restaurant just opened at 315 and 317 Bush street. The name "Ralston" comes from the fact that the system of cooking at this restaurant is not only the preventive of dyspepsia, but its cure. The Ralston prepares food upon proved hygienic principles, which ensures freedom from all stomach troubles, biliousness, or indigestion. The place is fitted up in a quiet, substantial manner, pleasing to the eye. The service is superior, and all dishes found in any modern restaurant may be had, in addition to the Ralston specialties.

THE EMPORIUM.

EL CAPITAN is for purposes of recuperation. It is exactly what tired people want—a rest, a vacation, a shampoo. I shall not say that I was a total wreck, mentally and physically, prior to Monday night; but I was less happy in my daily work, less of a sunbeam to my family and less satisfaction to myself, than I am now since witnessing Messrs. Klein & Sousa's opera as performed by Mr. Hopper and his company. I could write a testimonial on the spot, and assert that I have tried Vin Mariani, Del Monte, iron, gold and other minerals, sea voyage, sleeping with my head to the north, lime fruit, Indian clubs, Jaeger flannels, kumys, pulley weights, old ladies' herb soup, bicycling, glass of hot water before breakfast, spiritualism and alcohol baths—and that none of these gave me that rejuvenility, that inspired sans gêne which I derived from El Capitan on Monday night.

Because I take El Capitan as a tonic is no reason why the perfect man should not enjoy it. I can imagine no one so strong and unjaded that a three hours' percolation of this healthy, idle fun will not do him good, infuse the glad spirit of springtide in his breast, and make him think better of the world in general, and of "comic opera" in particular. I use the term "comic opera" in its most unmeaningful way. Carmen is called comic opera—so is El Capitan. Yet there are many differences between them; and Sousa, judged by the standard of a Bizet, would be found considerably minus. But you must not take him that way. Sousa is a genial tunesmith, and he gives Klein's burlesque some smart, tuneful settings—music with smash, power—mostly foot power—and hing. But this does not infer that he has written an opera: quite the contrary. Of course, it would be a hard matter to convert Mr. Sousa to this opinion. The people flock to El Capitan, laugh at DeWolf Hopper—the funniest funnyman in the business,—laugh at Charles Klein's hook—one of the best burlesques ever got together in this country,—applaud the springy "two-steps," whistle the jocose Zauzibar song, and go off to supper amused and diverted, as we all did Monday night. And Mr. Sousa tunes his Stygian whisker, adorns his bosom with sundry specimens of hardware, performs a sonata in drum-major on the baton, and says to the world, "Ah! perceive me; I am your John Philip, and I did it." Of course, he did not. He wrote the incidental music to a sensationally good burlesque. The march is splendid, the Zanzibar tune is fresh and witty, and the finale of the second act is noisy and valuable. But any handmaster, without a whisker or a medal or a double-back-action gesture to his name, could have written the rest, which is neat, handmaster melodizing, quite as good as any cheap imported fluff opera music, and quite as commonplace.

I am not undervaluing Mr. Sousa's share in the success of El Capitan. I think as much of him as any fair-minded appreciator of music can think. The "Washington Post," "High School Cadets" and "Liberty Bell" are genuine music. They are marches; and, after the negro songs of Foster, the most convincingly American melodies that have been written. It is not improbable that some day Sousa might write a "Marseillaise" for Americans. But the promise of it is not so strong in El Capitan.

All this Sousa seriousness is an after-thought. I did not think for a single minute on Monday night. I did not care whether El Capitan was an opera or a circus. I was swallowed up in a sensation of large, unusual content. And who couldn't be contented with the facile tomfoolery of Mr. Klein's book, and the cultured clownishness of DeWolf Hopper, and the easy, cheerful music, and the pretty good company?

The hook is a treasure. Only one hand-me-down hanality—a tipping scene for the comedian—and that is so unctiously acted you forgive it without a struggle. No cheap gags, no sewery slang, and, above all, no cues for acrobatics. I do not remember a single instance of one comic person kicking another comic person upon—as the gentle Goldsmith described it—that side least capable of making a defense. This last innovation is daring, but it works like a charm. And Mr. Hopper has legs, too, that are a temptation to that business. Mr. Klein seems to have studied closely the comicality of his comedian. Hopper has a part that fits him to the limit of his luxurious length. It is fluent, affable, full of sumptuous language. Hopper is happy when he is wallowing in rhetoric, and Mr. Klein gives him a vast, continuous gush. Some of the lines are really too good—that is, they were too good for the Baldwin first-nighters.

"You have met before?" says the jealous lover, overhearing Estrelida's fervent greeting to the warrior, El Capitan.

"Only in dreams," El Capitan answers.

"Whose dreams?" shouts the lover.

Nobody seemed to think this was funny enough to laugh over. And nobody even winked an eyelash when El Capitan said, "My mother was a vivandière, and I was the child of the regiment."

The librettist is usually the fortieth consideration in light opera—he comes somewhere between the understudies and the scene-shifters, and he usually deserves his position. Mr. Klein is different. He divides the top honors with Mr. Hopper. I did not pay attention enough to the lyrics to know if they are clever. But the plot! The hilarious ingenuity that conceived the Viceroy of Peru masquerading his cowardly bones in the armor of El Capitan and joining the insurgents, so as to win either way; and the attendant complications of his leaving the little, yard-high Chamberlain in the Palace in his stead; and the brilliant, unswerving, legitimate humor with which everything is worked out! Well, Mr. Klein is a young man, I understand, and this is his first offense of the kind, and if he is not champagned to death by his admirers, or led down some dark alley by his competitors, there is something in this soiled old world for him to look forward to.

Among Mr. Hopper's company there are a large, competent chorus which makes itself justly eminent, the usual paper tenor and the dubious basso, a notably forceful prima donna soprano assoluto—Miss Nellie Bergin—who sings a strong, shrill, birdie note with good Sousanian effect, and a middle-aged comedy mezzo-soprano—Miss Alice Hosmer—who can both sing and act her role.

There are very few chances for Edna Wallace Hopper in her part this time. Mr. Alfred Klein is not much better off, but he plays the Chamberlain with such fine accomplishment, such dry sincerity, such concealed consciousness of how funny a little fellow he is, that I regretted when necessity put him out of sight in the prison cell. I could have more easily spared Mrs. Hopper, who, finding nothing in the part of Estrelida to fit her specialized daintiness, takes it out on the audience by an extravagant system of ogles, smirks, and leg agitations, which must sorely try even a man of Mr. Hopper's uxorious complacency.

I am candidly prejudiced in favor of DeWolf Hopper, and while I fear he is not a versatile comedian, I have never seen so much of him as to grow tired of his unique personality and his unique methods. There is something ingeniously delicate, intimate and artistic in his work which I have missed in that of other operatic comedians, and his magnetism is sure and compansiaole. It glows in his playing, as it glows in the speeches he makes before the curtain. He is confidential with an audience, and yet he is refined—a nice distinction if you will observe many comedians. And Hopper can sing. This is not considered vital by most singing comedians, and one admires Hopper the more for the eccentricity. There is a soulfully humorous throb in his voice that, to me, is the true vocal expression of comedy. Mr. Hopper is nine-tenths of the cast in El Capitan, but nobody seems to object. For my part, if it were not for Alfred Klein, he could be the other tenth.

Modest man, with sublime faith in the superior advantages of his sex, can better understand why "girls will be boys"; but the effeminated male person will ever be something of a mystery to him. Until Tuesday night, when I heard Alexander Ticianu at the Orpheum, I enjoyed a special contempt for the "female impersonator," a weird creature who usually struts like a peacock and sings like two. Ticianu is a surprise. He wears the garb of woman, and he-sopranoizes in hysterical falsetto, and, just as you are wishing for the hand of God or man to reach out and smite him where he is noisiest, he drops into a clean, musical barytone, and finishes out his song with unchallengeable virility. Ticianu's abnormal genius is not feminine, it is epicene.

A few respectable patrons of music and myself sat between the pianos in Byron Mauzy's Hall on Thursday night and listened to Mr. Otto Bendix's recital. It was solemn, good, unsensational. Mr. Bendix's playing of the Schubert Fantasy was not, to my thinking, a revelation of the work. It was heavy rather than strong, and pedantic rather than poetic. In the Schuman Novelette he found a better mood, and in the Brahms's pieces he asserted crisp understanding of the music and keen tonal discrimination. I left after the Liszt transcription of Schubert's "Spinning Wheel," which, so far as I heard, was the best of the programme. He colored it vividly and tempered it in beautiful rhythm. ASHTON STEVENS.

Mr. Frawley has a brilliant outlook for the coming season at the Columbia. He has re-engaged Frank Worthing, Blanche Bates and several other members of last season's company. J. M. Colville, Theodore Hamilton, Grace Henderson, Gladys Wallis and Georgia Bushy are among the newcomers. Some of the plays secured are: The Fatal Card, Two Little Yagants, Sue, The Henrietta, Held by the Enemy, A Social Highwayman, The Case of Rebellious Susan and Shenandoah.

The Columbia promises a big spectacular show next week in the engagement of Rice's Excelsior Jr. Sadie Martinot, Joe Cawthorne, Johnny Page and Carrie Behr, and David Abrahams, the English pantomimist, are of the company. The scenic display is said to have engaged the attention of all the art editors in the East, and the chorus girls, so says the honorable press agent, have youth and beauty and elie that will set the youths of the town mad as March hares.

The Orpheum has another strong bill for next week: Edmund Martin's educated dogs, the "Crocodile and Demon" Eclair brothers, and the return of little Guile, the tenor. Tacianu, Fleurette and her four fleurs-de-lis, and other favorites are retained. The Venetian Ladies' Orchestra plays in the Orpheum Annex every afternoon from four to six, as well as after the regular evening performances.

The great Irish opera, Shamus O'Brien, continues at the Tivoli. Next week Mr. O'Sullivan will interpolate several Irish ballads. After the run of Shamus comes Dellinger's opera of waltzes and marches, Captain Fracassa.

Frederick M. Biggerstaff, pianist, will give a concert at Golden Gate Hall on Thursday evening.

El Capitan will crowd the Baldwin for another week—then Nat Goodwin.

THE annual spring sale of road, harness, work, and draft horses, from the famous Haggin ranch, will take place on Wednesday, the 12th inst., at 10 o'clock A. M., corner Market street and Van Ness avenue. Kilip & Co., auctioneers.

MR. J. O. Harron, Vice-President of the Parke-Lacy Company of this city, has gone to Guatemala to attend the exposition there, on a visit that may be protracted for several months.

THE Mining Journal has another whoop-up for the new railroad from Oakdale to Sonora. The Rawhyde (sic) mine comes in, as usual, for honorable mention.

The art of serving a fine dinner, perfect in its variety and appointments, suitable to every taste, and all for $1.00, is seen at its best at Swain's Bakery, 213 Sutter street. The best in the market, cooked in the best manner, and served in faultless style from 5 to 8 o'clock every evening. Fine pastries, and confections of all kinds promptly supplied.

MAMZELLE NOISETTE

A SALON STORY

CARL HUYSMANN IN QUARTIER LATIN.

WE, that is to say, about half-a-dozen of us "indigent artists," with Robert Summers the only financially successful one amongst us, were gathered together in the smoking room of the Crayon Club. We had just entertained Summers at dinner—why is it always that the fat and rich are fed and feted, and the poor and thin sent empty away?—and now were to hear the story of his first successful picture. Most of us hoped that some day we ourselves should be "dined," and have to tell the story of our own first success.

"It was in this way," he began, after lighting a shilling cigar (we all smoked pipes). "I had done my time at Julian's, and had mastered the Flesh, or; at all events, the way to paint it—if not the World and the Devil. I decided that my chances were better in Paris than here in London, and, the worst come, there were the p'tites pièces d'art for the shops of the Rue de Rivoli, baigneuses and studies of the toilet, to fall back on, so I took a studio not far from the Passage des Panoramas at the top of a house in a by-street.

"It was not at all a bad little place. The studio was well ventilated and splendidly lighted, its last tenant having spent a good deal of money on fixtures; there was a good stove, and a little gas one for cooking. The bedroom was en suite, and had also a door opening on to the stairs. The studio had been to let some little time, and for this reason they had reduced the rent, which was now decidedly low; so I took it, and moved in as soon as I could. This was in November or December.

"Whilst I was working at a study of the nude at Julian's—from a model, a girl with Titian red hair, a lovely skin, and the most graceful pose of any model there—a connoisseur who used occasionally to drop in took a fancy to my treatment of the figure, especially the handling of the flesh tints, and one day, soon after I had settled down in my new quarters, he called and gave me a commission to paint a picture.

"'I'm going to give you a chance,' he said, naming what was to me at that time a considerable sum. And then he described what he wanted. Well, the subject was quite unconventional, not such a one as many English collectors would commission or hang without a locked frame. He was a cute enough man, and he knew that if I did my part well the thing was sure to be hung in the Salon, he talked about a lot, and he would get the credit and enjoy the pleasure of 'discovering' me.

"'You must get hold of someone who won't either look ashamed of herself or as if she liked it. I want it to be a perfectly natural picture,' he continued, 'and I believe you can do it.'

"I hinted that I thought models of the type he wanted were not too easily found.

"'Oh,' said he, 'don't spare expense. I'll pay everything over and above the usual fee that may be necessary if you find the right kind of girl.' And then he said good-day, and promised to look in again in a week or two.

"Of course, I immediately began to look out for what I wanted, letting a few of the fellows at Julian's know the sort of thing I was in search of. I remember Jackie Fenwick (poor chap, he's dead) saying with a laugh, 'Bob, my boy, it will be some time before you find la belle fille. The ones who've been through the mill couldn't look shy to save their lives, and those who haven't "sat" won't "sit," my boy, for five francs a day.'

"I had plenty of applications, of course. I think the fellows used to take a delight in plaguing me by sending me anything they came across in the shape of a woman. I had Junos, Venuses, Psyches without end. The first mostly too fat, except for a picture of the 'Mère de la Nation' class, the second class mostly too knowing, and the third mostly slips of girls with no figures (though some had good skins) to speak of, several of whom had never posed before, but had no objection to doing so for five francs a day if I'd take them.

"I selected one in sheer despair at last—one of the Venus type. I wasn't at all satisfied with her, however, and was in a despondent sort of mood one morning in February, got from gazing on the canvas, when I was startled by a knock at my door, and in response to my 'Entrez,' a young lady appeared. She was of slight, girlish figure, very well dressed, and somewhat heavily veiled.

"Bowling her to a seat I awaited her pleasure.

"Lifting her veil, and thereby disclosing one of the loveliest faces it has been my good fortune to see, she said in a low, clear voice—

"'Monsieur Summers, I presume.' And when I had intimated that she was correct in her supposition, she continued, 'I have heard, Monsieur, that you are in need of a model. Is that so?'

The temptation to throw over my somewhat coquette Venus at once assailed me. Here was my ideal, at last. So I said—

"'Mademoiselle——' waiting for her to fill in the blank, which she did with a slight hesitation, and with a blush caused by the giving of a name other than her own. 'Ah, thanks! Mamzelle Noisette is correctly informed. But does she know the subject?' I asked.

"'Yes. And does Monsieur think that I should serve?'

"'That I cannot——' I commenced. But she interrupted me with 'Ah! no. Of course; how stupid of me. But pardon, Monsieur, I am not accustomed—that is,' she hastily added, her face and neck getting crimson, 'not very much accustomed to sitting.' Then she glanced round, and seeing her eyes rest upon the door of my other apartment, I signified that it was entirely at her service.

"The outcome of it was that she arranged to sit to me—to come at eleven o'clock next day. And then she dressed herself, and pulling her veil over her face went down the somewhat dark staircase, with a promise to be punctual on the morrow.

"When I went into my room to write to Venus, I perceived a delightful odor of heliotrope.

"At eleven precisely next day I heard Mamzelle Noisette coming up the stairs. I had tidied up my room in readiness, and had even put a bouquet of white narcissus and daffodils on the small dressing-table. I had got a new canvas on my easel, having turned the old one with the commencement of Venus thankfully to the wall.

She came out almost shyly, with the studio robe enveloping her till I was ready to commence, walking forward with the dainty grace of a well-born woman.

"As she took her stand, a few moments later, in a patch of sunlight near the stove, I thought that I had never seen such a perfect figure or so beautiful a woman.

"As was perhaps natural, I speculated very considerably as to the identity of my sitter. That she was no model I immediately decided. That she was a young lady was almost equally certain, at least from her manner and address, as well as from her attire.

"At the end of a week I was ready for the background. The subject of the picture was, briefly, the morning 'tub' of a well-born young woman of about twenty. And for this purpose I had to temporarily fit up a part of the studio as a dressing room. Articles of feminine attire played a conspicuous part as accessories. A rose-colored satin garment lay, just as it had evidently slipped from a chair, on a fur mat, and a pile of white, lace-trimmed linen (difficult, indeed, to paint well) was heaped on the chair standing at the side of the large china bath. Mamzelle Noisette, half facing the spectator, was just trying the water by lifting it in her pink hand. Behind the tub and her body, with its golden and pink shadows, was an olive-green Japanese paper screen, on which were cranes and other waterfowl. The morning I began the background I had explained the general scheme of the picture to her, and laughingly she helped me dispose the dessous of her toilette with artistic and natural negligence. It was the lingerie of a woman of taste and position, exhaling the same faint odor of heliotrope I had noticed on a former occasion.

"When she had posed, looking at the pile of laced whitenesses on the inlaid rosewood Louis Quinze chair, I said, 'I thought all women were tidy.' 'Not when they keep maids,' she replied, and then blushed lest she should have betrayed a secret.

"The weeks went by. The picture was almost finished. For several days I had been working at the final touches on the face. There was really no necessity for further sittings, but I was in love with my model, and sought to postpone the time of her going, and the time of my declaration.

"I had found out very little about her beyond the fact that she was undoubtedly a lady, and had no need to sit to me or anyone else.

"Whilst she was dressing a few days before the completion of the picture, I had ventured to express regret that she was so soon to discontinue her sittings. I even suggested another picture, but the conversation was at once turned by herself into another channel.

"On the day I was finishing the face, I realized that I could ask her to come only once more. I decided to postpone until then the avowal of my love.

"On the morning of the last sitting I received a note. It ran-- "Avenue ———

 "Paris,
 "le 7 avril, 188—

"Dear Sir,

"I cannot come to-day or any other day. I shall not, probably, see you again. I have sat to you, and allowed you to paint my beauty for a bet. I have won 10 000 francs, which I needed to save me from disgrace. I hope that the picture will make you a name. I shall go to see it once if it is hung in the Salon (as it is sure to be), and then I shall leave Paris with my family for a long time. If you should meet me, which, however, is improbable, do not seek to address me. With my best friendship's regard,

"Ever to you,
 "MANZELLE NOISETTE."

"I never saw her again. Once I thought I caught a glimpse of her when a smart Victoria swept round a corner of the Place de la Concorde, and for a moment disclosed to me a lady in a veil; but I have never been able to decide whether it was really Mamzelle Noisette, or not.

"The picture did make me a name. The critics were kind, except, perhaps, a few feminine ones. To them the realism of clothes is very real. I overheard a group of ladies discussing the latter one day. They admired my painting of the rose-colored satin garment immensely. But one young demoiselle of the party exclaimed, 'No one wears ribbon trimmings like that now,' and she pointed to an article of attire with her parasol. 'Nor that kind of frills! How very old fashioned!'

"And yet Mamzelle Noisette had laughingly assured me one day not two months before that they were the latest nouveautés!"

PICTURESQUE SAN FRANCISCO.

THE supplement of to-day's NEWS LETTER will recall vividly to pioneers of San Francisco the material of which many of the structures in early days were made. The dilapidated section reproduced may be seen on Jackson street, between Sansome and Battery. The corrugated iron came around the Horn by sail half a century ago, and is of a kind very generally used before lumber mills were built on the Pacific Coast. The battered and rust-eaten material, as Caesar's clay might have done, stops up the holes and keeps the wind away in a part of the city very much out at heel and elbow. It recalls to the argonaut the fact of the shifting and uncertain trend of trade; for in early days the part of the city now given over to junk shops, neglect, and squalor, were the most important streets of San Francisco.

No other people equal the French for the quality and artistic perfection of cooking. The Maison Riche, Geary street and Grant avenue, is an admirable example of this fact. The finest French dinner to be had in San Francisco is served daily at the Maison Riche, between the hours of 5 and 9 p. m. Music by a string band adds to the dainty creations of the chef. Faultless service. Rare wines.

The adornment of any home is made more complete by the presence of tasteful Japanese works of art—carvings, curios, figures, tapestries, etc. George T. Marsh & Co., at 625 Market street, under the Palace Hotel, have a full line of these unique and beautiful goods, for sale at most reasonable rates.

THE PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU, 510 Montgomery street, S. F. reads all papers on the Pacific Coast, and supplies clippings on all topics, business and personal.

"Book and Heart." Essays on literature and life, by Thomas Wentworth Higginson. Published by Harper & Brothers. New York. 1897.

Of the three dozen save one articles in this volume twelve deal with literature, and are placed first. It seems a favorite trick with Mr. Higginson to place words in a different order from the usual one; just as some British people, out of mere perversity, say "Cambridge and Oxford," though all the world long since decided to say "Oxford and Cambridge." As Mr. Higginson once wrote a book entitled "Women and Men," we are quite prepared to find him writing "literature and life." Whether he means thereby to put literature before life, or women before men, or not, we neither know nor care: the order of importance in which things stand in Mr. Higginson's mind is a subject of no concern to us. Of the literary essays the most interesting to us is that entitled "A world outside of science," in which the author shows that the mere man of science is a very narrow man, large areas of whose heart and spirit are uncultivated. Thus Charles Darwin, perhaps the greatest and purest man of science that ever lived, as he progressed in his life-long studies, lost, slowly but surely, his taste for literature, art, and music, for which as a young man he had had much aptitude, until at sixty years of age he found the poetry of Shakespeare so intolerably dull that it nauseated him, pictures bored him, and music was a lost pleasure. Of fervor or emotion, of course, he had not a trace left: the dry light of science had withered his heart and soul. In another essay, Mr. Higginson very truly says that the best thing that Americans have to learn at Loudon dinner-tables is to abandon the habit of monologue; no man, however brilliant or self-assertive, is permitted to monopolize the talk there. The "orating" habit smacks of a condition of semi-civilization, just as does the inordinate esteem in which long-windedness and wind-bagginess are held in the United States. Mr. Higginson says that the daily press is the greatest foe to eloquence in the United States, and speaks feelingly, as though some fine flights of his own had been spoiled by the reporters. We cannot agree, being rather disposed to think that most of the silver-tongued, brass-throated, iron-jawed, leather-lunged orators, possessed of the cheek of the devil, have been incited to their misdeeds by the adulation of foolish newspapers. The twenty-three articles on Life are all of them readable, and give the reader a very favorable idea of the essential soundness of the writer's mind and heart. We note little of that tendency to over-emotion of which we seemed to find traces in "Women and Men," or of that inclination to twist the British lion's tail which is occasionally apparent in "Concerning all of us." In "Book and Heart" we have the reflections of a man who has seen many years and got rid of many ideas. There is just one matter on which we must join issue. In "Anglo-mania and Anglo-phobia" Mr. Higginson speaks of the "widely-spread dislike" of England in the United States, and leads us to suppose that something of the same kind is present in Englishmen's minds. This is not so at all. The Briton, as a Briton, has no feeling of dislike for the United States: rather, indeed, the reverse; he is naturally disposed to be kind and hospitable to Americans visiting the Old Home. He may, perhaps, be a little surprised to find that an American is an excellent classical scholar, but then he would be just as much surprised at finding that an Australian was one. When Mr. Higginson assigns British sympathy for the Confederates as a reason for mistrusting Britain and Britons, he is merely falling into an error almost universal among his countrymen. When the War of Secession began, it was impossible to tell which side would gain the day, and, had the Southerners prevailed, the British would have found themselves sympathizing with the "upper dog": as it was, they sympathized with the dog that eventually turned out the "under" one: but were not both the dogs American? It is surely rather hard that, when a nation splits into two nearly equal parts, a foreigner should be blamed for wishing well to one rather than the other. Nowhere, so far as we know, in the United Kingdom, would a solitary American visitor find himself or his country a target for abusive and insolent attack; yet how frequently in the United States does not a pack of jackals snap and snarl at the heels of any British lion whom they may have succeeded in isolating? Indeed, we have heard a pleasant American woman, who had traveled considerably in Europe, say that she dearly loved to chaff an Englishman. Now, the teasing of a pretty woman may be endured by men who have no stomach for the vulgar insolence of the opposite sex. To turn to another matter: Mr. Higginson clearly sees that wealth is powerless to secure great social prizes in America, because there are no such prizes. Whereas, in Europe, and especially in Great Britain, wealth can consolidate and perpetuate itself (almost beyond the possibility of wreck) in the hereditary nobility. Whether this is to be considered an advantage or not depends on the views one takes of society, Government, the hereditary transmission of capacity, and other matters. We think that the excellent administration of almost every branch of the public service in the British Empire is largely due to the fact that affairs are in the hands of a body of men fitted by heredity, social environment, education and ideals for the tasks they perform. Thank God, the British Empire is not yet administered upon the theory that one man is as good as another, but on a recognition of the fact that some men are incomparably better than others.

Mr. Edgar Saltus has lately been speaking of Sir Edwin Arnold as a newspaper reporter: he never was anything of the kind. After his Oxford career Edwin Arnold became an assistant master at King Edward's school, Birmingham, a famous school that gave the late Archbishop Benson, the late Bishop Lightfoot, Bishop Westcott, and many other great scholars, to the English Church; thence he went out to India, where he became Principal of the Poona College, and a Fellow of the University of Bombay; on his return to England he became an editor of the Daily Telegraph. Young men possessing the scholarship and attainments that Edwin Arnold possessed after his graduation at Oxford do not become reporters on English newspapers; if they take up journalistic work at all, as Mr. E. T. Cook or Sir Alfred Milner did, they enter the editorial room at once.

The May issue of Scribner's Magazine appears in a very pretty colored cover. E. S. Martin and Robert Grant write of life at Harvard, and C. D. Gibson of a London drawing-room. There is an article on golf by the amateur champion of the United States, and an elaborately illustrated account by Charles D. Lanier of "The Working of a Bank." Charles Edwin Markham contributes a short poem of two stanzas, entitled "The Whirlwind Road." It has amused us to see on the back cover of Scribner's a tinted cut of a young woman in a corset waist, when we remember that a certain association of would-be women writers on this Pacific Coast affected to resent the publication of a cut of a plump young person, bien corsetée, in the souvenir of an entertainment. Is Scribner's immodest, or are the Pacific Coast women prudish? If we may judge from some of the young ones we know, we should not consider prudishness their most strongly marked characteristic.

Newnham College, one of the ladies' colleges at Cambridge, England, furnishes some striking proofs of the great advantage of having people of high intelligence and training for one's parents. Miss Helen Gladstone, who has just retired from the position of First vice-Principal of Newnham in order to solace her distinguished parents' declining years, is a daughter of William Ewart Gladstone, four times Prime Minister of Great Britain, and controller of the British Empire. She is succeeded by Miss Katherine Stephen, daughter of the eminent lawyer, Sir James Stephen. Miss B. A. Clough, the Head of Clough Hall, Newnham, is the youngest daughter of the brilliant Arthur Hugh Clough, the favorite pupil of Dr. Thomas Arnold of Rugby.

MINE Host Warfield has cause for rejoicing, for he could not ask a better adjunct to his efforts in making San Rafael the objective point for our beauty and fashion this summer than Mrs. Hager. Society people will be safe in choosing the Hotel Rafael for their summer "Season," for between Baron Von Schroeder and Mrs. Hager, with Major Warfield at the head, a constant stream of pleasure is sure to flow.

The list of guests, as given by the press dispatches, who were invited by Lady Hesketh (Flora Sharou) to meet the Prince of Wales on his recent two days visit to the country home of Sir Thomas Hesketh in Northhamptonshire inclines one to think that our erstwhile native daughter is getting inducted in the ways of "the Prince's set." Firstly, as 'tis said, Sir Thomas was absent in Africa, and the little lady had therefore all the responsibility of collecting the guests, who comprised the Duke of Grafton, whose reputation is well-known in the London swim, the Earl of Euston, who married the notorious Dolly Tester, and Lord Fitzroy, whose name was associated with Oscar Wilde. One is led to wonder in reading this list, who the women were that completed this aristocratic "house party."

Rumor has it that our respected townsman, Winfield Scott Jones, has taken a trip to Washington for the purpose of bringing back a bride to his Hyde street home. The lady is said to be an old love and one who was an intimate friend of the rival belles—Addie Smith (now Mrs. Holt) and Addie Cutts, the widow of Stephen A. Douglass. Should this be true, what a warm reception she will receive at the hands of Mr. Jones's numerous lady friends in San Francisco.

"Milty Latham is the jolliest kind of a fellow," is the dictum of the guests at the recent gathering at Mira Monte Club House over in Marin County, where Milty is a leading spirit. By the way, gossip asserts that this "jolly fellow" is "gone"—and a very bad case too—on the last remaining sister of a charming trio of sisters who are very great favorites both in the city and Sausalito.

A propos of moonlight frolics, the members of the riding school are credited with the intention of getting up a large riding party during the next moonlight, and after a trip through the Park the evening will wind up with supper at the large home belonging to one of the party. Some of them wanted to bring up at the Presidio, and others the Occidental, but nothing has been settled so far.

"Bonnie Bernie"—as Miss Bernice Drown's girl friends style her, is said to be a young lady whose mental attainments place her in front rank of our many bright girls. Miss Mary Kip bids fair to take the place left vacant by Miss Hannah Williams when she became Walter Hobart's bride, her rare beauty making her a bright feature of any entertainment at which she appears.

The nearness of Sausalito to San Rafael will no doubt occasion many a merry-making between the two places this season. Already several frolics are being discussed, and when the moonlight nights come, a picnic by pale Luna's beams is on the tapis to be awfully jolly, and desperately select, don't ye know.

The Tivoli has been rehabilitated in a society point of view by the favorite son of the soil, Denis O'Sullivan, singing his famous "Shamus O'Brien" there, and swell theatre parties to hear him have been the rule, with suppers at the University Club or at home almost every evening during the past week.

On dit that the gallant Lieutenant Winn will make his projected European trip a wedding tour.

There is no doubt about it, the new men at the Presidio are the soul of hospitality. Ever since their arrival they have kept the ball rolling in fun of some sort for their lady friends, and the dinner dance to the bride elect of Lieutenant Bent, Miss Ethel Cohen, tops it off. Only a few of the most popular city belles were guests at the dinner, but they were the merriest crowd imaginable. What a graceful compliment to this charming fiancée for her bridesmaids—to be—to combine in an entertainment of like nature before the wedding, and have it take place at the biggest house of the lot.

The recent reception, supper and exhibition of riding under the tutelage of Captain Dilhan, was a delightful affair, much enjoyed by those fortunate enough to be present. All rode well, though of course some were better than others. Special mention must be accorded Miss Rose Hooper and Mrs. Fanny Leut for their skill and graceful daring, especially in the "tandem" act. It is a matter of congratulation that this delightful art is being taken up by society, for surely never did woman appear to greater advantage than when on horseback—if she knows how to ride.

The London Mining Journal publishes a lengthy editorial in defense of the nation's experts. It originated in the rather pungent criticism of Indian Engineering, which is accredited with the assertion "that the men who leave England and apply for appointments as mining engineers are, for the most part, simply a set of adventurers, who have during some time or another, served at a mine, and picked up a smattering of mining. The Journal, while reluctantly admitting the decline of the English mining engineer, takes exception to the view that the majority of soi-disant mining experts are a "set of adventurers," asserting that the majority of men in all walks of life are adventurers, a term which in this sense hardly carries with it a reproach. California has not been happy in the selection of the class under discussion. While of course it would be absurd to deny that some of the men imported in the profession are able and fully competent for the positions, the majority come under the category of our East Indian contemporary. While their scientific training may be excellent in every respect, they lack in knowledge of practical mining and the common sense which should teach them that in every new territory there is much to be learned from experience. Time and again the opinions of the best men in this State, who have been brought up in its different mining sections, each of which has its own peculiarities of formation and general conditions, have been offset and counteracted, to the heavy loss of capital by self-sufficient individuals who, if skilled in science, were practically lost in the field. For this reason we have repeatedly urged the necessity for the employment of trained and competent California engineers in reporting on property in this State in the interests of the foreign investor. The most reliable class of English experts fully recognize the necessity for this, and invariably secure the services of a local professional engineer. The man who does this can be set down as level-headed and trustworthy, but unfortunately in the past he has been the exception. We would have had no fiascos to regret, such as the Union Gold, Ilex, and some others, had home talent been employed, instead of feather-weight English experts. The best argument of eternal fitness in the profession is the selection of California mining men as managers by the most prominent mining companies of London operating in South Africa and Australia.

Dredging for River Gold. With the passing of the control of the Bowen dredging outfit some days ago, the possibilities of reaching the gold in the sands of California rivers are now being discussed. The success which has been attained in operations of the kind up north in Washington has stimulated a desire for operations of the kind elsewhere, and during the week a strong company has obtained by purchase the Rogue river, which will soon be under active exploitation. A company of the kind has just been formed in London, called the Quesnelle River Gold Dredging Company, Limited, which will work the bed of that river for gold, which has been found to exist in amounts ranging from $1.70 to $17 per ton. The men at the back of this company were formerly connected with West Australian mining. An effort is now being made in this city to place one or more of the Bowen dredgers at work on the Sacramento and some of the other Californian rivers. The working capital of the London company is placed at $75,000.

Con. Virginia in Ore Again. Just on the eve of the dissolution of the speculative mining market in this city, Con. Virginia again looms up as the possible savior of the business. A most important strike has been made in upraising from the 1,650 level. About 60 feet above the sill floor of this level high-grade ore has been found, which is already promising in its dimensions. What the extent of the new find may be is something which time alone can determine, but it is safe to say that the development is the most important made in the mine since 1886, a year of happy memory to shareholders. So far no official announcement has been made as to the character of the ground in the locality of the strike; whether it is absolutely new and clear from previous workings. The general impression is that it is virgin territory, but it will be more satisfactory to have this statement come from Mr. Lyman himself whenever he feels justified in expressing an opinion on the subject. The effect of the development so far on the market has been salutary. Business has been active at a higher range of prices, and the ranks of dealers have been already recruited from the vast army of speculators which during the past twelve months retired from the field in disgust. Should the development make into a big ore body in the course of exploration, the question of the future of the business is solved for a long time to come. The management of the mine is highly popular and backed with capital to protect its own interests in every way. So far the advance has been light in all directions.

Millions for Mexican Rubber. All the good things seem to drift Londonward nowadays. With all the boasted wealth of the New World, strange to say, whenever financial aid is required to promote an enterprise of magnitude, the British public is called upon through the London promoter. New York cycles, down East railways, Western mines and industrial projects of varied description all drift toward the great monied center of the universe. One of the inducements held forth just now to investors is what is known as the India Rubber (Mexico) Limited, brought out in London with a capital of $2,300,000, is the unlimited demand for chewing-gum in the United States of America, which the property is in a position to supply, no less than 250,000 chick or chewing gum trees being ready for tapping, according to the prospectus. This will be glad news to the millions of masticators in this country—male and female—who have been laboring under suspicion, while cud-chewing, that the material was anything but a natural product. One would think that with such a demand alone to supply, that American manufacturers would have found it expedient and profitable to have coraled this font of the chewers' delight, before taking the output second-hand from Great Britain. The "tapping" process for working capital is possibly an easier matter over the Atlantic than it might be in America, or the trees on the vast estate of Llano de Juarez, in Oaxaca, Mex., might remain untapped for another generation, and this in the face of the Mexican Government's subsidy of three cents for every new tree planted up to a limit of 15,000,000 trees. The omission of chewing-gum from the Dingley bill, in view of the new India Rubber (Mexico) Limited, is an oversight upon the part of the nation's legislators, fraught with peculiar danger to the chewing-gum manufacturers of the country.

A Prosperous Scotch Concern. The Griffiths mine, of El Dorado, recently purchased by syndicate represented here by P. George Gow, is rapidly developing into a valuable property. Prospecting on the surface has revealed some fine veins on the seven claims, with first-class ore at all points, justifying the management in starting a tunnel at a depth of 1,000 feet to crosscut the whole property. Sinking a shaft is also progressing 1,500 feet from the north line, which is down 250 feet, exposing good ore. This Scotch company is one of the most prosperous concerns in the State, and deservedly so, as its management, while always ready to put money up for the development of a promising prospect, has the faculty of minding its own business, without interfering with that of other people.

Mining on The Feather. Some of the directors of the Development Syndicate Limited, of London, will arrive in town next week on a visit of inspection to the company's property at Oroville. This includes the Banner, Long's Bar, and several other promising mines in this vicinity, making one consolidation. Work is being carried on with excellent results under the direction of Colonel J. B. Low, the consulting engineer of the company. No work has been done yet this year in the river mines below, owing to high water, but everything is ready to start up when the time comes.

The Down Crier

"Hear the Crier!" "What the devil art thou?"
"One that will play the devil, sir, with you."

GUN practice at the Presidio languished sadly on Monday, there being, apparently a hoodoo upon the day's proceedings. The guns kicked, so did the weather, the wind howling like a banshee and the powder being dampened by a lack of ardor. No wonder that Lieutenants Randolph, Hubbard and Miley feel mortified at the fiasco, which took place under their direction, but they made a fatal mistake in not having any targets to fire at. If the laws of the land only permitted the slaughter of assorted hatches of unjailed miscreants upon such occasions, gun practicing in Uncle Sam's pretty Presidio yard would be of immense advantage to the city and to the soldiers. The CRIER would be overjoyed to sit on the fence at such performances, and would take unholy delight in seeing a procession of blatherskite politicians, and blackmailing soundrels of the journalistic ilk march forward to a deserved doom.

BOSS Rainey's Sacramento labors in behalf of the fully-paid fire department bill have been rewarded by a "pelone" in the shape of a silver tea-service, an illuminated text, and other flattering but inappropriate testimonials of the department's adoring regard. Rainey, being in politics, is of course familiar with silver, and its acquirement in any form is doubtless pleasing to a man who has been out for stuff so long as he has, but his unfamiliarity with such a beverage as tea, and his long-distance acquaintance with texts of any kind, tend to invest these complimentary but useless gifts with ironical significance. With Rainey as guardian angel of the fire department above ground, and Satan as guardian of the fire department below, these necessary adjuncts to civilization should be faultlessly controlled, provided the brimstone supply does not fail.

AHINDU nuisance, who calls himself Bramacharin Bobbabbishksku for short, and who is earning his living here by picturesque posing and the gift of gab, has grossly insulted the American women because they wear modern millinery instead of towels about their heads. He also accuses persons unknown of pulling his pajamas. The man from India's coral strand will soon be stranded himself if he does not put a padlock upon his vituperative mouth-piece. He has no kick coming, since he does not, like his Christian brothers, have to foot the bills for the dear girls' head-gear, and as for the familiarity of yanking at his nether garments, it is too trivial to mention. What if this wild Indian's leg had been pulled in true American fashion? Away with him! Tie his name around his neck and drop him into the translucent waters of the bay.

MADAME Lydia Mamreoff von Finklestein Mountford, a distinguished prophetess from Jerusalem, admonishes us to practice brotherly love in the spirit and not in the letter. The lady is dead right. Many a millionaire would have lived in comparative peace, instead of suffering mental and financial torture unspeakable, had he communicated his affections to the fair object thereof by the spirit instead of the letter route. Letters are dangerous, deucedly dangerous, and the CRIER advises his wealthy brothers who have susceptible leanings womanward, to avoid ink-slinging absolutely, and work the spirit trolley for all it is worth. Only the devil himself knows the number of breach of promise suits and other embarrassing legal complications that will thus be prevented.

SOME of the Missionites want a zoo and others want a park. By all means let them have the zoo. A brand new park would increase the suicide record unnecessarily, Golden Gate Park having somewhat exhausted its popularity as a happy hunting-ground for despondent souls to shuffle off their mortal coils upon. Give 'em a zoo.

LITERARY note: It is rumored that a volume of especial interest to the legal fraternity and the general public is now in press. Advance sheets have already been furnished to the daily papers. Its title is "A Knight and a Fair Lady."

MISS Eliza D. Keith, a school teacher, read a paper at the Woman's Congress, advocating the spanking of infants in the primary grades. This idea will, if acted upon, be anything but a welcome innovation to the city's taxpayers, although it may be hailed with joy by the schoolm'ams, who yearn to practice upon the anatomy as well as the minds of insubordinate kidlets. It would be physically impossible, even for an athletic teacher, to administer corporal punishment to a class of several dozen small rebels in the good, old-fashioned way, and the department has enough to do to pay salaries without incurring the expense of spanking machines. Meanwhile the maternal hand and the paternal slipper will doubtless continue to get in their deadly work.

A LOVE feast was held by the Congregational Club this week, the Methodist and Presbyterian brothers breaking bread together. Love feasts seem to be extremely popular with the Congregationalists hereabouts, the most successful in the holy history of the local denomination having been held in a series by one Charles O. Brown, D. D., who did not, however, content himself with breaking bread, but broke the commandments and the clerical record of the church simultaneously into most unholy smithereens. To follow his career consistently, this pastoral animal, instead of browsing in Chicago's fertile fields, should be financially broke, and breaking rocks in the congenial environs of a penitentiary.

IN days of old it was fashionable for a shepherd to walk at the head of his flock. Later on the mode changed, and he drove it with the assistance of a dog, whose menaces terrified it, but perceiving that the beast's bark was worse than his bite, the sheep laughed and ceased to fear. This is a parable of the church; the dog is the devil. Dr. Dille, of the Central M. E. Church, has been uttering the weekly wail because young men prefer cycling to church-going. It is not surprising that they find fresh air more invigorating than the average sermon. The cycle is up-to-date, but the sanctuary is behind the age.

MRS. Carrie Higley Dimond is wondering whether she made such a good exchange after all in leaving her luxurious island home to become a giddy burlesque actress. There seems to have been a hitch in the elopement in the first place, for the fascinating drug clerk soon became invisible, and has not been heard of since; and now those photographs of her extremities so freely scattered over the town don't look as appetizing as she fondly hoped they would, even when painted pink. Carrie is a star, but she's barely twinkling.

THE TOWN CRIER is pleased to notice that the poppers and mommers of San Francisco have been protesting against the length of the racing season on the grounds that the race course has injurious effects on the budding morals of their sons. This shows that the old-fashioned custom of training up a child in the way he should go is not entirely out of vogue, as some suppose. A boy who is not brought up on Puritan principles is cheated out of a glorious heritage. He can never know to the full the joys of going astray.

POLICEMAN Cassius Blackburn abused his deadhead privileges by demanding that the Sutter-street ear upon which he was enjoying a free ride, should stop in order to allow him to make his exits and entrances in a dignified and majestic mauuer. Now the company retaliates by putting him off the free list. Now Blackburn should be frozen out by the fruit and peanut stands, and frowned upon by all the pretty chambermaids and nurses on his beat.

CIGAR dealer A. Mass and wife have been arrested for obtaining money under false pretenses. People are continually getting into trouble, trying to amass wealth. The TOWN CRIER rejoices in his poverty, and righteously condemns the course of the acquisitive tobaccoist and his spouse for endeavoring to live up to the family name.

THE DOLL'S FUNERAL—WILL ALLEN DROMGOOLE, IN N. O. PICAYUNE

WHEN my dolly died, when my dolly died,
I sat on the step and I cried, and I cried;
And I couldn't eat any jam and bread,
'Cause it didn't seem right when my doll was dead.
And Bridget was sorry as she could be,
For she patted my head and "Oh," said she.
"To think that the pretty has gone and died!"
Then I broke out afresh, and I cried and cried.

And all the dollies from all around
Came to see my doll put under the ground;
There were Lucy Lee and Mary Clack
Brought their dolls over all dressed in black.
And Emmeline Hope and Sara Lou
Came over and brought their dollies, too.
And all the time I cried, and I cried,
'Cause it hurt me so when my dolly died.

We dressed her up in a new white gown,
With ribbons and laces all around;
And made her coffin in a box
Where my brother keeps his spelling books,
And we had some prayers, and a funeral, too;
And our hymn was "The Two Little Girls in Blue."
But for me, I only cried and cried,
'Cause it truly hurt when my dolly died.

We dug her a grave in the violet bed,
And planted violets at her head;
And we raised a stone and wrote quite plain:
"Here lies a dear doll who died of pain."
And then my brother he said "Amen,"
And we all went back to the house again.
But all the time I cried and cried,
Because 'twas right when my doll had died.

And then we had more jam and bread,
But I didn't eat 'cause my doll was dead.
But I tied some rrape on my dollhouse door,
And then I cried and cried some more.
I couldn't be happy, don't you see!
Because the funeral belonged to me.
And then the others went home; and then
I went out and dug up my doll again.

HEARTS FOR SALE.—MAUD HOSFORD, IN LIFE.

For sale: A very fine line of hearts
At prices far below cost,
A circumstance which affords you a chance
To replace the one you have lost.

Hearts that are tender; hearts that are brave;
One that's been worn on a sleeve
Is marked down so low it surely must go,
Though it is somewhat soiled, you perceive.

Broken hearts, too, that have been "restored;"
One that has only a crack;
And hearts that are set on a coronet,
For lovers of hric-a-brac.

Sad hearts, glad hearts, hearts of gold,
Hearts that gold only can buy;
And a heart so true it will just suit you
If you'll only take it to try.

MY THOUGHT—AND HER'S!—PAUL DUNBAR, IN LADIES' HOME JOURNAL.

The gray of the sea and the gray of the sky,
A glimpse of the morn like a half-closed eye;
The gleam on the waves and the lights on the land,
A thrill in my heart—and my sweetheart's hand.

She turned from the sea with a woman's grace,
And the light fell soft on her upturned face.
And I thought of the floodtide of infinite bliss
That would flow to my soul with a single kiss.

But my sweetheart is shy, so I dared not ask
For the boon, so bravely I wore the mask;
But in her face there came a flame—
I wonder could she have been thinking the same?

DEAR EDITH: Bright colors are fashionable now, but when true feminine taste blends the combination the effect is pleasing rather than otherwise. Of course, the senses are shocked by the blaze of coloring; but as a rule the colors are so mixed that they please and delight the eye. One of the neatest examples of this treatment I note in a dress of bright billiard green crepe cloth. Its texture was so soft, it was so closely covered with tiny crepe wrinkles that did not seem to ridge the surface, that the color took on a thousand lights and made the green harmonize with any shade of green put with it, and with any other color, too, as a leaf does on a rose tree. The skirt was made over black satin, the breadths rounded short at waist and hem to show the satin. A deep facing of plaid silk reached the knees on the under side of the skirt, the plaid showing dark blue, dark green, and lines of scarlet and light green, a tiny streak of daffodil yellow striping here and there as inconspicuously as a streak of sunshine on a lily pad. One bodice for this skirt was plaid silk, crossed in a lot of folds over the front and fastening under a big frill from shoulder to belt. The belt was wide, fitted, and from black satin. A green cloth bolero, that fastened also at the side with a series of straps, between which the frill of the silk bodice showed, was for wear over this silk bodice. The jacket was lined with bright green.

The trick can be done too when the variety of colors is not great, and when the dominant one is very brilliant. The skirt was serge, and had a row of appliqued black braiding at the hem. The bodice was cerise taffeta, was tucked between the hretelles, gathered at the waist, and held by a belt of scarlet India foulard. The hretelles of scarlet silk were trimmed with appliqued braiding, and a full ruching of black chiffon finished the neck. Even when worn with a scarlet hat of turban shape, trimmed with black tips, this dress will not seem too striking or too high colored, so effective is a little black in softening the brilliancy of reds. The proportion of black is much greater than this in many cases, and women who are fond of quiet effects will be pretty sure to use more. They need not, however, for scarlet is to be so abundant that a dress like that just described will not seem assertive.

A favorite resort of those who are a bit fearful of overdoing bright colors is to mask them with a sober, but semi-transparent material. This method of making is highly fashionable, as by it the two chief characteristics of the season—bright colors and elaborateness—can be combined in one dress. Besides this point it has much to recommend it. Beauty of result is strongly on its side, and then it affords a fine chance for her who is ingenious as well as of sound judgment in dress matters.

From the standpoint of economy there is, perhaps, less to say in its favor. True, there is a host of beautiful transparent fabrics that are stylish and inexpensive, but what of saving is scored up by these is all wiped out by the outlay necessary for the silken lining. In these circumstances it is some comfort to remember that new styles are very seldom favorable to economy, and after taking all possible solace from this fact, the next thing is to consider how to do the trick inexpensively. There are many models that tend toward this end, and a very pretty one is thus described: Its skirt was of black grenadine over salmon silk lining, three small ruffles of the silk trimming it near the foot. Shirring on the back and front of the bodice supplied a yoke effect, and from this hung a pleating of salmon chiffon. The sleeves were gathered to the elbows, ending in chiffon frills; salmon chiffon and black chiffon were combined in the collar, and very handsome figured salmon ribbon gave the belt and the elbows at the shoulders an effect that saved the outlines there from bareness. Tight sleeves may be coming, indeed they can be seen not infrequently, but seldom without some elaboration at the shoulders to take the place of the departed puffs.

INSURANCE

THERE will probably be a change in the management of the Union Casualty and Surety Company in the next thirty days, if, indeed, it does not retire from the Coast altogether.

It is rumored that there will be a change in the Coast management of the Atlas.

The mercantile community is taking very kindly to the return to old P. I. U. rates, which were announced as the result of the new insurance compact.

Arthur M. Brown has become a partner with his father under the name of Brown & Son. They have the Coast agency of the American, of Philadelphia, and the Svea.

The year book of the Spectator Publishing Company is out.

The different Casualty companies are making an effort to combine against the Frankfort—the only company outside the board. The plan is to cut the rate made by the Frankfort, and all such business will be reinsured in the different companies.

The Metropolitan Life has completed a large 8-story building in New York, and will occupy the entire structure.

The Caledonia Insurance Company, represented by L. B. Edwards on this Coast, has issued a magnificent brochure, which is being distributed to the patrons of the company in this city.

Julius Ach, the well-known Manufacturers' agent, has been appointed inspector for the Kalamazoo Sprinkling Company.

Wilcox & Company, agents for the Battery Insurance Company, are issuing a handsome calendar.

The New York Insurance Department this year is issuing a complete record of all business done by insurance companies in that State, together with a statement of their standing.

The State Glass Insurance combine in the East is moving Westward, and it is likely that there will be an increase of rates in this city shortly.

Ex-Commissioner Higgins left for the East on Tuesday. His successor is Henry G. Gesford.

HEAVILY OVERSTOCKED.

J. J. O'Brien & Co.'s Great Sacrifice Sale of New Spring Goods.

THE great sacrifice sale of J. J. O'Brien & Co., which began last Monday morning, has crowded that mammoth establishment with customers in search of genuine bargains. The fact that the tremendous reduction applied to every article in the great store, and that the prices that were cut in two meant new, up-to-date spring importations of the best designers and the most famous manufacturers.

The extraordinary character of the sale can be judged from the fact that the Messrs. O'Brien, having nearly doubled their usual spring importations in anticipation of the proposed great increase in the tariff, found themselves heavily overstocked, owing to the backwardness of the season; and this compelled them to adopt the most radical measures to unload the vast quantities of goods on hand before the season becomes too far advanced and while the goods are yet seasonable. That their efforts would be successful was a foregone conclusion in view of the reductions made, the prices in many cases having been cut in two; and these reduced prices are not confined to a few special lines, but extend to every article in every department of the firm's mammoth establishment, including black and colored dress goods, silks, laces, ribbons, gloves, handkerchiefs, dress trimmings, ladies' shirt waists, jackets, capes, suits, dress skirts, hosiery, underwear, corsets, men's and boy's furnishing goods, wash dress fabrics, curtains, linens, housefurnishings, and the thousand and one other articles that go to make up a first-class dry goods stock.

Finally, and most important of all, and the point that appeals with resistless force to those in search of the best values for their money, is the fact that the goods are all new, fresh and clean, of this season's importation, instead of the usual run of old, shelf-worn, obsolete styles that are generally offered at the conventional reduction or cut-price sale. This great sacrifice sale continues next week.

IN the palmy days of his career, no office in the gift of Shasta County would have been withheld from Clay Webster Taylor, the Democratic politician and attorney who died here a few days ago. Among other honors was his election to represent his district in the State Senate, where he had as his deskmate Attorney Charles W. Cross, now of this city. The story goes that the debris question was the dominant issue during that session, and Taylor's constituents made many demands that he declare himself upon the mooted question.

"You'll hear from me all right," said the stentorian-voiced bearer of three famous names, "and it will be no uncertain sound, either."

Then he carefully prepared and wrote out a speech which was to reverberate down the hills of time, change the entire vote of the Legislature, and accomplish several other equally impossible results. After finishing the compilation of this oration, he placed the manuscript, as he thought, in his desk, but inadvertently deposited it in that used by his neighbor, Senator Cross. Now, Taylor and Cross had taken opposite sides in the debris controversy, and when Cross discovered this manuscript in his desk, he considered it ammunition sent him by the gods. He carefully mastered its legal points, and on the very day on which Taylor had planned to deliver it, Cross made a rattling speech, anticipating and refuting in advance all the arguments Taylor had intended to state. The latter was furious, and despite the clamor of his constituents, he was obliged to sit through the debate in speechless rage. Cross told it everywhere, and although Taylor threatened to denounce his opponent in the chamber, he found himself laughed out of the Capitol.

True harbinger of summer, Henry J. Crocker burst forth this week in a magnificent waistcoat of the fashionable tint of the season,—slate colored blue. Wherever he went, he was conscious that people glanced at him in amused surprise, and to escape vulgar observation he sought the seclusion of the University Club.

"Oh, where did you get it?" was the wailing greeting of young Harry Stetson.

"We heard you coming, Henry," added Jack Casserly, with his famous grin.

"Looks as though he had just stepped out of Bond street, you know," remarked Jack Parrott, significantly.

Mr. Crocker hardly considered these personal comments so screamingly funny or killingly witty as to justify the uproarious laughter with which they were greeted. Hastily buttoning up his coat to hide his new raiment, he turned on his heel, feeling somewhat affronted. Jack Casserly, with a deterring arm, turned him around, in full view of the other men.

"My son," said Jack, with paternal demeanor, "it is a pernicious practice to buy your clothes in London. I am glad you patronize the tailors of your own land. But why do you wear the badge?" and he skillfully removed a tag, bearing the words, "Ah Wong, $1.35."

It cost Crocker the price of several bottles. He says he will get even with Eddie Eyre for that tag, if it takes all summer.

Anticipatory joys abound in art circles over the expected arrival from New York of Emil Carlsen, who is about to revisit his old hunting grounds in this city, after an absence of five years. During his sojourn here, his friends assert that he will again occupy his old studio quarters on Barbary Coast, the former Mecca of all lovers of still life. There, Emil gracefully played the role of entertainer, and his "Four O'clocks" were famous in Bohemian circles. No girl of his acquaintance ever needed to go thirsty. A pilgrimage to Montgomery avenue would always insure her a foaming gin fizz or a cool cocktail, artfully concocted by the sunny-tempered painter. He was intensely proud of the degree conferred upon him by that club within the Bohemian Club—the Knights of the Round Table—which dubbed him "D. D." (Dissipated Dane) and he used the mystic initials with as great a flourish as does any learned parson with his much-prized "Doctor of Divinity."

Carlsen's work in San Francisco was spasmodic, and the sale of a picture always meant the relegation of palette and brushes to a dark corner, the studio being used solely as a place of lavish entertainment until the artist's purse again became depleted. Many of his best pictures adorn the walls of the Bohemian Club, the ransom for princely bills, lavishly contracted in dining room and café.

Emil's greatest success was achieved in paintings of fish, and one, which he considered his masterpiece, represented a big harracuda, sent him by an admirer from Catalina Island. The fish was packed in ice, and Carlsen worked on it several days. When the odor became too pungent in his studio, during a party, he shied the fish out of a window, and noticed it, early next morning, lying in the alley. Emil had been accustomed to take his meals in an adjacent Spanish restaurant, but when the waiter brought him barracuda on three successive days, the still-life painter concluded to change his caterer.

To the visit of E. L. Thayer is ascribed much of the recent gaiety of the clubs, although the once rollicking Eddie of San Francisco's most advanced bohemianism is now transformed into a supposedly staid business man of Boston. It was during his residence here that he wrote, anonymously, that famous epic poem, "Casey at the bat," and it was penned during great financial stress. Thayer and Eugene Lent, fresh from Harvard, having had a disagreement with their respective sires, decided to carve out their fortunes unaided. To that end, they applied for work to their former classmate, the then youthful proprietor of the Examiner. They were given regular assignments on the paper, although they were disgusted to find no resemblance to the companion of their college escapades in the distant and unapproachable employer whom they accordingly dubbed "The Great White Throne." This dread being was absolutely pitiless on questions of finance, and the petted darlings of rich fathers, with luxurious college habits added, found it no easy task to maintain their membership in the Pacific-Union Club, go the pace and pay car-fare, on their salaries of twenty dollars per week. After an elaborate dinner, one night, they gave their last dollar to the waiter, and then decided that nothing but a carriage would restore their shattered health. Having issued a mandate to a hackman, they proceeded to climb in, but the cabby, familiar with the condition which prompts such abandon, demanded a retainer in advance. As this was impossible, a consultation was held.

"It's no use asking for another order on the cashier from the Great White Throne," said 'Gene. "Give him 'Casey,' Eddie."

The poem had hitherto been heard only indoor, with the recitative author on the table, each verse punctuated by mugs and bottles. But Thayer was in the humor for it that night and no party of his friends ever heard him so well describe the lack of joy in Mudville as the open-mouthed Jehu on the pavement. Casey and Thayer between them won the cabby's heart and he not only drove the boys to the Cliff House, but waited for them all night. The bill? Oh, that's another story.

In the person of the accomplished dramatic singer at the Tivoli, it is hard to perceive much resemblance to the Denis O'Sullivan, as San Franciscans principally remember him, who, less than ten year ago was a bashful boy making no pretension to vocal merit. Some of the other boys, indeed, declared that he could sing like an old-time minstrel, but no amount of coaxing could sufficiently overcome his modesty to induce a display of his talent before young women.

One summer, while the O'Sullivan's were staying at the Hotel Rafael, the talk of their brothers and friends concerning Neely's wonderful singing aroused a keen desire to hear him in the hearts of the society girls of that season. It was a case of Mahomet and the mountain, so the girls begged for eavesdropping facilities. One of the men arranged that, as young O'Sullivan would sing to a male audience that afternoon in the billiard room, the girls could be secreted in an adjoining apartment, entrance to which was provided only through the billiard-room. All of the arrangements were carried out and the young singer delighted his audience, both seen and unseen. Many drinks were ordered and their co-conspirator managed to smuggle some glasses to the imprisoned but joyful young ladies. One song led to another, each man demanding his favorite. Finally, the selections degenerated from the classical to the ballads of the concert hall and Denis was persuaded to sing a French ditty, more remarkable for its melody than its morals. Unfortunately, the society girls understood French, and it would be difficult to estimate their relative chagrin with that of their escort. Unconscious of these unwelcome auditors, Denis was about to respond to a rapturous encore, when the unhappy prisoners, unable to endure another Parisian number, rapped on the table with their glasses, in sheer desperation.

And then there was a scene! Denis had been trapped, but so had the girls, and they dared not express their mutual reproaches, but they all turned their indignation on the wretched man who had arranged the secret audience. Most of those girls are young matrons now, and that is why the story is being revived, for the incident has hitherto been a strictly tabooed topic.

Included in the paraphernalia which the De Wolf Hoppers brought to San Francisco is a thousand-dollar pug, presented to Edna Wallace by Willie Hearst of New York. To the unbounded admiration of Willie for the petite opera singer is ascribed the laudatory telegrams published in the Examiner from every water tank along the transeontinental journey of the company. Great interest in that diminutive canine is taken in the Mission-street editorial rooms, and daily bulletins are posted by City Editor Garrett regarding its health and the character of the food it consumes. Intense rivalry is manifested among the members of the staff for the honor of attendance on the dog, and it is adjudged high treason to refer to the animal as a "pup." Its advent has been the means of shattering the friendship of two old chums, for since the managing news editor detailed Fred Lawrence for the honorable assignment of leading the pug from the ferry to the hotel, Jake Dressler has been unable to conceal his jealous rage, and now refuses to speak to his former companion.

The proximity of Senator W. J. Biggy is always readily discernible by the cigars he smokes, suggestive of Cuba before the revolution. While the quality of his perfectos admits of no question, his friends have little hesitation in guying the genial statesman, in the supposed belief that his Havanas are so many bluffs to the hox. Biggy takes the chaffing good naturedly, and occasionally goes the gayer one better.

"Ahem! Is that imported, Senator?" was the suspicious query, a few days ago, of a friend, with a disdainful sniff.

"Yep. Brought in through the customs all right."

"Oh, I see. From Chinatown?" persisted the friend.

"Well, no. They were imported in bulk by the Kittle Cordage Company," replied the Senator, cheerily.

While all the other insurance men on the street are praying for rain, which would produce big crops of grain and give the companies fat premiums for policies covering the growing cereals, Ned Bosqui is quite content with dry weather, so long as there is plenty of it. Being a true sportsman, he is naturally more interested in the hatching of young birds than in the writing of prosaic policies, for which there is not even a closed season.

"No, sir, you are mistaken. We don't want rain," he asserted to J. D. Maxwell. "It would spoil the crops."

"Why, you are crazy, man," replied Maxwell. "Then his curiosity got the better of his judgment. "What crops would it spoil?" he asked.

"The crop of quail," joyously replied the crack shot of the Country Club.

If Tivoli parties were the rule last week, the Baldwin has been similarly favored this week, society turning out in large numbers to welcome the DeWolf Hoppers and enjoy El Capitan in the first place, and in the second the delicious little suppers that followed the performance. Otherwise the week has also been much livelier than the last one was, and though it is now rather late in the season to expect anything very formal, some of the entertainments given approached that style very nearly. For instance, the musical tea given by Mrs. Darling at the Occidental Hotel on Monday afternoon, when she entertained a large number of her friends, and at the same time received their congratulations on the news just received of Major Darling's appointment as Military Attache at Vienna—one of the most brilliant courts in Europe. Mrs. C. P. Huntington was chief guest of the occasion, and one of the features was a number of Major Darling's compositions, which were given, making it almost a recital of his musical gems, which were listened to with delight by Mrs. Darling's guests. The decorations were all in crimson, including bunting, roses, carnations, etc. Major and Mrs. Darling having given up their trip to Japan, expect to leave for the East in June, and will form a part of Mr. and Mrs. C. P. Huntington's party over the road.

There were several card parties on Tuesday, and a very delightful tea given by Miss Meyerstein at her home on Octavia street, her guests being all young people, and twelve of her young girl friends assisted her in receiving.

On Wednesday Mr. C. P. Huntington gave a banquet at his residence on California street, entertaining one hundred guests, representing chiefly members of the different departments of the Southern and Central Pacific Railroads.

The event of principal interest to the young people on Wednesday was the dinner dance at the Presidio, given in honor of Miss Ethel Coben, the bride-elect of Lieutenant C. L. Bent, and which was a most charming affair, as are, in fact, all the entertainments given at that most hospitable army post. Among the party of twenty-eight at dinner were the Misses May and Alice Hoffman, Ida Gibbons, Emma Butler, Clemmy Kip, Kate Salisbury, Bernie Drown, Helen Wagner and Julia Crocker.

Among the last of April weddings was the ceremony which united Miss Marguerite Heister and Robert Higgins, performed by the Rev. Dr. Spalding, at the Heister residence on Howard street, last Friday at noon. White roses artistically arranged with green foliage converted the parlors into veritable bowers, and the toilettes of the bride and her maid-of-honor, Miss Kate Hyland, were springlike in their dainty freshness, the bride's robe being of white organdie over white satin, trimmed with Valenciennes lace; her fleecy tulle veil held in place by a diamond star, and her bouquet was of bride's roses. Miss Hyland's costume was of white mousseline de soie over pink satin, and she carried a cluster of long-stemmed La France roses. Herbert Calinan supported the groom as best man. A wedding breakfast followed the ceremony, and later in the day the newly-wedded pair left town for their future home at the Needles.

First on the list of May weddings comes that of Miss May Spencer and Ira N. Breedlove, which took place at Trinity Church at 4 o'clock last Saturday afternoon (May Day), the Rev. George Walk officiating. There were no attendants, and the wedding reception was held in Oakland at the residence of Mrs. Wm. Jacobs on Oak street.

The wedding of Miss Grace Young and Francis C. Williams was solemnized at the home of the bride, on Pacific avenue, on Wednesday evening.

June, the month of roses, is to be prolific of weddings, an announcement made this week adding another to the long list of those already arranged to take place. The bride and groom-elect in this instance are Miss Helen Wright and Chas. L. Davis. Another recent announcement is of the engagement of Miss Eva Estelle Worth and George R. Gay.

Miss Minnie Burton has reconsidered her first intention of having a number of bridesmaids, and has decided that her sisters, the Misses Leila and Kathro Burton, shall be her sole attendants. However, a whole bevy of her pretty girl friends will assist at the reception which will follow the ceremony, for which several hundred cards have been issued. Lieutenant Thos. Pierce, her groom-elect, will arrive from Fort Logan about the 23rd, accompanied by his best man, Lieutenant Wm. Sells, also from Fort Logan.

The reception and exhibition given by the Thursday evening class of the San Francisco Riding Club; Mrs. Joe Crockett's luncheon party of twelve ladies; Mrs. Walter Campbell's musical reception for Mrs. Bishop, and Miss Florence Sharon's début tea in Oakland, are among the recent society gatherings.

The details of a Poster Show and Matinee Concert to be given at Golden Gate Hall, for the benefit of the Old Ladies' Home, on next Saturday afternoon have been arranged, and the indications are that it will be a society affair and very well attended. Mr. Denis O'Sullivan will sing, the Misses Ames and Marie Wilson, as well as the Saturday Morning Orchestra, will assist, and at the conclusion of the concert the Art Posters will be sold by auction. Mr. Fred Yates and Miss Helen Hyde are among the artists who will be represented in this line.

The lady managers of the Maria Kip Orphanage will celebrate the opening of their new building, on Lake street, on Saturday, the 22d of May, with a musical reception. Herr Schott, Frank Coffin, S. Homer Henley, Miss Alice Bacon, Mrs. Richard Bayne and others will take part in the programme.

Mr. and Mrs. Leon Lewin (née Goodman) have departed for Europe. Mrs. Lewin's farewell reception at the Palace Hotel on Monday was very largely attended. Mr. and Mrs. W. I. Kip and their daughters, who will spend the summer at the Hotel Rafael, left town for that charming hostelry on Saturday last. Miss Ada Sullivan and Miss Masten are also among the guests at the Hotel Rafael. Mrs. George Howard, who leaves to-day for Europe, where she will join Mr. Howard, expects to make a visit of some duration in the Old World.

The engagement is announced of Theodore E. Schucking, son of Mrs. E. Schucking and nephew of the Hon. Adolph Sutro and of the late Levin Schucking, a well-known German author, to Miss Ella Leichter, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. C. P. L. Leichter and niece of Mr. Frederick Hess of the Demokrat. Both young people are well and favorably known in the best German society circles of this city.

The marriage of Miss Oppenheim and Hugo Lyons has been arranged to take place on the 30th of May. Mr. and Mrs. Albert Raas returned from their Southern trip on Sunday last and are at the Hotel Baltimore, on Van Ness avenue. They will spend the summer in San Rafael.

In response to the many requests for a repetition of Mr. Ad. Locher's mass, it will be sung at the French Church (Notre Dame des Victoires), on Bush street, between Stockton and Grant avenue, Sunday, May 9th, at 11 a. m. Mr. Locher's composition has been accepted at Bordeaux, and will be sung there shortly at St. Peter's Church by eminent artists.

The Gingerbread Fête, to be opened at the residence of Mrs. Clark Crocker, corner of Sutter and Octavia streets, on next Tuesday evening, the 11th, and continue afternoon and evening for the rest of the week, in aid of the Children's Hospital, is attracting great attention. A most interesting programme of entertainment has been arranged by the ladies having the fête in hand. The handsome grounds will be brilliantly illuminated at night, a shooting gallery will be provided, and especial arrangements made for entertainment of children on Wednesday and Saturday evenings. A number of noted paintings will be exhibited, among them being "The Cardinal's Portrait," by Toby Rosenthal.

In a monastery, seated in an arm chair near a table, on which is a bottle of Italian wine and a dish of fruit, is a Cardinal whose portrait is being painted by a young monk. The Cardinal is rather well advanced in years, and apparently not strong; still, judging by his partially finished portrait on the easel, it will be noticed that he desires to appear as a man in the full vigor of life.

While the monk has been at work the Cardinal has fallen into a sound sleep. His head has dropped on his chest, and a book which he had been reading has fallen to the floor. It is at this moment that the monk turns away from his canvas, and seeing the Cardinal asleep, he stands, palette in hand, bewildered and nonplussed. He dare not awaken the high dignitary of the church, neither can he proceed with his portrait. With his hand in his chair he is a picture of astonishment, as he gazes on the Cardinal.

The contrast between the latter as he is and as he is made to appear on the canvas is remarkable. The canvas is 43x55 inches, and the many details that Rosenthal introduced are beautifully carried out. A handsome piece of tapestry forms a part of the back-ground, while a rich carpet covers the platform on which the Cardinal's chair stands.

The artist Defregger gave it as his opinion that this latest work of Toby Rosenthal is the most brilliant that he has ever done, while Kaulbach, in speaking of it, said that it reminded him of, or rather appeared to him like a large Meissonnier. In Munich the Prince Regent went to see it twice; while in Berlin, where it was afterwards exhibited, it attracted the attention of Emperor William.

The object of the fête is most worthy, and a generous response to the praiseworthy efforts of the ladies having it in charge will be made. Admission for the evening will be 50 cents; afternoon, 25 cents.

The Vendome at San Jose easily takes rank among the few first-class hotels on the Pacific Coast. Its appointments are both abundant and refined, its management in all respects thoroughly up to date, and cuisine and service are everything that the guest can desire. The grand popular concerts given every Sunday afternoon by the Vendome orchestra, are a feature of the Sabbath's recreation, and are greatly enjoyed by the people of the Garden City, and the guests of the hotel. The music is of a high class, and is rendered in a finished and artistic manner. Hotel Vendome is a source of pride to the citizens of San Jose, and a pleasant home for those who sojourn there for a day or remain a season.

Major John A. Darling, U. S. A., now on leave of absence, in this city, is reported to be slated for military attaché of the American Embassy at Vienna. His many friends, and the friends of his charming wife, who was Mrs. Catherwood, are greatly pleased at the Major's reported good fortune.

JOHN PARTRIDGE, stationer, printer, and book-binder, at 306 California street, has recently added a large space to his manufacturing department, and has greatly increased the capacity of his printing establishment by the purchase of new type and other materials. All kinds of half-tone, line drawing, color work, etc., done at lowest prices consistent with legitimate trade.

When pondering over the worry of getting up your dinners and entertainments, it is a relief to remember that Max Abramam, the caterer, at 428 Geary street, takes complete charge of your banquet hall or dining room and prepares the wedding feast or the banquet with perfect satisfaction to both host and guests. Tell your troubles to him.

SANDS W. FORMAN, ex-Supervisor, has been appointed a notary public for the city and county of San Francisco, and has opened an office at 19 Montgomery street. Mr. Forman will attend to the taking of depositions, protests and notes, acknowledgments, affidavits, etc., with promptness.

EL CAMPO, the popular Sunday bay resort, is open for the season. The steamer Ukiah will leave Tiburon ferry at 10:30 A. M., and every two hours thereafter until 4 P. M., and will make the final return trip at 5 P. M.

GOOD HOUSEKEEPING.

GEORGE Meredith, in "Rhoda Fleming," speaking of Margaret Lovell, says, "She was a most distinguished sitter in a luxurious drawing-room chair, which is a more difficult thing than you may suppose," but one must be phenomenally awkward to manage to sit ungracefully in the "luxurious drawing-room chairs" of to-day. So cunningly are they fashioned to fit every angle of the room and adjust themselves to every curve of the body, that one only requires a certain yieldingness, as it were, to become a "distinguished sitter."

The variety in chairs is so great, and the patterns shown are so excellent, that if you have only one chair to buy it will be worth your while to make a comprehensive study of the subject before making your purchase. A few years ago, the Turkish chair was considered the acme of luxury, but beside the creations of to-day it looks clumsy and stuffy. It has no grace of outline.

Other high-back chairs are an arm-chair of English oak which, already upholstered in heraldic English tapestry, and one with mahogany arms and legs, but seat and back upholstered in gold and green Cambridge cotton.

Lighter high-back hall, library or parlor chairs are popular, either in mahogany or the dark-veined toa-wood. Others are in forest-green ash, and there is an infinite variety of wicker chairs in natural wicker or stained forest-green, brown, black, or blue.

The green satin sometimes called "Epping-forest green," is especially admirable for country halls, or for libraries, unless one affects the heavy black English or Dutch oak style of furnishing.

Among oddities in chairs is one of California "toa-wood," in massive, rectangular lines, with a rush seat of coarse grass. It is not exactly the chair you would choose for the boudoir of some lithe, latter-day damsel, but her portly father would take infinite comfort in its capacious depths.

Never stain furniture in imitation of some other kind of wood. In carrying out a color scheme, especially in chambers, soft-wood furniture may be greatly improved by staining it the dominant color; but hard-wood furniture, however simple the design, is handsomest when given a varnished, polished or dead finish that brings out the natural tint and grain of the wood. Enamel is not a pretentious humbug like stain in imitation of hard wood. On the contrary, it is often the most effective method of renovating cheap, old soft-wood bed-room furniture, but, like stain, it never improves hard wood.

Lukewarm soft water, a clean, soft sponge and fine chamois-skin are all that is needed to freshen fine, highly-polished furniture that is only dulled by use. Wet both the sponge and chamois, and wring the latter dry; wash with the former, wetting only a small part of the article before drying, and polishing with the chamois; and in doing the last-mentioned operation, rub always in one direction. Slight dents in furniture can usually be raised by wetting the spot, then placing a wet cloth over it, and holding a hot sad-iron close enough to steam. White spots can be removed with spirits of camphor, but it also takes off the varnish. No matter what finish is to be given furniture, it should be first well cleaned. Use turpentine or ammonia in warm water, and a flat, rather stiff paint brush for the corners and crevices.

Manufacturers have evidently learned that however attractive in design and coloring they make cheap casement muslins, that are faded and stringy with a month's use, the woman who knows what economy really is cannot be deluded into buying them a second time, for the shops show less of such trash than heretofore.

For sash curtains—either half or full length—plain swiss; dotted, woven figured and cord and lace striped white muslins are far more popular than those with woven or printed colored designs.

Tamboured muslins are in little favor, consequently no new styles are shown.

Lace-striped and plain scrim has regained much of its old-time popularity, and there is a beautiful quality of cream cheese-cloth at fifteen cents a yard that is in every way desirable for casement or long drapery curtains.

In colored draperies there are printed gossamers thirty-six inches wide, that are beautiful in quality of weave, but like cheaper muslins, the greater number are printed in strong colors and hold designs. Penang muslins show smaller and more dainty designs, in softer tints of color; fifty-four inches wide.

Nottingham, Tamhour, Irish point, Brussels, and all other kinds of pattern lace curtains come by the piece in white, or both white and ecru, for sash curtains; are twenty-seven inches wide.

Point d'esprit lace is charming for either casement or long curtains, but it is too flimsy, unless the best quality is purchased.

THE great firm of Miller & Lux filed articles of incorporation on Monday, with a capital of $12,000,000. The incorporators and directors are Henry Miller, Henry Lux, Thomas B. Bishop, J. Leroy Nickel, Edward T. Allen, Jesse S. Potter and Azro N. Lewis. The object of the incorporation is for the purpose of facilitating the distribution of the estate and legally winding up its affairs. The property of the incorporation consists of lands from Oregon to Texas, and thousands of cattle, sheep and hogs, besides other property; and it will require several years to dispose of all their varied interests to advantage.

THE San Francisco and North Pacific Railway has issued a beautiful little booklet descriptive of the country through which the line runs. It is filled with photographic views of some of the many lovely points along its route. The San Francisco and North Pacific Railway is the picturesque road running out of the city; and it pierces a section of the State that is the ideal cruising ground of the summer camper, the fisher, and hunter. YOU WILL FORGET.—PALL MALL GAZETTE.

You will forget—a few swift hours,
Fortune and fame and all to woo,
And ere the bloom forsakes the flowers
The lips you kiss have kissed for you,
And ere the morrow's sun is set,
You will forget.

You will forget—a mile or so,
And out of sight is out of mind;
The easy tears soon cease to flow
When life's before and life's behind;
Aye, love, while still your eyes are wet,
You will forget.

You will forget—in other years
When you behold that white starshine
We see so dimly through the tears;
When you shall pass these doors of mine.
Or that dear spot where first we met,
You will forget.

You will forget—let me love on,
You have been all in all to me;
So when the past is dead and gone,
Like some fine golden phantasy,
Let me love on, to pay my debt—
You will forget.

THE TAVERN OF CASTLE CRAG.

THE Tavern of Castle Crag was built in the heart of the Sierras, almost at the foot of Mount Shasta, and amid the most picturesque mountain scenery accessible to the tourist. The eligibility of the place selected was due to a rare combination of flowing water, inspiring mountain scenery and inviting forests.

The Tavern of Castle Crag, with its splendid environment, it was believed would appeal chiefly to those who seek a summer resort for health, recreation, outdoor sports, sympathy with nature and informal sociability. To emphasize this intention and signify the kind of invitation extended, the name TAVERN of Castle Crag was chosen.

To avoid all implication of sumptuous accommodations, or the tyranny of social formalism, and to realize this original conception, the management has decided to make the Tavern of Castle Crag distinctively a family resort; and especially attractive to those to whom health, recreation and sympathy with nature are paramount considerations. To this end rooms on the first and second floors of this splendid tavern, with board, will be furnished at a monthly rate of $65 a person; and rooms on the third floor, with board, at a monthly rate of $50 a person.

The accommodations of the Tavern are first-class in every particular. Its parlors and halls are elegant and spacious. Its verandas are cool and inviting, placing the guest always in the presence of the most attractive mountain scenery to be enjoyed from the balcony of any tavern in the world.

The opportunity for outdoor sports embraces hunting, fishing, riding, bicycling, walking on mountain paths, and driving on picturesque roads. The Tavern is located immediately on the main trunk line of the California and Oregon railroad, and is fourteen hours' ride from San Francisco, twelve hours from Stockton, ten hours from Sacramento thirty hours from Los Angeles, and twenty-three hours from Portland. The Tavern of Castle Crag is reached from San Francisco and Sacramento without loss of time. The train leaves San Francisco at 8 o'clock P. M., arriving early the following morning for breakfast, which is always ready upon the arrival of the train. Returning, the train time affords equal accommodation. Thus both in going and in coming the comfort of the passenger and the economy of his time have been studied. In brief, the Tavern of Castle Crag realizes to its guests the perfect ideal of that spring-time in the high altitudes of the Sierras which never becomes high summer, and is the comfortable home of pleasing recreation and restful repose.

SAN FRANCISCO
NEWS LETTER

Vol. LIV.

SAN FRANCISCO, MAY 15, 1897.

Number 20.

Printed and Published every Saturday by the proprietor, FRED MARRIOTT
 54 Kearny street, San Francisco. Entered at San Francisco Postoffice as Second-class Matter.

The office of the NEWS LETTER in New York City is at Temple Court;
 and at Chicago, 503 Boyce Building. (Frank E. Morrison, Eastern Representative), where information may be obtained regarding subscription and advertising rates.

THE Mayor suggests that Lotta's perpetual fountain be gilded. The suggestion is well in its way; but, unfortunately, to gild a nuisance does not abate it.

IF Mayor Phelan prove himself able to enforce economy and business methods in the different departments of his official family, he will have manufactured a plank large enough to carry him from the City Hall to Sacramento.

SOCKLESS Simpson, the Kansas Representative, asked Speaker Reed the other day: "Where am I at?" To which the Maine statesman responded: "I have never been able to find anybody who knew that." Judge Hebbard has just propounded the same question to twelve of his fellow-citizens, and has received about the same answer.

EMPLOYEES who will have to wait three months before their warrants can be cashed by the city are fortunate. They can afford to wait. Their hours of toil are shorter, their labors lighter, and their pay greater, than rule in commercial circles for similar services. Were they to resign to-day, five thousand competent men would clamor for their shoes at half their salaries.

EFFORTS to put the wires strung about the city underground should receive the assistance of everyone who wishes to see San Francisco dressed in modern garb. But it is far more likely that the irony of fate, and the ordinary course of nature, will see the progressive citizens who advocate this innovation well and securely under the ground before the wires reach that desired destination.

WHILE the fate of a celebration of the Fourth of July by the people of San Francisco appears to rest upon an annual municipal appropriation of $3,000, it may be observed that the patriotic subjects of Great Britain here resident have put up $3,500 for a proper celebration of the good Queen's Jubilee. It might not be inappropriate to add that there are not as many Englishmen as Americans living in this city.

THE Mechanics' Institute Fair management has determined to make pure food the central idea and motif, so to say, of the exhibition. This will prove to be a drawing card, and is good business judgment, as well as, incidentally, the right thing. It is promised that one of the attractions will be a dairy in full operation, even including the presence of the mild-mannered and genteel cow. Thanks to the efficient Dockery, the appearance of the female hovine will not be thought to be superfluous or inappropriate.

NO one questions Auditor Broderick's sincerity in his contention that there can be found no warrant of law for voting money from the emergency fund in aid of the unemployed now temporarily employed in completing Balboa boulevard. The Good Book declares that charity covers a multitude of sins; and the Auditor may err on the side of right in this case without fear of incurring the criticisms of the taxpayers or complaints of his bondsmen. Broderick's hesitation might mean just the difference between an empty belly and a full stomach to many.

IN the Fair-Craven will case, some comment has been occasioned by the touching solicitude shown by the attorneys for Mrs. Craven for certain handwriting experts. The solicitude is natural, and is no doubt born of observation. It is really astonishing that the testimony of experts should be held of the slightest consequence; for whoever heard of one of them disagreeing on the stand with the fee obtained in payment for his services? or forgetting in his yearning for the truth which side of the case his testimony was expected to support?

LABOR Commissionier Fitzgerald may be big enough to handle himself on American soil, but when he becomes a self-elected diplomatic representative of this country to Hawaii, he painfully illustrates the difference between ability and absurdity. His threat made to the planters that Congress would oppose annexation if the islanders did not open their arms to the unemployed of the Pacific Coast, who are supposed to be anxiously peering over the bosom of the ocean toward the cane fields of the Hawaiians, was a stretch of the Fitzgerald imagination. Our Labor Commissioner should be chained up in his office, or sent to join the ranks of the unemployed himself.

THE Manufacturers' and Producers' Association held an important meeting Wednesday, and determined to employ every effort to make the Pure Food Congress a permanent organization, with branches in every county of the State. Delegates will be named by President Kerr to attend the Trans-Mississippi Congress, to be held at Salt Lake on June 14th. A fight will be made there to prevent the shipping of convict-made goods into this State. A telegram was ordered sent to W. R. Hearst, in New York, asking him to use only California materials in his new building to be erected in this city. The association might well have added a request that Hearst send out a gentleman to take editorial management of his paper.

EDWARD BOYCE, President of the Miners' Federation which has just adjourned at Salt Lake, in his address before the assembled miners, urged them to arm for the purpose of maintaining their rights. "Every miners' union," says this anarchist, "should form a rifle club, so that the inspiring music of the martial tread of 25,000 armed men in the ranks of labor might be heard." And in this revolutionary and treasonable utterance this arch enemy of the laboring man found a hearty amen in the endorsement of Eugene V. Debs. It is well that the headman stalks behind these incendiary and turbulent spirits; and the sooner Debs and Boyce are looking through the bars or wearing stripes in some penitentiary, the better and happier will be the fate of the laboring element in the United States.

SOUTH American trade is just now attracting the attention of the mercantile community of San Francisco, and it is well that the truth is dawning that trade, to be obtained, must be worked for. Too long have this city's merchants lived in the hope that they were entitled by right of original possession to the tribute which, in a few years, made many of them opulent. They have seen trade gradually seek other channels, until to the north and south have been raised up important centers of commerce. It is time to reach out for trade; it is time to get rid of the old-fogy, sleepy ideas of the past. South American trade waits for San Francisco to take it. Some money and more enterprise are necessary. Will our merchants rip the commercial harnesses off the seats of their somewhat un-commercial trousers?

INVOKING THE LIBEL LAW.

JUDGE Hebbard has wasted six weeks, that he owed the public, in a fruitless attempt to gain glory out of libel suits. He has had his benchmen around him; they have beaten the big drums and made much noise; but what have he and they gained by it all? Hebbard came through his election in a blaze of glory. The public, who did not know him, took him at the valuation Sheehan, Baggett and the Examiner put upon him; he received a phenomenal majority at the polls; all his sins of omission and commission were forgotten, and it remained only for him to justify the promises made on his behalf by his friends, and honor the dignified position to which he had been so handsomely elected. But he turned out not to be that kind of a man. He has exhibited himself as he is, and not as our citizens took him to be, and, as a consequence, he could not to-day be elected to any office within the gift of the people. Because of the false pretenses of his friends, he went up like a rocket, but through his love of notoriety, and hatred of all newspaper men, except Long Green Lawrence, he has fallen as rapidly as the stick. He has done little or nothing since the 1st of January last but virulently prosecute two libel suits, has lost in both cases tried, and has seven on his hands yet. During all that time he has drawn his official salary amounting to $1,333.33, his clerk and bailiff have also been paid large sums, and his reporter, we presume, is out and injured, and above all, the public interests have been treated as of no account. A strictly conscientious Judge would have deemed his first duty to be the discharge of the onerous obligations with which our citizens had intrusted him. Not knowing him, they had vindicated him, and at that he ought to have rested. But Hebbard, whose face indicates the man, went in quest of fresh notoriety, and he has got it.

If he were to abide by his own pretenses he would now resign his official position. He claimed that his usefulness was gone until he had been vindicated by a jury of his fellow citizens. Well, he found that such a jury was not to be humbugged by his claqueurs as were the voters, and so the expected vindication turned out to be an utter condemnation. Will he follow the logical course which his own pretenses and judicial propriety alike indicate to him? We think not. He consorts with men of too low a calibre to make clear to him high-minded obligations of that character. The men he consorts with, and who speak for him with great accuracy, make good the old saying: "Tell us the company he keeps, and we will tell you the man he is." He was hail-fellow-well-met with bank emptiers, and now shares with them the unpopularity, if nothing more, of a course that left widows and orphans minus their hard-earned savings. It was a poor and paltry plea he had the hardihood to set up. "He was not responsible," he said, "for the acts of his appointees." He was, when he appointed, in the face of protests from good citizens, and when he failed to remove them when the stockholders called his official attention to what they were doing. If Hebbard was not responsible for Sheehan, their boon companionship and secret confabs lasted a long time for nothing. The breakdown of this particular Judge should teach the lesson that only men of proved qualities and ability should be elected to the Superior Bench. If Hebbard, as a lawyer, ever tried a case in court, we never heard of it. He was for a time a Justice of the Peace, but that is the highest and only legal experience he had prior to reaching his present office. He lacks legal knowledge, in our judgment, and certainly is devoid of the judicial temperament. To all of which is now to be added the wreckage the libel court has strewn around and about him.

The NEWS LETTER has, more in sorrow than in anger, stripped the plumage from this gay bird. It at all times likes to speak well of good Judges. They ordinarily cannot strike back. But it should be remembered that Hebbard was a candidate and free as well as able to defend himself. He did not do it then, just as he did not submit himself to examination in court the other day. That was a bad break for a man of his pretensions to make. If he were conscious of nothing to hide, why did he not speak out? He knew that he would have to submit to a cross-examination, and knowing the cross-examiner, he avoided it. As to the law of the case, we shall have something to say hereafter. Now, as ever, the NEWS LETTER has endeavored to maintain the liberty of the press, without using its privileges as a license or in a bad cause. This has been a contest for the freedom of the press against the dangerous assumption that the judiciary of the country is above criticism; that because a citizen has been made a Judge by the votes of his peers he may not be subject to the same obligations and penalties to which they are amenable. The establishment of such a precedent as has been sought by the prosecution in this case, would be a travesty upon the spirit and the letter of the Constitution of the United States; it would close the mouth of honest criticism and silence the press against any outrage that might stand forth if it were but clothed in judicial garments. We have felt from the first that not the NEWS LETTER alone, but a great principle, in which the press of the country and the whole people were vitally interested, was on trial. While we have been silent, the personal fight against us has been urged on and fed by a desire for revenge of a weak Judge; but we have never felt that the result could be other than the triumph of final Justice, and the deserved and lasting rebuke of a man whose whole career shows that he is unfitted for the high office to which accident and a fortuitous combination of circumstances elevated him. Judge Hebbard has been beaten; the vindication he sought has been spoken by twelve of his peers, and their verdict is a victory for freedom of speech, personal rights, and criticism of the judiciary in which honest men should everywhere rejoice.

Public acknowledgment of the invaluable services of Hon. Samuel M. Shortridge, who conducted the defense of the case, is doubly due him, not only on account of the NEWS LETTER, but for the further reason that his exposition of the law and his arguments involved the principles of personal freedom, without which the guarantee of our constitution would be as shifting sands: they were in reality an able defense of the press and people against a pernicious and dangerous assumption of judicial freedom from legitimate responsibility.

City Finances. Ante-election pledges and post-election performances were drawn in very significant parallel lines at the conference between heads of departments last Saturday at the City Hall. The meeting was held for the purpose of devising some method of staving off the threatened assaults upon the municipal coffers, or of raising or saving money enough to pay for supplies and other necessities aside from salaries. The meeting resulted in a sort of show-down by the different department heads, and the only patriot that could be found with a magnifying glass was Auditor Broderick, who boldly declared that he had discharged two men and compelled the remaining five to work each one hour longer daily. But Broderick stood alone; not another man emerged from the financial ruck who had discharged any of his assistants, or could do so without seriously crippling his office.

The most remarkable exhibition of municipal maladministration, however, was accidentally uncovered by F. W.

Lees, Collector of licenses. He declared with all the rest that he could not run his office for one dollar less than it is costing now. One of his men draws a salary of $1,250 per year, and his collections amount to $1,200. In other words, the city is paying out $50 per year more than it is receiving in this particular branch of Lees' department! This is no doubt an exaggerated illustration, but it shows the loose, wasteful, and more than unsatisfactory manner in which the people's business is being done in some departments. How long would a merchant be able to meet his bills on a basis of this sort; and where is the man who would in private enterprise for a single day permit such a condition of affairs as is known to exist at the City Hall?

The general public who know anything of the hours and the amount of labor performed by the city's employees, will not believe for one moment that the different departments cannot be kept well within their appropriations, or that in such a pinch as at present faces the treasury, cannot satisfactorily perform all reasonable duties with reduced forces. It is safe to say that a level-headed business man could take charge of any branch of the municipal service, and under contract perform every duty for sixty per cent. of the money now paid out.

The fact is, that the people's interests are of secondary consequence—if they are even considered. The offices are first of all for the politicians and their creatures. Some good men are doubtless elected, but they are too often powerless to prevent the loot of the taxpayers by the appointment of incompetent and unfit persons, who have qualified for soft jobs by manipulation at ward meetings and around election booths.

Mayor Phelan, in his determination to personally investigate and for himself determine the value of the statements made at Saturday's conference, meets the approval of every man who wants to see justice done. The Mayor is a business man, and his judgment will be accepted by the people of the city as conclusive. The mere claim of politicians that they are doing the best they can bears no conviction to the minds of intelligent taxpayers. Something reliable and authoritative is wanted now.

The Hawaiian Swindle. To obtain something for nothing, by false representations, is an undoubted swindle. That is why we feel entitled to apply that epithet to the so-called Hawaiian reciprocity treaty. Under it the sugar consumers of this coast pay an average of $4,000,000 a year in rebated sugar duties to a few Hawaiian planters. In return we practically get nothing. It is true that they give us a small trade that would come here anyhow. It could go nowhere else. We are their nearest market, and we have for sale the articles that use has accustomed them to. After all, they bring us only about 8,000 customers. Most of the others are Chinese and Japanese, who do not buy of us, but yet are given an enormous bonus with which to compete with the very people who furnish the bonus. Every pound of sugar imported from Hawaii comes into competition with our new and promising industry of beet-sugar growing. We as a people hold to the doctrine of protecting the home market. But so far from doing that in regard to the Hawaiian article, we actually give a bonus of 1½ cents a pound for the pleasure of having it as a competitor. We, in other words, give protection to the foreigner, whilst applying free trade to our own sugar producers. That is a reversal of the national policy, and substantially filching the benefits of the home market from the home producer.

Senator Perkins avows that he finds himself impaled on the horns of a dilemma on this question. He is a protectionist, but is being urged to vote for free trade by our merchants, and between the two he is troubled to make up his mind as to what he ought to do. Clearly there is no path before him but the straight one. As an honorable man he is bound by the principles he advocated prior to his election. He was then a thick and thin advocate of the home market being preserved for the home producer. He knows perfectly that the Hawaiian treaty does not do that. He admits that it is only "the commercial organizations, banks and exporters of San Francisco who deem the treaty of importance to them." He confesses that "all the interior cities and counties are against the treaty, and that they base their opposition on their desire to see the beet industry succeed." To which he replies that "no one can be more alive than myself to the importance of that industry, and I hope to see it grow and give to the State that prosperity which I believe it is capable of producing." Just so. Then, as a protectionist, why subject it to a free trade competition with Hawaiian sugar? If he is such a believer in the future of the beet, why put this new and struggling industry under a ban? The Senator is very hazy in his words when talking about protection, and seems better posted in the logic of the free trade school of political economists. He is likely to hear language from his constituents that we, in common with his many friends, will regret.

Our silly contemporary, the Examiner, thinks it is a free trader, but knows as little about either free trade or protection as it does about decent journalism, saves less than half a column of space for the discussion of the Hawaiian treaty. Among other stupidities, it actually has the amazing ignorance to claim that we pay for $15,244,977 worth of sugar by parting with $4,184,351 in goods, $1,065,278 in gold and $73,900 in silver. Such a claim seems incredible as coming from even "the new journalism." It goes on to say: "that by paying out $5,323,529 all told, we bought goods worth $15,244,977. Is there any objection to that kind of balance of trade? Is there any one in California who would object to a trade in which he got $15 worth of goods in return for $5? That is what we are doing right along in the Hawaiian trade." Generous Hawaiians! They let us off with a payment of about 33 per cent of the value of the goods they send. Such liberality has not before been discovered in all the world. The Examiner man, as a discoverer, is greater than Nansen. The former has reached the end of financial foolery, whilst the latter has failed to get as far as the pole of folly. It may be accepted as a certainty that the astute missionaries collect dollar for dollar on all they send to us. They do not import their balance of trade to Hawaii, because they have use for it elsewhere, and Honolulu is not a market for gold. Hawaii buys largely from England and Germany, and permits her to do her remitting there. Moreover, the plantations are not all owned in the Islands, and dividends (paid out of our rebated duties), have in large part to go to New England, France, Germany, Great Britain, and to our own State. Again, money goes to the Islands through the mails in the shape of bills of exchange, greenbacks, and the like. England every year imports more than she exports, and according to the Examiner man, to be getting poorer instead of richer. The reciprocity treaty was conceived in jobbery, is a fraud from every point from which it is viewed, and ought to be swept out of existence.

The Tariff Question Goes By the Board. McKinley and Dingley are nowhere these times. They and all they represent have been given the go-by, and the Senate has done it. The House was docile enough, and promptly and without debate passed a measure that within two years would have rendered the Republicans as unpopular as the framers of the Chicago platform. It was simply full of outrageous proposals, that would have grown more and more unpopular every day, and in the end would have buried McKinley as deep as the gold in the Comstock mines now appears to be. The Senate was wise enough to see all this ahead, with the result that we have a brand new set of tariff proposals that out-Herod Herod, and surpass Wilson at all points, that lead towards free trade. It admits that Mr. Dingley's figures are all wrong, and that to make receipts equal to expenditures, an entirely new plan must be adopted. Hence, the increasing of the beer and tobacco taxes, and putting a large duty on tea. These items alone mean an increase of about $60,000,000 a year to the revenue, without an atom of protection to home industries. The other changes all favor lower duties, and some are against all the definitions of protection as we have been taught them from the stump. Thus, while the duties on clothing wools are materially reduced, those on carpet wools are raised to an extent almost, if not quite, ruinous to the carpet industry. The duty of one and one-half cents a pound on bides, while logically sound from a protection point of view, will arouse fierce resistance from all the leather manufacturers of the country. New England is already up in arms, and the fate of the tariff is not as sure as it at one time seemed to be. The tacit abrogation of the present treaty with the Hawaiian Islands is protection to our sugar beet industry, and is a matter of much moment to this coast. No true representative of California can favor the retention of the planters' treaty, all one-sided, monopolistic, and fraudulent as it is. The omission of the retroactive clause was necessary in order to conform to the law. Duties could not be collected until a law authorized their collection. The sugar duty is increased from one cent to one and one-half cents per pound, and the act is to go into effect on the 1st of July. All these changes are of great import, and together constitute a better tariff than we had expected from the party in power. There is still a great deal of paying of election debts, but not nearly so much as was at one time apparent. If the latest proposals go through, we trust that they will never again be changed, except at the instance of a permanent and non-partisan tariff commission.

How the Money Goes. Once more there is to be a shortage in the municipal funds of the year. The sum of $166,180 is said to be the amount needed to make good the deficiency. There will again be a long wait for creditors, much discomfort to teachers and other officials, and confusion in the public accounts. These things occur year after year with unhappy regularity. The last Supervisors went on the same track as their predecessors, and a task is upon the new men to tide the municipality over the difficulties they have inherited. Nearly every one of the departments have overrun the appropriations set apart for their use. How this can be done with the one-twelfth act still on the statute books surpasses our comprehension. In this instance there does not appear to be any particular official upon whom to fix the blame. About all alike have sinned in exceeding the amounts appropriated, and then wrangles over the new Fee bill, and the assessment of bank deposits, reduced the revenue that had been calculated upon. It would be better always to anticipate difficulties of this nature and make allowance for them when the rate is struck. The overdrawing of fixed appropriations is inexcusable, and a way ought to be found to put an end to it. A charter that would regulate these things is badly needed. But if we may judge from past experiences, relief by this road is far off, for there appears only a small disposition upon the part of the majority to accept a way out along this line.

On the Streets at Night. There is a new moral movement on foot in several of our States to prevent young people, under the age of sixteen, parading the streets and out of the way places after nine o'clock at night. A number of towns and some cities of considerable size, both in the West and the South, have yielded to this demand, and the Michigan Legislature has been persuaded to pass a "curfew law," as it is called, for the whole State. Governor Pingree has shown more sense in this matter than the law-makers, for he has vetoed the bill on the ground that it involves interference by the State in matters of purely domestic concern. Roaming the streets at night is bad business for young people, but it would be worse for the community to have the State attempt the role of a beneficent parent. In our own Queen City of the Pacific the evil practice of night prowling, on the part of young people, is perhaps as bad as it is anywhere. But it is difficult to see how in a free city it can be regulated by law. The streets are free, the air we breathe is free, and our coming and going are free. None of these, in this free land of ours, can be subjected to license, limit, or litigation. Any such venture is bound to prove a failure, and would simply aggravate an evil which can only be cured by persuading fathers and mothers to do their duty by their children.

Nervous Prostration and Insomnia. The medical men of the city report an unusual prevalence of nervous prostration, accompanied by insomnia, in our midst, and especially among men past middle age. This condition is in part accounted for because of the exceptionally large number of cold north winds that have prevailed all through the winter and spring, and in part because of the worry and harassment of hard times. The evils we speak of are found mainly among men who work with their brains. The struggle to make ends meet is breaking down many a sturdy son of the Golden State. Patient after patient tells the same story. He goes to bed at his usual hour, falls off to sleep very much as usual, but instead of sleeping through the whole night until six or seven in the morning, he wakes about two or three, or even earlier, and do what he will, he can get no sound sleep after that time. He may lie more or less still, and may even doze off occasionally, but if he does, he dreams and is more than half conscious all the time, and when he rises he feels not only unrefreshed, but as if he would give all his day's profits for one single hour of sound, refreshing sleep. But that may not be. Now, there are three things to be said on this point: First, something as to the cause; secondly, as to the treatment to be avoided, and thirdly, as to the treatment that will probably cure. The cause is, no doubt, abnormal weather. Our north winds are trying to the strongest nerves. These have been accompanied by a damp, relaxing atmosphere, and this again by worries of the mind occasioned by the state of business. Under the circumstances, what is to be done? One thing must certainly not be done; soporifics must not be resorted to. The right thing to do is, if possible, to diminish or altogether stop excessive brain activity. The most effectual step to this end is to run away for a time to the sea side or to the foothills, where it is cold and bracing. The undefiled ozone of a cool atmosphere works wonders in such cases, and mental rest will do the remainder. To take sleep producing remedies may answer the purpose for a time, but such a course cannot but be attended with after injury under the peculiar physiological condition. A few days of brain resting in a brain bracing climate will, with certainty, effect a natural cure in most cases, and the effect upon the whole system will be as lasting as it will be beneficial. We are not puffing any particular resort, but merely telling a truth that the entire medical faculty, we think, will indorse as one of importance at the present time. The mountain and seaside resorts cannot be too well patronized this year.

The Proposed Park and Zoo.

It is being often repeated, and it is true, that the people cannot have too many breathing places. But as the people cannot have parks in every block, and must necessarily set a limit on their desires in that regard, it is the part of wisdom to see to it that those they have are placed where they will do the most good. Where the population is likely to be densest, or, in other words, where the greatest good is likely to be done to the greatest number, is the best place for a new and popular breathing place. No doubt the Mission is becoming the most crowded part of San Francisco's residential population. It will continue to grow, and in the end will be occupied mainly by the working classes, who most need open squares and pleasure grounds. It is, therefore, the first place that should be attended to by the Supervisors, who are being so strenuously urged thereto by the energetic committee of citizens who have the matter in charge. But it will be well for the parties to moderate their plans to what is practicable. We cannot afford a second Golden Gate Park, and a Zoological Garden talked of for that section of the city. While it would cost a large amount of money, it would be a source of pleasure and education. San Francisco is to be a great city, and the full cost need not be an original investment. The foundation could be laid, the plan could be mapped out, and a creditable beginning made, without very great expense. It is true that the Mission has been neglected, and it is but just that taxation should have representation. Let us have a park and a zoo south of Market street; but if we cannot have both, and the people prefer the latter, let us see that it is provided.

MORE money will be necessary immediately, or work on the boulevard must stop. A few hundred dollars will complete this splendid highway and make it permanent. It must not be said that San Francisco will permit the work to end now when it is so near a lasting finish.

SOUTH AMERICAN TRADE.

It is only a comparatively recent idea among San Francisco merchants that the ocean commerce of this port offered a profitable field for their capital and energy. The pioneer idea was to develop interior trade over the same lines that brought merchandise westward, but competitive points have deprived this city of a large part of this distributive commerce, and our merchants have been forced to look out through the Golden Gate for business. It was high time they came to this conclusion.

The result has fully justified the effort, and a large trade has been developed in Oceania (including Hawaii), Central America, Alaska, and measurably in China, Japan, and Australia. In the development of this ocean commerce the question of cheap transportation has figured largely. The rates formerly charged were practically prohibitory, but have been largely reduced. Take the instance of Central American trade, now the most prosperous of San Francisco's ocean commerce. Prior to 1893 it amounted to little, and was restricted by very heavy transportation charges. The organization of the North American Navigation Company inaugurated a contest for fifteen months, which reduced the rate of freight to Central American ports to two dollars per ton southward, and coffee, northward, to five dollars per ton. These abnormal rates made a loss to carriers, but the effect was almost magical, and the business increased beyond expectation. When the contest ended by the withdrawal of the Company, it had sunk $300,000 in the too cheap carriage of merchandise between San Francisco, New York, and Central America. But the money was very profitably expended, and the Pacific Mail Steamship Company has recovered its losses many times in its increased traffic. Judiciously restricting its advanced rates, it has retained the trade, and now makes it pay a remunerative rate. Its steamers leave always full, and seldom cleaning up the offerings; in fact, the tonnage available is now much too small, and must be increased. With the advantage of geographical position, we have higher rates to reach that market, and we need for its development a direct line of steamships to South American west coast ports. The miserable policy of our Government, which has permitted the American foreign carrying trade to be destroyed through hostile legislation, prevents the inauguration of such a line of steamships, unless the legislation now proposed by Senator Elkins applies a remedy.

While the products of the west coast of South America are largely identical with those of the California coast, there are still many articles which our merchants can sell there. The finer forms of manufactured leather, refined sugar, confectionery, mining machinery, portable mills, agricultural implements, cotton fabrics, carts and carriages, horse accoutrements, firearms, cutlery, beer, sewing machines, chemicals, rope and twine, canned meats and canned and dried fruits, and, to the nearest South American ports, cereal products in large quantity, are all in demand, while the long and varied manifests of ships discharging at those ports from the Atlantic States and Europe contain many other articles not above enumerated, which can be added thereto. One serious impediment to the development of the commerce of this coast with our port is the rate of exchange, owing to those countries being on a silver basis; but in this we are no worse off than our competitors, while there is a disposition in Chile to adopt a gold standard, after a fashion, and at a ratio which we would not entertain as practicable.

The Chamber of Commerce has successfully inaugurated combined action in Asiatic and Central American trade. The results have fully warranted the efforts, and have encouraged the trustees to invite our merchants to join in a like effort on the southwestern coast of America. A reduction in freights has been obtained, and still lower rates are possible if the volume of traffic can be increased. The time appears propitious, and it is to be hoped that our merchants will respond to the invitation by a combined movement to increase our trade in that inviting field. Certainly, they cannot expect prosperity in foreign commerce to come to them uninvited, since their competitors are always ready to take the initiative.

Connected with the subject is that of the proposed establishment of a College of Commerce, Manufactures and Navigation at the California State University. This recognition of the commercial situation is itself encouraging, and evinces a desire to make the University practically useful in commercial pursuits. The education of our young men intending to take up a commercial career, in the Spanish language, is one of the necessities connected with South American trade, vastly more important to our people than any other language, not excepting French. The Germans have paid special attention to this by educating their commercial representatives sent to this coast, not only in the language, but in the geography, productions and customs of the people whose trade they have acquired to a large extent.

San Francisco must hereafter make her record as a great seaport, and the development of her maritime commerce should be the aim of our merchants and capitalists. In this there is an assured future prosperity. We have too long delayed action on this important commercial fact, but the awakening is full of hope. WILLIAM L. MERRY.

PLEASURES WAND

EXCELSIOR JR.

The shades of night were falling fast,
As through a Western village passed
A show, that bore the name of Rice
Oo play-bills with the strange device,
Excelsior Jr!

His brow was sad, his eye beoeath
Bespoke the critic, and his wreath
Of dusky hair proclaimed the same.
"To see the show," he said, "I've came—
Excelsior Jr!"

"Try oot the Pass," the old man said;
He heeded not, he went dead-head
(And took a friend along beside)
And loud that clarion voice replied,
Excelsior Jr!

"Oh stay," the maiden said, "and rest Thy weary head upon this breast!"
"Nay, nay," he said, "I'd rather go
And see sweet Sadie Martinot
In Excelsior Jr!"

"Beware the choruses' withered branch,
Beware the awful avalanche
Of doleful song and senile smirk
And palsied jest and gibe that lurk
In Excelsior Jr!"

At break of day they found him there,
Froze fast within his velvet chair,
Still grasping to his hand of ice
The play-bill with that strange device,
Excelsior Jr!

And on its margin this was writ:
"Once Martinot, now Martinit."
A tear was frosted in his eye,
His glacial lips still seemed to sigh,
Excelsior Jr!

There in the theatre, cold and gray,
Lifeless, but beautiful, he lay.
A steamy voice from far below
Groaned, "Better here than at that show,
Excelsior Jr!"

Nat Goodwin comes to us again next week. We may be remote, but sometimes we are lucky. That was, for us anyway, a fortunate day when Goodwin resolved to go to Australia. We had in Mizzoura, with his indelible character of Jim Radburn—the finest individual acting of the decade, to my thinking—before he steamed away; and we got the first blush of the most humanly comedic Bob Acres of the stage when he came back—to say nothing of his trim, tailor-made work in Mrs. Ryley's comedy, An American Citizen. Ever since Jim Radburn I have been penning away that Nat Goodwin is the greatest of American actors; a fact, strange to say, not universally accepted. In New York they persist in regarding him as a funny actor with magnetism and geniality—an entertainer, nothing more. New York is a long, large place. It wakes slowly. By the time Mr. Goodwin has established his ability for serious acting to the complete satisfaction of Podunk, Fresno and Chicago, he can commence to rebuild his metropolitan reputation on that line—that is, if any theatres besides the vaudeville houses are left for him to work in, and the syndicate does not object to his using one of those.

To a sincere student of the drama and the day, Nat Goodwin is the only hope for real greatness on the American stage. He is an actor; but, better still, he is a maoager. And he is now nearly in a positioo to give the people, not what they think they want—the tradesmen of the syndicate will look to that sort of thing—but what he wants. And unlike Mr. Mansfield, who has bad taste and worse mannerisms, or William Crane, who is pre-eminently bourgeois in talent and taste, or Mr. Haworth, who cannot even manage himself, Mr. Goodwin has the mind, the appreciation to choose the play, to direct the miutest details of its preseotation, and, so far as I have seen, the artistic naturalness to play his own part as no other living actor can play it.

It is easy to understand how the New York critic—who, as a rule, is so busy writing that he has little time to think—could overlook Mr. Goudwin in the shuffle of the season. Goodwin has never been a fad; he has a jovial, chummy personality, and for years he traveled on that, fitting plays to it, as his tailor fitted clothes to him, gaining general popularity all the time, and, at the same time, the sure, definite touch of the artist—poisiog himself and placiog his audience. When he took himself so seriously as to play Jim Radburn in New York, he was ready to wake the next morning and find himself famous, and doubtless arose early for that express purpose. There are soils where the early bird has no advantage. Mr. Goodwin found the town peacefully encased in its pajamas, enjoying the unruffled slumber of the innocent, and smugly unconscious that anything had happened, or ever would—unless it was imported.

Yet a few persons found out in Mizzoura: several commuters, Charles McLellau of Town Topics (his brother was afterwards Goodwin's mismanager on the Australian tour) and a few obscure gentlemen of the pictorial, dialect magazines. But the bulk of the people and the bulk of the critics passed it over as a good show—"atmospheric," "conscientious detail," "Goodwiu quite convincing in his serious role," I believe they said. That was all. No fire-crackers, no notoriety, no interviews.

That David Garrick had fared even worse is a part of dramatic history. The critics insisted that there was a joke in it.

So, if it is not too much to expect the old rule to work the wrong way once again, even the dullest of us may anticipate something of artistic consequence in Goodwin's Garrick—which was not a hundred nights' success in New York.

The repertory for the fortnight's engagement at the Baldwin consists of David Garrick, The Rivals, and An American Citizen. My interest centers in Garrick, which I never have seen Goodwin play, and which to my knowledge is the only work of the romantic class that he has ever essayed. The play belongs to the "trustful" age; much of its sentiment and much of its comedy are highly artificial, builded, it would seem, as man and woman never were nor will be. But the opportunities are big to the leading part; there is a splendid scale of diverse expression to be got from it by the versatile actor; and Goodwin, with his transcendent comedy gift, his sensitive fervor, and that fine, nervous, magnetic character-grip of his, should bring out all there is in it.

Bob Acres he played here for the first time in America. It gave promise of being the best on the stage,—a rosier, blusterer than Jefferson's Bob, more of a younker and less of a Yank.

An American Citizen is three hours of Nat Goodwin in his everyday clothes. It is clever and diverting for us, and easy play for him.

Altogether, the season seems to be worth living to see. The Baldwin has a long list of high-sounding attractions on the way, and Mr. Frawley comes to the Columbia with an enticing array of plays, and what reads like a good company. I hope Mr. Frawley has secured a stage director of some accomplishment—ensemble and deportment were the weak points last season.

A pink-inked annex devoted to plays and players is the glowing feature of last week's Musical Courier. I cheerfully recommed it to aoy one who cares to read clever, competent paragraphs on the drama. A new broom sweeps clean, and the New York theatres are sadly in need of one. In Loodon, weekly criticism is power and authority; in New York it is almost uoknown. There is a big field for the Courier's new department. Mr. James G. Huneker (of whom I recently wrote at some leugth) and Mr. Vance Thompson are the editors. They are not play reporters, but students, essayists, critics.

ASHTON STEVENS.

Next week at the Tivoli a new German comic opera, Captain Fracassa, will be presented. This work is said to abound in catchy solos, beautiful waltzes, stirring marches, and magnificent ensembles and finales. The score was written by Rudolph Dellinger, the composer of Lorraine and the Palace of Truth. The book is by Genee and Jell, adapted into English by Harry B. Smith, the author of Robin Hood, Tar and Tartar, and other successful works of this character. Captain Fracassa has been running for over two years in Vienna.

The Orpheum announces a big bill of novelties for next week. George Osrani and his burlesque pantomime company in a fantastic creation entitled Yvette, and an eccentric musical act, "Do-mi-sol-do," the Baggesens in an intricate specialty called "the juggling waitress and the twisting waiter," and the Kroneman Brothers, humorous acrobats, who have been secured for a return week. Fleurette and her four fleurs-de-lis, Ed Latelle, the music-maker, Tachianu, with lightning change of sex, and several other favorite acts are retained.

At the Baldwin Mr. Goodwin will play David Garrick on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Saturday matinee. The rest of the week will be devoted to The Rivals. Garrick will be preceded by The Silent System, the curtain-raiser which Miss Maxine Elliott and Frank Worthing played so cleverly at the Columbia last season.

Excelsior Jr., with Sadie Martinot, Joe Cawthorne and Johnny Page in new specialties, will be continued another week at the Columbia, after which the house closes for a week's renovation. Then opens the Frawley season with The Fatal Card, a melodrama of reputation.

Mrs. Charles Dickman, contralto, prior to her departure for Europe, announces a concert at the Young Men's Auditorium on Monday evening. Donald deV. Graham, Bernhard Mollenhauer, J. C. Hughes, Will Wood, and Mrs. C. A. Keesing will assist Mrs. Dickman.

The McKenzie Musical Society, a hundred voices strong, will give a concert at Odd Fellows' Hall on Thursday evening. A special feature will be Mr. McKenzie's arrangement of several popular marches for the big chorus.

Miss Hattie Nathan will give a dramatic reading in the Maple Room on Thursday night week, under the auspices of the Eureka Society for the Protection of Children.

ONE of the most important recent patents is the Welsbach Incandescent Gas Light. It has the merit of giving three times the light at one-half the cost of the ordinary gas burner. Thousands of the Welsbach burners are in use in this city, among large consumers being: Western Union Telegraph Company, Pacific Telephone Company, Murphy, Grant & Co., J. J. O'Brien & Co., Wells, Fargo & Co.'s Express Company and Bank, Mechanics' Institute Building and Library, Knights Pythias Castle, Red Men's Hall, Foresters' Hall, and hundreds of others that can be mentioned, besides many of the finest residences, are fitted up with the lights. W. W. Gillespie is the agent for the city of San Francisco for Welsbach Gas Lights and Supplies. His office and salesrooms are located at No. 134 Ellis street, where the lights and apparatus may be seen in operation, and any information concerning the same will be cheerfully given, and all orders entrusted to him will be promptly filled.

Owing to the unprecedented success of her New York establishment, Miss A. L. Stone, of 217 Post street, will be compelled to leave for Paris on May 22d, an earlier date than heretofore. Previous to her departure at 217 Post street, Miss Stone will offer her choice and exclusive designs in fine millinery at less than cost. This will be an opportunity to purchase fine millinery at lower prices than ever before offered in this city.

The "drink which cheers but not inebriates" is J. F. Cutter whiskey—the delight of good judges and the favorite of all connoisseurs. This liquor is pure, properly aged and has a smooth, grateful flavor. E. Martin & Co. at 411 Market street, are sole Pacific Coast Agents for J. F. Cutter Whiskey.

TAKE ELEVATOR

A Reminiscence of Monte Carlo

WE were floating lazily down the Grand Lagoon in Venice,—Douglas McIntyre and I.

The full moon, in her southern splendor, spangled the sea, as it chanted mysteriously on its way to the broad ocean.

Our gondolier's form, hending far down to the oar, looked like a black half-moon struggling with the shadows. Snatches of songs came to us over the water, and the whole mise-en-scene was fraught with the glamour and romance of a Venetian night.

Somehow—perhaps it was the moonbeams chasing the amethystine waves—but my thoughts flew back to Monte Carlo. I was sitting again in the Casino gardens there, watching the Mediterranean turn from dewy violet to darkest hyacinth beneath the strange spell of that warm clime.

My hair was brown then, but now it shines like little drifts of snow round my temples, so a friend of the gentler sex tells me, but she is amiable, especially so since my trouble.

"A penny for your thoughts, old man!" and Douglas McIntyre's buoyant voice startled me out of my reverie, almost making me drop overboard the cigar which I had just settled down to enjoy.

"Would you really like to be bored with my thoughts?" "Bored! I can't imagine you causing such an emotion. Why, all the fellows say you are most interesting; a certain episode in your life particularly so." His frank eyes glowed with natural curiosity as he paused.

"I suppose I should feel flattered at being the subject of the conversation of my friends," I muttered stiffly, feeling curiously annoyed.

"Oh, don't be huffy, Lee, for you know it is impossible for some people to escape greatness. It's destiny. Remember George Washington, Gladstone, Roseberry, Bismarck, and all those fellows, dear boy." He laughed in his cheery way, and lit a fresh cigarette. No one could hear a grudge to him when he laughed, and I felt my displeasure rapidly melting away.

"So you would really like me to tell you what I was dreaming?" I began, hesitating only a moment. "I was living over my Monte Carlo experience of three years ago. The winter when frost stopped hunting for so long and I was snowed up in the country. Growing tired one day of the inaction and the attractions of the library, I turned my desire to the fascinations of the South, and three days later I was comfortably installed in a bright suite of rooms on the hill at Monte Carlo.

"Several nights after, when, as usual, luck turned against me, I rushed from the hot rooms and went for a stroll on the terrace facing the sea.

"The scent of tropical flowers made me languid, as I threw myself full length on a bench, half yielding to the delicious lassitude stealing over me. Just then a tall, gaunt, old man, very poorly clad, passed hurriedly, talking to himself excitedly in a foreign tongue. His grey hair and beard straggled down long and unkempt, and he looked on the ground in a preoccupied manner as he stumbled along.

"When he had gone on about fifty yards, my attention was attracted by a youth, who was evidently following the old man.

"Suddenly the moon sailed out from behind a cloud in all her glory, lighting up the slim figure of the boy, and as he turned his head, I could see the beauty of his fair hair and face.

"A cigarette case dropped out of his pocket, but he continued on his way, ignorant apparently of his loss.

"Going over, I picked up the case, over-took the owner, and restored it to him. Thanking me in a nice, frank, English way, he looked me full in the face. Our eyes met, and I shall never forget what a tender blue his were.

"Will you not do me the honor?" and he proffered me the open case. Charmed by his pleasant manner, I was about to select a cigarette, when he cried out: 'Oh, no, don't take those; these on the left side with the gold tips are much more superior.

We walked on for a bit, smoking and chatting together. Finally the conversation drifted to Heidelberg, where he was studying.

"Having many friends in Heidelberg, I became interested, and begged him to come and sup with me at the Café de Paris, an invitation which he accepted with all a boy's enthusiasm.

"His beautiful face was Greek in its purity of outline, and his long, lovely hands revealed an artistic temperament. I judged that he was not more than sixteen years of age, although remarkably precocious for that spring-time of life.

"After promising that I would dine with him the next evening, I had him a drowsy good-night, and hurried to my room, almost overpowered with sleep. Before I slept, it struck me that I had been the more confidential of the two, and that the boy had been a very good listener, for when I came to remember, he had only spoken of Heidelberg, for he seemed so excited by his surroundings and appeared to drink more wine than was permissible for one of his youthful experience.

"The next morning I awoke with a dull headache. When the garçon brought me my café au lait, he handed me a message, which I found was from my lawyer, advising me that my presence in London was imperative.

"Knowing that fresh complications were brewing in a lawsuit I had on, I made immediate preparations for departure, and only remembered my dinner engagement with the pretty boy at the last moment.

"Expressing my regrets to him in a short note which I dispatched by a commissionaire, I hurried down to the station to secure a compartment in the Cluh train; but missed the train, unfortunately, by a few seconds. I found, however, that an express, which was almost as good, would leave for Paris in half an hour, so I consoled myself by watching the mixed crowd coming and going until the express was ready.

"A fiacre rattled up, and to my surprise, my young friend of the evening before alighted, and walked leisurely over to the ticket office window, followed by a porter laden with his luggage. On seeing me he expressed the keenest delight, and insisted on our traveling in the same carriage together, when I told him that I had been called away to England.

"He, also, had received a message telling him to return at once.

"Just while ago I sent you my regrets about the postponement of our little dinner," he said.

"Both our notes had crossed, so neither of us had received the other's.

"I followed my friend as he opened the door of the nearest carriage and swung himself in.

"To my relief there was only one other occupant, and he seemed so interested in a newspaper that he didn't look up.

"We settled ourselves and our traps to our satisfaction, then my youthful companion drew a long sigh as the train moved slowly out of the depot.

"I'm jolly well glad to get away from Monte Carlo. The tables were too much for me, and should my governor hear of my playing, there'll be a rumpus, and no mistake," he said.

"As he offered me a cigarette our eyes met, and he blushed like a girl, until his face had the glow of a wild rose.

"Wasn't it difficult for you to get admittance to the gaming rooms?" I ventured to remark. "Minors aren't allowed to play, I have heard."

"He blew a long, clear cloud of smoke through his well-bred nostrils, before answering. It is odd how well I remember every detail of that time."

"Oh! I got in very easily—by presenting the card of a friend. And—and how can they tell a fellow's age, anyhow?"

"Smiling at his bravado, I wisely forebore telling him that he didn't look to be more than sixteen at the most."

"These late hours make one rather stupid," he murmured presently, with a yawn, and in a few minutes he fell asleep with his golden head resting back on the carriage cushion. He looked so fresh and innocent that, callous man of the world as I was, I felt a vague pity, because he had begun to see the seamy side of life so soon."

"I smoked on for some time, watching the pink and white villas in their flowery bowers on one side, and the dazzling gleam of the Mediterranean in the brilliant sunshine on the other."

"After awhile I became drowsy, and soon fell off to sleep. Just before doing so I saw the other occupant of the carriage staring at my young friend. I had a disagreeable impression that I had seen the pale face, with its shaggy grey beard, somewhere, but I could not locate it."

"We must have been journeying for some hours, for I was awakened by the cold and sat up, cramped and unrefreshed."

"Shiveringly drawing my rug closer about me, and glancing over at the opposite seat I saw that the boy had departed."

"The old man in the corner seemed to be sleeping. I gazed at him idly, wondering where I had seen him before. It dawned upon me slowly that he was the same man I had seen the previous night when my young friend had dropped his cigarette case."

"It appeared to me, after awhile, that the old man was in a very awkward position. His head was hanging down on his breast helplessly, and he was too still to be sleeping. Something tickled sluggishly over his coat. I watched it, like one in a nightmare, as it fell in a red pool on the floor. With a sickening fear at my heart I sprang to his side, calling aloud and shaking him roughly by the shoulders, but he was far beyond human help. His head rolled and almost fell off—it had been nearly severed from his body. Near by, on the carpet, I discovered a razor, clotted with blood, still wet. Picking it up I saw, to my great terror, that it was one of my own, which some one had abstracted from my dressing bag. My predicament was a very dreadful one, and I sat down opposite the corpse, appalled with the horror of it all. Quickly making up my mind, I rang the alarm bell. The train stopped with such suddenness as to pitch the dead man over, and he fell with a heavy thud against my traps."

"I told the excited guards how I met the boy, of his journey with me in the same carriage and his absence when I awoke; but they only sneered at my story and protestations of innocence, and arrested me for murder."

"After I had had three months of imprisonment in a bare cell, where the rats made night hideous, friends contrived to obtain my freedom. They convinced the French authorities that I had no motive to induce me to kill the old man, who was afterwards identified as a traitor to the Russian Nihilist cause."

"While I was confined in prison my hair turned white, and I became prematurely old."

"Last season, in London, I attended a reception given by a literary friend. We were chatting about her latest book, when I suddenly heard a laughing voice that made my heart almost cease to beat. It was the voice of the pretty boy I had met at Monte Carlo. I listened eagerly, quite forgetting my hostess."

"Yes!" chirped up the voice. "Those were ideal days, yachting on the Mediterranean. The blue of the sky, and the languor of that fair land coax one into happy illusions. Come! let's go into the conservatory, I couldn't get a chance to smoke after dinner. No! you won't like those—these gold-tipped ones are better." Then I heard the click of a cigarette case as it closed, and the swish of a woman's gown.

Rushing round the jungle of palms to obtain a glimpse of the boy, I was confronted by a slender, lovely woman. A radiant smile lit up her sweet, fair face, but her sea-blue eyes gleamed like steel in the candle light, as she glanced carelessly full in my face. Then she slipped her hand through her escort's arm and they leisurely walked through the crowded rooms. I watched them until they disappeared. Feeling as though turned to stone, but recovering my normal condition, I went in search of my hostess, who had escaped to talk to other guests, when she found me so engrossed. Finally coming upon her, I gasped out: "Who is she?"

"Whom do you mean?" asked my hostess, regarding me as one would a mild sort of lunatic.

"Why, the lady with fair hair, who stood talking to that journalist by the palms a few moments ago."

"Oh! that is the Countess Gonboroff, the great agitator for free Russia. Shall I present you?"

"When we went in search of her, she had flown, and hasn't been seen in London to my knowledge since that night. She disappeared completely from my horizon."

Douglas McIntyre ejaculated: "By Jove! what a marvelous experience!"

Just then the familiar scent of a Russian cigarette and the clear music of a woman's laugh made me tremble, as a gondola sped past and shot under the arch of a bridge.

Again she had eluded me, and the darkness covered her path, while the plaintive strains of a mandolin sobbed through the warm night, saddening my mood until I throbbled with an infinite pity for my beautiful youth.—Irene Osgood in Travel.

"The Stand-By," by Edmund P. Dole. Published by the Century Company, New York. 1897.

The hero of the story, the "Stand-by," is William H. Craigin, stroke and captain of the Yale Eight, which, after a terrific race against Harvard, crosses the line victorious. Immediately after the race, the stroke is introduced to John Denman and his beautiful daughter Isabel, whose girlish heart at once goes out toward the strong and modest young fellow. Just after taking his degree, Craigin has offered to him the editorship of The Tocsin, a newspaper recently established in John Denman's town, Apsleigh. Now, John Denman owns Apsleigh, and to edit an organ of prohibitionism there is to incur John Denman's undying enmity, for he is a millionaire whiskey-dealer. However, despite some warnings, Craigin accepts the post, and soon the hattle is raging. Craigin saves Denman's life from a vicious horse, and gratitude and admiration stay his spite for a time. But the Prohibition Party gains strength, and at last hundreds of complaints are piled up against Denman and the other whiskey-dealers and sellers by a bold county attorney. Then comes out the unscrupulous nature of Denman; he bribes one jurymen, lends money to another, frightens a third, and so defeats the actions. But he has a game antagonist, whom he can neither hoodwink, cajole, nor "bull-doze"; who fights on, and marshals the Prohibitionist Party till it gains strength enough to render itself irresistible. The great whiskeyman is forced to give up his business; maddened by rage and a sense of defeat, he tries by underhand means of all sorts to gain control of The Tocsin, that he may turn its bold editor, the savior of his life and the lover of his daughter, out into the street: failing, he hires six ruffians to break into the pressrooms and smash the presses. Craigin happens to be on the spot, and, taking the scoundrels singly, fells some, and holds the rest off till help comes. This act of unscrupulous rascality turns even Isabel, his pampered daughter, against Denman, who loves her as the apple of his eye. When Craigin is unanimously nominated for the House of Representatives, Denman is seized by a paralytic stroke. Though the author tries his best to make John Denman out to be a very fine fellow, and continually barps upon his generosity, goodness of heart, and noble nature, he only succeeds in depicting a thorough-paced scoundrel, who, if thwarted in any dirty scheme that he has invested money in, will bribe, corrupt, intimidate public officials, and even hire others to beat, maim, or murder the people who are bold enough to oppose him. Of course, such a man, if let alone to pile up wealth in his own way, will pay his servants good wages, pet his wife and daughters, and give good cigars and wines to his friends. But, for all that, he is a rascal at heart, without principle to sustain him when any severe strain comes; then the essential vulgarity, meanness, and treachery of his nature come out unmistakably. But we think that Mr. Dole (who is Assistant Attorney-General of Hawaii), has written a very readable story, although we consider his attempt to whitewash Denman eminently regrettable, because it tends to obscure the clear distinction between Right and Wrong, and to cause people to think that a man is justified in committing any crime to save the dollars he has invested in his business. This loose thinking is responsible for much crime. Though Mr. Dole writes interestingly, his English is by no means free from blemish: he makes a United States Senator say, "I'm very glad to have you feel that way toward me"; and "I don't know as I would want to influence you." Other queer phrases are: "You've never seen me but twice," "I don't know as that's any worse," "Most people like a glass of wine or beer at the table when they feel like it"; how does a man feel when he feels like a glass of wine? Craigin is spoken of as being "Most as old as Napoleon was when he crossed the Alps"; on another occasion he takes a boy on his knee and "feeds him grapes."

Sir Walter Besant has kindly forwarded to us a copy of the April issue of the Cornhill Magazine, which still retains the yellow covers with designs showing ploughing, sowing, reaping, and thrashing that it had when W. M. Thackeray and Anthony Trollope successively edited it. The opening article, by Sir Walter Besant, is entitled "A Day of Celebration," and contains a quotation from the Christmas 1896 NEWS LETTER. Sir Walter comments on the facts that sentiment rules the mass of a people in any country, and is largely fostered by flags, emblems, fireworks, bonfires, brass bands, and other things not much beloved of educated people, but highly useful for all that. He attributes the patriotic sentiments of Americans to the deliberate fostering of national pride by school text-books, days of celebration and spread-eagle speeches, and thinks that the British will do well to set apart Shakespeare's birthday (April 23d) as a day of general rejoicing throughout the Empire. As the ultimate, though yet far-off, culmination of this celebration, he looks forward to the federation of the whole Anglo-Celtic race. The article is very interesting and suggestive, and we sincerely trust that the proposal may meet with the same success that attended Sir Walter's efforts to establish a palace of recreation for the poor of East London slums. We learn from Sir Walter that the article was published simultaneously in many parts of the English-speaking world.

"The Mill of Silence," by B. E. J. Capes, has just been issued in book form by Rand, McNally & Co., of Chicago and New York. It is a story of mystery, and won the second prize in the competition for weird stories organized by the Chicago Record. At a period perhaps not yet so long past that the short-memoried newspaper-reader has forgotten it entirely, the Examiner printed "The Mill of Silence," and invited the readers thereof to furnish a dénoncement. What the result of this invitation was we are quite unable to say, but doubtless those persons to whom it was a matter of concern remember what happened. Personally, we cannot abide the newspaper tale of mystery, for, to our mind, the better it is (i. e., the more completely bewildering, mind-torturing, and abnormal it is), the worse it is. To take satisfaction in the perusal of such horrors is one of the many pleasures of bad taste. However, any person who prefers to read "The Mill of Silence" in a volume decently printed on decent paper, instead of in the multi-colored, variously-defiled sheets of a blanket supplement, has now the opportunity to gratify his preference. May sound sleep attend him!

When Robert Louis Stevenson died, he had just finished writing a story entitled "St. Ives, or the Adventures of a French Prisoner in England." The serial rights of the story for America were purchased by S. S. McClure, and for Great Britain by W. W. Astor, proprietor of the Pall Mall Magazine, in the November, 1896, issue of which the publication of "St. Ives" began. As the Pall Mall Magazine, which is probably the handsomest and most expensively gotten-up periodical (except, perhaps, one or two artistic publications) in the English language, has an extensive circulation in the United States, Mr. McClure intends to try to get an injunction against the further publication of "St. Ives."

Mr. Edgar Fawcett has lately (and with much wisdom, as we think) urged young and pretty women to wear flowers, but to avoid jewels, especially the hard and brilliant diamonds commonly so beloved of the fair sex: mature women he recommends to wear diamonds, so as to distract attention from their faded charms. As regards apparel, Mr. Fawcett thinks that plain women gain by gorgeous raiment, but that pretty women lose by it. This is true enough, but where are the women who will confess themselves mature, faded, passées, or plain?

Sir Alfred Milner, the newly-appointed Governor of the most difficult dependency of the British Empire for an administrator, is one of the many brilliant pupils of the late Dr. Jowett, the Master of Balliol College, Oxford. As an undergraduate, Milner of Balliol made a reputation by his splendid speeches at the debates of the Oxford Union Society, of which, as were W. E. Gladstone and the late Sir Stafford Northcote before him, he was President. After hearing him speak at the Union, Mr. Goschen came away saying that he had heard "an undergraduate speaking like a statesman." At the dinner given in his honor in London prior to his departure for Cape Colony, there were present sixteen former Presidents of the Union, the best known of them being H. H. Asquith and the Hon. G. N. Curzon. Sir Alfred learned under eminent teachers: as Mr. Asquith said of him, he studied scholarship and metaphysics under Jowett and Green; the art of writing under John Morley; he was introduced to official life by Mr. Goschen, learnt the practice of administration under Lord Cromer, and the discharge of the delicate and responsible duties which fall to the permanent head of a great department of the State under Mr. Balfour and Sir William Harcourt. Sir Alfred is a Liberal, but of a decidedly non-partisan type: he is too thoughtful, too earnest, and too highminded to care for party politics. In no other country than Great Britain could a man of Sir Alfred's tastes and qualities reach eminent public position.

The following interesting item is culled from the Court Journal: "A remarkable circumstance in relation to the so-called unlucky number thirteen is recalled by Lord Roberts in "Forty-one Years in India." On January 1, 1853, thirteen officers, including himself, messed together at Peshawar, and so far from any of them coming to an untimely end within the year, eleven years afterwards they were all alive, despite the fact that nearly the whole of the party had taken part in the suppression of the Mutiny and five or six had been wounded. Another instance is the fact that Nansen and his crew of twelve have, notwithstanding their unpopular number, returned safely to teach us more about the northern regions than we ever knew before. These facts should of themselves be sufficient to knock the bottom out of the superstition concerning the fate waiting those who have the temerity to dine in parties of thirteen, and indeed should be sufficient to promptly disband the Thirteen Club as an institution that has no reason for its existence."

The most striking feature of the May Traveler is a full-length portrait by Taber of that winsome and winsome young person, Cissy Fitzgerald. There is also a fine reproduction of a photograph of the Empire State Express in motion at the rate of about sixty miles an hour. An article on the Los Angeles Fiesta by J. F. J. Archibald fills two pages, and a story by Lillian Ferguson nearly two more.

DURING the session of the present Congress a bill is to be brought before that body to abolish ticket scalping and to make the same illegal. In several of our States there already exists a similar law, but it is more or less inoperative, and it is therefore desired to make a national one. The business of ticket scalping in its incipiency was undoubtedly a reputable, as well as a needed one, when there was no provision made by the railroads for redeeming unused tickets, but all railroads now promptly redeem unused tickets or portions of same. This being a fact, the ticket-scalper lives principally upon stolen tickets. George H. Daniels, General Passenger Agent of the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad, during his argument before the Senate Codes Committee recently, laid upon the table counterfeit tickets to the amount of $50,000, which had been taken up by railroads in the State of New York, mostly during the year 1896. Over two million people have already signed petitions favoring this bill, and it is hoped that this iniquitous business, which a Supreme Court Judge has termed a "fruitful source of crime," will be entirely eliminated.

PICTURESQUE SAN FRANCISCO.

THE NEWS LETTER presents its readers to-day with an interesting view of the bay, with Goat Island in the middle ground and the Berkeley hills in the distance. The shifting scenes on the bay are always full of life, and our view shows the shipping and water front of one of the world's great commercial marts.

The "Maison Riche" has long held the first place in the hearts of true connoisseurs of the art of French cooking in San Francisco. This restaurant, at Grant avenue and Geary street, gives a splendid dinner every day between the hours of 5 and 9 o'clock at which all the delicacies of the market are served, in the most delicious and appetizing manner. During the dinner hours a string band renders the popular selections of the day.

The Pine Street Market.

There has been considerable activity in the Comstock mining market during the past week. Favorable official reports on the Con. Cal.-Virginia mine have served to build up business in connection with some good fluctuations in the price of these shares. All leaks having been stopped from this mine by a change of men employed in the lower levels, the street has been practically left at sea in regard to daily conditions of the new development, and this is another influence for the good of trade. The usual lack of unanimity is of course noted in the action of the other managements along the lode. The rise at one end has been the signal to throw cold water at the other, leaving one mine to do all the dragging. Of course, if the development holds out, all will be well, and the bonanza mine can stand the strain. If not, then another general falling to pieces can be expected, with worse conditions than before. The public will get a stronger feeling of disgust than ever over a dog-in-the-manger policy which is only too fully apparent, no matter how much its framers may imagine they have concealed it, and another nail will be driven into the coffin of mining speculation in this city. One would naturally expect that all the different managements along the Comstock lode would stand in at a time like this and help the market along, but the inclination is evidently the other way for reasons which can only be appreciated by people acquainted with the system of business on the old-fogy Stock Exchange of the Universe. That the people here would like to have a chance to speculate cannot be denied, but it seems that if they ever do, the new growth of business in that line will be spontaneous and natural, free from any cultivation on the part of the very men who, one would think, are the most interested in the event. Chances like the present cannot be thrown idly away, and the folly of checking the growth of a speculative movement at such a time is criminal. All that can be done is to hope for the best, and that Con. Cal.-Virginia will open out into ore big enough to stem the current of all opposition. With an ore body will come public support and a stimulus of the kind will be apt to force the laggards eventually into action, for self protection if for nothing else. Work has been started up again in the Nevada Queen mine of Tuscarora.

Fortune Wooed by Religionists.

Colorado has a little wonder in the way of a mine dedicated to God, and the superstitious miners in the vicinity of its location on Russel Gulch are on the qui vive for future developments. The ancient Latins and Greeks, in offering libations at the shrines of the Deities presiding over the undertaking they were about to engage in for the time being, were not any more religious in their intent than the clerical owners of the Colorado property, and the send-off the new mine got was an eye-opener to the heathenish or infidel resident thereabouts. A poor selection has been made in the name of this new bulwark of Zion, Bon Ton smacking a little too much of the irreverent class, dwelling in shady Bohemia or amid the revelers of the Latin Quarter. If the churches stand in now, as will naturally be expected, the "cheerful giver" will have abundant opportunity to ante up for working expenses. As might be expected from such good people back of a good enterprise of the kind, good luck will provide profits to be "set aside for a good cause." And the clerk says Amen!

Africa's Shares Picking Up.

Londou still seems to have full confidence in the good judgment of John Hays Hammond as a mining engineer. Since his return from South Africa, the shares of the different companies working there have strengthened up, due, according to the financial papers, to some favorable remarks made by Hammond in an interview on the prospects for deep level mining on the Rand. This, too, in spite of the previous failure to stimulate them, it is said, by "various rumors concerning political events" which were circulated in the hope of bulling prices.

Winning Out in Westralia

It is a source of pleasure for the old-time California friends of Henry Callahan and W. A. Irwin to note the continued successes which have marked their career since taking up their residence in Australia. Both are rich men now, with the self-gratification of knowing that their wealth is due entirely to their own brains and ability. The Sydney Bulletin has just published some very complimentary notices of both of these gentlemen in the mining department of a recent issue. Mr. Irwin, who is now manager of the Associated mines at Kalgoorlie, thought better of a ten-acre strip of mining ground than the Wentworth Company did, and bought it from them, the result showing that, as the Californian had figured, the ore pitched into the ground he acquired much above the 1,000 level. This, says the Bulletin, is "truly a nice state of things for the Earl of Kilmorey to reflect over. He is chairman of the Wentworth mines, and has come out to see them. This puts a feather into the judgment cap of W. A. Irwin, now managing the associated mines at Kalgoorlie. But, at the same time, it is a bit of a staggerer for the present company, which has over 1,000 acres mostly where it doesn't want them. Another strip of the ten acres of the Wentworth estate would have carried the contract down another 1,000 feet, and then there would have been no D'Arcy mine. At the Lake View Consols, Manager Henry Callahan is also doing big work according to the same paper, and preparing for a larger output of ore than ever. In all respects his judgment, it is said, is being fully borne out by the results. A correspondent, addressing the NEWS LETTER on the success of Messrs. Callahan & Irwin, and the glowing opinions expressed of them from time to time in print, says: "If there were more of this kind of California mining engineers in Australia, there would be relatively just as good results obtained, due to both experience and knowledge of the different propositions they undertake to treat or to work."

A Mexican Bonanza Mine.

Some years ago a number of Mint officials picked up a prospect hole in Mexico, which was very favorably reported upon by an expert. The fact that employees in this branch of the Federal Department took shares in the mine was the signal for a general attack from a portion of the local press always on the lookout for misconduct on the part of officials, and some even went the length of charging jobbery and compulsion upon the part of the Superintendent himself. The sequel to the affair has been such as to make many outsiders wish they had been "jobbed" to the same tune, as the shareholders are now receiving about as much in dividends as they get in salary from the Government. The mine has turned out to be even better than was predicted for it, and seems destined to exceed even the most sanguine expectations. Some waste ore shipped from the property during the past month, averaged somewhere in the neighborhood of $1100 per ton in gold. The shares of the Santa Rosalia mine could command a high premium in the open market just now, were any of them marketable.

The Burmah Ruby Mines.

There are some of our readers in this city interested in hearing how the Burmah ruby mines are opening out. A meeting of the original founders' shares has just been held, at which the chairman's report showed a satisfactory profit on the working, a dividend being suggested at a rate of 25 per cent to the shareholders. In January, rubies to the value of 67,000 rupees were obtained, and in February to the value of 70,000 rupees. The famine in Upper Burmah and the plague in Rangoon had checked the production, but the prospects were considered very bright. Some trouble has been experienced in dealing with the founders' shares, which it was decided should not be declared remunerative until the company had a net profit of upwards of £37,300 per annum.

A Victorian Mining Review.

The Victorian mining industry is ably handled in a supplement of the Melbourne Leader, under the direction of Minister of Mines Foster. The different gold fields are taken up seriatim and treated at great space, showing the leading mines, with the output and prospects. Victoria still holds her own among the later gold producing sections of the Australian Continent.

John Crier

"Hear the Crier!" "What the devil art thou?"
"One that will play the devil, sir, with you."

HIGH Priestess Annie Besant, who is supernaturally blessed with a private wire to the next world, avers that our astral bodies go junketing every night while our physical bodies are peacefully reposing in their accustomed beds. The CRIER emphatically denies that his soul is cavorting among the angels of other spheres, the while he is placidly snoring in his bunk in San Francisco, but it may be that this is because he has no soul to project into space. Nocturnal picnics sans the formality of railroad fare must be a pleasurable sort of excursion, but the CRIER fears that such ghostly pilgrimages are not for him. Free passes for souls are, however, to be expected. Naturally, we will all be dead heads in the spiritual world.

PASTOR BOYNTON, once guardian of the First Baptist Church flock, has resigned after a three-months' period of bitter factional strife with the pew-holders, some twenty of whom, it is claimed, want to engineer the religious machinery of the edifice themselves, and decline to recognize the authority of any other pebble on the beach. The Reverend Boynton says he resigns in the interests of Christ. He is endowed with sense in thus leaving his congregation to fight matters out among themselves, and is certainly a shining contrast to one C. O. Brown, who should have resigned in the interests of Christ, but who preferred to hang on in the interests of Satan.

FAIR but fractious Evelyn Ferry, who distinguished herself once upon a time in gay Paree by biting off her husband's nose because he happened to object to such a trifling defecation as her marital infidelity, is heard from again as defendant in a suit brought against her for recovery of furniture, the lady having blossomed out as a San Francisco lodging-house keeper. Considering the litigant's unsavory reputation and proclivities for mayhem, there were more reasons than one for those present at the trial in Judge Hunt's court to hold onto their nasal appendages.

MOVEMENTS are on foot to close the city cemeteries. Not yet, gentlemen, not yet. Graves are yawning for local prey that should have been planted long ago. What this city needs is an increase of cemetery facilities or else an appropriation for a nice large crematory, where batches of defunct miscreants and soulless sinners can be roasted properly. It might damage the tombstone trade, but it would keep out Satan wonderfully, for if His Majesty were to get his share of San Francisco patronage he would be laid up with nervous prostration for the next decade.

W. B. BRADBURY, capitalist and champion expectorator at large, is again in the cold clutches of the law for making a public nuisance of himself. The aged offender is, however, a public benefactor as well, for by paying a five dollars' fine into the city treasury every time he boards a street-car, the municipal revenue will materially increase. Similar offenses at the same rates on the part of other pigheaded millionaires are respectfully solicited.

BLANTHER'S brides are popping up with the usual posthumous celerity, and so far San Francisco has furnished the largest number of his supposed spouses. This is indeed a happy hunting-ground for would-be widows. The TOWN CRIER himself is beginning to fear death, lest his unsullied bachelor name be dragged in the postmortem matrimonial mire.

IT is to be hoped that the recent publication of a poem by Theodore Durrant, the popular young murderer, will not encourage ambitious but obscure bards to follow his example in order to get their effusions printed. As the author of that poem, if not of the murders, the gallows yearns for him.

IT'S an ill wind that blows nobody any good, and the gas companies must be making a good thing out of the recent suicides.

MISS Lillian Ashley, whose claims against Lucky Baldwin as the popper of mommer's blue-eyed baby girl have been exploited in court ad nauseam, says that the bogus Count von Turkheim was also an ardent suitor for her somewhat damaged and blasé affections, but that she gave him the glassy eye. It would add another interesting chapter to the detective's dizzy history if the Amazonian Mrs. John Martin, who when last heard from was painting houses instead of painting the town red, were to come forward with the same blushing confession.

CHRISTIANS are quarrelsome folk. The CRIER does not hear tales of dissension from the other places of amusement. One objection made against Mr. Boynton, the pastor of the First Baptist Church, and which had its weight in bowling the divine gentleman out, is that he is too young. Now, this seems unreasonable, for youth is a fault that is soon outlived, and in any case it isn't Mr. Boynton's own fault that he is so young—it's the fault of his parents. And really, retroactive punishment should be barred. The future Hades is enough.

AN Oaklander named White is attracting considerable attention because he has erected a house adjoining the family homestead where he can retire in solitude when the fusillade of flatirons, rolling-pins and other paraphernalia incident to domestic disagreement gets too exciting for him to dodge the missiles. The idea is not, however, an original one. Many a San Francisco benedict maintains one or more establishments between which he divides his time, but he is not so eager as the Oakland man to take the public into his confidence.

BROTHER Hayes C. French and Brother William Rader, both of them salaried toilers in the Lord's vineyard, are at loggerheads about Jonah and the whale, the former being ready to swallow the whale and its cabin passenger, while the latter discredits the literal application of the scriptural story. The CRIER, being a peaceable devil with no religious prejudices whatever, advises that these excited gentlemen be "heard to cease." The case should be promptly dismissed, owing to the absence of the principal witness.

WILLIAM G. Bell, an aspirant for Senatorial honors at the last election, appropriated a horse and buggy belonging to License Collector Lees the other day, and proceeded to enjoy himself, under the supposition that he was playing a practical joke on a friend. He wound up by being arrested. Of course, it is but natural that a Senator should want to take everything in sight, but the startling part of this transaction is the law's prompt intervention.

AN appeal is to be made for the pardon of John W. Flood, ex-cashier of the Denohoe Bank, who appropriated $161,000, and is now serving a seventeen-years' term of imprisonment in consequence. If the case were a mere murder one could better understand such misplaced sympathy, but to the passionless crime of embezzlement no mercy is due. As Flood is reported to be an exemplary convict he has evidently found his proper sphere.

MAYOR PHELAN is to be commended in his efforts to obtain better fire protection for patrons of the theatre, but the good work of protection should not be confined to the exits and entrances of playhouses. What's the matter with extending the work of reform to the stage and affording the public protection from bad acting?

TONY Hellman, the Bohemian Club wag, says he finds himself so much sought after by the ladies that he seriously contemplates making merchandise of his popularity by selling his conversation at so much an hour. Why don't he sell his jokes by the pound? They would fetch more.

PASTOR Gibson yearns for companionship and declares that he does not care to live alone. It will be remembered that Pastor Brown, now exerting his demoralizing influence upon the susceptible Chicagoese, holds to the same doctrine that it is not good for man to be alone.

IT is said that Mr. Stead is writing a sequel to his "If Christ Came to Chicago," the book which created such a sensation three years ago; it is entitled "When Dr. Brown Came to Chicago," and promises to be even more spicy reading than the former famous work.

'TIS said that a woman 's as old as she looks,
And a man as old as he feels.
Perhaps; but the question of size is the one
With which this short homily deals.

For, size up humanity's hustling hordes,
From the Four Hundred down to the cooks:
How seldom a man is as big as he feels,
Or a woman the size that she looks!—Life.

"Where do all the pins go to?" said the girl to her best beau, when the talk about bicycles had lapsed into obnoxious quietude. "I'm pretty sure I know where a million of them go," he answered. "Indeed! Why, where?" she asked, with a start of surprise that made him withdraw his arm hastily from around her belt. Gazing ruefully at the brand-new scratches on his wrist, he pointedly replied, "They go to waist." The next time he called she wore her brother's ulster.—Judge.

DEATH OF WILLIAM B. CARR.

THE death of William B. Carr, which occurred at his residence in this city last Saturday night, by accidental asphyxiation, came as a profound shock to the thousands of acquaintances of the deceased, and a heavy and abiding sorrow to his family. Saturday evening Mr. Carr retired in excellent health and untroubled spirits; on the following morning his wife, entering his sleeping apartment, found her husband dead in his bed, legal papers strewn about him, and the room charged with gas, which was escaping from an accidentally half-opened burner. Evidence was clear that Mr. Carr had grown drowsy, and in extinguishing the light had unconsciously half turned it on.

Few men were better known in California financial or political circles than William B. Carr. He had long been a resident of this State, having arrived here in 1851, and had from poverty and obscurity won his way to wealth and great influence in the shaping of public affairs. He was associated with J. B. Haggin and Lloyd Tevis in heavy land and other investments, from which he amassed a large fortune. He was equally successful in political as in financial matters; and for many years was an important factor in the Republican party of the State. He was sixty-seven years old, having been born in Clark County, Indiana, November 16, 1830. Mr. Carr had a very wide acquaintance throughout the State, and numbered his warm, personal friends by the hundreds. He was a true man, faithful in all his obligations, warm in his friendships, earnest, aggressive and forceful in all his undertakings. He leaves a widow and three children—George G. and Ralph M. Carr of this city, and Mrs. Mary M. Leeb of Louisville, Ky. The funeral services were held at the family residence, Broadway and Fillmore street, on last Tuesday afternoon.

ANTIQUITY OF CHESS.

THE latest excavations on the pyramid field of Sakkara have led to an extraordinary discovery as to the origin of chess. Hitherto it was assumed that the ancient Indians had invented the game, that it was introduced from India to Persia in the sixth century, and that by the Arabs, and in consequence of the Crusades it spread from east to west. This theory was substantiated by the fact that an Indian, Persian, and Arabic influence is traceable in the character of the figures at present used, and in some of the words connected with the game, such as "shah" (check) and "matt" (mate). Now, north of the pyramid of King Tetu or Teti, two grave chambers have been discovered, which were erected for two high officials of that ruler. Their names were Kakin and Mernker, called Mera. The grave-chamber ("mastaba") of the former, consisted of five rooms, says the British Chess Magazine, built up with limestone. Its walls are covered with exceedingly well-preserved bas-reliefs and pictures representing various scenes. The other grave-chamber, that of Mera, is the most valuable. Up to now no fewer than twenty-seven halls and corridors have been uncovered. There are beautiful grave-columns; in the chief room there is in a niche a tinted statue of the departed, about seven feet high, with a sacrificial table of alabaster before it. Among the many wall-paintings in this and other rooms, hunting and fishing scenes, a group of female mourners, the three seasons, Mera and his sons, holding each other by the hand, and Mera playing chess, are to be seen. King Tetu belonged to the sixth dynasty, and his reign was assigned by Professor Lepsius to about the year 2700 B. C. Professor Brugsch, correcting this chronology, puts it back to still greater antiquity, namely to the year 3300 B. C., so that chess would have been known in the once mysterious land of Misraim something like 5200 years ago.

DEAR EDITH:—No doubt you have observed that ready made costumes of wash materials are just now leading features. An opening of this style of costume is rather an unusual event, but at one of recent date were shown some smart designs in new cotton and linen fabrics, including such novelties as the linen and cotton and cotton grenadines, the canvas cloths, and foulard lawns, batistes, organdies, dimities and linens. Tailored outing suits and separate skirts in pique, cotton tweeds, crash, denim and duck are now chief lines of interest.

Their severe simplicity is in sharp contrast with the elaborate blouse waist and trimmed skirt of the cloth or wool tailor suit, but they must be even more carefully cut and fitted. The skirts measure from four to five yards in width and have the front breadths narrow at the top and broad at the foot. When possible the circular side breadths are fitted without darts, and when darts are necessary they are made to show very little by careful cutting and pressing of the seams on the inside. The skirts are finished with a deep hem, with no lining or stiffening. The Empire, Eton or bolero jackets are all popular for the wash material outing suit. The short blazer is one of the most approved styles, while the English mess jacket is an extreme, the least appropriate of all. The material for a wash suit should be shrunk before making up, otherwise the first washing will render it unfit to wear. A dark blue denim suit will be found both smart and serviceable for one expecting to spend the summer in the country.

Cotton canvas cloths can be purchased in an almost endless variety of tints and colors by those who desire to have such suits made by the home dressmaker. Tan, blue and red are suited for these simple costumes, also the designs in blue, striped with narrow white lines. All kinds of braiding show to advantage upon canvas cloth, although tolets of this fabric will not be so much adorned with braid as dresses made of denim.

Embroidered muslins and linens in dress patterns are very effective and are not so expensive, when you remember that they require no trimming. For the most part they are made over colored silk slips which throw the embroidery pattern into strong relief. Full and fluffy looking waists are made up with ribbon belts and stocks. Lawn is another cotton fabric which is popular for youthful gowns. One of pale pink is made with a skirt trimmed with numerous rows of insertion. The waist has the fronts cross each other in surplice fashion, leaving a pretty modest V at neck which can be filled in with lace or worn open. A smart white lawn waist is trimmed with band of insertion and has a double ruffle of Valenciennes down the front.

Irish point and guipure are favored laces for these wash dresses. Ruffles edged with narrow Valenciennes are always dainty and pretty. In Swiss muslin embroidery there are many new styles. Linen batiste embroidery is very beautiful and much worn.

It is generally conceded, except in midsummer, that the best dressed woman is the one in a plain tailor-made gown, but the productions of this season are not confined to the simple coat and skirt models. The English women are especially addicted to the severe style in tailor-built gowns, but the French woman's tailor dress is a thing of beauty, embracing every opportunity for decoration. One striking example is a green cloth dress with a yellow and green brocaded silk vest, a cloth bolero embroidered all over with narrow silk braid, a high braided collar cut in battlement squares, and a jabot of fine creamy lace over the vest. The skirt and sleeves are braided, and frills of lace fall over the hands.

IT is utterly impossible for James C. Adams to be anything but agreeable, and the handsome young attorney is locally famous for his polite good humor. As he was returning a few days ago to his Oakland residence, his courteous nature received a severe shock, which somewhat ruffled his proverbially sweet temper. At the ferry waiting-room he encountered a heavily-laden woman, shabbily dressed, carrying a dozen parcels of varying shapes and sizes, her burdens not lessened by the fat baby who was the culminating point to her mountain of packages. Jim Adams instinctively went to her rescue.

"Can I carry some of your parcels, madam?" he asked, with a bow, and a suggestion of his engaging smile.

"Yes, sir, you can," promptly replied the woman, and, without more ado, she thrust into his astonished arms a large package of infant. "I can manage the rest," she added reassuringly, as she again gathered up her paper bundles and led the way to the boat.

The situation was decidedly embarrassing for Jim, and his task was not lightened by some considerate acquaintances, who had witnessed the episode, and who followed the apparently domestic procession, with personal comments, very audibly expressed.

"How young to be a father," said one.

"But doesn't the kid look like him?" remarked another.

"He is a nice chap, making his wife carry all the heavy parcels, while he amuses himself with the child," was the sarcastic comment of Adams' younger brother.

"Dresses quite like a gentleman, too, and lets his poor wife wear any old thing," added his particular chum, in simulated disgust. "I suppose he makes her support him, too!"

Strange to say, Jim's sunny disposition was not permanently soured, but since that unhappy experience, he ignores all the other passengers on his ferry trips, and now devotes his attention to literature with an eagerness which is almost feverish.

When Jim Hallock decided to escape the heat last Saturday by a retreat to the country, at the same time accomplishing a visit to his suburban relatives, he was careful not to go unfortified, and his ammunition included a bottle of fine, ten-year-old Holland gin. With such an ambitious thermometer it was not necessary to transport a very extensive wardrobe about the country, so all the baggage Hallock took with him was a small leather satchel, in which he placed a suit of pajamas, carefully rolled around the bottle containing the precious elixir. He had neither occasion nor opportunity to open his prize package until he retired for the night. When he unrolled the pajamas, what was his surprise and grief to discover that the bottle had been unaccountably broken, its precious contents spilled, and that a decided odor of gin pervaded the pajamas, which had been saturated with the liquor. He needed some garment to sleep in, and nothing else being available, he wrapped himself up in the intoxicated pajamas. The night was warm, Hallock was restless and rolled about in his bed a good deal. When he tried to arise in the morning, he found that he was decidedly unsteady, and his efforts to navigate his apartment were not exactly successful. He says it was twenty-four hours before he was himself again. The pajamas had been the cause of his downfall. He had acquired it altogether by absorption.

From the inmost recesses of the luxurious Concordia club comes the champion hard luck story of the season. Hoping that the wager would operate in the nature of a fetch, Jonas Erlanger bet Moses Blum one hundred dollars that it would rain in San Francisco during the week ending at midnight Monday, the authority to be the Weather Bureau official. It was a dry week, and on the last day of the seven, Jonas had about given up hope of receiving five big twenties from Blum. In the evening, he sauntered over to the Concordia Club, where he mentioned the wager, and received the condolences of his friends. As they sat talking, Nat Gerson started up.

"Why, that sounds like the patter of rain drops now," he said.

There was a rush for the windows, where a slight drizzle could be discerned sufficient to be denominated a trace, and enough to win a hundred.

"Saved, by Jupiter!" exclaimed Erlanger, in accents of thanksgiving. "I was afraid I was a goner. But won't Blum swear? He thought he was a sure winner.

"Well, I suppose we crack a bottle with you, Jonas, on your luck," suggested Mose Adler.

"A bottle?" repeated Erlanger, scornfully.—he is the prince of entertainers. "Not a bottle. We'll have twenty bottles!" and they did.

After he had settled for the wine cards, there was still a small balance left of the wager and early next morning Jonas hunted up Blum, and extended his palm.

"Well, you're a promising youth!" ejaculated Blum. "I'll collect that bet myself. You are the loser, not I."

"Not at all," persisted Erlanger. "We all saw the rain up at the club. A dozen fellows can prove it."

"Ah, but that was on Van Ness avenue," replied Blum.

"There was no rain at the Mills Building. I was in the Weather Bureau till twelve."

Rain Secretary Hammon upheld Blum's position and so Jonas paid up, without a squeal. But his friends in the Concordia Club think it is pretty hard lines to be buncoed by a rain cloud like that.

After a pleasant sojourn with his friends by the Golden Gate, Chase Osborn, of New York, decided to take the Alaska trip before returning home. He engaged passage on the north-bound steamer Walla Walla, and shortly before the vessel sailed, he visited the steamship office to purchase his ticket. He enquired the amount due, and carelessly drawing his check for the required sum, tendered the paper to the agent. Now the clerks of the Pacific Coast Steamship Company know little about New York people, and absolutely nothing about Chase Osborn—at least that was their mental condition on Thursday, but they are better informed now. Osborn considered their ignorance regarding him as a personal reflection necessitating resentment, and he proceeded to furnish the reproof by attempting to clean out the office. Before the wreck of the place was absolute, Osborn was persuaded that only current coin was acceptable in that office, and as he returned with the cash half an hour later, his apparel seriously disarranged, the clerks were carrying hack the shattered steel safe from the gutter, into which it had been cast by the infuriated visitor.

The uncomfortable habit of some auctioneers who take advantage of a removal to rent temporarily the vacated house and therein hold a sale of furniture, "as good as new," has frequently been a source of intense annoyance to people who have had occasion to change their residence. The name of the late occupant is generally mentioned in the auctioneer's advertising announcement, and purchasers suppose that the frayed and tarnished ornaments, musty and tattered carpets, and rickety furniture, were actually used by the unfortunate ex-householder. The friends of Dr. W. J. Younger are indignant, because since the departure of the fashionable dentist, they say that auctions of his alleged belongings have been held periodically. No less than six different sets of villainous old furnishings have been palmed off as Younger's by thrifty wielders of the hammer, with leather lungs and impenetrable consciences.

"No wonder he wanted to get rid of such traps," say those who habitually follow the waving of the red flag.

Fun abounds when Howard Taylor, the Olympic Club leader, and Aleck Rosborough, put on their war paint and make their bows as christy minstrels. The other night one of their efforts was received with loud laughter, so out of proportion to the effort it inspired, that the minstrels were non-plussed for the nonce. During a certain interval, Taylor appeared alone and told a long story full of puns and local allusions, about a man, who, riding on a street car, was amazed that the conductor should know personally all his passengers, because whenever he called at the door, "Jessie," "Annie," "Eddy," and so on, a passenger would alight. The yarn was received with good natured tolerance by the audience, but when, later on, Rosborough appeared in a recitative solo, and told the identical story, with variations only slight enough to make the similarity the more marked, his auditors were seized with uncontrollable convulsions. The audience anticipated each pun and when it came, greeted it uproariously. Rosborough at first bowed his acknowledgments with much gratification, but finally the audience got away with him, and he was obliged to retire before he reached his climax. When notes were compared behind the scenes and Taylor and Rosborough each found that the other had used the property story, there were mutual accusations of stolen thunder. Their minstrel repertoire is at present without an anecdote.

East street is the scene of many strange spectacles, but its frequenters have seldom seen anything more odd than the antics of a band of burros, lauded on the wharf by the Stockton boat yesterday. There were two score of these wild asses, and they had no sooner reached East street than they were greeted by the braying welcome of a passing team of the same species. At the first sound of the resonant haw-hee-haw of the domesticated mules, the long ears of the entire drove were uplifted simultaneously, and all forty of them trotted off in brisk pursuit of the rapidly driven wagon. The burro drivers were in despair how to secure the return of their troublesome charges, when valuable assistance was suddenly received from an unexpected quarter. The truant asses paused, stopped, turned and started back, first in a walk, quickened to a gentle amble, and ending in a mad gallop. Passersby were at a loss to account for the asinine proceeding, until they caught sight of a man with an immense, broad-brimmed hat, haranguing a group at the ferry. The burros had been lured by the deep, bass tones of Thomas V. Cator, the Populist orator.

Shipping and commercial circles can present no more unique character than Charles D. Clarke, agent of the California Navigation and Improvement Company. His artistic possibilities in the line of profanity leave nothing to be desired. Clarke is of the type of the Mississippi steamboat captain, and swears with consistent regularity, wearing a good-natured smile the while. His friends do not seriously object to his little idiosyncrasy, which they know is simply a matter of habit, and they understand that he does not mean the picturesque oaths to which he gives voice. Clarke frequently employs at the wharves men known as lumpers, who work about the fleet of river steamers for which he is agent. The task of supervising these lumpers keeps him in practice, and gives his tongue daily exercise. On a recent busy day, Clarke had no time to smile, as he called upon all the legendary deities to consign the lumpers to various unexplored regions. He regretted the bad temper, and felt that an explanation of his unusual irritation was due.

"I have had so much swearing to do to-day," he said, apologetically, "that the first thing I knew I was mad clear through from listening to myself!"

While Judge Coffey's sarcastic tongue is the cause of much trepidation among the legal fraternity, his shafts are not always directed against others, and he can tell as good a story at his own expense as if the point is directed at any one else. The great probate authority is fond of swimming in the salt water, and while he was enjoying a recent dip, he was conscious of an irritating sensation in one of his legs. An investigation showed a young mackerel shark, which was nibbling, without causing much injury, at the judicial calf. Judge Coffey glanced reproachfully at his finny antagonist. Then, with dignified precision born of a prolonged occupancy of the bench, he uttered a mild reproof.

"I had supposed," he said, with a tinge of sorrow in his voice, "I had supposed I would meet with professional courtesy in these waters."

Members of the local bar take great delight in the ready wit and sharp tongue of Attorney D. M. Delmas. Apropos of his ironical comments on the conduct of the Fair-Craven controversy, lawyers are recalling a story of a passage-at-arms between the brilliant barrister and Superior Judge Seawell, illustrating how dangerously near Delmas can approach the flame of judicial wrath without being burned. During the trial of a case before Judge Seawell, Mr. Delmas was repeatedly overruled on a point which the skillful pleader presented under many and various guises and disguises. The court was courteous, almost deferential.

"I am very sorry, Mr. Delmas," he said, soothingly, "but the law is against you. You must blame the law, and, of course, you can save your exception."

With a Chesterfieldian bow, Delmas waved a declining hand.

"No, your Honor," he replied, suavely, but with marked emphasis, "I have no oak to find with the law."

THE society event of the week has been the Gingerbread Fête, for the success of which our prettiest maids and most charming matrons have so untiringly labored for weeks past. It did seem too bad that the weather should have changed so decidedly for the worst for the opening, which took place on Tuesday evening; but to judge from the pleased expression of the crowds in attendance, it would not have very much mattered to them had the elements been openly at war outside, so long as it was so delightful indoors. The attractions offered have been manifold—beautiful tableaux, sweet music, works of art, priceless curios, Russian tea, delicious refreshments, Punch and Judy, the anamatiscope, lemonade and flowers, to say nothing of the DeWolf Hoppers, Ferris Hartman, and Henry Payot. This will be Children's Day, and the arrangements made for the pleasure of the young folks are so perfect that they will have a "real good time" goes without saying.

The swim can thank Mrs. C. P. Huntington for most of the festivities which have taken place here this month, as she has not only been the motif for a number of card, luncheon and dinner parties, but has also been hostess herself on several occasions. It will, therefore, be a decided loss to society when Mr. and Mrs. Huntington take their leave of San Francisco, which will probably be within a very short time. However, the loss of one is often the gain of another, and the pleasantest news heard in an age is that of the approaching return to their native heath of Mrs. Herman Oelrichs and Miss Virginia Fair for an indefinite stay, for whenever they come to San Francisco, gay doings follow in their footsteps, as witness the innumerable lunch and dinner parties that are always consequent upon their arrival. The old Fair home, on Pine street, was ever the center of hospitality during Mrs. Fair's régime, and Mrs. Oelrichs has proved a worthy successor of her mother as a hostess, so society is to be congratulated upon the prospect of having her here for some time to come.

There was a pretty home wedding last Wednesday evening, when Miss Agnes Smedberg was the bride and Max Rosenfeld the groom, who were made man and wife by Judge J. M. Seawell in the prettily decorated home of the bride's mother, Mrs. James Smedberg, on Pine street. Miss Hallie Smedberg was her sister's maid-of-honor, Miss Annie White officiated as bridesmaid, and A. W. Follansbee appeared as the groom's best man. The guests, some fifty in number, comprised relatives and intimate friends only, and after the ceremony a handsome supper was served.

On Wednesday evening, the 12th inst., Miss Frances M. Herbert was married to Harold C. Ward, the ceremony taking place at the residence of the bride's parents, on Morton street, Alameda. The halls and dining-room were beautifully and profusely decorated for the happy occasion. After the ceremony an elegant supper was served, and dancing followed.

Wednesday evening, June 9th, is the date set for the wedding of Miss Mahel Estee and Leonard Everett.

The engagement of Mrs. Dolly Brown and Chas. Wood has at last been officially announced, though it has been an open secret for several weeks past, and while the wedding day is not actually named, it is said the ceremony will not be long delayed.

The most prominent of recently announced engagements is that of Miss Laura Gashwiler and Samuel M. Shortridge, so the swim has yet another wedding to look forward to in the near future. The young bride-to-be is one of the beautiful Native Daughters that California is so proud of; and the groom is one of the most prominent attorneys of the State. The happy pair have been receiving hearty congratulations on all sides.

The tea given by the Sketch Club at the studio of Miss Kate Thompson, on Sutter street, last Saturday afternoon, was a delightful affair; the silver wedding anniversary dinner of Mr. and Mrs. Willie Howard at the Hopkins Villa, near Redwood City, last Sunday, was enjoyed by eighteen of their friends, who heartily wished them "many happy returns." Besides these, have been the Lockett reception at the Presidio; Mrs. McLaren's tea in honor of her sister, Mrs. Harold Sewell, who is here en route to the Sandwich Islands, and an unusually large number of theatre parties, of which the Baldwin and Columbia have each had their share.

Opening days continue to be heard of at all the summer resorts, but as yet society has not migrated to any great extent. The season has been delightfully inaugurated at Santa Cruz by Major and Mrs. Frank McLaughlin, who gave a fancy dress ball at Golden Gate Villa last Saturday evening. The barn, which was lighted with Japanese lanterns, was elaborately dressed with fancy draperies, flowers and foliage, and here the dancing took place. At midnight a handsome supper was served at the Villa. The costumes were very pretty, and altogether the affair was a great success.

Mr. and Mrs. Phil Lilienthal and Mr. and Mrs. I. N. Walter are among those who have selected Santa Barbara for their summer location. The Louis Gerstles, Marcus Gerstles, W. T. Gerstles, Leon Slosses and Louis Slosses will spend the summer at San Rafael, where they all have lovely cottage homes of their own. There also will be found Mrs. Elizabeth Hager and her daughters, that lady having taken a house there for the season. Mr. and Mrs. O. D. Baldwin and Miss Blanche have gone to their Mill Valley cottage for the summer months. The H. S. Crockers and H. Dutards have chosen the Hotel Vendome as their abiding place. Miss Gertrude Goewey is the guest of Mrs. Emma McMillan at Pasadena; Miss Lily Lawlor is visiting Mrs. Will Tevis at Bakersfield.

New York has been full of San Franciscans of late, among the sojourners being Mr. and Mrs. Russ Wilson, Miss Caro Crockett, Dr. and Mrs. McMonagle, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Scott, Mr. and Mrs. Rounceville Wildman, Mr. and Mrs. Homer S. King, James V. Coleman, J. C. Stuhls, Mr. and Mrs. Lloyd Tevis, Miss Breckinridge. Prince Poniatowski and Will Crocker sailed from New York for Europe last Wednesday. Col. Fred Crocker was an East-bound passenger over the road last Tuesday evening. Our newly fledged Brigadier, General Shafter, arrived from Washington on Tuesday, and was given a reception on Wednesday evening by the Presidio Club.

Last week Mr. and Mrs. Sol Ehrman returned home, after an extended tour of the East. At Baltimore Mr. Ehrman visited his mother, whom he had not seen in some twenty years, and while in New York they were the guests of Mr. and Mrs. Stiefel (née Schweitzer), formerly of this city. With them came Miss Ruth Meyer, of New York, who will spend the summer in San Francisco as the guest of her sister, Mrs. Ahe Stern. Being a native daughter, and having a host of friends here, a good time is already assured her. The fact that our city is not altogether unpopular with the Eastern girl seems to be gaining every day. A niece of Mrs. Sylvain Weill, Miss Stettheimer, sister of Mrs. Ferichtwanger, and the Misses Jacobi, of this city, will be included in this summer's influx.

The "musical" at Professor Alois Lejeal's residence last Saturday afternoon was not only an artistic success, but a social one as well. The rendition of a very carefully selected programme was accomplished in a most satisfactory fashion, especially the playing of Mrs. Franklin and Miss May Hyman, both of whom possess a touch and technique excelled by few professionals. The solo by the younger Lejeal was quite a feature, and if he reaches the prediction of his friends and admirers, California may yet produce a Paderewski. The afternoon's entertainment ended pleasantly in a sumptuous repast.

A great many people are just now arranging to go out of town for the season, and at the Hotel Rafael have already been reserved a large number of apartments for the next few months. Manager Warfield has made elaborate preparations for the reception of his guests, who may rely on anticipation of all the luxuries and comforts usually found only at home.

Mme. Algeria de Reyna Barrios, the first lady of Guatemala, and wife of President Barrios, of the Republic, is at present a guest of the Occidental, this city, having arrived from the South early this week. Mme. Barrios is not a stranger to San Francisco; and her former acquaintances are exerting every effort to make the stay of the beautiful and distinguished visitor a pleasant one. Mme. Barrios is a native of the United States, having been born in New Orleans. The wife of Guatemala's President takes a very active interest study their children and educate themselves in the principles and facts that underlie the wisest child-training. To this end this organization, belonging primarily to the home, desires to co-operate with kindergarten, school and university as fully as possible.

One of the most picturesque and slightly locations in Sausalito is occupied by Hotel Geneva, formerly the El Monte, on the hill opposite the ferry. The Geneva has recently been thoroughly renovated throughout. Electric lights, most sanitary plumbing, elegant and new furnishings, hot and cold salt water, the best table, tennis court—in fact, every means for the comfort, both indoor and out, for guests, is provided. The Hotel Geneva is just a step out of the city, regular and rapid connections being made by the North Pacific Coast ferry. An ideal home for business men who must reach the city daily, and yet who require a summer outing. Chamberlin & Co. are the present proprietors, and every want of their guests is anticipated.

Miss Virgilia Foltz, who is well known in this city, sailed on the 29th ult. for Italy from New York. The young lady recently graduated from the Conservatory of Music there, and later took the role of the Queen in The Bohemian Girl in a company of professionals. The musical critics were enthusiastic and unanimous in their praise of her voice, which is a deep, rich contralto of great range. Miss Foltz will complete her musical education abroad. A brilliant future certainly awaits this accomplished young lady.

Mr. Thomas Watson, accompanied by Mrs. Watson, will leave the city on next Tuesday, the 18th inst., on his usual business tour through Oregon and Washington. At Tacoma they will join the steamer Queen, sailing for Alaska, on June 8th. They will be away from here about six weeks, returning on the 27th of next month.

The many friends of Mrs. Dr. Byron Haines will be pleased to learn that she has fully recovered from her recent severe illness. The Doctor, by the way, seems to have succeeded to the large society practice enjoyed by Dr. Younger previous to his departure for Chicago.

Arrivals to date at St. Denis Hotel, Broadway and Eleventh street, New York, are H. C. Coleman and Stewart Menzies of San Francisco, and M. Welsh of Los Angeles.

in the women of her adopted country, and has done much to advance their station in life. She is a patron of the recognized charities of her country, and is a most generous as well as a most beautiful woman. An illustration of her generous nature was shown in her prompt purchase of a box at the charity benefit that took place at the Baldwin Hotel on last Thursday afternoon. Mme. Barrios will remain in the city for some time, and thence proceed to New York and Europe, her trip covering a period of five or six months.

It seems that the promised activities of both the Calliopean Club and San Francisco Verein for summer outings have dwindled to nothing, and both "tug party" and "outing" will live only in the memory of some of the directors.

The Palace Hotel has added materially to the pleasure of its guests and the attractions of the grill room by the introduction of a musical programme of twelve numbers, beautifully rendered by the Vienna Trio, every Wednesday and Saturday at the noon hour, at which time violin, piano and cello will discourse popular airs of the day and selections from the operas.

"The Portrait of the Cardinal," by Toby Rosenthal, of which Mr. Jacob Stern is the fortunate possessor, has been on exhibition at the Gingerbread Fête.

The Board of Administration of The Home and Child Study Association will meet in the parlors of Golden Gate Hall on Saturday, May 15th, at 10 o'clock. Members of Mrs. E. G. Greene's Child-Study classes, and other persons interested in educational work, will be welcome. The purpose of this organization is to unite all persons, and especially mothers, who wish to keep in touch with the new movement in child study; to stimulate mothers to

AS the two military weddings draw near, one sees much rushing in and out of the stores by our pretty belles, and the lovely gowns that will result from all this shopping will make the weddings most attractive sights. A large party of guests will come over from San Rafael for the Cohen-Bent nuptials, as well as numbers from across the bay on the Oakland side. Some novel and artistic effects in decoration, etc., are promised at the Unitarian Church, where the ceremony will be performed; only the bridal party and their relatives will partake of the wedding supper at Dr. Gibbons' residence afterwards. Much speculation is rife in the swim as to which will make the prettier bride of the two, Miss Cohen or Miss Burton, but they are so totally different in appearance and style that comparisons cannot be instituted. That each will look lovely goes without saying.

Some envious fellows (and that this state of feeling is not by any means confined to the fair sex is thus proven) are inclined to think that Addie Mizner—our own unique Ad—has had a soft thing of it in directing and arranging the poses, etc., and being the head center of a flock of sweet girls in the week's Gingerbread Fête. But not so, thinks the young man himself, say his friends, for admitting the charm of being surrounded by, appealed to, and gazed upon by so many lovely creatures, the unpleasantness created by having to decide in favor of this or that one, and thus entailing loss of popularity from the others, has been a great drawback to his happiness. It is a lucky thing indeed that the "sweet girl graduates" from our fashionable seminaries are used to slang and somewhat strong expressions, for without this safety valve poor Addie might have been a candidate for Stockton or Agnews. Apropos of this charming entertainment, a wretched old hatch was heard growling to a sour-visaged female in one of the rooms that it was a pity the pains bestowed upon the outside of the heads could not have been given to the inside, and tableaux show the progress made in the mental condition of women in the series of years portrayed; but query, Has it been progress? Women's Congress, reply.

Advices from abroad give our society the pleasing intelligence that at the conclusion of the Jubilee celebration ceremonies and consequent thereupon, a party of Britons, swells all of them, will make a trip to California, coming from England to Canada, and on by the Canadian Pacific—no halt to be made on American soil save in our own Golden State. We can imagine the flutter their arrival will cause in our beau monde, as not only titled men, but titled women will be of the party; and who knows? perhaps the ambitions of Jim Phelan, Fred Crocker, or Terry Hamilton might be reached by capturing a sure enough "lady" for a wife.

Mrs. Millie Ashe Sewell's well-remembered smile was strongly in evidence at the reception given in her honor by her sister, Mrs. Linie McLaren, last week. Mrs. Sewell certainly holds front rank in the favor of her friends, who all crowded to meet and congratulate her upon representing America in Hawaii. Already numerous parties are being talked of for a trip to the Islands, and as they are likely to be composed of jolly people they are certain of a rousing welcome at the U. S. Consulate, and a good time generally is an assured fact.

Gossip from Gotham indicates that there is a chance of the long and patient waiting of Miss Jennie Flood's Eastern admirer being rewarded at last; and another hit goes that George Mayre will bring a bride hack with him.

Shakespeare says, "What's in a name?" But a name is sometimes productive of much annoyance, to say the least, as must have been the case upon the announcement by our dailies that Miss Flora Low was to be wedded in New York. Hence Miss Flora Low, daughter of the late ex-Governor Low, has, say her friends, been the recipient of endless notes of congratulation from friends far and near, all of which has proved somewhat embarrassing under the circumstances, as it was not she, but her cousin (a daughter of C. Adolphe Low, a former resident of this city) who was the young lady alluded to.

If any one supposes that high-toned gambling is confined to men's clubs, they ought to be guests at some of our aristocratic card parties, when a "little game" is hugely enjoyed by the women players, and sips of champagne fortify them for losses or marital chidings over tardy dinner serving.

Mrs. Chauncey Boardman's initial effort at a dinner party was pronounced a great success by the guests. This young matron is very popular with her girl friends (as any one with three eligible brothers-in-law would naturally be), and every one who knows Chauncey himself is aware what a genial host and good fellow he is.

The return of those vivacious cousins, the Misses Blake-mau and Keeney, has set Berkeley in an uproar of delight. The strong resemblance in personal appearance between Miss Ethel Keeney and Miss Gladys McClung is much commented upon by the Brownies.

The swim is greatly excited over the rumor from the rural districts that an announcement will shortly be made from San Rafael, the parties being a well known belle and a popular beau.

A SUNSET DREAM.—ARTHUR L. SALMON, IN COLLIER'S WEEKLY.

BESIDE the hearthstone old and gray,
Whose fires throughout the passing years
Have lit a home of mirth and tears,
I sit and watch the close of day.
Here where I breathed my earliest breath,
And cried my earliest cry of joy,
And played my pastimes when a hoy,
I linger still—and wait for death.
I see myself again a child,
With laughter ringing high and low,
And playmates of the long ago,
As glad as I was and as wild.
And voices through the deepening gloom
Are whispering fondly in mine ear;
And hands that seem so strangely near
Are beckoning in the dusky room.
Then beckon to the golden west
Where sunset's perfect glory lies;
While higher in the quivering skies
Appears the star of evening rest.
And crimson clouds—like angel hands
Assembled near to watch and pray—
Have gathered round the dying day
With palms of glory in their hands.
The darkened twilight deeper falls;
The misty moon hangs large and red
Above the forest's shadowy head.
And hark!—I hear a voice that calls!
Still further do my dreamings roam,
And further take the hue of truth;
I feel a sudden gush of youth,
And some one points the pathway home.

A REASON FOR SILENCE.—LOUISE IMOGEN GUINEZ, IN CURRENT LITERATURE.

You sang, you sang! you mountain brook,
Scarce by your tangly banks held in,
As running from a rocky nook,
You leaped the world, the sea to win,
Sun-bright past many a foamy crook,
And headlong as a javelin.
Now men do check and still your course
To serve a village enterprise,
And leeward drive your sullen force,
What wonder, slave! that in no wise
Breaks from you, pooled 'mid reeds and gorse
The voice you had in Paradise.

THE CHANGED ROSE.—FLORENCE A JONES, IN CURRENT LITERATURE.

The white rose leaned her stainless heart
To the red rose at her feet;
Ah, never was red, red rose so false,
Or white rose half so sweet.
She hreathed, "Beloved, I will draw
You up to my own fair height,
Then shall we smile at the mocking world,
When my red rose blooms white."
I of the mocking world leaned out,
As they touched my window sill,
And I saw a white heart crimson-stained,
But the red rose was red still.

AT ANCHOR.—M. ELIZABETH CROUSE.

Sunrise and God's fresh day,
The dew on all the grass,
And in the harbor ships that nestling lay
Unfurl their sails and pass.
Sunrise and God's fresh day,
Life's craft the waters spurn;
And may the vessels never go astray
But home to God return.
Sunset and God's tired day
Seek heaven thro' the west—
And in the harbor ships that sped away,
Now furl their sails and rest.

OUR over-worked justices of the Peace are carving up the summer time for their annual vacations.

A NEW suit may fit never so well, and still not make the wearer proud. For further particulars the unduly inquisitive are confidently directed to Judge Hebbard.

THE city of Glasgow will levy no taxes for municipal purposes after 1897. The revenues from gas plants, street railways and other municipal holdings will lift the burdens from the people's shoulders, while at the same time giving them most excellent service. Here is a hint to San Francisco; but Glasgow is run on strict business principles. The pull of the political boss, the gargantuan girth of the average Supervisor, and the absorbing enterprise of the contractor are not known in Glasgow. The difference is fatal!

THE effort being made to prevent the export of adulterated brandy from this State should be backed up in every legitimate way. The temporary advantages of such traffic would in the end prove a costly experiment. But it would be well for the authorities to see to it that the adulteration of liquor be stopped. It is all right to protest against sending it abroad, on account of the ultimate injury to trade, but it is even more necessary to protest against its sale at home as a matter of self-preservation. That the domestic stomach certainly equals the foreign market the rankest free trader will admit.

THE advice of that anarchist, Boyce, President of the Western Miners' Federation, to the miners' meeting at Salt Lake last week, that they arm themselves and protect their "rights" with powder, bayonet and ball, has already borne fruit. Guns and ammunition have been stolen from an armory of the Idaho National Guard, and, it is said by miners of the Coeur d'Alene, as a direct result of the criminal advice of Boyce. When the clash comes, and the strong hand of the United States is at the vitals of the deluded and misguided followers of such a cowardly torch as their President, Boyce will be far from the smell of gunpowder, drawing a fat salary as the price of his treason to the country and enmity to labor.

THE howl against Mrs. Atherton's latest book, "Patience Sparhawk," by the Mechanics' Library, is not defensible upon the theory of the greatest good to the greatest number. The action of the Directors will cause a run on "Patience Sparhawk" that will surprise Mrs. Atherton's warmest admirers, and prove a source of profit to this hard-speaking handler of twilight subjects.

THE Yerkes telescope, like everything Chicagoese, is the biggest glass in the world. It is four inches larger than the great Lick glass at Mt. Hamilton. It is said the Yerkes telescope will discover many new heavenly bodies, and vastly enrich the science of astronomy. We suggest, before its gaze be turned skyward, that the glass be given a test in trying to locate the tide of prosperity due to reach the Earth at 11:45 A. M. of March 4, 1897.

THE attaché of License Collector Lees' office whose salary equalled his total annual collections, of whom mention was made last week, is, upon investigation, found to have been drawing his salary for an office which had no legal existence. This report does not dislodge the tax-eater, however, who, his superior explains, is now engaged in clerical work in the office. If one may judge from his brilliant achievements outside during the past year, his "work" indoors consists chiefly in drawing his salary and keeping the grass off the political fences of his boss.

COMMENTS upon the great libel suit, in which Judge Hebbard, from a bumptious and aggressive prosecutor and persecutor, became a badly damaged and beaten defendant, are pouring into the NEWS LETTER office; and they contain, in straight-thinking English, opinions on the case. These will appear, duly credited, next week and thereafter, as space and time may warrant. These criticisms show where the Judge stands in the eye of the public throughout California, and, in effective limelights, uncover a luckless jackass ruthlessly plucked of his lion's skin.

THE Merchants' Association has turned its great influence toward giving San Francisco better lights. The Association is practical in all it undertakes, and it may be able to bring about the result it now seeks to accomplish. Better street lights are badly wanted; but it would give more personal comfort, make a better impression upon visitors, reduce profanity and stimulate piety—since cleanliness is next to Godliness—if the Association would choke the miserable existence out of the present street-sprinkling combine, and keep the atmosphere of the city clean by wetting the streets. Besides, the Park needs the compost which is really superfluous in lungs, ears, clothing, eyes, and nostrils.

JUDGE Joachimsen electrified his hearers last Wednesday by declaring from the Bench that he would no longer listen to trivial excuses for delays, continuances, and other slyster tricks familiar to the Police Court lawyers who infest the City Hall. "I will not countenance any such proceedings," said he, in well-simulated or genuine wrath. "It is about time a halt was called in such cases as this, and I propose to make an end of this business of thieves and vagrants coming into court and asking for favors that would not be granted to honest people." If the Judge accomplish these miracles, he will have marked an epoch in Police Court history in San Francisco that will richly entitle him to the respect of honest men. Our Police Judges have too long enjoyed the affectionate regard of the push, the pull, and deeper criminals. There is hope for them yet. Joachimsen leads the way.

WILL JUDGE HEBBARD RESIGN.

BY all the rules that should govern the personal action of a man fit to be a Superior Judge, Hebbard ought to drop the ermine and resign an office for which a high jury of his fellow-citizens have substantially declared him to be unfit. The appeal to that body was of his own taking, and he was very persistent, if not malevolent, in taking it. Many of his friends advised him that he could make nothing, but might lose much, by resorting to an attack upon the liberty of the press to criticise him as a candidate for a public office. It was all without avail. "His usefulness was gone," he said, "unless he obtained a vindication from a jury." He is, or ought to be, the best judge of how to safeguard his own honor. He has chosen that way, and the result is practically a verdict of "guilty" as charged by this journal. If his usefulness was gone before that verdict was rendered, how much less is it now that a judgment of condemnation has been rendered against him? By all the rules of logical reasoning, by all the impulses of a conscientious man, and by all that goes to constitute a judicial mind, he has passed final judgment upon himself, from which there is no appeal, except it may be from Philip sober to Philip drunk. He was charged with being "the tool" and "creature" of bank emptiers, and the verdict of an exceptionally strong-minded jury is in substance "guilty as charged." The trial was to him more than fair. He had two counsel to the NEWS LETTER's one. He had a Judge his warm personal friend, and probably had the case assigned to him for that very reason. He had the environment of the court all his own way. He had a fat official salary, and took care to draw it with regularity in order to help him to the goal he finally reached. And perhaps above all, he had his own "Superior" services as a lawyer to help him out. Of all these he made free use. Yet his path is now blazed with the words "guilty as charged." We have reason to believe that the jury directed their attention all the time to the question as to whether Judge Hebbard committed the acts charged, and their verdict is the result. If a different conclusion had been reached, Mr. Marriott would, of course, have been declared guilty, and would have had to suffer the full penalties of the law. He has been exonerated, and his opponent is left in the mire of his own creating as a "tool," a "creature," and, as a consequence, a dishonored Judge. For him there can be no future on the Bench, and nothing honorable now remains for him but to accept his own forewarnings and resign. In his former libel trial against one of the depositors of the wrecked Savings Bank, his counsel, W. W. Foote, declared in his presence and hearing that "a verdict of vindication was necessary to his re-assumption of the Superior Bench; that he did not seek revenge, and would himself pay any fine over one dollar in which the defendant might be mulcted." This big bluff almost snatched a verdict in his favor. Fortunately, as it happens, he lived to see another day, and that has proved his Waterloo. His much deluded constituents now know Hebbard better than they did, and their information will increase, unless, indeed, he takes the one step obviously open to him, and resigns. By the way, his loud-mouthed organ, the Examiner, barely published the judgment against him. That will be accounted for in due time. Those who read that sheet will remember how, contrary to a well-established rule of the press, that journal tried to prejudice our case, influence jurymen, and prevent us having a fair trial. The result shows how limited its influence is in this city.

Hawaiian Canes Nearly the whole of the Hawaiian question is stated in our head line.

Against California's Beets. Shall the Hawaiian cane sugar be given a bonus of one and one-half cents a pound, with the effect of suppressing the growth of the most promising industry that California has to-day? Our beet sugar industry has made a big start, has great possibilities, and, indeed, bids fair to become the leading industry of the State. Our great valleys of deep, rich soil are unsurpassed for the growth of the sugar beet by any part of the known world. Their cultivation and manufacture will give our own farmers, carriers, and refiners an ever increasing amount of profitable labor. With our country on a protectionist basis, why should we give up our own home market to the fat, lazy, and opulent Hawaiian planters, and to their semi-slave laborers of Chinese, Japanese, and Portuguese origin. To do that is to reverse our whole tariff policy, and to lead to the suspicion that certain of our Senators have tasted Hawaiian sugar, and found more in it for them than in that grown in their own country. The right kind of legislation on this subject is so palpable to the Protectionist majority that those of them who vote against it are obvious betrayers of a great public trust, and, as such, unworthy of confidence. The truth is, that the young missionary descendants who have fled from the natives nearly all their lands, have too long been a pampered, coddled and spoiled class. They toil not, neither do they spin. Yet, by abusing the hospitality of the natives, who so generously received their sires, they have become the lords of the manor, and rule over the country as despots. They employ imported heathens, who are paid and treated very much as if they were chattel property, and all this whilst these planters have been paid over $80,000,000 by the American wage-earners in the shape of rebated sugar duties, and that to the injury of what can be, and ought to be, the leading industry of California's free labor. The white population amounts to only about 8,000, or about as many people as are found housed in a single street in San Francisco. We send this select band $4,000,000 a year in rebated sugar duties, or more, on an average, than the United States has spent on the whole State of California. In return for all this, the Hawaiians buy of California wines, brandies, flour, lumber, canned goods, etc., to an amount just about equal to the sugar duties we present them with. That is to say, in fact, we virtually make a free gift of all that they care to order from us. Machinery, refinery material, and other articles of a more costly character, they take either from Germany or England, and order from us only what they must, which they would do treaty or no treaty. American consumers get nothing out of this subvention to the Hawaiians, because the latter take care that their sugar shall not sell for less than what is charged by countries with which we have no treaty. All this is a transparent wrong that has continued too long. It should no longer continue as an example of the jobbery and robbery of the period.

Taxing Inheritances. New York State did not like the Supreme Court's overthrow of the income tax, and is now playing for even by passing an inheritance tax bill. That it is an extreme measure no one can doubt. The rates are graduated, and are as high as ten to fifteen per cent on estates which mount well up into the millions. This feature may render it unconstitutional, inasmuch as it invades the requirement that taxation shall be equal. But its almost unanimous passage by the Legislature of our greatest State serves to indicate the trend of the times, that may well be taken to heart by the very rich. These men have for the most part acquired their wealth through special privileges of one kind or another conferred upon them by the Government. They can and they ought to bear a larger proportion of Governmental expenses than they now do. That is the feeling that is abroad in the land, and if it is not in some measure placated, it will sooner or later breed lamentable mischief. The masses have votes, and they are coming dangerously near to using them for socialistic purposes. Once let them carry a national election, and we may then witness scenes not unlike those of the French Revolution. The prevailing dissatisfaction is dangerous. The present Congress and administration are doing nothing calculated to alleviate it. The promised good times are not being realized. A considerable proportion of our population is made up of dangerous classes. Conservative men may well take serious thought of these gathering clouds and put their heads together to forestall and circumvent them. The reorganization of our present incidents of taxation is inevitable, and it is to be feared that dire will be the consequences if it is much longer postponed. The NEWS LETTER's consistent course during its whole career renders it unnecessary for us to say more of ourselves than that we are treating of this matter more as a friend and counselor of acquired capital, than as a critic.

The opposition to the New York measure, which still awaits the Governor's signature, is raising heaven and earth to have it vetoed. Being an extreme and inequitable law, that ought to be its fate. But shelving the issue in that way will not solve it. Like Banquo's ghost it will not down. Its defeat now will only lend exasperation to the dissatisfied classes. The millionaires of the metropolis, who seemed to be struck dumb with amazement when the bill was going through the Legislature, now hazes forth upon the man who alone is empowered to put it on or keep it off the statute books. The New York Evening Post refers to the measure "as a direct tax on accumulation." But are not all taxes that? It is only a question of degree. The New York Times questions "whether it will not destroy all incentive to accumulation and industry." But may not the same thing be more justly said of the present too heavy burdens upon the poor? These are fair specimens of the arguments used up and down the State among its newspaper exponents of public opinion. All of which is as applicable to the struggling man's savings as to the vast accumulations of the very rich, with this difference: that the latter is able to stand it without suffering, whilst the former is not. This bold assumption on the part of these misguided organs is that extraordinary individual wealth is the sole product of honest thrift and industry, rather than of privileges created by the law, or taken in spite of the law. If the millionaires of the land will not abstain from buying vetoes, legislatures, and court decisions, as they are reported to be preparing to do in New York, we warn them that a worse evil than an income tax will befall them. The wealth of New York will not always impress its will upon the laws of this land, and that is so palpable that it would be the work of wisdom to study the trend of the times, and be preparing moderate measures that will turn aside a condition likely otherwise to come upon us. It is better to yield in part than to be altogether captured and at the mercy of the enemy. These are grave considerations for accumulated wealth in this Republic.

The President Usurping Congressional Privilege.

A suggestive story comes from our Eastern exchanges. It appears that a tall, finely formed and well-educated colored man appeared in Washington with unexceptionable credentials, and an application for a Postmastership at the South. He was presented at the White House, and by his modesty, manly bearing and record made a most favorable impression. He was booked for the place, and was happy. But a storm arose. The white lady clerks "would not retain their places under him, that they wouldn't." The Senators from the State—Georgia—would harass the Executive "if the nigger were appointed." All this, and much more, although many of the most prominent white men in Georgia had signed the man's credentials. After warming his heels around Washington for weeks, he was at last bluntly told by the President that "he would not be appointed; was wasting his time in Washington and had better go home." To this the crestfallen office seeker replied that he would gladly follow the President's advice, but that he didn't have a cent to go home with. Whereupon the President pulled out a ten-dollar bill from his vest pocket, and sent the colored man on his way, if not rejoicing, at least able to pay his fare out of town. This payment by the President is a distinct usurpation of the privileges of Congressmen. Every one acquainted with the national capital knows the ordinary stages which the unsuccessful office seeker experiences. He arrives at Washington proud and confident. He puts up at an expensive hotel, as befitting his anticipated dignity. He sees the Representatives from his district. He files his papers and "pays his respects" at the White House. Then he waits, and oh such a wait! It soon becomes that "hope deferred that maketh the heart sick." As the days pass his pocketbook dwindles. He abandons the hotel for a cheap boarding-house. The new suit of clothes he bought before leaving home begins to look seedy. His countenance takes on lines of chronic discouragement. Sooner or later he gives up a struggle that has become hopeless, and obtains a loan from his Congressman to pay his return to civil life. It is an ever-recurring tale, of more pathos than humor to many of our free and independent. But it is invariably the privilege of the Congressman to send his constituent home. Mr. McKinley has been there himself, and knows all about it. He has set a bad precedent, and has only himself to thank if he suffers from it in the proportion to which $50,000 a year holds to $5,000 a year. The colored gentleman in question is reported to have spent his time and not less than $200 of his own money to help secure Major McKinley's election. Ex-President Harrison met a similar difficulty in a very different way. He had appointed a colored man to a position in one of the departments, whereupon the lady clerks addressed the President a remonstrance, saying they "could not get along with a negro in their midst, and would have to resign." The General replied that "he regretted their inability, as it was a distinct disability to office holding." They overcame their squeamishness. His weaker successor demonstrates that he is not of the stuff of which heroes are made.

The Roll of Honor.

The NEWS LETTER would fail of an honorable and pleasing obligation did it not thus publicly extend its earnest thanks upon its own behalf, no less than of the entire community, to the twelve citizens who sat in final judgment upon the case of Judge Hehhard against the liberty of the Press and the Rights of the People; for the NEWS LETTER and its proprietor were mere incidents in that happily abortive attempt to strangle free expression of opinion and protect our judiciary from honest criticism. The men who gave this emphatic verdict are substantial and active business men of this city. It is safe to say that a more thoroughly representative and intelligent jury never listened to testimony nor rendered a verdict in a San Francisco court. They sifted the testimony, reached the facts, and upheld justice in an atmosphere not over-friendly to the defense. That they did their duty courageously, and in their verdict maintained a great principle of justice, is the unanimous opinion of the people and press of California. If all our juries were animated by the clear sense of right and personal recognition of their sworn duties as were these men, we would have no cause to cry out against the insolence of office or the law's delays. These are the men: D. Farquaharson, hanker; Wm. Deeney, capitalist; K. Gamhitz, commission merchant; W. C. Kramer, hotel proprietor; R. Kaiser, grain dealer; Henry Levy, manufacturer; A. M. Lawyer, insurance and realty; Willard Perkins, bicycles; Joseph Simon, grocer; Thomas S. Taylor, mining; Adam Wagner, manufacturer, and D. B. Collins, merchant.

The Wilson Tariff Working.

The Wilson tariff is working as Grover Cleveland predicted it would. It is yielding all the revenue required, and never would have done less had not the Supreme Court knocked the income tax out. It has yielded another surplus, this time for April of $6,000,000. The total deficit now would be only $18,000,000 if the last Congress had not recklessly increased appropriations without adding a dollar to the revenue, and there is to-day a net balance in the Treasury, above the gold reserve, of $128,000,000. The folly of moving heaven and earth, putting business on the rack, and running big chances of turning the country over to the Bryanite Democrats, all for the professed purpose of getting money into a Treasury which already has too much, is apparent on a mere statement of the facts. The Wilson tariff is clearly working out its own redemption, and would have done well enough if left alone. Business men had become accustomed to it, and were abundantly content to work out their salvation under it. Now things are being turned upside down, and the end is not yet.

The Promotion of Judge Morrow.

The promotion of the Hon. W. W. Morrow from the position of Judge of the U. S. District Court to that of Judge of the U. S. Circuit Court, is one that at once honors the recipient and the appointing power alike. It is one that was eminently fit to be made, and gives satisfaction to all classes of our citizens, without distinction of party. That he will well and faithfully perform the duties of his new position goes without saying, because he has already been tried, and never found wanting, no matter what the emergency. His promotion brings him, we believe, an increase of salary of $1,000 a year. It also entails less work, greater dignity and usefulness, and is one step nearer to the Supreme Bench: the goal of the ambition of all good judicial officers. It is also satisfactory from the standpoint of civil service reform. As Judge of the District Court, he was in the direct line of promotion, and that he received it is creditable to President McKinley, who was elected on a civil service platform. Judge Morrow is a thorough Californian, is singularly well acquainted with its vast and varied interests, and few, if any, practical issues will come before him of which he does not know the direct bearing. He is still in the prime of a sturdy and energetic manhood, and still well calculated to achieve the hopes and expectations formed for him by his many friends.

Exit, the High Hat.

Rottanzi has triumphed. The anti-high hat ordinance, with a little sawing off of its wings and mowing down of its plumes, to borrow from the art of millinery architecture—has passed the Board of Supervisors, and will, it is to be hoped, become a law. There may a danger lurk in the chamber of his honor the Mayor; but we trust not. He has, so far as is known, "laid low and kept dark" as to his most secret thoughts of the blooming and desolating high hat. It is true, Mayor Phelan is not a benedict. He yet delights in the charms of his cluh. But he is a gallant gentleman, with all the compliment implies, and his duty—usually quickly seen, and no sooner seen than fearlessly done—may be fatally entangled in the roses, the silks, the ostrich tips, and the laces and ribbons of one of those fearful triumphs of the dry goods store and taxidermist's wonderful cunning—at once the despair of the first-nighter and the joy of the feminine heart. But the Mayor is human; he is not a man of great stature; he is an inveterate patron of the theatres, and we charitably hope that he has suffered and torn his hair in impotent rage, as others of us have, when the heroine and hero—aye, the whole ballet—have been suddenly engulfed in the gloomy shadow of the milliner's riotous imagination. This is the one touch of the high hat that makes male mankind kin. Let the ordinance be signed, and the horizon cleared.

Tilting at Windmills

Dr. Lyman Abbott, a man of deep practical piety and profound knowledge—at once an honor to Plymouth Congregational Church, Brooklyn, and worthy successor to the garments of the great Beecher—has called from the other side of the continent to the small and valiant warriors of the faith in San Francisco in a voice that appeals to the reason of the unsectarian world, even though it fail to arrest the intol-erant attention, or stay the discordant babel that bursts from the congregations of the Godly in condemnation of the conservative doubts of the Rev. William Rader, who questions the authenticity of Jonah's whale. Dr. Abbott has spoken as one who has traveled beyond the shallows near the shore, and from the deep ocean of a ripe and gracious experience hales back the way to those who clamor in de-feuse of the literal letter of the law forgetful of the spirit of charity and toleration—the great absorbing and vital facts for which the name of the lowly Nazarene has stood through the centuries. The emient divine, whose clear vision and broad wisdom none may successfully contradict, reads the Bible without the spectacles of tradition, and uses brains in penetrating its mysteries. He does not see in this fable of the fish and Jonah anything that bears upon the spirit of true Christianity; and he has holdly declared from his pulpit that a mau may gain a place in Abraham's bosom without consulting the possibility of temporary residence in a whale's belly. The Rev. Mr.

Rader has been subjected to the severest censure by many of his brethren, and in particular has he been scored by papers representing other than the Congregational faith on this coast. He had the temerity to say at a meeting of the ministry, that he did not take much stock in the Biblical allegation of Jonah and the whale—in fact, he regarded it as improbable, not to say absolutely without foundation. For this exercise of sincere personal belief, the brethren proceeded to rend him. They have not sought to meet his disbelief by reason; argument and logic are not in their lexicon. They say, let him who doubts be cast into outer darkness; may his uame be anathema; may he fade from the fold and perish from the earth. Blind acceptance, undoubting belief must take the place of individual opinion, and because the fables are of the Bible, no question of their literal truth can be entertained. To be a man first and a Christian after, will not serve their turn.

It is this indiscriminate and sweeping position of the orthodox faith that does the cause of religion greatest hurt. There is enough of vitality, of hope and divine sympathy within the lids of Holy Writ to claim the respect and stir to action the best emotions in the human heart. The grandest character in history is that of Jesus Christ. Its beauty and strength are not touched by the trivial causes which set by the ears half of the orthodox world, and exciting the mirth and inviting the ridicule of the struggling humanity of the earth. When these furious Don Quixotes of the faith cease to tilt at windmills, and practically take to heart the eternal truths taught by the Carpenter of Nazareth, and of which He stands as the sweetest and most gracious impulse and influence for the happiness and hope of a Race, they will find less time for small quarrels and windy battles over incidents of doubtful authenticity and less significance.

BRILLIANT MARRIAGES OF EARLY DAYS.

WHEN one looks upon the beautiful and elaborate decorations of the church, the long train of charmingly attired bridesmaids, and the correctly got up ushers, whilst listening to the musical program of the organist, all adjuncts of a fashionable wedding nowadays, the mind often turns backward to early day ceremonies, comparing the simplicity of weddings then with the display of to-day. Take for instance the wedding of Judge Stephen J. Field and Miss Sue Swearingen which was performed at Grace Church on the 2nd of June, 1859. Could anything be simpler than that? The congregation of Grace Church at that time worshipped in a little wooden building on Powell street, near Jackson. The edifice is still standing and occupied by a colored denomination. Simple as the little church was it bore the distinction of being the fashionable church of the city. Church weddings were very infrequent in those days, but nearly all the society weddings which were performed in church took place therein as on this occasion. Such a thing as ushers were then undreamed of, "reserved pews" were also still in embryo, and so the guests at this ceremony, who were many in number, were allowed to seat themselves according to their own pleasure. There were no flowers—not even a bouquet upon the altar; the sun having not yet set there was no artificial light, and the only music heard was the wedding march as the bridal party entered the church at seven o'clock. Judge Field was in full evening dress; the bride and her sister, Miss Belle Swearingen (now Mrs. Audy McCreary), who was bridesmaid, wore gowns of simple white muslin. Bishop Kip, who was then acting as rector of the church, tied the nuptial knot.

But simple as this service was, the wedding of Miss Belle Swearingen (the bridesmaid at the above mentioned ceremony,) and Andrew McCreary was still more so. The bride and groom, with a couple of friends, drove up to Grace Church (the present edifice), at nine o'clock one evening towards the close of 1865, and were married by the rector, there being no one present but themselves. What greater contrast can be presented to this than the elaborate wedding festivities of their son and Miss McAdam, which took place so recently in England, and of which news has just been received? or of the still grander ceremonial when their eldest son married the only daughter of Colonel Lawrence Kip in New York not long ago? Judge J. M. Seawell, who so gracefully united in marriage Miss Agnes Smedberg and Max Rosenfeld last Wednesday evening was the groom of one of the prettiest bridal parties ever seen in San Francisco. The wedding ceremony of himself and Miss Gertrude Ver Mehr took place at Trinity Church on Pine street, on the evening of November 12, 1863, the father of the bride, the Rev. Dr. Ver Mehr, (a pioneer among our city clergy) officiating. At the reception which followed at the home of the Ver Mehrs on Sutter street the beauty of the bride and her attendants were the subject of comment, the bride being a blonde of the most perfect type, the Misses Ella Maxwell and Sarah Poett, who were the bridesmaids, equally lovely and perfect brunettes. These were all church affairs, and in contrast to the elaborate marriage ceremony which took place in New York a year or so ago, of Burke Holladay and Miss Clara Huntington, was the simple home ceremony which united the groom's parents—Samuel Holladay and Miss Kate Ord, performed by the Rev. Ferdinand Ewer in the parlors of Judge H. I. Thornton's residence on Green street one morning in September, 1858. Judge H. J. Thornton and his son-in-law, Judge James Thornton (ex-Judge of the Supreme Court) occupied adjoining houses on Green street in 1857, and both houses were utilized for the marriage of Miss Bessie Thornton, the belle par excellence of that period, and Ben Nesbitt, which was solemnized on the sixth of November 1857. It was one of the earliest weddings among San Francisco's swagger set, and the lovely bride and handsome groom, who was a junior partner in the banking house of Lucas Turner & Co., were looked upon as the most fortunate of mortals by the host of friends who crowded the rooms on the occasion. It was an evening ceremony, performed in the long parlor of her father's house by the Rev. Dr. Scott. The bridesmaids were Miss Eliza Van Ness (Mrs. Frank McCoppin), Miss Lucy Judge (Mrs. Sam Brooks), and Miss Martha Scott (Mrs. Nick Kittle), and the groomsmen were Harry Thornton, Lieutenant G. H. Elliot, U. S. A., and Lafayette Hammond. Supper was laid in the adjoining residence of the bride's sister, Mrs. James Thornton. The beautiful bride wore a robe of white moire trimmed with orange blossoms, a wreath of the same flowers, and a tulle veil.

Had the marriage of Wm. C. Ralston taken place now instead of on the twentieth of May, 1858, what a magnificent function it would have been! Ralston, although not the money-king he afterwards became, was even then rapidly looming up in the financial world, and his wife was a niece of Colonel J. D. Fry. The marriage service was performed by the Rev. Dr. Scott, in Calvary Church on Bush street, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon. Again, there were neither flowers, attendants, nor wedding guests proper, no invitations having been issued. The church was well filled by their friends, and a reception followed at the residence of Mrs. Darling at North Beach. The notable feature of this wedding was the bridal trip to Yosemite Valley, which was a regular camping-out frolic; the ladies wore bloomers, the trip having to be made principally on horseback, the valley being almost inaccessible in those days. The party was a lively one, consisting of Mr. and Mrs. Ralston, Miss Sarah Haight, Mrs. Darling, Mr. and Mrs. Kinkead, Colonel Fry, Judge McCreary, J. Y. Hallock, Edgar Mills, J. A. Donohoe, Tom Morrison and General Josh Haven.

A pretty home wedding was the ceremony which united the parents of those popular young beaux, Samuel and Danforth Boardman, and Chauncey Boardman, whose recent marriage to Miss Mary Mercado was such a society event. Mr. Geo. C. Boardman and Miss Julia Hort were married by the Rev. Mr. Wheeler in the parlor of the handsome new residence of the Horts on Sutter street, on the morning of August 16, 1863. Sunlight was excluded and the rooms brilliantly illuminated with gas; the bridal party and many of the guests were in full evening dress. The bride never looked prettier than she did on that occasion, and her bridesmaids formed a trio of pretty maidens. They were the Misses Cora Lyons, Nelly Gordon and Sue Throckmorton. Only a few intimate friends were present at the ceremony, but a large reception followed afterwards.

The approaching marriage of Atherton Macondray and Miss Quita Collier recalls the wedding of the groom's parents, Fred Macondray and Elena Atherton, who was not only one of the prettiest, but one of the most popular, belles of San Francisco early-day society. It was the first country wedding ever celebrated hereabouts, the ceremony taking place at the country home of the Athertons, near Menlo Park, on the 11th of September, 1865, and was performed by Archbishop Alemany. A special train from town conveyed the guests to the scene of the nuptials. The lovely bride had three pretty bridesmaids, her eldest sister being one, and the others Miss Ella Maxwell and Miss Quita Smith. The déjeuner which followed was à la fourchette, and later the party returned to town by special train.

THE California Title Insurance and Trust Company elected officers for the ensuing year on the 1st inst., as follows: Charles Page, President; Oliver Eldridge, Vice-President; Howard E. Wright, Secretary. All the gentlemen are well known in business circles in this city. Mr. Wright was a member of the Assembly in the last Legislature, and is a prominent financial broker. Capital stock of the company is $250,000; reserve fund paid up, $25,000.

There are many kinds of Argonauts—but only one kind of Argonaut Whiskey, and that is the best. This fine liquor is represented on this Coast by E. Martin & Co. at 411 Market street, who are sole agents. Argonaut whiskey is pure, mellow, and the very perfection of good drinks.

'We obey no wand but pleasure's.—Tom Moore.'

SEE Tom Robertson's serio-comic hand-me-down David Garrick, remember that actors have played it for many years, will play it many more, maybe, and think to yourself that posterity is a great critic, but a slow one. Grandchildren are apt to be just as bad judges as their pro-progenitors: it is a wise child who knows more than his father knew; and bad art often descends unto the third and fourth degeneration. It is not necessary to be an impertinent modern and a pro-traditionalist to recognize David Garrick as a fogey impossible, imposter "classic"—to me, at least, it does not seem necessary for man to be anything more than alive and awake to know that the play is bad, downright bad. Yet I sat in the neighborhood of ostensibly intelligent persons on Monday night at the Baldwin Theatre, and heard Garrick discussed as a master-piece. Everybody did not regard it that way; in fact, one first-nighter told me that he had always liked the play, but somehow his illusions were shattered after the Goodwin performance. "Shattered illusions," you may have noticed, is a bit of high language applied by whining man to those sudden shocks that mark the evolution of his taste. I am in a bad way to make myself convincing to the old-timer, who numbers Garrick among his cherished traditions, for I have never seen any of the "great Garricks" of the stage. I did not see the elder Sothern's—for reasons best known to my parents—nor Lawrence Barrett's; I was not in London when Charles Wyndam played the part—nor when he did not, for that matter—and those Garricks whom I did see were acted by rough, inexpensive actors whose names would give no formidableness or circumstance to the present occasion. If I remember well, the David Garrick who precedes Mr. Goodwin's in my experience was a fat young gentleman, who wallowed porkily in the lines, and had to be handled in the drunken scene by three brave men, and who has now, I believe, fallen to conducting a school of dramatic art. So, you see, I stand no chance in a discussion where comparisons are the weapons. The only good Garrick whom I have ever seen is Nat Goodwin's, and that is not so good that I have gained any respect for the play, or increased the almost unincreasable admiration I candidly hold for Mr. Goodwin. I wanted to see him in the part, just as I would hear Paderewski in a fire-cracker piano piece—to watch his fingers go round—to watch Goodwin in the various phases of dramatic virtuosity the part of Garrick is supposed to call forth. I satisfied my curiosity without diminishing by a single crumb my art appetite. Mr. Goodwin wastes enough good force on this loose, leaky part to keep several lesser actors vitalized for the rest of their lives.

My strongest reasons for esteeming Goodwin as the very best of American actors are the degrees of humanness, naturalness, unostentation, that lift his work to a realness unattained by other actors. And all this fine artisticness is as good as thrown away, it seems to me, on a part that is obviously artificial and theatric from start to finish. If Robertson had said of his Garrick, "Here is a poser and a prig, who lords it over a pack of ignoramuses, tells them what a devil of a fellow he is, sacrifices himself in one act by playing drunk before the girl he loves, because he has said to her father with puffing pride, "David Garrick has given his word," and then goes off and tells the whole business to the first roystering crowd he falls in with, and, proud and imperious to the last, will not wed the girl until her father remembers the Garrick vow, never to marry any man's daughter until her father comes hat in hand to beg the honor of the alliance—if Robertson had said this fairly, and lived up to something like it throughout the play, there might be some chance for a consistent character. But he did not; he intended his Garrick to be nothing less than a hero to the last letter of the word. That he reads a prig is only the accident of bad playwriting and worse ideas as to what constitutes the actious of a hero. In the time of Garrick the actor was patronized by the world; his praises were sung in royal measures while favor held him high; but when luck was against some unfortunate member of the "perfesh," none was too low to hurl at him the stinging epithet "playactor!" Garrick, the player, believed in his craft and believed in himself. In the play he is presumed to elevate his calling. He does it by speaking of Shakespeare in reverent, religious tones, and patronizing the world. His deportment is meant to be a lesson to one sex and a joy to the other. In a small way he is as big a snob as Chesterfield, and in a big way he is as small a snob as the average star actor of the present day who is suffering from an obese opinion of himself.

Now it would be hard to find an actor who damns the oh-me-Gawd style of playacting as devoutly as Nat Goodwin does. Any one who remembers his career—from lowest comedy, mimicry, to that marvelous life-likeness, Jim Radburn, the Sheriff in In Mizzoura—must acknowledge that every detail of his work has been achieved by the purest and most unaffected of legitimate methods. In this case he tries to do more for the part than the part justifies. He overestimates the capacity of David Garrick for fine treatment. The first act starts beautifully; the delicate irony he brings out of his side of the situation when Ingot questions him and offers to bribe him to leave England; the eloquence of his facial expression; the rich humor suggested in his laconic replies—the general assumption and execution of this scene is nothing short of first-rate comedy art. And the noiseless unimportance which he attaches to that blithering line, "David Garrick has given his word," deserves a panegyric on gold plate. I do not like so well the scene where he discovers Ada's identity. It is the only incident that I remember in the play where Mr. Goodwin forces himself to anything like theatricalism, and it stands out incongruously.

* * *

The drunken scene—which has been unfavorably reviewed by several of my colleagues—strikes me as being more a question of interpretation than of execution. It is worked out in the same spirit of delicacy that characterizes the entire portrayal. Mr. Goodwin seems purposely to avoid making Garrick as extravagantly comical as a comedian of his known resources could easily make him. He subjects himself to the tomfoolery of the scene with some reserve, never going so far as to completely lose us the illusion of the sober Garrick. He is frankly playing drunk, not being drunk. He assumes a role within a role, and he takes pains to maintain the two apart. The average leading man, given this part, would make Rome howl with Garrick's drunken revelry, taking it for a great character chance. Goodwin's comicality is an established institution; in Garrick he asks for serious consideration, and instead of hinging the entire play upon the boozing episode, he makes that nothing more than incidental to the whole. Many a worse actor could get more violently successful results out of it—and make Chivy's following scene an anti-climax. For it is well to remember that Chivy is no imitation; his is a real drunk. The last act Goodwin plays with unusual gentleness. He is ingeniously sentimental rather than volcanic with Ada; and with something of superhuman decency he contrives to get real comedy out of that fearful moment when, hat in hand, Ingot asks the honor of the alliance. But artistic discrimination, subtle subtlety, and sensitive magnetism, get poor return from David Garrick. It is a rank old play.

* * *

The Smith, Jones, and Brown people are furiously farcical, and William Ingersoll is excellent just so long as Squire Chivy is boiling drunk—he takes the sober moments with bad grace—but there are two palpable cases of miscasting in David Garrick. Neil O'Brien, who has an honorable record in "below stairs" bits, is woefully inadequate to Ingot, and Miss Gertrude Elliott, who is clever at the "maudlingly emotional," should have saved her sister from playing an impossible Ada Ingot. I cannot see for a minute where Miss Maxine Elliott comes in in this play. She is no more the clinging, cooing, gushing, actor-smitten matinee girl of last century than she is of this; and she patronizes the part quite openly.

The Silent System follows for a curtain dropper, and is well worth the waiting. It is the best little sketch of its size that I know, and in it Mr. Goodwin and Miss Elliott realize more art than in all of Garrick. The performance is absolutely perfect. Miss Elliott finds her happiest comedy pace, and Mr. Goodwin's plastic, unerring pantomime is easier to read than print.

On Thursday night Nat Goodwin donned the Jeffersonian wig for the second time in San Francisco. And there was a better Bob Acres under it than Joseph Jefferson ever dared to play. I have seen Jefferson more than once in the part of Acres. I appreciate all he did in cutting and polishing the play to its present practical form: but I think that the best thing he ever did in his life was to hand it over to Nat Goodwin, together with the famous wig—it gave The Rivals a new chapter in stage history. I reviewed the performance last December, when Goodwin played Acres for the first time in America. The production throughout is improved now, and Goodwin makes good the promise of famous acting that was in his first performances. The delicious bumpitiousness of his first entrance, the irreproachable nuances of expression with which he merges Bob from bluster to quakes in the challenge scene, the comical yet almost pitiful piteousness at the dueling field—why, from the standpoint of technique alone, these scenes marked great acting. And, enveloped and warmed in Goodwin's compelling magnetism, they made old comedy live again, rejuvenated and humanized. It requires no whiskered traditions for one to appreciate the rare excellence of The Rivals as Goodwin gives it. I sat there in the Baldwin, Thursday night, sincerely believing that this play would be a success had it been written yesterday. This would be a hard test for any "classic," but I think The Rivals could stand it. That Irishman, Sheridan, was the Osear Wilde of his day.

During the run of Shamus O'Brien at the Tivoli I noticed that a score or two of people usually left the house at the end of the second act—the music was too much for them. To those persons I commend Captain Fraacassa, a matty comic opera composed by Dellinger, book by Genee and Zell, done into English, I am told, by Harry Smith of De Koven fame. It will see two more performances at the Tivoli, at neither of which shall I be present. DeWolf Hopper once played the title role. Rhys Thomas is following in Hopper's footsteps, and honestly confessing for once and all that he is no comedian. The production is an elaborate and an expensive one, and I could easily praise nearly everybody in the cast—Miss Millard particularly—for not making out the melancholy book and the weinerwurst music to be any deadlier than they really are.

The Baggensens (mother and son) are the only fun to be found among the Orpheum's novelties for this week. Mother Baggensen is very expert at juggling plates and bottles, and son has a new, if rather long-winded, scheme for playing stage-drunk. The pantomime, Yvette, committed by George Osrani and accomplices, is vulgar without being funny.

ASHTON STEVENS.

Mr. Goodwin will devote all of next week at the Baldwin to Mrs. Ryley's clever comedy, An American Citizen, in which he and Miss Elliott have scored one of the biggest successes of the season since the piece was introduced to us several months ago.

The Tivoli people will sing Martha next week, with a strong cast. A big ballet and several specialties will be introduced. Great preparations are being made for the local satire, Miss Frisco.

Nearly everything new at the Orpheum next week: The mysterious Omene, magician and illusionist, assisted by La Belle Nadine; Jules and Ella Garrison, travesty artists; Little Anna Laughlin, character specialist; Mitchell and Love, comedians, and the Eclair Bros. in their weird act, "The Crocodile and the Demon."

The Celandine grew in the rank weeds. Sad was its life in the deep shade. It longed for a sight of the sky; and it loved the sky-bird, the Swallow. Crushed and broken by rude hoofs; but still alive and longing! Then chance cleared the way and it faced the sky, and the Swallow, oh, joy! paused for a moment beside it. But the Swallow's true mate came by, and away they flew together. Again rude hoofs, and ruder chance, o'erwhelmed the poor, little Celandine. One glimpse of sky, one moment of love, and then lowly life in the shadow.

HE had longed all his life to be loved. Nature, by making him a hunchback, seemed to have cut him off from the greatest of all things.

With what clinching of hands and low forced-out groans had he wrestled with the consuming agony of desire to be in all to someone!

At last, as the one wonderful gift from the gods, it came.

He was loved; loved for himself and for eternity. She was going to spend her life with him, and in return he had given his very soul into her keeping.

The habitual look of restless yearning in his eyes was changed to a happy sparkle, and even the weird bronze bell-pull on his outer gate in the Rue Boissonade seemed to grin with reflected joy as it peered through the vines.

With unspeakable happiness of heart he looked forward to the spring when they would return to America and become man and wife.

Ah, Life was rich and golden after all!

How she came to do it she never quite knew.

She had been rash, perhaps. He really was very unsatisfying to look upon. But then he was so kind; his gray eyes had looked at her with such an intense longing. She had felt sorry for him. He was so noble and so unselfish, and he loved her so devotedly—madly; he almost frightened her with his intensity of feeling.

There was really no one she liked better.

And these longings after an ideal, after an indefinable something that would complete her, were absurd. All right for novels and silly girls, but for an art student in Paris, with the weary Philistine world to struggle against, and the scarcity of prosaic necessities—well, he was so kind and could give her a home, and she could work her way to fame so much easier if she had not that to worry over.

And then he was so clever, he told such witty stories that one almost forgot that—well, what difference did it make if—if he were not like other men. Was she so petty that she prized a mere structure of perishable flesh and bones to a mind that she acknowledged as superior and to a nature she knew to be noble?

No! she would think only of these things. And she would go back with him on La Normandie and visit his people in Philadelphia, as it had been arranged. And they would be married a month later and then—Oh, well, something would turn up, and there was no need of thinking so far ahead.

The Friend does not quite know how it all came about. Fate, he supposes, the inevitable must be.

It was to be, and that was why his passage was booked for La Normandie, and he found himself traveling to Havre on the same train as Creighton and his fiancée.

It was deuced stupid of him, but he was lonely, and they were jolly, so he attached himself to their party.

Creighton was his best friend, and Alice Webb was a beautiful and interesting girl.

At Havre, as he watched Creighton assist the being dearest to him on earth up the long gang plank of the French steamer, the picture made his flesh creep.

He checked his thoughts with a start, astonished and annoyed at this disloyalty to his friend.

"My God, Aline, I love you! I can stand it no longer! I despise myself; I feel that I have lost all honor and self-respect. I hate myself for the treachery I have developed since we came on this ship seven days ago. Seven days—or is it seven years? Everything is chaotic, everything but my love for you, Aline. You belong to me. You know it; I know it. You can't help it, dear girl, any more than I can. You must tell him, Aline! You are mine. You must tell Creighton before we leave this ship."

"Carl, I cannot. It would be a crime. You may as well give me a knife and tell me to stab him. To lose me would be to lose everything." She looked at his athletic figure. "No, Carl, I cannot."

"Do you—love him?" asked the Friend.

She hesitated.

"No!"

"Do you love me?"

"Yes!"

"Then you must tell him. You are mine. It is but a choice of crime, since you put it that way. Better one stab than slow poison—I will go with you. Come!"

The Friend assisted the trembling figure of Creighton's fiancée to her deck chair beside him. They had just been standing by the guard-rail, partially screened by a life-boat. The watch had just tolled eight bells, and in the gloom the three were together.

The sea was calm and the sky free from storm, but under the very shadow of that life-boat took place a wreck, a hopeless wreck, not planned, but foreseen, and avertible—but at what cost! It was one wreck or else two.

"Are God and Nature then at strife?"

So careful of the type she seems,
So careless of the single life."

Half an hour later Creighton was carried to his state-room by a steward, and the Friend, who had the upper berth, changed to another room for reasons not made public.

For the three days following Creighton did not appear. But when the vessel steamed into New York harbor he came on deck and stood by the guard-rail waiting for his friends—those who had come to welcome him and his bride-elect.

He was very pale, and alone.

They were married, the Friend and the Fiancée, and returned to the Quartier to set up housekeeping in one studio-room in the Rue Delambre on nothing to speak of a month.

Creighton tells his witty stories in Philadelphia among the bachelors. There is more sarcasm in their texture than formerly, and the look in his gray eye has changed since the greatest of all things slipped forever away.—GRACE GALLATIN, in Quartier Latin.

HOW "TATTERS" WON THE BLUE RIBBON.

It was about time for Miss Van Alston to be descending the steps of her home for her afternoon constitutional. There were also times when Miss Gertrude could be condescending but sometimes it was too much trouble. She hadn't much use for the line "Oh why should the spirit of mortal be proud?"

Miss Van Alston never deigned to move other than in the most dignified manner, and so, as she leisurely walked along Pacific avenue to the corner to take a down-town car, it was very provoking that an ugly spike should rear its head and insist upon an introduction to her patrician toe. However, upon inspection, the patent tip of her dainty lottie was still found to be in its pristine lustre, and the momentary annoyance fled. Once in the car, fair Gertrude gave herself up to maiden meditation, scorning the meek efforts of a woman nursing an immense basket from which peeped the family rations, who seemed to wish to speak to her. The canaille never had any interest for Miss Van Alston, not even as a study. It was fatiguing. A messenger boy, with alert eyes, was sitting opposite, and seemed to find something very entertaining about the floor in her vicinity. "Seuse me, Miss," he began, but when she bent upon him one of her most icy glances he thought better of his charitable impulse, and dropped off the car at the next crossing, saying disgustedly sotto voce, "Let der bloomin' nobility take care o' dereselves. Wot t' ell's de dif?"

Arrived in the frivolous precincts known as down town, Miss Van Alston left the car and began her demure promenade toward Kearny street, pleasantly conscious of the fact that her new Easter hat with cerise and violet trimming was in perfect accord with her walking gown fresh from the modiste's, and also feeling the flattering looks of the many promenaders of the one sex, and the envious glances of the ditto of the other.

At Sherman & Clay's corner some hypuotic power forced her to glance up Sutter street, and there she saw Reginald Forbes, her fiancé, out for an afternoon stroll with his diminutive, perky little terrier Tatters ambling serenely along beside him. But she had had a little bit of a misunderstanding with Reggie the evening before, and so she decided that she would not let him see that she knew of his vicinity. With her most stately step Miss Van Alston crossed the street to the northwest corner, looking neither to the right nor to the left, but with the little blush of excitement on her cheek so becomingly matching the cerise above it that more than one pair of the mauy masculine eyes usually to be found in that neighborhood was ravished at the sight.

But what was happening? What a peculiar sensation! Something seemed to be tugging at her skirts and almost forcing her to a stand-still—and at that corner of all places.

She tried to move faster—to break away from the clutch of the unseen power that seemed to rivet her to the spot; and, horror of horrors! the next time she tried to take a step she found she could not move an inch backward or forward! She glanced over her shoulder with some wild thought of calling a policeman to rescue her, and there, tugging with all his little furious might, was Tatters with several yards of blue satin bebe ribbon wound round and round his fat little body. Tatters, firmly convinced that it was some infernal machine seeking to destroy him, was savagely pulling and gnawing to get away, while the more he pulled the closer the ribbon shirred up in the founce of her silk petticoat and, pinioned the stately Miss Gertrude Van Alston as if in an inverted pudding bag.

Just then Tatters' teeth, vindictively worrying the ribbon, gave a long pull, a strong pull, and a pull all together, and something gave way. Tatters was sent sprawling, the ill-mannered brutes in the cigar store gave an extremely audible snicker, and Miss Gertrude was free to continue her fashionable promenade, leaving some eight or ten yards of ribbon as a memento to Tatters. But the promenade had lost its charms, and utterly crushed the fair Gertrude went home in hysterics and a cab.

That evening, after her nerves were somewhat restored, a messenger called at the parental abode with a large parcel for Miss Van Alston. Upon investigation it proved to be a small, repentant, appealing terrier, and attached to his collar was the following touching message

"My Dear Gertrude—

Since Tatters has formed such an attachment for you, and judging from certain indications that separation would be a trying ordeal, though it breaks my heart to part with him, he is yours.

Devotedly, Reginald."

And Gertrude is undecided, up to date, whether to keep the dog and return the ring, or vice versa. But at any rate Tatters, although not entered at the San Francisco bench show, won the blue ribbon.

"Patience Sparhawk and her Times," a novel, by Gertrude Atherton. Published by John Lane, The Bodley Head, London and New York.

This is a new edition of a novel originally published in 1895, and is well printed on good paper, and neatly bound. When we first read the title, we supposed the phrase "her times" to mean the period of the world in which Patience Sparhawk lived, but a perusal of the book leads us to the conclusion that "times" is to be understood in the same sense as in the phrases "a high old time," or "a real nice time." Patience, the daughter of a beautiful but dissipated woman, spends her early days on a ranch near Monterey. She is a dreamy, passionate child, without religion to console, or principle to guide her. Often when her mother's company becomes insupportable, she wanders alone over the fields and through the woods. A favorite haunt of hers is an old tower, in which she indulges in reveries, and the companionship of a blinking owl. In one of her night wanderings she meets a young Irishman, a lawyer and a clever fellow, who makes some sensible remarks that imprint themselves deeply on her mind. After her mother's death she is introduced to New York society, and blooms out into a handsome girl with excellent taste in dress. A very queer society she finds New York "society" to be: the women are entirely devoted to dress and the arts of captivating men; and the men treat the women on the assumption that they are harlots. On a first acquaintance a man takes a girl's hands, squeezes them, and will not let them go: on next meeting her, he grasps her round the waist, hugs her violently, and kisses her. No wonder a girl of common decency is disgusted. If the New Yorkers commonly met in "society" are the unlicked cubs that Mrs. Atherton represents them to be, they can be succinctly and accurately described in four letters: they are CADS. Nor do they even belong to that "improved species of cads" of which Mr. M. W. Hazeltine somewhere speaks. They are of the unadulterated and unmitigated sort. Even Patience, though the more vulgar of the men repel her, has a fair number of experiences ("times") herself. Ere long she is so unfortunate as to inspire a violent passion in the breast (he has no heart) of one Beverley Peele, who, though represented as belonging to one of the best families in Westchester County, is a more utterly unredeemed and unredeemable blackguard than the rest of the men in the story. Tempted beyond her strength by the passion, animal magnetism, and physical beauty of the man, Patience marries Peele. She has not been married long ere she hates him: he becomes daily more violent and unbearable. At last she leaves him and takes refuge for a day with a friend of her childhood, Rosita, now a petted prima donna and the spoiled mistress of her manager. Patience takes up journalistic work, and with considerable success. Her editorial chief is a man named Steele, a clever journalist who, though taking the queer and distorted views of life that work on a "great daily" almost inevitably gives, does bear some remote resemblance to a gentleman. Patience grows attached to him, and they spend much time together. At last Peele's jealousy makes him ill, and Patience is sent for to nurse him. She does her duty, distasteful though it is, faithfully. Sometimes, when he is in pain, she has to administer morphine: but one night Peele pours it out for himself, and dies from the overdose. Patience is accused of murder, and after a highly sensational trial is condemned to death. But Bourke, the Irishman whom she met as a girl on her night walk near Monterey, makes unceasing efforts in her behalf, and at last secures an affidavit from one of the most important witnesses at the trial to the effect that, through jealousy and hate of Patience, she had lied: Patience is pardoned, and falls into Bourke's arms, for she has some time before discovered that she does not love Steele with her whole heart and soul, as she does the voluble advocate. That "Patience Sparhawk and her Times" is a clever and interesting story we do not deny (in spite of Mr. Leggett's inability to perceive its literary merit), but we think it an unwholesome one. It is not often that the professional and the amateur coincide in their opinions about a book, but in this instance we confess that, somewhat to our surprise, we find ourselves in accord with Messrs. Joseph Leggett, Patrick F. Healey, and Ferdinand Formhals, the amateur book critics of the Mechanics' Institute. We think, as they do, that overmuch rumination upon sexual matters is unwholesome. But, though we chance on this occasion to take the same view as Messrs. Leggett & Co. we hold that these good gentlemen are entirely out of their province in criticising books, the function of one of them being to practice law in the courts of California, of the second to buy and sell books, and of the last to vend drugs. We beg to direct their attention to a little essay entitled "A Case of Bookstall Censorship," in which Mr. A. T. Quiller-Couch discusses the similar case of Mr. Grant Allen's "The Woman Who Did," having been excluded by certain well-meaning but misguided persons from the railway bookstalls of Great Britain. Paraphrasing Mr. Quiller-Couch's words, we say: That Joe, Pat, and Ferdie, by the process of being appointed the Book Committee of the Mechanics' Institute, should be exalted into supreme arbiters of what men and women may be allowed to read—this surely is unjustifiable by any argument. The public has no reason to suppose that they know a good book from a bad one. If there must be a censorship of literature, let the community choose a man whose qualifications have been weighed, and on whose judgment it decides that it can rely. While we cannot pretend (as Messrs. Leggett et al. do) to be shocked at the mention, or even at the sight, of a woman's legs, and while we think that some women stand upon a better footing than others, we do not think that Mrs. Atherton's highly-wrought, sensational tales of promiscuous flirtation are calculated to do any good. We observe that Mr. Leggett has recklessly offered to stake his "reputation as a man and as a literary critic" that the recital of Patience Sparhawk's gay times is not wholesome. If Mr. Leggett will separate his "reputation as a man" from his reputation "as a literary critic," and will lay the latter reputation to a red cent, he may find a taker.

At the end of The International Magazine there are now several departments, one of which is conducted by Mr. W. E. Curtis, under the heading "Matters Diplomatic." In the May issue Mr. Curtis girds at Sir Julian Pauncefote, the British Ambassador at Washington, for refusing to accept an invitation to a dinner at the national capital, at which his host informed him that he would not be permitted to occupy his proper place at the right of the hostess. We may feel entirely certain that Sir Julian was simply doing what he conceived to be his duty in insisting upon proper respect being paid to his official position as the representative of Great Britain: to himself, as a distinguished Englishman, it must be a matter of incalculable utimportance whether he sits to the north or the south, to the east or the west, of the consort of a Washington lawyer or doctor. A man who would insist on due respect from an Emperor of Russia, Germany, or China, cannot reasonably be expected to yield place to a provincial attorney.

Now we have Miss Gilder in her department, "The Lounger," in the May issue of that excellent literary periodical, the Month, writing: "It is claimed that this alteration (the elimination of all expressions distinctly American) 'will make Louisa M. Alcott's 'Little Women' more suitable for reading in English class-rooms.'" Instead of "claimed," why does Miss Gilder not write simply "said"? that is all she means. "Claimed" in this sense is certainly an "expression distinctly American"; as also is "hesitancy" for "hesitation" in such a phrase as "One sometimes feels a hesitancy in sending out his manuscript," which we observe in an earlier paragraph of "The Lounger."

THE sights which one enjoyed at the delightful charity affair, veiled Gingerbread Fête, held at the Crocker residence on Sutter street last week, were not all down on the programme by any means, and each evening a new "show" was to be seen by those who look beyond the public gaze. What, for instance, more interesting to observe than the way the girls watched the devotion of the popular young couple so soon to be made one flesh. No doubt about the affection in this case, say the girls: it speaks in every action, every look. Then for those who seek the comic element there was the view presented of the pretty spiekers "going for" C. P. Huntington, and a gallant officer who was the objective point for scores of women, matrons as well as maids, for women are always attracted by what is styled "toney."

"The sounds of revelry by night" are beginning to be heard at the Hotel Rafael—Saturday night such an influx of Fashion arrived there the halls resounded with merriment, and the delightful moonlight was taken advantage of by several parties in several ways. There is no lack of opportunity for enjoyment to suit all tastes where the urbane Warfield presides, and from present indications the trouble will be not what to give the guests in the way of amusement, but where to put them, so many applications for rooms have been received. Afternoon card parties for the dowagers are at present in full swing over there, and sometimes that amiable young lady, Miss Clementina Kip, takes a hand pour passer le temps.

The reliability of the Examiner as a medium of fashionable intelligence can be judged by their New York correspondent asserting that the Herman Oelrichs are at present in Newport preparing to open their house there for summer residence, when every one knows that Mr. Oelrichs is in San Francisco making the Fair residence ready for the occupancy of his wife and Miss Fair, who are expected here shortly for an extended stay among their old friends in our Golden City.

Expressions of pleasure are heard on all sides upon General Shafter taking command of the Military Department of California, the place vacated by General Forsythe's retirement, for although the latter officer has made himself very popular with all, it will be good news to society, at least, to have the Black Point residence occupied once more by a family that will undoubtedly offer hospitality therein.

Rumor says that Mrs. Hager and Mrs. de Young will rival each other this summer in suburban festivities, as each will be in residence in San Rafael. The de Young place, Meadowlands, is well adapted for lawn parties, and on dit, Mrs. Hager will have a grand picnic in mid-summer; so no doubt the friends of both ladies will benefit by their amiable intentions.

"Al Bowie has been changing his steps of late," said a girl at the Gingerbread Fête, to a vacuous-looking youth, whose mother has more money than he has brains. "Ah, really; so I suppose he can't do the two time as well as the old glide," was the response that sent her into a peal of laughter.

The Downey Harveys are gradually emerging from their seclusion and mourning for their wealthy aunt, and are once more a bright feature in theatre parties, dinners, and dog shows, at which their numerous friends are greatly delighted.

The Pine Street Market. There is little to be said regarding the speculative mining market for the week now closed. Business has been dull and altogether in the hands of the small fry, who still suffer themselves to be led by absurdities of many king's still greater than themselves. There is a wide field for the close observer on Pine street in reviewing the peculiarities of the slaves and their herders. In no place is human credulity more elastic, and, it might be added, more profitable. The official report from Con. Cal.-Virginia has to be drawn upon for all information regarding the new development, or quasi-development, perhaps, is the safest way to put it. This is a benefit in the way of shutting off the avenues for robbing people on a small scale by small people figuring their status from a basis of dollars and cents. The middle stocks have done a little better of late, and were it not that the fractional advances are now on an infinitesimal scale, a few profitable turns could have been made. Elsewhere nothing of interest has developed to arouse enthusiasm outside the ring of investors who for years have hucked the game and grown weatherworn in their devotions to it. Outside patrons are not to be allured by such slow work as that now going on the street.

Consuls as Financial Advisers. A prominent London financial weekly is inclined to dispute the right of Consuls to act as commercial and financial advisers, or as the writer puts it, "to act as a spy upon the business of his countrymen which are carried on in the neighborhood." We differ with our esteemed contemporary on this point. A Consul has it in his power to assist his countrymen very materially by his advice on all matters of the kind, for the reason that he is in a position to obtain direct information of a local hearing which is not otherwise readily available to the foreign resident. Furthermore, it is in his power to sound a note of warning as to cases of fraud, protecting the pockets of his countrymen as well as their persons, which he is supposed to look after in time of peril. It matters not where his lash may fall in dealing with villainy in any form. Should the delinquent belong to his own people, there is all the more justification for special severity. No argument can be put forward to sustain the position that an honorable and scrupulous official must blind his eyes to what is going on around him prejudicial to the interests of the people he represents. The closer watch he keeps upon commercial and financial enterprise of all descriptions, the better he fulfills the duties and responsibilities of his position in the opinion of honest men without regard to nationalities.

Money for South Africa. It is about time the result was known here of the effort made by the Consolidated Gold Fields of South Africa, Limited, to raise additional capital to the extent of $3,625,000. An extraordinary meeting of the shareholders was called for May 8th. The money is required to open up the deep levels, and the report of John Hays Hammond is depended upon to sustain the management in their new departure. The company now controls about 609 claims, and by the end of the year it is expected that a new 280-stamp mill will be dropping, in addition to the one of 100 stamps now running. There are now 7,594 shareholders in the company, and it is expected that they will absorb the new issue of stock. The success of this company in raising the proposed capital is of interest here, as it will tend to revive the market for mines, which has been practically closed to projects from California and elsewhere for some time past.

A Valuable Concession. The Mexican Government has, it is said, renewed the concession originally granted in 1882 for the colonization of the Angel de la Guarda, Tiburon and San Estaban Islands in the Gulf of California, which were subsequently forfeited. The concessionaire has, however, been deprived of two-thirds of the Angel de la Guarda and San Estaban, originally held by him, while he is allowed to retain condi-tionally two thirds of Tiburon, his title thereto to be held conditionally on the performance of the following colonization projects: He must, within eight years from April, 1897, settle on the land in Tiburon Island ten families, who may be either Mexican, European, Japanese or Chinese, conveying by sale or otherwise to each family a lot of not more than fifty hectares. The concessionaire is also empowered for twenty-five years, terminating in 1907, to establish oyster, seal, whale and general fisheries in the Gulf of California, and to erect canneries and works for extracting from fish their fat, commercial salts or phosphates. This, on the surface, looks a very valuable concession in the hands of the right man, backed by sufficient capital. With the embargo off regarding China and Japan, it should not be very difficult to fulfill the provisions of the concession in regard to colonization. However, the scheme failed before, although the Government confesses that the concessionaire did all in his power to carry out the terms of the old concession.

The Gold of Buckeye. Residents of Nevada are excited over the recent strike made in the placer mines at Buckeye. Their wealth seems phenomenal, and comparisons are now being drawn between the camp and the Rawhide mine, both having been turned down by alleged experts as worthless, or practically so. In this connection the death the other day of Schiefflin, the discoverer of Tombstone, Arizona, recalled the fact that he also had some experience with "ye expert," who turned down as a fraud what afterwards turned out to be one of the richest of Western mining camps. It is easier to make a condemnatory report in any case than to show possibilities of a favorable nature, which require a peculiar technical education to understand and appreciate. There is one consolation, that the loss by such expert reports invariably falls in the long run upon the men who pay for them, so that little harm is done to any one else. The Schiefflins lost nothing by the wild and sweeping denunciation of Tombstone, the Rawhide bonanza has reacted like a homerang upon the savants who couldn't see enough to take it in for $150,000, and now the Buckeye will probably reiterate the force of the moral that the professional expert is not always as expert as he thinks he is.

What Does This Mean? The statement which appeared in the Chronicle recently, in an interview with President Neff, of the California Miners' Association, to the effect that that body will take no part in the conflict between the farmers and miners, precipitated by the Anti-Debris Association, seems hardly creditable. "Our body was not formed for that purpose," Mr. Neff is quoted as saying. If not, for what purpose was it formed? Not purely political and anti-railroad, surely. For some time past the practical mining man has looked askance at the combination of manufacturers and politicians gradually working into control of the organization, and if Mr. Neff is now quoted correctly, the sooner dissolution comes, the better it will be for the honest contingent which lent a sustaining influence under the impression that the Association was a protection to the mining industry in all its branches. Is the Anti-Debris Association such a power in the land that the politicians connected with the Miners' Association are afraid of incurring its enmity by doing their duty in the premises? If this is the case, the death-knell of the organization may as well be sounded, for its end is near at hand.

Latest from Bounce & Co. The London Shareholder says: "The Rothschilds have had bad luck of late. This celebrated 'house' is known to be largely interested in South Africans and in Brazilian stocks which are in a very rotten condition. The Grand Central Mine of Mexico is evidently doing badly, and now something appears to be wrong with Anacondas. In spite of the recovery in the price of copper, these shares have been pressed for sale of late, and as the price of 5¢ carries a 5s. dividend, it cannot be attributed to inflation. The sooner the real position is known the better for all concerned."

A NEW YORK financial contemporary says: "It may be discourteous to criticise the U. S. Supreme Court, but a decision that allows the telephone patent to cover a period of thirty-four years, instead of the ordinary seventeen, is open to some comment."

John Lauer

"Hear the Crier" — "What the devil art thou?"
"Oo that will play the devil, sir, with you."

PASTOR Gibson has inflicted another letter upon the public through the obliging medium of the daily press. If these literary effusions are an index of the sermons that the Reverend J. George perpetrates, it is advisable that his resignation be at once accepted. The erstwhile spiritual adviser of Durrant, it is averred, has the warm sympathy of his ministerial brethren. They should transfer their pity to the people who pay out their hard-earned nickels to peruse the Gibsonian effusions in their epistolary form.

IF the bold, bad "Baron" were indiscreet enough to return to San Francisco, he would find himself amorously besieged by a multitude of maidens on the shady side in veils and morals. To have all the sensation of a wedding and a European honeymoon, and none of the reactionary flatness of the connubial state, is many a woman's ideal of marriage; it's the plums without the stomach-ache. And the role of forsaken female is highly popular just now—there's money in it.

GOVERNOR BUDD, in the course of his investigations into the Durrant case, has visited that now notorious edifice, Emmanuel Church. It is too much to expect, however, that the Recording Angel will chalk this pilgrimage up to gubernatorial credit, although it is believed that there is always joy among the heavenly throng when a public officer enters the house of God. Emmanuel Church, however, is not the house of the Deity.

ATTORNEY Deuprey is still looking ahead. He seems to place but a flimsy hope in Governor Budd's investigation, for it is said he is already getting up fresh evidence for the next appeal. He does not expect to conduct this in person, but has engaged the services of a prominent archangel, who is now busy arranging the great mass of facts, and hopes to have all ready by the time Durrant comes up for his final trial.

CONSIDERABLE comment has been made over ex-Mayor Sutro's perilous escape from disaster the other day, when the white-whiskered Seer of Sutro Heights and Duke of Seal Rock barely avoided collision with a runaway. So much for the brevity of the public's memory. The narrow escape of our glorious commonwealth from municipal ruin when it came into collision with Mr. Sutro seems to be quite forgotten.

THE plea that train-wrecking is only murder in the second degree, because the malice of the murderer is not directed against a specific individual, is monstrous; and yet one of the attorneys in the Worden case did not hesitate to present this argument to Governor Budd. Presumably he is one of those people of narrow intelligence who think it is more respectable to be in a wholesale business than in a retail.

THERE is a row in the Woman's Press Association, but it is not true that it originated in any aspersions among its members as to which was the oldest pebble on the beach. It was merely a difference as to the authority in the managing board. Let the good ladies settle the matter among themselves. Hairpins are cheap.

"IMMORTALITY" was the subject of Reverend W. M. Reilly's discourse on Sunday. Considering the defections of certain of his clerical confrères hereabouts, it seems to the CRIER's unorthodox mind that a disquisition on "Immortality" would have been a more timely topic.

COFFEE is by no means the most important of Guatemala's exports. Men with money to burn are of much more value in the cargoes that reach the local market. At all events, a heavy price is upon their heads, as well as a heavy tax upon their purses.

NAT GOODWIN is authority for the statement that a man can't be a successful actor unless he is an adept at making love. Nat ought to know.

DOCTOR Irmer, dubbed the Pook-Bah of the Southern Seas, having filled the position of Governor of Germany's islands in the Pacific, is temporarily tarrying in the midst of us. The gentleman has a remarkable record, for it is said that besides being thoroughly onto the executive job, he has administered justice, looked after commercial and trade interests and kept the natives on their good behavior. This genius should not be permitted to escape. Cannot something be done to induce him to devote his rare talents to San Francisco, and keep the natives here on their good behavior?

POLICE Judge Campbell would better encase his luxuriant crop of whiskers in a protection mask, for Chief of Police Lees is after his scalp and may confiscate the accompanying beard. It all came about through His Honor's too precipitate release of Mabel Keating, a light fingered lady of the lower levels who picks the pockets of gentlemen for a living. Her bonds were supposedly of straw, but this is not proof that the Campbell whiskers are adorned with hayseed.

BOSS Rainey's pet lambs are being slaughtered in wholesale batches, and their erstwhile guardian is powerless to protect the loudly bleating flock as their heads fall one by one into the municipal basket, while the guillotine goes merrily on its decapitating way. Ed Graney, official horse-shoer of the city, is also in jeopardy, which proves that a man may be a successful political heeler and still lose his head.

BURGLAR Harris so successfully projected his astral and physical body through the dock in Police Judge Low's courtroom on Tuesday that he has escaped the clutches of the law and is now at large. With his natural proclivities, and bearing a charmed life, Mr. Harris should not confine his accomplishments to common burglary. He would make a brilliant record as a member of the next legislature.

UNDER cover of the fusillade of legal shots in the Barillas-Blair melodrama, our local Lotharios have crept into temporary obscurity. It is indeed an ill wind that blows nowhere. One of the dizziest dazzlers of them all, is enjoying a sweet surcease of public attention while he murmurs sympathetically and softly to himself, "There are others. Miue was not the only Lily on the stem."

ADESPONDENT actress out of a job set fire to her dresses this week, with the desired result, free advertising. Other unlucky Thespians of the feminine persuasion will, it is feared, work the conflagration scheme until it is as common as the lost-diamond gag. The experiment is startling but absolutely safe, provided the incendiary wears a property wig.

ARCH-PRIESTESS Annie, surnamed Besant, at present turning a four-candle-power astral searchlight upon San Francisco audiences that sit in spiritual darkness, declares that there is no hell. To substantiate this statement, however, it would be necessary to secure post-mortem affidavits from some of our gone-but-not-forgotten millionaires.

SATURDAY night's rain, it is stated, did considerable damage at the City Hall, several of the offices and court rooms being flooded. The City Hall is a great place for leaks, anyway. It is not, however, always so easy to locate them as in this instance, most of them being of a financial nature.

THE morbid gloating over horrors is one of the most unpleasant characteristics of the age. The story of Hollman, the murderer, anticipating his doom by cold-bloodedly rehearsing his own hanging, is thoroughly revolting—it's as bad as a man rehearsing his wedding ceremony.

THE average citizen who is not a householder takes no interest in the discussion about a cut in water rates. So long as the fluid does not contaminate his whiskey he does not care what its fate may be.

WHILE Redwood City is preparing for a sweet pea fete in June, Durrant is also preparing for his June fate, but the sweet-pea girl with him is but a memory of the past.

And a lovely bouquet
Worn in such a cute wuet
As only few girls have the knacque.

Some day, ere she grows too antique,

A SONG—JOHN REEVES EDITOR, & LOTUS

Come, boys, pile up the crackling logs,
Be merry while we may
Outside the winds shriek through the bogs,
The wailing cats and howling dogs
Give portent of the day
We die!
Long life to Death!

Come, take the jug and fill your glass,
And drink to all a toast,
The modest wife, the shameless lass;
Life is but short, and soon we pass
From flesh and blood to ghost;
We die!
Long life to Death!

Come, while away the passing hour
And give no need to time!
The Devil take the crab'd and sour,
We'll drink a toast to him whose power
None can withstand. A crime
To die!
Long life to death!

THE MAID O' THE MILL—CHARLES MURRAY, IN CHAPERONE MAGAZINE.

The cushie doos are cooin' in the birk,
The pee-weets are cryin' on the lea,
The starlings in the belfry o' the kirk
Are layin' plans as merry as can be.
The mavis in the plantin' has a mate,
The blackbird is busy wi' his nest,
Then why until the summer should we wait
When Spring could see us happy as the rest?

There's leaves upon the boortree on the haugh,
The blossoms is drappin' fra the gean,
There's buds upon the rantree and saugh,
The ferns above the Lady's Well are green
A' the herd is singin' on the hill
The o'er come o' ilka sang's the same:
"There are owre mony maidens at the Mill,
It's time the ane I trusted wi' came hame!"

MEMORY.—CHARLES C. NOTT JR. IN SCRIBNER'S.

Upon a night long after I had died
I rose and passed the portals of Her heart,
Therein no wreck nor ruin I espied,
But fair and quiet its dim-lit chambers lay,
And a sweet sience breathed in every part.
And I, who once had dwelt there, stood and sighed,
And thought, "While I have slept in the cold clay,
How soon the stains of grief were washed away,
That soon some tenant new might here abide."
And as I thought, one quietly entered in,
And in his hand a key to every door.
I bowed my head and turned away and said:
"Pardon me if I return here from the dead;
I dwell here once, though I dwell here no more."
But he the keys did place my hands within,
And said: "Whate'er thy steward's is, is thine;
My name is Memory, and this place is mine."

MAY.—ARTHUR J. BURDICK, IN BUFFALO NEWS.

A burst of melody, divine,
From where the leafy branches sway;
A glimpse of blue—sweet violets—
Amid the grasses by the way;
A breath of perfume on the breeze;
The vagrant brook's soft, liquid lay—
And this is May.

A sheeny glimmer on the lake
Where soft and dancing sunbeams play;
A hazy, mazy, shifting cloud,
Of giddy, basking insects gay;
A medley rare, of scent and sound;
A dream of sweetness all the day—
And this is May.

DEAR EDITH : The color epidemic this spring was red, and for this reason red is the scarcest and most carefully handled color in the wardrobes for summer. It has such use as for bicycle hats, toned down with black, and for accessories of rough serge outing gowns; having been made popular, it is felt to be in best harmony with utility dress—dress that is meant to be frankly democratic. The fever for red has, in fact, brought about a reaction in favor of blue, green, and mauve. The large use of these colors has already been noticed in the matter of Scotch plaids. These plaids remain in vogue, and there is no need to return to them here; but what is entirely new is the mingling of blue and green in separate materials, which takes the form, principally, of green trimming on blue. Thus, blue veiling gowns and blue jackets of various material are covered with green silk appliques, scroll work stitched flat; thus, blue serges are trimmed with green soutache. Last year these colors were mixed in the weave, now they are placed in contrast side by side, and the principal novelty lies in this change.

But if a truly aristocratic color is wanted, a color that only the few will or can wear, this color is yellow. Among all the others yellow has an air of distinction, and will give value to a gown that has cost almost no money at all. For example, a burlap skirt of tow color and a silk blouse of deep saffron is an easily made gown that has great effect. Over the blouse goes a little sleeveless bolero of the burlap with square jockeys that stand out straight, and the skirt and bolero are lined with the tint of the burlap. The sleeves of the blouse are in ridges running round from top to bottom, an effect seen on many new gowns. The ridges are made by stitching the smallest possible tucks at regular intervals apart in a piece of cloth and then cutting out the sleeve from the piece. The bolero has an application of white cotton embroidery that enriches the gown, but adds nothing to the style. To complete this dress should be a hat of yellow straw, trimmed with white ribbon and black gauze rosettes and coque's plumes.

Serge and flannel costumes are being made with a loose jacket, whose principal new feature is the cut of the collar. Last winter the high collar stood close to the ears, but the new one falls away from the face with a look more conformed to warm weather. It is made by sewing to the top of a band a collar that flares or that in godets falls out with a more or less fluted effect. The edge is round, or it may be irregularly cut. Sometimes it runs only across the back. This collar may be faced so as to contrast with the gown, and a stylish effect is got by facing it to match the blouse, as for example with a black serge face the collar with white satin covered with yellow embroidery, and make the blouse front to match the collar. This carries the white low down in front and high up behind, in a slightly diagonal line that throws out the chest, and is very becoming. But a collar facing to contrast may be an inconvenience, for one does not always wear the same blouse, and a similar effect is given by setting a high ruffle in the neck of the blouse round the back. Another expedient is worth mention. One of the trimming novelties this season is tulle ruffled up in little ruffles, forming a surface of something less than an inch thick, and among other uses to which it is put is the facing of collars.

The "sun" skirt has grown so in favor that it is now for thin materials the one in most frequent use. This skirt, as you will recall, is in radiating plaits, which, as they fall out loose, are rather crimps than plaits. As there is no thickness at the top, this skirt is advantageously worn by the stout. These skirts may be trimmed, and some muslins have lace applique set in before plaiting, with an effect as exquisite as the doing is difficult, but ordinarily the crimped surface is quite decoration enough.

INSURANCE

THE Equitable Aid Union of Columbus has gone by the board. No assets.

Mr. Emil Oelbermann, President of the German-American Insurance Company of New York, is dead.

The North British & Mercantile of Great Britain has fallen in line, and will have a United States tender of the same name.

R. S. Brannen, Secretary of the National Association of Local Agents, has been elected President of the recently organized Colorado State Association.

Manager W. C. Lenvitt, of the Union Mutual Life, has appointed J. W. Spinney metropolitan agent.

H. T. Lamey, of Denver, Coast Manager of the Western & British America, is contemplating making his headquarters at San Francisco.

Thomas W. Aisbett, Manager of the National Life Association of Hartford, who has been visiting this city for the past six weeks, left for his home in Los Angeles yesterday.

The Liverpool, London & Globe will do business in South Africa.

Mann & Wilson have been appointed Coast Managers of the Teutonia Insurance Company of New Orleans.

The Frankfort, through Voss, Conrad & Co., has appointed L. C. Jones State agent for Oregon. Mr. Jones formerly represented the Employers' Liability, and will transfer a large block of business to the books of the former company.

Mary A. Berliner has failed to win her $20,000 suit against the Travelers' Insurance Company.

George L. North is waking up the agents of the Provident Savings Life.

The appointment by the Governor of Andrew Clunie to fill the unexpired term of Insurance Commissioner Higgins, while disappointing to Mr. Gesford, appears eminently fitting, when it is remembered that Mr. Clunie will succeed himself a year hence.

The Fidelity and Deposit Company has added $250,000 to its paid capital and $250,000 to its surplus since the 1st day of January last.

Mr. F. C. Moore, President of the Continental Fire Insurance Company of New York, seems to have a busy pen. Now he writes of an opponent: "I commend to him (Mr. Kennedy) the example of the Kansas editor, who, in a moment of indignation and excitement, smarting under a supposed grievance at the hands of a brother editor, wrote to him: 'Dear Sir,—You are an ass!' and signed himself, 'Yours, fraternally.'"

INSURING EMPLOYEES.

THE Surgical Assurance Company of California is an organization, the first of its kind in this State, but similar to many in the East, which guarantees medical and surgical attendance of the employees of the assured. Thus it is noted that the San Francisco Chronicle has just insured all its employees in this company, thereby guaranteeing every man on its pay roll the needed attention in case of sickness or accident. The field of insurance would seem to have been exhausted, and protection for a fee given against every possible phase of misfortune. The soundness of the principle last noted is certainly one of the best, for it brings the employer and employee into closer and more sympathetic relations, which is always desirable, aside from the material physical benefits which must be apparent to every one.

QUARRELS among his appointees, and dissatisfaction between the two wings of the local Democratic party—the chivalry and the shovelry—to say nothing of the conflicting influences of the Durrant case, have occasioned Governor Budd much worry of late, and he foresees a troublous path ahead of him when he either strives for reelection or, what is nearer to his heart, the Senatorial prize. Having convinced himself that he is in great need of relaxation, he has been spending much of his time in this city recently.

"In Sacramento he feels his Governorship [and] spreads his pinions a bit," as Aleck Vogelsang says. "But when he comes to San Francisco he's only Jim Budd, and he's strictly on the diversion lay."

Nor are the galleries forgotten. A Budd disciple, meeting the Chief Executive at the entrance to a cheap restaurant in one of the markets, and recalling the fondness of the gubernatorial palate for dainties, expressed his surprise.

"Oh," replied the Governor, with the pride that apes humility, "I belong to the people—I must eat with them."

Somewhat later in the evening the Stockton ruler was rescued by some friends as he was addressing a boisterous but inappreciative audience on the Barbary Coast, regarding the good fortune of Californians in the possession of a certain public servant. But that was after dinner.

To be a continual reminder of some one else is the penalty for the distinguished bearing of Dr. Daniel D. Lustig. The haudsome Insanity Commissioner quite expects to have a double, and is properly resigned to the existence of the inevitable twin, but he considers that he has a legitimate ground of complaint when he is made to form one of a triplicate series. As the Doctor was walking down Market street the other day, a stranger accosted him:

"By the way, Henry," he began, "there's a funny thing about that divorce case of mine—this is on the quiet, of course"—

"Excuse me—I don't hanker after your confidences—my name is not Dinkelspiel," interrupted Lustig, who had been there before.

A few minutes later he was mounting the steps to the Press Club, when he encountered a pretty girl who stopped, stared hard at him, and then gracefully seized Lustig by the arm.

"Why, Mr. De Vries," she said, with a radiant smile, "what cloud did you drop from? Now, when are you coming to see me?"

She had mistaken Dr. Lustig for the grand opera star of last year's Tivoli season. This time he did not correct the error. He says it would have been too harsh.

It is a fortunate matter for E. W. Davis, of Santa Rosa, whom the Board of Regents of the University of California has just elected as its secretary, that the University charter, requiring the incumbent to be an agriculturist, does not fix also a standard of deportment. His manners are brusque, and his usual remarks uncouth. Besides being School Superintendent of Sonoma county, he is lecturer for the State Grange—and looks it. While recently addressing a convention of women teachers at Petaluma, Davis was perceptibly under the influence of a medicine which, as he says he takes it as a cure for consumption, was probably cod liver oil. Naturally, there were a few whispered comments among the pretty young schoolma'ams concerning the speaker's condition.

"If you women can't keep your mouths shut," shouted the successor to the scholarly Dr. Bonte, "I'll have a policeman among you to keep you in order!"

The young ladies, shocked and humiliated beyond expression, relapsed into a silence that was almost breathless.

"Didn't I give them h—l?" audibly remarked the courtly Mr. Davis as he left the platform.

It has been unofficially announced that the literature of the Pacific Coast is soon to be enriched by an important and valuable addition in the form of an autobiographical work, comprising four quarto volumes, in which will be recounted the rise of an eminent journalist. It is entitled, "How to Be Busy Without Working—a Bluff," and the name of the author is given as Andrew M. Lawrence. Advance sheets indicate that the narrative will have a peculiar charm for one William R. Hearst. Among other interesting revelations the work will recount how the author succeeded in ingratiating himself with his employer. When the latter was in his editorial office in this city, Lawrence, who then held a subordinate position, would rush violently past Hearst's open door with a handful of proofs in his hands—proofs of articles already published, and, therefore, harmless—and at the same time generously damning some writer, who was, of course, at a safe distance, the while impressing his employer that he was a devil of a fellow.

"Andy's a shrewd, careful chap, devoted to my interests," reflected Hearst. "He shall be my managing editor. I won't be happy till I get him."

He has got him.

An artistic young lady, who is as fond of her housekeeping arrangements as of her adjacent studio, delights in giving little dinners as frequently as the resources of her slender purse will permit. She has a morbid fear of the claret dripping from the bottles and staining the handsome table linen, of which her store is limited. As an artistic preventative, she ornaments the bottles with bows of ribbon, which absorb the vagrant wine drops, and the color of these ribbons is always made to harmonize with the prevailing decorations of the dinner. Her latest entertainment was a scarlet dinner, and after arranging her table she went upstairs to put the finishing touches to her own toilet. As she was hurrying about, she heard the bell, rung by the early guest. She could not find the ribbons with which she wished to bind the short sleeves of her dinner gown.

"Where can I have mislaid them?" she soliloquized, nervously. "I cannot do without those ribbons."

Then her truant memory came to her aid.

"I am lost!" she wailed, in hopeless desperation. "They are around the bottles!"

At the Gingerbread Fête last week, the central figure in the management of the amusement department was John G. Housman, who acted as stage director, and who has much local fame as a lay reader, with dramatic tendencies, in various Episcopal churches in and about San Francisco. When becomingly arrayed for his ecclesiastical duties in his black cotta and white surplice, with his gray hair and his contrasting black moustache, carefully curled at the ends, he is the hero of many an altar guild and ladies' aid society. On a recent Sunday as he walked across the chancel of St. Luke's Church to the reading desk, he stumbled over a stool, and slightly disarranged his vestments, displaying about two inches of his shoe. Housman blushed like a girl, and was plainly disconcerted during the reading of the first lesson.

"How perfectly bold of him," whispered Lieutenant Harry Benson. "Did you see his ankle? I tell you, he's no lady!"

Neither hosts nor guests expected that it would develop into such a frolic,—that quiet little stag party at the old fashioned cottage on Buchanan street where Carrington Wilson and Goodwin Harris maintain joint bachelor quarters. Denis O'Sullivan dropped in after the Tivoli, Jack Casserly was already there,—and there were others. The fun waxed faster and more furious toward daylight and by dawn everyone firmly expected that the place would be raided. After the sun had fairly risen, Jack Casserly made several inarticulate remarks, finally translated as an announcement of his intention to attend early mass.

"Where are you going for mass?" was chanted by an incredulous chorus.

"St. Dominic's," replied Jack. "But I'll be back to finish up the evening," he added, artlessly, as he steered for the temple on Steiner street.

Ambitious floriculturists have been sadly duped by a designing individual of insinuating manners and low morals, who flattered the vanity of his patrons, took their coin and, when they protested, laughed in a loud and coarse manner and calmly went his way. It is the aim of every suburban resident to develop new varieties of roses, and without much trouble a gentleman was found in every town on the sunny side of the bay, willing to bestow his name on a new flower and, what was more to the point, able to pay for the glory of creating a rose.

After the negotiations had been concluded, there was much comparing of notes about new flowers reported from various localities. One grew in Berkeley in the garden of James Palache and was christened the Palache rose. Alfred Cohen, the recluse of Alameda, came to the front with a new flower, which he called the Beauty of Glazewood, and Harry Fortune, of San Rafael, announced to the horticultural world the birth of Fortune's Yellow Rose. Other enthusiasts joined the amateur florists and felicitations became general. Congratulations perceptibly decreased when one similarity after another was discovered, until finally the complete identity of the three "varieties" was established.

The same rose had been sold many times,—and so had the purchasers.

One of those jovial characters whose fund of good-fellowship wins general regard is J. Downey Harvey. Owing, perhaps, to his stature, which is not great, and to his geniality, which, on the contrary, is large, he is much petted by the other men in the Pacific-Union Club. No one thinks of addressing him as "Mr. Harvey." He is "Downey" to every one, a familiarity to which Harvey himself does not usually object, but which his wife resents as entailing some damage to her husband's dignity. He was somewhat surprised the other day, however, at being freely accosted by a man whom he had no recollection of ever seeing.

"Hello, Downey," he called, in easy greeting. "How are you, old fel?"

Harvey was somewhat taken aback, and showed it. "It is Downey Harvey, is it not?" asked the other, his assurance a trifle shaken. "I thought—I believe—I——" "Oh, don't mind me," responded Downey, airily. "Don't apologize. I'm a familiar kind of a cuss, I guess!"

Church courts are not usually sources of particular diversion, but a clerical joke, if slow in coming, pays for the waiting. The Diocesan Convention of the Episcopal church which has been in session here this week has been, for the most part, as dignified and formal as its own traditions. On Wednesday morning, however, there was a spasmodic effort to throw off ecclesiastical restraint. It was "missionary day," and a long list of frontier parsons had recounted the uninteresting details of church work at their respective stations. One good brother, whose parish is on the edge of Death Valley, made a report which was as dry as his own locality. He was not without hope, however.

"All we need," he concluded, in a tone that was almost sanguine, "is water and society."

The Rev. George Edward Walk, rector of Trinity, could not let such an opportunity pass.

"That's all they need in the other hot place," he said, quickly and wittily, "water and society."

A QUARTER of a dollar is a small sum, yet it is quite enough to give one a pleasant Sunday's outing at El Campo, just across the bay. Four boats each way.

THE great event of the present week has been the Dog Show, which opened at the Pavilion on Wednesday. Many of our matrons made up parties for the opening night, entertaining the members at dinner before visiting the canines; and several stag dinners were also given with a like conclusion, and society at large was well represented at the show that evening. Theatre parties have again been a feature this week, and some of the prettiest girls in the swim were included in the one given by Mr. Wiltsee.

And now approaches the time when the sweet girl graduate will be largely in evidence, and for some weeks we shall both hear and see them in their pretty gowns, and as the recipient of school honors, diplomas, and flowers innumerable. In fact, school commencements have already begun—one of the first being that of the Irving Institute, which took place at Golden Gate Hall on Thursday evening, and those of Trinity School will be held in the school hall on Tuesday evening next, the 25th. There will be a promenade concert at the new building of the Maria Kip Orphanage, on Lake street, this afternoon from three to seven o'clock. The programme to be executed promises a musical treat, and the attendance will, beyond doubt, be large and fashionable.

The expectations of the swim are wrought up to a high pitch regarding the floral decorations of the Unitarian Church for the Cohen-Bent wedding on the 2d of June, something very unique, beautiful and elaborate in that line being promised. The fair bride-elect has herself designed the gowns of her bridesmaids, and her well-known taste gives assurance that they will be dainty creations. St. Luke's Church has been selected by Miss Mabel Estee for her marriage to Leonard Everett on the 9th of June, and it goes without saying that here also the floral decorations will be worth looking at, that little edifice being one of the easiest to dress effectively.

On Thursday of this week Miss Maud Roberts and N. A. Borland were the bride and groom of a ceremony taking place at the Borland residence on O'Farrell street. On Wednesday of next week Miss Lillian Mastick and Oliver Ellsworth will be married at the residence of Mrs. Frank Otis on Santa Clara avenue, Alameda. The 23d of June will be the date of two weddings of note in our social world, though neither of them will take place in San Francisco. The Coleman residence in Oakland will be the locale of Miss Jessie Coleman's wedding with Harry Knowles, while in Portland, Oregon, the Macleay-Grant nuptials will be solemnized.

The recent wedding in Stockton of Miss Louisa Bours and Charles Lowell Otis was another one in which San Franciscans were interested, inasmuch as the family of the groom has been well known among them for many years. The marriage took place in St. John's church on Wednesday afternoon of last week, the Reverend Mr. Bours—a brother of the bride—performed the ceremony. Miss Lily Bours was her sister's maid-of-honor, and Atherton Macondray—a groom of the near future himself—officiated as best man. A reception and wedding breakfast at the Bours residence followed the church service, at which all the groom's relatives and many of his friends from San Francisco were present.

Recent engagement announcements include those of Miss Anna Grube and Harry Durbrow; and of Mrs. Annie L. Worcester, née Jackson, and A. H. Small, the latter coming as a great surprise to their friends.

The Gingerbread Fête was a great point of attraction last Saturday, many attending it before going to the concert at Golden Gate Hall, and others dividing their time between it and the very pleasant tea given by Dr. Charlotte Brown that afternoon. The Fête closed in a blaze of glory and dollars on Saturday evening much to the regret of those who took part, as well as their visitors, who found it the pleasantest place imaginable to spend both time and money. It was in every sense a great success.

The unpleasant state of the weather rather spoiled the opening day of the Pacific Yacht Club at Sausalito last Saturday afternoon, so far as the out-of-door arrangements were concerned; but inside the pretty club house the guests had a delightful time between dancing and feasting, and enjoyed every moment of their stay.

The Mills Club musical reception, in the rooms of the Sorosis Club, on Pine street, was greatly enjoyed by a large number of guests. Other recent pleasant affairs were Mrs. J. B. Crockett's tea in honor of Mrs. Harold Sewell; Mrs. Asa Wells' progressive euchre party; George de Long's tug party, which was chaperoned by Mrs. Willie Gwin; Mrs. Charles A. Low's reception in honor of Miss Lizzie Knox, and the luncheon given by Mrs. O. F. Long at the Requa residence in Oakland. The dinner d'adieu given by Mrs. Kruttschnitt to Mr. and Mrs. C. P. Huntington was one of the most elaborate at which they were guests during their visit here. Another feast in honor of a departing visitor was the luncheon given by Mrs. Hager for Mrs. Gale, who had been spending some weeks with her sister, Mrs. H. L. Dodge, and who has returned to her Eastern home. A dozen ladies were invited to meet her on that occasion. Mrs. McKittrick has arrived from Bakersfield on a visit to her mother, Mrs. Shafter, at the Presidio, and will remain several weeks. The Shafter's will be at the Presidio for some time longer, before taking up their residence in the lovely quarters of the Commanding General at Fort Mason.

The swim are later this year than usual in deciding upon out-of-town quarters, the several June weddings which are to take place in society circles having much to do in keeping people in town. The Hotel Rafael, from its nearness to the city, has already received many acquisitions, and later on Castle Crag will, it is said, be well patronized. To dwellers near the sea coast—such as San Franciscans are—what can be more delightful than the delicious mountain air and the odor of the pine groves which are obtained in that locale. Del Monte grows in favor with Eastern visitors every year, and the assurance of meeting pleasant people from the other side of the continent is to our residents one of the least attractions of that most charming place.

Mr. and Mrs. J. B. Whitney, the Messrs. A. B. and L. McCreary, Baron and Baroness von Schroeder, Henry L. Tatum, and others, are among arrivals at the Hotel Rafael; Mr. and Mrs. Geo. Shreve, and Mr. and Mrs. J. G. Walkington are at the Hotel Mateo for the season; Mrs. Jarhoe and Mr. and Mrs. Paul Jarhoe are occupying their new villa at San Mateo; Mr. and Mrs. C. F. Kohl are among the visitors at Del Monte.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry Scott and Miss Laura McKinstry are at home again: Mr. Harold Sewell has arrived from the East, en route to Honolulu; he and Mrs. Sewell are the guests of Mrs. C. L. Ashe on Sacramento street. Mrs. Younger has decided to postpone her contemplated visit to San Francisco this summer, and sailed for Europe last Monday. Dr. Younger will, however, be with us again next month. Mrs. John Skae and Miss Alice, and the C. P. Huntingtons have gone East; Louis Sloss, Jr., leaves for Alaska early in June; Colouel and Mrs. Smedberg, accompanied by Miss Cora, anticipate an absence of several weeks, paying visits to friends in the East.

Mme. Barrios, of Guatemala, is one of the guests at the Hotel Rafael, and her present intention is to remain there a month or more.

Dr. Byron W. Haines contemplates closing his Belvedere home in the early fall, and, with his family, taking a several months' vacation in Europe.

An enjoyable concert will be given on the evening of next Friday, 28th inst., at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s Hall, 223 Sutter street, at 8 o'clock, in aid of the San Francisco Boys' Club Association. Tickets of admission, 50 cents, to be had of the managers, or at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s, Vickery's, Doxey's, or of any of the patronesses.

The fourth annual Festival of the Vested Choir Association of San Francisco, will be held in St. John's Church on Fifteenth and Valencia streets, on the evening of the Feast of the Ascension, May 27th, at 7:30 p. m. Six choirs of men and boys, aggregating two hundred voices, will be present. The director this year is Mr. W. A. Sabin, F. R. C. O., organist and choir master of St. Luke's church. The organist is Mr. W. H. Holt, of Grace church. Admission to the Festival is by ticket, but the doors will be thrown open to the general public at 7:30 p. m. A certain number of tickets are set apart to each parish whose choir participates in the Festival, and may be had next Sunday of the parish authorities. The choirs taking part are those of St. Luke's and St. John's, San Francisco, St. John's, Oakland, Christ Church, Alameda, St. Mark's, Berkeley, and Trinity, San Jose.

Geo. T. Marsh, dealer in Japanese curios in this city, who makes annual business trips to Japan, has often been requested to chaperone parties from here. Mr. Marsh speaks the language fluently, and has an intimate acquaintance there that would be invaluable to those who might accompany him; and he is thinking of organizing a small party for a trip to Japan early in August, as that is the time to see that country at its best. The cost of such a trip would be greatly reduced by an arrangement of this sort, to say nothing of the superior opportunities for obtaining information and seeing sights under Mr. Marsh's direction, that would not otherwise be possible.

The moonlight riding party that Miss Jeannie Moore intended giving in honor of Miss Anna Simon was summarily changed, owing to climatic influences. It seems that our hostess failed to consult Weather Prophet Hammon, and at the last minute was compelled to change to a theatre party at the Columbia. Sixteen young folks enjoyed Excelsior Jr., and then adjourned to the Moore home, on Jackson street, where a delightful supper and dance were indulged in. Miss Anna Simon has just returned from Europe, where she has been visiting friends for the past year. Previous to her departure she was one of the most popular of the "Verein" girls, and her long absence has in no way impaired her popularity.

One of the most pleasant memories of a trip to the top of Mount Tamalpais via the scenic railway is the beautiful Blythedale, six miles beyond Sausalito. Blythedale is just the sort of place to visit for the summer's outing. The hotel and cottages, under the management of Mrs. Gregg, is one of the features of Blythedale to linger in one's mind with a wish for happy returns.

Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Marks left for Europe last Monday for quite an extended tour. They will be absent seven or eight months. The trip is taken for the enjoyment of a much-needed vacation.

Amongst the latest arrivals from the East are Mr. and Mrs. Julius Weill (nee Scheffel), who are on their honeymoon. Mr. Weill is an ex-resident of San Francisco and a brother to Mrs. Max Brandenstein.

The latest planned Alaskan trip is that of Mesdames Hellman, Esberg and Weill, who contemplate taking their families for an ocean jaunt about the end of June.

The S. Schwabachers will summer at Sausalito; also the Fehheimers. The former have the Sheppard home and the latter the cottage by the sea.

Mr. Nathan I. Cook left last week for an extended trip south.

THE Nelson Amycose Company has incorporated, and has established offices at the corner of Clay and Front streets. Nelson's Amycose is recognized by physicians and dentists as being a splendid antiseptic and a toilet article—especially valuable for sore throat, catarrh, and diphtheria.

To get up a banquet, supper, or marriage dinner—perfect in its appointments and satisfying the tastes of the most refined is an art; but Max Abraham at 428 Geary street is a master of that art, as his superintendence of all the swell dinners in the city very clearly proves. Practice has made him perfect.

NOTES OF THE ARMY AND NAVY.

THE NEWS LETTER has frequently received requests, both from abroad and at home, asking for news of the army and navy. Inasmuch as we endeavor to do well whatever may be undertaken, and as it is somewhat difficult to arrange for complete and reliable information, there has been unavoidably delay. But, beginning with this issue, the NEWS LETTER will each week present a full, accurate, and complete budget of current army and navy society notes, and official movements, which will be found to cover this important department to the complete satisfaction of our wide circle of acquaintances throughout the United States.]

In military circles there is much discussion regarding the system under which men in the service are held in the grade of subalterns until they have reached the age of fifty years and upwards. This is considered radically defective, and an immediate change is desired. It is argued that although the United States can progress well with a small standing army, still the interests of the public and the safety of the nation demand that it shall be officered by men who have the physical as well as mental qualifications to meet any emergency that may arise. As it is now, it is a lamentable fact that many of our field officers, by reason of age and physical infirmities, are unable to mount to the saddle, and others, through a long period of inactivity, are incapable of efficiently conducting even the ordinary drills of their regiments. By all means give the younger element a chance.

The location of some of the vessels in commission in the Pacific and Asiatic stations is as follows: Philadelphia and Marion at Honolulu, Bennington en route to San Francisco, Alert at Mare Island, Oregon at Bremerton, Wash., Monterey and Monadnock in San Francisco harbor, Olympia and Yorktown at Yokohama, Monocacy at Shanghai, Machais at Chemulpo, Boston at Nagasaki, Petrel en route to the Asiatic station, Adams at Honolulu, and expected at Port Angeles on June 28th. When the Philadelphia returns from Honolulu she will go to Mare Island for extensive repairs. The McArthur is surveying a part of the harbor near Alvarado. The Alert left here Tuesday for Alaska, and will act as convoy to the aged gunboat Pinta upon her return from Sitka. The Pinta is practically useless and will doubtless be sold. The gunboat Concord, now at Mare Island, will go into commission to-day under the command of Commander Asa Walker, U. S. N. The Baltimore, now at Mare Island, will not be ready for service until August 1st. She will then become flagship of the Pacific station. The Charleston, which is being overhauled at the Mare Island navy yard, will be ready for service about next January.

Rear Admiral Joseph N. Miller, U. S. N., who has been assigned to the command of the Pacific squadron, to succeed Rear Admiral Lester A. Beardslee, U. S. N., was commandant of the Boston Navy Yard during the past three years.

Commodore H. L. Howison, U. S. N., formerly commandant at Mare Island, has succeeded him in the latter position. Mrs. Howison returned from Honolulu last week and has gone to Boston to join her husband.

The recent death of Rear Admiral R. W. Meade, U. S. N., retired, in Washington, D. C., recalls the fact that more than three decades ago he was attached to the Saranac and the Cyane in the Pacific squadron.

It is rumored, upon excellent authority, that Colonel William M. Grabam, Fifth Artillery, U. S. A., is making strenuous efforts to secure promotion to the rank of Brigadier-General. He will be retired from active service in 1898.

Colonel S. B. M. Young, Fourth Cavalry, U. S. A., is now on duty at the Yellowstone National Park.

Colonel Edmund C. Bainbridge, Third Artillery, U. S. A., having attained the age of sixty-two years, has been retired from active service.

Lieutenant-Colonel Evan Miles, First Infantry, U. S. A., has been promoted to the rank of Colonel.

Lieutenant Commander Charles G. Bowman, U. S. N., has been ordered to Mare Island to take charge of the equipment department.

Major William H. Heuer, Corps of Engineers, U. S. A., is on special duty at Cincinnati, Ohio.

Major E. B. Mosely, medical department, U. S. A., is now on duty at his new station, Benicia Barracks. He was on duty in this city in 1884 as attending surgeon of the Division of the Pacific.

Lieutenant-Colonel Marcus P. Miller, First Artillery, U. S. A., has been promoted to the rank of Colonel of the Third Artillery.

Major William H. Bisbee, Eighth Infantry, U. S. A., has been promoted to the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel of the First Infantry.

Lieutenant J. Franklin Bell, Seventh Cavalry, U. S. A., formerly aide-de-camp to Brigadier-General James W. Forsyth, U. S. A., has been ordered to join his troop at Fort Apache, Arizona. Lieutenant J. F. Reynolds Landis, First Cavalry, U. S. A., who was his fellow aide-de-camp, has been ordered to Fort Riley. The latter was also Inspector of Small Arms Practice and Acting Engineer Officer. Both of these gentlemen were uniformly courteous in the discharge of their duties, and their departure from the Presidio is felt with regret.

Captain Charles Morris, Fifth Artillery, U. S. A., and Lieutenant G. O. Squier, Third Artillery, U. S. A., both on leave of absence, are in Washington, D. C.

Lieutenant J. A. Dapray, Twenty-third Infantry, U. S. A., has returned to his station after a prolonged detail on special work at Washington, D. C. Lieutenant Dapray was on the staff of General Miles when he was stationed here a few years ago.

Lieutenant Warren P. Newcomb, Fifth Artillery, U. S. A., who has been ill during the past three months, has returned to Fort Riley greatly improved in health.

Lieutenant George A. Skinner, Assistant Surgeon, U. S. A., has reported for duty at Fort Spokane, as the relief for six months of Captain Edward R. Morris, U. S. A., who has been granted a leave of absence.

Lieutenant James Hamilton, Third Artillery, U. S. A., has returned to duty after enjoying one month's leave of absence.

Lieutenant Thomas Bentley Mott, First Artillery, U. S. A., has been granted two months' leave of absence, with permission to go beyond the sea.

Lieutenant R. C. Croxton, First Infantry, U. S. A., has been appointed Assistant Adjutant at the Presidio.

Lieutenant Benjamin H. Randolph, Third Artillery, U. S. A., has been appointed Ordnance and Engineer Officer and placed in charge of the beautiful gardens at the Presidio.

Lieutenant Charles W. Hobbs, Third Artillery, U. S. A., has been promoted to the rank of Captain.

Second Lieutenant Delamere Skerrett, Fifth Artillery, U. S. A., has been promoted to the rank of First Lieutenant in the Third Artillery.

Second Lieutenant John W. Joyes, Fifth Artillery, U. S. A., now on duty at the West Point Military Academy, has been promoted to the rank of First Lieutenant. He was very popular in society circles when he was stationed at the Presidio.

Chief Engineer George J. Burnap, U. S. N., has been appointed Fleet Engineer of the North Atlantic station. It will be remembered that he was invalided home from the Asiatic station a few months ago after the sudden death of his daughter at Vallejo, so it is a matter of congratulation to know that he has recovered and is again on duty.

Medical Inspector J. C. Wise, U. S. N., has been ordered to the Philadelphia as fleet surgeon, relieving Medical Inspector J. A. Hawke, U. S. N., who has been ordered detached and granted three months' leave of absence.

Surgeon C. U. Gravatt, U. S. N., will leave New York to-day by steamer for Piree for duty on the San Francisco. He will relieve Medical Inspector H. J. Babin, U. S. N., who has been ordered home and granted three months' leave of absence.

Passed Assistant Paymaster T. H. Hick, U. S. N., has been detached from the Marion and placed in waiting orders. Paymaster J. E. Cann, U. S. N., has been ordered as his relief.

Assistant Surgeon William M. Kneeder, U. S. A., now stationed at San Diego Barracks, has leased a cottage at Coronado Beach for himself and family.

The new gun boat Marietta will go to Alaska when completed.

Assistant Engineer R. E. Carrey, U. S. N., and family, will pass the summer near Ben Lomond, in the Santa Cruz Mountains.

Dr. James F. Kearney, of this city, has been appointed surgeon to the U. S. revenue cutter Perry, of the Bering Sea fleet.

Brigadier General Zenas R. Bliss, U. S. A., commanding the Department of Texas, has been appointed major general. He will soon apply for retirement under the veteran service law. Brigadier General John R. Brooke, U. S. A., will be his successor.

Rear Admiral W. A. Kirkland, U. S. N., is at Port Orchard investigating the causes of the grounding of the Oregon.

Colonel Evan Miles, First Infantry, U. S. A., came down from Benicia barracks last Wednesday and assumed command at the Presidio.

Colonel R. T. Frank, First Artillery, U. S. A., of Fort Monroe, Va., and Colonel T. M. Anderson, Fourteenth Infantry, U. S. A., of Vancouver barracks, are the leading contestants for the vacancy in the rank of general.

The first day of June will witness a very pretty military wedding at the residence of Colonel George H. Burton, U. S. A., the Inspector General of the Pacific District. The bride will be his beautiful and accomplished daughter, Miss Minnie Burton, and the gallant son of Mars whom she is to wed will be Lieutenant Thomas A. Pearce, Seventh Infantry, U. S. A., now stationed at Fort Logan, Colo. The wedding will take place at half past one o'clock at the family home, 2111 Pacific Avenue. The Misses Lulu and Kathro Burton will be the bridesmaids and Lieutenant William Sells, U. S. A., will act as best man. An informal reception will follow the ceremony. The young couple will reside at Fort Logan.

Lieutenant Charles Lyman Bent, First Infantry, U. S. A., will become the husband of Miss Emelie Ethel Cohen, of Alameda, on Wednesday, June 2d. The ceremony will be performed at 9 o'clock in the evening at the first Unitarian church in this city. Afterwards there will be a reception at the home of the bride's uncle and aunt, Dr. and Mrs. Henry Gibbons, 920 Polk street. Miss Cohen is bright, vivacious, handsome, accomplished and wealthy, so Lieutenant Bent is to be congratulated upon securing such a charming partner for life.

Captain G. W. Sumner, U. S. N., and Lieutenant J. M. Roper, U. S. N., of the Monadnock, and Chief Engineer Richard Inch, U. S. N., of the Mare Island Navy Yard, are to conduct the trial trips of the Marietta and the Wheeling that are now in course of construction at the Union Iron Works.

Past Assistant Engineer Frank Eldridge, U. S. N., has been promoted to be chief engineer.

Past Assistant Surgeon M. J. Rosenau, U. S. M. H. S., was appointed quarantine officer at San Francisco last Tuesday.

Lieutenant E. B. Babbitt, U. S. A., of the Benicia arsenal, will leave June 8th on the steamer Queen to visit Alaska. Mrs. Babbitt will accompany him.

Lieutenant Harry M. Field, U. S. N., of the Monterey, and Ensign Louis A. Kaiser, of the Monadnock, will be detached from duty on these vessels to-day and he assigned to the Concord.

Ensign Yates Stirling, U. S. N., of the Albatross, is being congratulated upon his engagement to Miss Myra Noyes, a beautiful and accomplished young lady of Washington, D. C.

The Albatross has been ordered to the Tacoma dry dock for repairs, after which she will go to Alaska to obtain statistical data regarding the progress of the salmon canneries.

Brigadier General Elwell S. Otis, U. S. A., has been relieved from the command of the Department of the Columbia, and ordered to the command of the Department of the Colorado, with headquarters at Denver, Colo.

THE Imperial Hotel, at Stockton, is now under the management of W. S. Low, formerly of Santa Barbara, with F. H. Clark chief clerk. These gentlemen are thoroughly competent, and will doubtless make a great success of the Imperial.

KORN, the Hatter, 726 Market street, near Kearny, is the sole agent for Kaos. See the latest spring styles.

The Hebbard Libel Suit.

Argument of Samuel M. Shortridge, Attorney for the Defendant,

Frederick Marriott, Department 2, Superior Court for the City and County of San Francisco,

Thursday, May 13, 1897.

Argument of SAMUEL M. SHORTRIDGE, in behalf of Free Speech and a Free Press, on the trial of Frederick Marriott, accused of libeling J. C. B. Hebbard: In the Superior Court of San Francisco. May 13, 1897.

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR HONOR, AND I TRUST IT WILL PLEASE YOU, GENTLEMEN OF THE JURY: I would do myself a wrong and my profession an injustice if I did not, at the outset, return to you my grateful thanks for the patient attention you have given to a case which, from my point of view, I regard so important to every citizen. The nature and importance of this case cannot be over-stated. It is not the personalities of the prosecuting witness or the defendant which give dignity to a cause which you have been listening to for four weeks, and which you will very soon be called upon to decide. The prosecuting witness will run his little course and be forgotten. The Judge upon the bench and his successors, in the fulness of time, will pass away, and you and I and all of us will lie down to sleep in the quiet and equal grave. Our lives, our deeds, our names, may not be remembered among men; but the great principles which are here at stake—the principles of free speech and a free press, the principles of free government, of self-government, which are here attacked, and feebly but earnestly by me defended—are vitally essential to the permanence of our country, and will be enduring, if future jurors are as brave and fearless and true to the spirit of liberty as I believe you, each and all, to be. It is not, I repeat, a question of mere personalities. If it were so, this would be a small and inconsequential case. No; it is the mighty cause, the great principles, which are here at stake that give our deliberations dignity, and your decision far-reaching importance. And it is because of these very principles, which underlie and give life and vitality to our government, that the people await with solicitude, but not without confidence, your verdict. These principles, here attacked, scoffed at and derided, are as alive and vigorous to-day, I trust, as they were when our ancestors fought and bled and died for them. The principles thus attacked and in peril are the same principles for which English patriots laid their heads upon the block, and Irish patriots mounted the scaffold. Gentlemen, you are called upon to perform a high duty, and to determine by your calm and mature verdict, whether these principles shall be upheld and triumph or perish to gratify private vengeance and un-Christian revenge. In a word, the principles at stake are these: In a free country, in a republic, in a self-government such as ours, have the people a right to criticize their public servants, or to comment upon, or express their sentiments concerning, those who seek public office of great importance and of great power? I beg to repeat to you, and to impress upon your minds, that this is not a case wherein a private citizen has been criticised and denounced; it is a case where a public servant, your servant and mine, has been justly and severely censured for his official misconduct. For I need not remind you that the Judge upon the bench is the servant of the people, subject to their law, charged with carrying out and enforcing their decrees, the same as the humblest and poorest man that to-day works upon our streets. The Judge is not above but below, and governed by the law, and you and I and every citizen has the right freely to discuss his merits or demerits, freely to comment upon his official conduct, freely to approve or to oppose him, freely to eulogize and praise him, or to censure and denounce him; and no man shall deny us that right, guaranteed to us by the Constitution of the United States and the Constitution of California. And if you or other juries, or other Courts, shall deny that right to the citizen, it is not too much to say that self-government will be at an end and liberty a dream not realized.

Free Speech and a Free Press.

These observations carry us back to the great struggles of our fathers for self-government, for freedom of conscience, and for liberty of speech. Thus far we have preserved in this country, and enjoy at this hour, what our ancestors fought for and achieved. No man who is familiar with the struggles of England and Ireland for self and free government; no student who is acquainted with the struggles of our Revolutionary fathers, and with the debates and discussions which led up to and culminated in the framing and adoption of our Federal Constitution, is unacquainted with the studied and tyrannical efforts of Government to suppress free discussion, or with the vital importance of free lips and an untrammelled and uncensored press. Time was when to criticize Government or men in high official place, was to be flung into a dungeon, robbed of property, stripped of reputation, or to die upon the scaffold. When our fathers came to the great work of adopting a Constitution for the new nation, they sought to preserve for all time the inestimable blessing of free speech and a free press; and to that end threw around them the shield of the Constitution itself. Indeed, had not free speech and a free press been guaranteed to the people for all time, the Constitution itself never would have been adopted. It is a well known historical fact that, had not Marshall, and Washington, and Adams, and Jefferson, and others of the great champions of the Constitution, promised Patrick Henry and those who opposed the adoption of the Constitution through fear of centralization, fear of tyranny growing up, that they would agree to the original eleven Amendments being engrafted upon the Constitution, the great charter of our liberties would never have been ratified by the people of the original thirteen States. What was that fear? What did our fathers seek to protect us against? It was not an idle, but a well-founded fear, that the press might be shackled, and that the citizen might be stripped of his liberty to criticize Government and men in official station. There was a fear that power would become arrogant, that government would become tyrannical, and that unless prevented, Congress might pass laws in restraint of the liberty of the press. To guard against usurpation of power and the enslavement of the people, our fathers made haste to adopt certain amendments to the Federal Constitution, first and chief among which is Amendment No. 1. That Amendment reads as follows:

"Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances."

This great bulwark against tyranny, this great shield against oppression, was proposed as early as the 25th of September, 1789, and ratified on the 15th of December, 1791. This constitutional guarantee of free speech and a free press is a castle of refuge, not an ambuscade of danger. The pioneers of California bore with them a love of free government and a belief in this doctrine of free speech and a free press, and lest a venal Legislature should seek to rob the people of their heritage, the people enacted in their organic law that lips of men and the press should be free forever. In their Declaration of Rights the people of California declared:

"Every citizen may freely speak, write and publish his sentiments on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of that right; and no law shall be passed to restrain or abridge the liberty of speech or of the press. In criminal prosecutions for libels, the truth may be given in evidence to the jury; and if it shall appear to the jury that the matter charged as libelous is true, and published with good motives and for justifiable ends, the press shall be acquitted, and the jury shall have the right to determine the law and the facts."

Gentlemen, the defendant in this case invokes the protection of these Constitutional provisions, and I appeal to you to uphold them in their true spirit and their true meaning. If men may not express their sentiments, to use the good word of our Constitution, their opinion, upon public questions and public men, then indeed have we fallen from where our fathers started us; then, indeed, are these Constitutional guarantees a delusion and a snare! And who, let me ask you, wishes it established in this country that a man can only exercise his Constitutional privilege of criticising public officials at his peril, that he must express his honest sentiments with fear and trembling? I answer, none but the rogue, none but the hypocrite, none but the unworthy.

Impressed with the importance of these great principles, I almost forget that I am defending Mr. Marriott; I almost forget the small personality of the prosecuting witness. I stand by the Constitution and for a great principle, and I look with confidence to the upholding of that principle by you. What if the sentiment expressed is hostile in the extreme? What if the censure is severe? What if the opinion of the citizen is expressed in language strong and indignant? What if he employs withering invective, biting sarcasm and destroying irony? May not the citizen employ his native tongue to express his sentiment or his opinion? Are we to be told that a citizen must express his opinion of public servants at his peril, lest others may not agree with him, and therefore seek to punish him? Are we to measure men's rights and rob them of their liberty by their peculiar use of the English language? Are we to deal lightly with wrong in high places, with iniquity in the Temple of Justice, and when, expressing with righteous indignation a just wrath, indulge in soft mellifluous phrases? Are we to deal lightly with official corruption—daily with it, handle it gently, gloss it over with cowardly phrases? Shall malfeasance in office and breach of public trust go unexposed, unwhipped of justice? If so, the Constitutional guarantees which I have read are meaningless, and the labors and struggles of our forefathers were in vain.

The People the Source of Power.

In this country, gentlemen (and we should be so grateful for it) the people are the source of all power, and officers are the servants of the people, chosen by the people to act for the people, and for their greatest good. We have long since exploded and discarded the notion of divine right of kings—the notion which enslaved the world.

As we proceed, you will observe, if you do not fully realize it now, that this is a prosecution urged against a citizen for expressing his political sentiments, in regard to a public question, and as to the merits, or rather demerits, of a man then a candidate for public office, who, at the time, was an officer and servant of the people. And I say now, and may have frequent occasion to repeat it in the years to come—and will stand or fall by it—that when I see a man in public office, or seeking public office, that I regard unfit or disqualified by virtue of passion or of ignorance, by virtue of his associates, his conduct, his private life or public official action, I shall oppose him, I shall denounce him with whatever vigor of language I possess, and I shall expect every honest citizen to exercise the same privilege and perform the same duty. Let the press be free; let discussion be without restraint; let men voice their sentiments upon all public questions without fear, and then let the people decide the fate of men and measures. If Mr. Marriott, who, let me here observe, is not proved to be the author of this alleged editorial opinion; if Mr. Marriott, the citizen, the elector, like you, like me, is to be prosecuted for the expression of his political opinion, I doubt if there is one of us who might not be subjected to a like prosecution. I had hoped that the expression of political opinion would not be the subject of personal vengeance or of personal and revengeful prosecution in the courts of our State. I had hoped that when, in the heat of a campaign, fellow-citizens wrought to excitement expressed in strong and vigorous language of invective, or of denunciation, men would allow something for the passions and heat of the hour, and that the State would not be made to prosecute one of her own people for freely expressing his political opinion. I had hoped that when the late campaign was over, after the discussion in newspapers, from the rostrum, from the platform, from the stump had ceased, after the heat, the passions, the excitements of the hour were over, men would let the campaign, its battles and its strife, rest and be at an end. Some of you may have championed that peerless orator, William J. Bryan; some of you may have followed the banner of that masterful statesman, William McKinley; some of you may have expressed yourself with power and vigor and earnestness in favor of one and against the other, and feeling that the one or the other was the friend or the enemy of his country, you may have advocated or opposed him; or, believing that the purposes or policy of the one was dangerous and injurious to your country, you may have denounced him as the enemy of the people. But are you to be brought into Court for expressing those political sentiments? Are you, and is this citizen, to be prosecuted for expressing a sentiment concerning a public question? May not men oppose candidates fearlessly? Is the citizen to have the danger of a criminal prosecution hanging over him when he dares to assert himself during the campaign, whether it be by spoken or by written words? Is this the beginning of a series of political prosecutions? These are the questions, and this is the great issue which we are here now to consider and to decide.

The Wrong Done the State.

Who are the parties, gentlemen, to this case? Who are the parties that have engaged your attention thus long? The nominal parties—the parties, so to speak, on the record—are The People of the State of California—my State and yours—and the defendant, Mr. Marriott, a citizen. My State is made to come here, and day after day seek to punish one of her own people for doing what our State Constitution says he may do—express himself on a public subject—touching the qualifications of a candidate for public office. The real parties, however, gentlemen, are otherwise. The real parties to this case are the prosecuting witness here, J. C. B. Heh-hard and Mr. Marriott, the defendant. You understand that, we all understand that. But the State is made to take this hostile position against one of her citizens. And the State, instead of the real plaintiff in this case, is made to bear the expense of this long and costly prosecution. This case has a ready cost the State nearly $2000, and it was a very desirable thing on the part of the prosecuting witness to bring to bear the pressure of the State upon the citizen rather than to institute a civil suit and stand on an equality with the defendant, as man to man, and fight his own personal battle out. But in a civil suit he would have had to bear the expense of trial; this he sought to avoid, and has avoided, by throwing the State into this unjust prosecution. The prosecuting witness here represented by Mr. Kahn; the State is misrepresented by one whose name is unfit to pass my lips.

I repeat that the State is here made to say that one of her citizens has violated her laws; the State is made to say and to take the position, that the citizen, for expressing his sentiments upon political matters, for commenting upon official conduct and censuring a candidate for public office, has violated some criminal law. I venture to say that every one of us is equally guilty. I venture to say that every one of us has uttered sentiments which if brought against us here, would show us equally, if not more, guilty than Mr. Marriott. But I thank God that we are not guilty of any infraction of our laws, nor is this defendant when he uttered his sentiments, expressed his opinion as to the merits or the demerits of a candidate for judicial office.

It is said that Mr. Marriott has done—what? That he has violated some law hurtful to the State—that he has disturbed the peace and insulted the dignity of the State. Wherein has our old State suffered? Wherein has her peace been disturbed? What has Mr. Marriott done to wound her dignity? And wherein has this prosecuting witness suffered at his hands? We had it flung out to us here during this trial—and we know from the public records—that despite these expressions of opinion, this particular candidate, like another O'Donnell, swept into office. Whether he was elected or defeated, no crime was committed; but we know that no harm was done to him, as is evidenced fully by the result. It must have been harmless; it must have had no effect; it must have been easily nullified and corrected, because nobody sealed his lips, nobody prevented him from speaking through the press, nobody prevented him a hearing before the great body of the people; and the record shows that the people, for reasons which perhaps to them then seemed sufficient, treated this little editorial as harmless, without hurt, and disregarded it. Consequently I have a right to say, and I do say, that it did no harm even to the prosecuting witness, who comes here day after day and week after week, urging on this revengeful prosecution. It did not provoke a breach of the peace; it did not cause a riot. It was the truth then; it is the truth now; and as the truth it stands and will stand forever on the records of this Court.

Equal Before the Law.

Gentlemen, you are American citizens—whether born on this soil or coming from foreign country—I would do violence to you to say or to suggest or to hint, that you did not love this country just as much as I do, or just as much as the defendant loves it. There is no privileged class, there is no official class, in this country. We are all equal; we are all on a common level; and whether a man stands in rags or is clothed in purple and fine linen, whether he stands single and alone, or with the vast majority, he has a right to express his sentiments freely and fearlessly. This Mr. Marriott has done. Majorities are not always right; heroes are generally in the minority. But what if Mr. Marriott stood alone in the expression of his opinion? He was entitled to that opinion and to the expression of that opinion. I have yet to learn or to hear, either in a court of law or in the history of the world, drowned as it has been in blood and tears, that the majority are right. Is the majority right to-day, yonder on the plains of Thessaly? Is the majority right, yonder bearing the crescent and tramping on the cross? May not the humblest man stand up and express the truth, regardless of those who oppose him? Is a citizen to be stripped of his rights to criticize or comment upon, or to oppose a candidate for office, because he may chance to be in the minority? If this be so, then we have a despotism worse than anarchy. But, gentlemen, I am proud and happy to believe that no such monstrous doctrines will find approval in your minds. So to fear or to doubt, would be to insult your manhood and to despair of the Republic!

Julius Cæsar Bonaparte Hebbard.

Through the influence of the prosecuting witness, who was at that time a candidate for office, and upon the eve of a heated political campaign, an indictment was filed against Mr. Marriott. By whom and under what circumstances was that indictment found? It was found by a body of citizens holding secret session—the Grand Jury. That body of citizens did not know what you know, what the people of this city now know. Had they known what this record discloses, this indictment would never have been filed, nor would you have been taken thus long from your business and your families. Who appeared before that secret tribunal? One who dared not get upon this stand and look us in the face and speak to you! Before that secret tribunal, where there was no cross-examination, where there was no opportunity of laying the facts, and all the facts, before the jury, where there was no adversary to question him—in that secret tribunal, the prosecuting witness and one Richard Dillon appeared and testified. Where was the prosecuting witness when the time came for him to speak here in this court-room? Where was Mr. Dillon—whoever he is. I know not—where is that creature, Richard Dillon, who, in the darkness of a secret and private tribunal, added the prosecuting witness in bringing about the indictment of Mr. Marriott? And where—I repeat it again—where was Julius Cæsar Bonaparte Hebbard? Why not appear before you, gentlemen; why not appear before you; why not come out, man to man, when the opportunity was offered, when the light was streaming through these windows, when counsel, able, vigorous and attentive, was watching his interests? Why not come here and exculpate himself from the grave and serious charges preferred against him originally and proved by sworn testimony? Why go into the secret chambers of a Grand Jury, where many a reputation has been stabbed and many a heart broken, and then not dare to appear in the open, where all brave men fight? It is only the coward who goes into the star chamber; it is only the coward who fights in the dark. Why did he not come; why did he not exonerate himself; why did he remain silent, and by all the arts and all the objections good or bad, known to the law, seal his own lips, and lock forever the books which we sought to open and spread their contents before you?

Dared Not Deny.

Under the circumstances, gentlemen, I submit it to you—to your consciences, to your judgment, to your sense of fairness, which, I hope, and have always believed, and still do believe, is in the heart of all true Americans—why did he remain silent here? On some occasions "silence is golden," and speech, we are told, is silver. But as we are taught in Sacred Writ, there is a time to speak and a time to keep silence. And the time to speak is when charges have been made. After a man has spoken in the secret chambers of the Grand Jury, in the absence of his adversary, the time to speak is, and was, here in this courtroom before you and before all men. Gentlemen, the prosecuting witness dared not take the witness stand. Silence, under the circumstances, and in view of the damaging testimony from so many honorable and respected citizens, is confession of guilt. You will remember the great speech of Webster, wherein he said that there were but two things for a certain wretch to do—confession or suicide. And suicide is confession. I say it with sorrow, and with a blush for our courts, that the silence of the prosecuting witness in this case, in the face of the testimony of so many gentlemen who came here and testified from this witness chair, is confession that they uttered and spoke the truth. He dared not deny, under oath, the testimony of official conduct which was so grossly reprehensible. He dared not contradict Mr. McCarthy. He dared not contradict Mr. Pike. He dared not contradict Mr. Thomas Williams. He dared not contradict Mr. Arthur Williams. He dared not contradict Mr. Kendall. He dared not contradict Mr. Mahoney. He dared not contradict Mr. Harris. He dared not contradict Mr. Frace. He dared not contradict Mr. Steadman. He dared not contradict Mr. Spelling. He dared not contradict Mr. Dickson. He dared not contradict Dr. Harris. He dared not contradict Mr. Conant. He dared not contradict Mr. Lucy. He dared not contradict Mr. Hutton. He dared not contradict Mr. Dimas. He dared not contradict Mr. Henley. He dared not contradict Judge Denson. He dared not contradict Mr. Flournoy. He dared not contradict Mr. Livernash. He dared not look any one or all of these gentlemen in the face, and contradict their statements of his misconduct, official and otherwise. He dared not deny that he received those resolutions passed by the assembled depositors, censuring the unlawful acts of his Receiver, and addressed and sent to him by the secretary, Mr. Pike. He dared not deny that he had received the letter written and addressed to him by Mr. Steadman, recalling his name from that bogus protest, which served the court and others as an excuse for violating a promise voluntarily and solemnly made. He dared not deny that Mr. Barnett, in open court, begged him to desist from his contemplated action, the discharge of that unlawful Receiver, and the exonerating of his bondsmen. He dared not deny—and I would impress this upon you—he dared not deny that in the darkness of night, when good citizens are supposed to be at home or attending to some legal and proper business—that in the darkness of night, here in this courthouse, he was conveniently present to receive certain politicians who came in a hack from the Palace Hotel, and then and there entered orders and made appointments which were utterly null and void. You remember that Mr. Spelling testified as to the issuance of the injunction and the appointment of the Receiver the second time in the Knight case. Here was the Judge of our high Superior Court, at night alone in his chambers, no Clerk of the Court present, to receive his favorites and his political friends, and to make an appointment which he must have known, if he was qualified for the bench, was contrary to law and in the direct face of the decisions of our Supreme Court. Shameful and disgraceful as was that transaction, he did not have the courage to make even a plausible excuse or explanation. Nor did he have the courage to get upon this witness stand and deny knowledge of all these wrongful things, done by the Receiver and his advisers. This partiality shown by the Receiver, the insults heaped upon the committee of depositors, the trampling upon the rights of those who have lost all and begged only for the poor privilege of representation in that bank—he dared not, I say, deny that he knew of all these illegal and shameful things, and had knowledge of them from these resolutions presented and forwarded to him, from letters addressed to him, from private conversations, from public rumor, from the daily papers—from all those well-known sources of knowledge which we know he had. He did not have the audacity to deny, and he dared not deny, that he had broken a promise voluntarily and treely given—a promise given as a Judge to parties interested in the subject matter of that promise. He dared not deny that he had violated a promise which was given, or supposed to have been given, for the purpose of putting men in control of that bank, whose savings were there, and which savings represented the toil and the tears of widows and of orphans.

His Silence was Confession.

Why did he not go upon the stand like a brave and fearless man and deny those charges, or seek to palliate their enormity? Why not make a clean breast of it, and state why he did those things, and deny, if he could under his oath, that he knew all about the infamous transactions which have now for the first time been brought into the light of day? I repeat that his silence, when given an opportunity to speak in open Court, is a confession that he could not, in honor and in truth deny the truth of the statements made by all the gentlemen I have named; could not deny that he had been consorting with evil men, and doing things which reflected discredit on himself and dishonor on the Bench. His silence is no more significant than the silence and the absence of his detective, John Gamage. Gentlemen, the State's representatives may think and may indulge in the foolish, fond belief that you did not see quite through that whole business, and the connection of this private detective with a Superior Judge! When I called Mr. Benjamin Lucy to the stand—and I have yet to learn that it is any dishonor to be a poor man and to work in the Union Iron Works—when I called Mr. Lucy to the stand and he said that this creature Gamage had approached him a few days before the late election, when he was at his work, and had asked him to go to the office of certain lawyers who were the friends and boon companions of the prosecuting witness, there was a chorus of objections upon the ground that there was no showing that Gamage was the agent of this candidate! What was the prosecuting witness afraid of? What had he done which should he kept secret? What had he urged or advised that should be kept hidden? I was not aware, and perhaps you were not aware, that under our reform election laws, passed to insure the purity of elections, candidates for the Superior Bench had to have, or would so disgrace the Bench as to employ private detectives or agents to advocate their qualifications or fitness for public office. Although we were there checked for the moment in proving what the detective Gamage had said to Mr. Lucy, do you for a moment question why and for what purpose he had sought out that gentleman? Prevented from disclosing the truth by Mr. Lucy, the prosecution having objected and closed his mouth, we undertook in the utmost good faith to bring that detective here before you, and with what success you know. He had been here in this court-room, flitting about the corridors like a guilty thing, whispering in the ear of the prosecuting witness, advising with him, suggesting to him—his bosom friend, his particular friend—he was in evidence until he was called for as a witness to go upon the stand; and then, like a guilty thing, he fled away, and every effort was made by me—not by the other side—by me to serve him with a subpoena and bring him here. Although I knew he would be a hostile witness, I was not afraid to grapple with his conscience and to tear out the guilty secrets from his breast. And we all heard the prosecuting witness pretend to make an effort to have that detective in Court. "He will be here in the morning," said he; "I will go and telephone to him and bring him here." He went; he telephoned; and Gamage never came! He had gone to Sacramento! Why didn't this bosom friend, this particular friend, of a Superior Court Judge, come into Court and tell why and for what purpose he had interviewed Mr. Lucy and asked him to go to the office of certain lawyers? Gentlemen, the prosecuting witness, though professing great friendship for this detective, dared not produce him before you. I pause to remark that I was not before aware that our Superior Judges were so proud of their close relationship and warm comradeship with that class of private detectives! I have heard something about "men being known by the company they keep." At any rate we wanted that man here, and I regret to say that we were not successful in our efforts to produce him.

What was Gamage doing in and about these things? Why was he calling on Mr. Lucy? What was he doing in and about this court-room? And why, when he heard that he was wanted, did he disappear? Gentlemen, Mr. Lucy was a depositor in that bank; he was a member of the committee of seven, representing as it is admitted, originally some 1600, and later on some 2800 depositors, whose little savings had been sunk in that institution; and this prosecuting witness was seeking then, as he seeks now, to stifle public censure and to intimidate men! He failed then; and if I know aught of you or your character, he will fail now.

Judges Should be Above Reprach.

I again observe, gentlemen, that the prosecuting witness's silence here was the best evidence of the truth of the statements made by gentlemen who were upon this stand—a confession of the truth of facts which reflect the highest dishonor and disgrace upon the bench; a confession that the opinion expressed and the facts stated in the editorial in the NEWS LETTER were well founded and true. I can imagine that an inferior ministerial officer, such as a Sheriff, might do some things which might not square with exact morality, or comport with the dignity which should mark the walk and the life of a public official. I can well imagine that such inferior officers might do things questionable, if not criminal, and conduct themselves without dignity and carry on the business of their offices without courtesy; but we have been taught to believe that our Judges should be above reproach, and above suspicion, should not be consorting with milk inspectors—with all sorts and conditions of political hirelings and "hangers-on," with private detectives who fear to show their faces from the witness stand! And I doubt not that you were shocked and ashamed to learn that one of our Superior Court Judges was confederating with such a motley gang in breaking up a private meeting of respectable citizens, met together to discuss their own private affairs and consider their distressing grievances.

No Proof Against Marriott.

When the State closed its case, the defendant might have safely rested without putting in one word of testimony. The State has the burden of proof, as you understand; it must prove every essential fact; it must prove those facts, not only by a preponderance of testimony, but beyond all reasonable doubt. The presumption of innocence in favor of the citizen goes with him from the beginning to the end, and the defendant, presumed to be innocent, throws around him the barrier and the shield of that presumption, as it is now thrown around and protects you and protects all men. The State undertook to prove—to establish beyond all reasonable doubt—that the defendant was guilty of a crime. In order to make out their case, they asserted that he was the author and the publisher of a certain editorial. It is enough to say that there was no proof at all that he was the author of the editorial in question; not one word of proof, not even a suggestion of proof. Is there any testimony that he was the publisher of that editorial? I ask you gentlemen, as business men, as men of affairs, would you buy the NEWS LETTER and take title to it upon the testimony which you have heard in this court-room? For you will pardon me if I remind you that under your oaths, you are to act upon the testimony which you have heard in this court. Would you take the testimony of Mr. Dreypolcher as evidence (and that is the only testimony) of title to the San Francisco NEWS LETTER? I say, there was no proof of ownership, no proof of authorship. You might as well think of convicting Mr. Cahill, Mr. Whitcomb or Mr. Scott for any publication in the Examiner, the Chronicle or the Call, as to convict Mr. Marriott upon the proposition that he is the owner and the publisher of the NEWS LETTER. It may be his venerated mother who owns that journal; it may be the estate of his lamented father; it may be a corporation; we do not know, and all we do know about the title to that paper is a statement of Mr. Dreypolcher that, some two years before October 31st, 1896—the day of the publication in question—he had heard Mr. Marriott speak of the NEWS LETTER as "my paper." If that were proof of title, every reporter in this city would be the owner of a newspaper; if that were proof of title, every clerk in every store would be a merchant; if that were proof of title, every driver of a team would own that team. If, to speak of a paper as "my paper" two years prior, is proof of title on the 31st day of October, 1896, then any idle remark which I might make or which you might make, touching property with which we had to do, would be to establish our title to that property. Since, therefore, it was the duty and the burden was upon the State to prove that Mr. Marriott was the publisher of the NEWS LETTER on the 31st day of October, 1896, and to prove that essential fact beyond all reasonable doubt, and since they failed to introduce any proof at all that he was such owner on that day, the defendant was not obliged, under the law, to say one word, and he might have confidently appealed to your oaths and to your consciences, and, rapping on your breasts, asked you for and received from you an acquittal. But I have never yet where great principles were at stake, or where there might be the least doubt, or the remotest shadow of a doubt upon any essential point, rested a case until I had laid every fact possible before the jury which seemed to me proper, or which might strengthen the case of my client, or assist the cause of justice. I remind you again, that whatever proof of title was adduced, was at a time two years prior to October 31st, 1896—the day of the publication which has caused this iniquitous persecution. I am very far from regarding that as the important proposition here to determine; but I am doing what you would expect to be done for you; I am reminding you, and do now insist, that the State failed, and has failed utterly, to prove title to this paper in Mr. Marriott on the day named. And for that reason he is entitled to an acquittal.

Is there any evidence that he caused his name to be put in the paper as its editor and publisher? Not one word. Such proof, if I may dignify such testimony by that word, is no proof at all in a court of law; it is not proof in the ordinary transactions of life, and there is not one of you gentlemen, as business men, who would take the testimony of Mr. Dreypolcher as evidence of title and pay one dollar at this moment for the NEWS LETTER, no matter what the value may be. The State must prove beyond all reasonable doubt, and if there is any reasonable doubt upon this question of title, I need not remind you again for the court will instruct you, that it becomes your duty to acquit the defendant; for, otherwise, you might arrest in the prosecution of a lawless reporter upon any of our daily papers who uses the phrase "my paper" in relation to the journal on which he is employed. Why the State did not undertake to prove and if it were true, prove ownership in the due and legal way I do not know. Suffice it to say, leaving this point that the State did not prove it, and it does not stand proved now on the record of this court. Will it be maintained in a court of justice, under the strict rule of law, where every presumption is in favor of a defendant that the essential proposition of his guilt is to be proved or can be proved by language which would not establish title to a load of hay or to a most inconsequential or valueless thing? Can it, in view of these presumptions and these indulgences of law in favor of innocence, be seriously maintained that you can prove ownership, which is essential to the crime here charged by testimony which would not prove ownership in the smallest and most petty civil case?

The Rights of the Citizen.

But gentlemen, that is not the question which we are here to discuss and determine, although upon that one point the defendant is entitled to an acquittal at your hands. You cannot presume a man to be an owner; you cannot presume a man to be an author; you cannot presume a man to be guilty because every presumption is the other way. And these things, each and all of them, the State was bound to prove, and I submit to your good judgment has failed to prove. The defendant is, therefore, entitled to an acquittal. That he will receive it upon other and broader grounds I do believe; my faith in this result is unshaken from my view of the testimony and my appreciation of your good judgment, courage and fairness.

It is charged, however, gentlemen that Mr. Marriott is the owner of the NEWS LETTER and that he published this editorial. Well, what is this editorial which seems to have so greatly wounded the sensitive nature of the prosecuting witness, which, we are told, threatens the peace and offends the dignity of the State? Why, if you and I should turn aside to pursue people who now and then indulge in playful merriment, or irony, or sarcasm, or flippant humor, or idle jest, at our expense we would be busy the remainder of our lives in hunting down reporters. Talk about De Wolf Hopper and "El Capitan," and his bloodthirsty propensities! Why, every lawyer in this town, perhaps every citizen, would be buckled on with armor, with a knife in each boot and a revolver in each pocket, pursuing reporters and publishers, if we took affront at editorials of this character. But, I take the bold position, and will maintain it before you, that a citizen has a right to oppose with invective, with sarcasm, with scorn, with irony—with all the arts and force of language—a candidate who offers himself before the people, asking their suffrages. I maintain that it is not a criminal libel to oppose a man bitterly and vigorously; to express in strong terms your opposition to men or the principles which they represent. And I say it is not criminal libel to tear the mask from brazen impudence and speak the truth concerning official misconduct. If, by your verdict, you shall deny to the citizen that right, you have gone back five hundred years, and we are again on the fields of battle where our fathers fought and died in order that they might be free in religion, in politics, and in their government. I am not dealing in abstractions. Let us realize where we are—that we are in a court of justice, and that a citizen is prosecuted for uttering his political sentiments and speaking the truth. Was he obliged to use gentle and complimentary words in denouncing wrongdoing, and is the citizen obliged to express scorn and contempt and opposition in eulogistic phrases? Suppose a judge in private life is a libertine; on the bench, arrogant and partial; in his knowledge of law, ignorant and obstinate—on the bench, a tyrant; off the bench, consorting with vile men—and you oppose him for these reasons, and express your opposition with vigor and indignation. Are you to be convicted of criminal libel because you had the hardihood, or the want of prudence, to call attention to that official's unfitness or unfairness, or because you expose him to those whose support and suffrage he seeks? Has the citizen a right to express his sentiments and to state the truth? That is the great question. I had supposed that in this country, in California, the time of political prosecutions had ended. I had supposed that the labors of English patriots and the blood of Irish patriots had done something towards fixing the laws of the Anglo-Saxon race, or established certain principles which were imported into, or which had further grown up in the United States. I had supposed men were free, politically, in this country, and that the beggar might look the prince in the face and tell him that he was a scoundrel! I had supposed that poverty had the same rights to express its sentiments as wealth and power. But here we see the spectacle of official power and influence seeking to stifle public criticism of official misconduct and to degrade and convict a citizen who has ventured to plead the cause of the lowly and the poor.

Is it a crime to plead the cause of the widow and the orphan, without money and without price? Is it a criminal libel to say of a demagogue judge that he is a disgrace to the Bench? Is a man to be convicted and imprisoned for saying that tools should not be elected to office, but, rather, that they should be relegated to the oblivion they so richly merit? Is it a crime to censure, denounce, and oppose a Superior Judge whose bosom friends are private detectives and whose ideas of decency and dignity cause him to break into a private meeting and by the presence of an obsequious Sergeant of Police, attempt to overawe and intimidate into silence citizens lawfully assembled to consider their grievances? Time was when men dared not criticize officers, and for so doing patriots' heads were dropped into baskets over the block. But that cruel time has gone, thank God, forevermore. You cannot now stifle just criticism. The letter of our laws and the spirit of our country proclaim the equality of man, and no Superior Judge—not even the President—can terrorize the people by prosecutions for the utterances of honest sentiments, or censure, however severely. We are the inheritors of the past; we have succeeded to and enjoy much from our ancestors. I trust we shall not throw away all they won by their sacrifice and their blood. No, gentlemen; although in moments of pique or anger we may question the utility of free speech and a free press, yet are they vitally essential to a free government and the pure administration of law and justice. And I love to believe and I do believe that principles for which I contend to-day are as full of life and strength as they were when Erskine pleaded in English forums and Fox declaimed in the House of Commons.

Judges of the Law and the Facts.

The mention of these immortal names brings me to consider and to impress upon you what I deem to be a most important legal truth—essential at once to the stability of the Government and the liberty of the citizen—and that truth is, that you twelve men, within the railing of that box, are not only the judges of the facts of this case, but also judges of the law of this case. And I am glad that it is so. Innocence never feared to look into the face of an American jury. Much as I respect the Bench, and much as our forefathers respected the Bench, it is well that in criminal libel cases the jury are the judges of both facts and law. And great as the power of the Judge is, under our system, he dare not invade that sacred place—the exclusive province of the jury. It was because venal judges in the olden time dared to do it, and did do it, against the more ancient and better law and against the protests of patriots, in order to work out the tyranny of English Kings, that by statute of Parliament the law was enacted in England and by Constitution established in this country, that in all criminal libel cases the juries—the people—should be the judge of the law, as well as of the facts. To secure this great protection to the citizen meant a struggle that threatened the throne of England; and had not our forefathers been assured that that protection would be vouchsafed to them, by way of Amendment, the Constitution of the United States never would have been adopted. So important did our fathers regard this privilege. In the old and tyrannical times, when Judges were the pliant tools and creatures of power, the Courts assumed the right to decide that a publication was a libel, and the Judge would say to the Jury: "This publication is a criminal libel; all you have to decide is, whether the defendant published it." What chance for life or liberty had the innocent who had incurred the frown of the King? A corrupt and infamous spy or private detective would set in motion a prosecution against a patriot for criticizing the Crown, or its Ministers, perhaps for pointing out the iniquities of Government or the wrongs done the people. The patriot citizen would be imprisoned and dragged into Court. A corrupt and vile judge, appointed by a vile and venal King, would say to the overawed jury: This is a criminal libel on the Crown, or against the State. The only question for you to decide, is: Did the defendant publish that article, that editorial? That, I repeat, was the only question submitted to the jury. The cowardly or corrupt Judge, cringing before power and seeking to bask in its smile, would declare certain words to be criminally libelous, which were, perhaps, an honest protest against official abuses, and the question of criminal intent, without which there can be no such thing as a crime, was withdrawn from the jury. The Court invaded and usurped the province of the jury, and thus tyranny oppressed the people and undermined and destroyed their liberties.

It was against this encroachment upon the ancient liberties of Englishmen, this infamous subversion and overthrow of the powers of a jury, which enlisted the genius of the great and liberty-loving Erskine and his compatriots. It required his and their united efforts, and the efforts of the patriots of Ireland to get a bill through Parliament, changing this Judge-made law and going back to the more ancient and correct theory—that the jury were the judges of the law in criminal libel cases. Our forefathers who fled from the tyranny of the old world to find liberty in the new, bore with them in their hearts a knowledge of this great principle, so essential to liberty; namely, that in criminal libel cases the jury are the judges of the law, as well as of the facts. This law, as I have heretofore sought to impress forcibly on your minds, is engrafted in the Constitution of the United States and in the Constitution of our State. This law I have sought to impress upon you—not that I am fighting against the Court, not that I think it will in this case or in any other case, attempt to usurp power not rightfully belonging to it—because it knows its province and will not seek to invade yours; but I love to look into the faces of a jury, drawn immediately from the people, and to remind them that they are, after all, the true and best guardians and defenders of free speech and of a free press, and that it is for them to determine what may or may not be said of or concerning candidates for office, or of ad concerning official conduct of our servants, chosen to execute our laws. When the day comes—long may it be deferred—when a citizen cannot express his sentiments on any and all political questions, without fear and without being hounded, pursued and prosecuted, then, indeed, will the light upon Liberty's altar be put out; then, indeed, will we have fallen into the dust and our country be not worth preserving. I impress this great proposition—your power to pass on law and facts—upon you, because from this time on to the close of your deliberations I wish you to feel that you are called here to render a great and important service which includes something more than merely to pass upon facts. You are to determine the law. In and about your deliberations, the Court can advise you, can suggest to you, can give you rules as to the presumption of innocence, as to the law upon the doctrine of reasonable doubt, and upon other matters helpful to you in arriving at your conclusions; but when it comes to the final question as to whether this citizen is guilty of a crime against the people of California for expressing his sentiments, you, and you alone, are the judges—you, and you alone, determine whether a crime has been committed.

The defendant is charged with having published the following words of and concerning J. C. B. Hebbard:

A Worthy Judge Forsooth.

"In another part of the NEWS LETTER appears an article signed by a committee of the People's Home Savings Bank depositors, showing adequate cause why Judge Hebbard should not be re-elected. The statements made in this terrible document will cause every honest man to shrink from voting for a creature who is therein clearly proven to be the enemy of numerous widows and orphans, and morally liable for the loss of their little savings. Is that the sort of man to re-elect Judge? Not so. Intelligent men will learn well the lesson that article teaches, and will see to it that he is removed from the high position he disgraces. If tools are to be elected to the Judiciary, then honest men had better get out of the city. But it will be more natural for us to relegate the tools to the oblivion they so richly merit."

Gentlemen, in view of the testimony in this case, may we not say that this is a mild and temperate censure of official conduct? Are not the opinions therein expressed supported and well-grounded in the facts proved in this Court? And did not the defendant, under the law, have a perfect right, as it was his duty, to communicate that opinion to the people?

And here I beg to read to you from the opinion of a great Judge in a great State—the case of Briggs vs. Garrett, decided by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. This was a case of libel, and among other things the Court said and decided, that the utmost freedom of discussion, touching the qualification and fitness of men for office must be allowed to the citizen. I read from this decision:

"The case narrows itself down to this: Conceding that a public officer, or a candidate for a public office, may not be falsely and maliciously charged with crime, or with anything else injurious to his reputation, have the voters whose suffrages he solicits the right to canvass and discuss his qualifications, openly and freely, without subjecting themselves to fine or imprisonment, or a ruinous suit for damages? If the voters may not speak, write or print anything but such facts as they can establish with judicial certainty, the right does not exist, unless in such form that a prudent man would hesitate to exercise it. Is not the fact that a candidate is charged with crime by reputable citizens, a matter proper for public information?"

And here, gentlemen, you will observe it is in the testimony that 2500 men, women and children were complaining; they were appealing to the people for a redress of their grievances.

"Suppose, in the case in hand, the charge against Judge Briggs had been one for which he might have been indicted. Is it possible that when two or three voters are gathered together, or where two or three hundred are assembled to consider his fitness for his office, the fact that such a charge had been made may not be stated by one voter to the other without the peril of being mulcted in damages in case the charge should subsequently appear to be unfounded? And this for an office for which the incumbent or the candidate should be like Cæsar's wife? A man's reputation may be had upon many points, that it would be difficult to prove. So long as he remains in private life it matters little. But when he becomes a candidate for office, even his private vices become a matter of public concern. There are some official positions as to which the people are properly jealous of the character of those who aspire to them. The judicial office is one of them, and it is not too much to say that there are many private vices which the people would not tolerate, if openly and notoriously indulged in by a judge. They would tear the ermine from his shoulders and hurl him from the bench. If then a candidate be a person of evil repute in the sense that it affects his fitness for the office which he seeks; if respectable citizens honestly so believe and so state, may not such statement be repeated by others in connection with the canvass, at proper times and upon proper occasions without the penalty of a libel suit? If not, we have indeed fallen upon evil times, and our boasted freedom is but a delusion. The principle contended for here, if sustained by this court, would put a padlock upon the mouth of every voter, and intelligent free discussion of the fitness of public men for office would cease. It would be a burden too grievous to be borne, and the people would be swift to reverse our decision, either by an Act of Assembly, or if necessary a change in the organic law.

"Referring to the three tests of privileged communications to which I have already alluded, they will all be found in this case. The occasion was a proper one. The meeting was composed of a body of citizens and voters assembled for this very purpose of considering the merits of candidates for office. At such meeting it certainly was the right, if not the duty, of any person present to state any fact bearing upon the fitness of either of said candidates for the positions they respectively aspired to. The circumstance that one of the candidates had been charged by a reputable citizen with conduct which was not consistent with a proper performance of official duty, was a fact which every elector present had a right to know and state. For aught that appears it was done from a proper motive, and we have already said it was based upon probable cause. It was a mistake, but an honest one, and corrected as soon as discovered. It was a subject of just annoyance to Judge Briggs, and if the law does not furnish him the redress he seeks, it is because of a rule of public policy of far more importance than the inconvenience of a single citizen. That rule requires that free discussion, especially upon political topics and candidates, shall not be so hampered, as to make its exercise dangerous. The rule furnishes no shelter for the malicious libeller of private character, but it will not impute malice to one who honestly acts upon information received from other reputable citizens. We are accustomed so to act in all the affairs of private life, and if we restrain it in public matters, we afford protection to all the rogues and thieves, who may by their own cunning or the negligence of the people, get into public office.

"In the enforcement of all general rules there will always be cases of individual hardship. But this is the sacrifice which the individual must make for the public good just as the soldier is shot down in battle to preserve for others the blessings of free government. Speaking for myself, I would rather endure undeserved reproach, than by any act of mine impair a rule of so much importance to the public welfare. The people, sometimes hasty, are in the end always just, and will not long permit any public man to remain under a cloud, unless it is one of his own raising."

The Supreme Court of the imperial and splendid State of Texas has announced the same broad and wholesome rule in the case of the Express Printing Company vs. Copeland. Permit me to read briefly from the decision in that case, which was one of libel:

"In our form of government, the supreme power is in the people; they create offices and select the officers. Then, in the exercise of this high and important power of selecting their agents to administer for them the affairs of government, are the people to be deprived of the right of discussion and comment respecting the qualification or want of qualification of those who, by consenting to become candidates, challenge the support of the people on account of their peculiar fitness for the office sought? Usually it is by such discussion and comment concerning the qualification of opposing candidates that the people obtain the requisite information to enable them intelligently to exercise the elective franchise. Any abridgment of this right of discussion and comment beyond the limitations heretofore stated, it seems to us, would be extremely unwise. And in this respect the press occupies the same position and should be included in the same category with the people. Public journals are supported by and are published with a view to the dissemination of useful knowledge among the people, and the comments and discussions of these journals are entitled to the same privileges, subject to the same limitations, respecting the qualification and suitability of candidates for office, as those of the people."

Gentlemen, the editorial to which I have invited your attention, and of which the prosecuting witness in this case complains, is the statement of facts which we have proved to be true, and of opinions and sentiments which those facts fully warrant and justify.

What Constituted the Libel.

If, then, gentlemen, this editorial be the expression of the opinion of Mr. Marriott, he is guiltless of crime; for the Constitution guarantees to the citizen absolute freedom to publish his sentiments on public questions. If the language complained of charges the prosecuting witness with specific wrongful and criminal acts, involving and imputing to him moral turpitude, Mr. Marriott is guiltless of crime; for the testimony abundantly establishes the truth of each and all of those charges. Before the State's representatives had paused to consult a dictionary, they told us that the word "creature" was very harmful, that it imputed moral delinquency, that it implied criminality, that to make use of it and apply it to a candidate for office was to be guilty of libel. Why, such a contention is ridiculous and absurd. The Judge of the Court is but the creature of the law; furthermore, he is our creature, and I know he will not take offense when I tell you that he is our servant. And who has not been, at some time of his life, the creature of circumstances? What of the word "tool," used in the editorial? We all know that amounts to nothing. I have said again and again, that a man may be the tool of another, knowingly or unknowingly. A "tool" applied to persons, may be a simple fool or a designing knave. The word, however, as generally used in a light, playful, or sarcastic sense, or by way of ridicule. It does not necessarily impute wrongdoing. The dictionaries show this: the text of the best authors proves it. Mr. Kahn has admitted that there is nothing libelous in the word "creature;" we see there is nothing libelous in the word "tool." And the Court has told us that it is not libelous to say of a Judge that he disgraces the bench. Well, then; if to say of this candidate that he was a "creature" is not a criminal libel; if to say of him that he is the "tool" of others is not a criminal libel; if to say of him as a Judge that he is a disgrace to the Bench is not a criminal libel, what is left in this editorial which makes it such a dangerous and such a criminal publication?

Is it libelous, and a crime, to say that facts have come to light "showing adequate cause why Judge Hebbard should not be re-elected?" Is it libelous to say that "the statements made in this terrible document" (put forth by the Depositors of the People's Home Savings Bank) will cause every honest man to shrink from voting for him? Is it libelous to express the honest opinion that he is "clearly proven to be the enemy of numerous widows and orphans, and morally liable for the loss of their little savings?" Is it libelous to say that intelligent men "will see to it that he is removed from the high position he disgraces?" Is it libelous to say: "If tools are to be elected to the Judiciary, then honest men had better get out of the city?" Finally, was it libelous for Mr. Marriott to say that the conduct and judicial acts of this Judge and candidate were such as should cause him to be "relegated to the oblivion he so richly merits?" If this be criminal libel, how many of us are innocent? Are we not all guilty? For have we not all expressed that sentiment? Do we not all entertain that sentiment now?

In view of the facts which we have dragged into the light of day, and in spite of every effort of the prosecuting witness to suppress them, the editorial in question was altogether too mild, too gentle;—"the punishment did not fit the crime." However, it was the opinion of an elector, touching a candidate for office, and regarding one of his and our servants. That is all; no more, no less.

Would you like to be sitting here as defendant for having said that some candidate was the tool or creature of some vile boss? Would you think it just to be convicted and imprisoned because in discussing the merits of candidates, you had in good faith said that one was the tool or creature of men? Great God! our language was given to us to use—to express, not to conceal, thought. And these are words of common use among common people. I concede that the word "creature," or "tool" may be used by way of censure and to express a feeling of scorn or detestation. Applied to a candidate, it may mean that he is not independent, that he is subservient, that he would do the bidding of corrupt men, his masters, that he would grovel and crawl in the dirt at the feet of wealth or power, that he was devoid of honor and character and manhood. Spoken of a Judge, either word might mean that he would deny justice to the widow and the orphan; that he would prefer the enpurpled rich to the ragged poor—or which is just as bad—decide in favor of the poor and against the rich, when the latter are right. They might mean that the Judge was not upright of heart, pure in character, spotless in private life, or learned in the law. They might mean to convey the idea and the truth that a given Judge was the vilest and most dangerous thing on earth—a political demagogue on the Bench, from which Heaven defend us! On the other hand, these words, spoken by a Judge, might mean that he was a simple, ignorant fellow—a cat-spaw for other men to use, an instrument for designing rogues to play upon. It might be admitted that he was honest, but through over-confidence in his friends was their tool. Yes, gentlemen; a man may be the soul of honor and truth and yet be made the tool of others; his very simplicity makes him unsuspecting; his purity of heart renders him an easy prey for the designs of hypocrites. I am indebted to a learned and eloquent gentleman, whose voice has echoed so often for freedom and good government, and who now sits in this courtroom, for this illustration and this truth. A man whose heart was pure, whose life was spotless, whose services were the greatest ever given to our beloved country, was made a tool by designing ambitious politicians, who sought to gain power by conjuring with a patriot's name. A few years ago, one whose image is in every heart, whose name is on all lips, whose splendid services to his country enthroned him in the affections of a grateful people, whose genius shed immortal lustre on our ever-triumphant flag, was induced by cunning politicians to seek the Presidency for the third time. He failed. And those who loved him most, who speak his name with emotion, said and say, in sorrow and in pity: General Grant, victor in war, lover of peace, was made a tool by ambitious men who sought to accomplish through him their selfish purposes.

Not Libelous if False; Not Libelous if True.

Gentlemen, you cannot presume that a man uses a word in its criminal sense; you must presume that he uses it in a legal and harmless sense; because the presumption is that a man is innocent, not that he is guilty. Presumption, therefore, is that the objectionable words here complained of were used in a proper and legitimate sense, rather than in a criminal sense. The burden is upon the State to show the criminal use of the words in question. And if you will not be offended by my reminding you of it, under your oaths you must presume that the defendant used the words in a proper, legal and harmless sense, rather than in a hurtful and criminal sense. But perhaps it will be said that it was, and is, a criminal libel to say of this candidate that he was the enemy of widows and orphans. Such language is not libelous, even if false; certainly it is not libelous when we know it now to be true. If I see a man aspiring to office whose purposes I think are bad, whose qualifications unfit him, whose principles I deem hurtful to my country, I will oppose him and denounce him as the enemy of my country. If I see a man aspiring to high judicial office whom I deem disqualified by reason of his past life, by reason of his evil associates, by reason of the influences that surround him and control him, I will oppose him, and I will say that he is an enemy, not only of widows and orphans, but to every good citizen. And is Mr. Marriott to be convicted of a crime against the people for saying what you would say, saying what I would say, or what any good citizen might legally, properly and justifiably say? Thus analyzed, thus torn apart, we see that the editorial which seems to have so wounded the sensitive nature of the prosecuting witness is but the simple expression of an opinion, or the truthful statement of facts. And I say that if this defendant is to be convicted for publishing such an editorial, we will have commenced a series of prosecutions which will involve every citizen and engross the time of our courts not only until the Christmas bells are ringing, but from this time forward, from the time one campaign closes until the echoes of the next are heard. If citizens are to be continually dated and prosecuted for the expression of their sentiments upon public questions and public men, then I say in the language of our great judges that liberty in this country is a delusion and the constitution is as brittle as glass, its foundations as insecure and unsafe as quicksand. Such, however, is not the law. If it were the law, I should seek to leave a country whose Declaration of Independence meant nothing, whose constitution was a sham, and whose boasted liberties were the dreams of idealists, not the possession of men. If it be the law, or if there can be found twelve honest men in San Francisco to say that a citizen shall be punished because he opposes with vigor and expresses his sentiments with force and earnestness, a candidate for office, then it were better indeed that we all leave this town. Public censure is a mighty weapon to deter rogues and thieves from plundering the people. Mr. Marriott is charged with saying "if tools are to be elevated to the judiciary, it were better that honest men get out of the city." Is not that true? Is that a sentiment which ineits with your approval or your condemnation? "If tools are to be elevated to the judiciary, then honest men had better get out of the city." Is there anything the matter with that sentiment? What do we want upon the bench? We want learning; we want purity; we want character; we want men above suspicion; we want men about whom there is no rumor even, or suggestion, of wrongdoing; we want good men, with "high erected" thoughts; good men with pure past lives, good men of charitable and merciful natures, fearless and impartial in the discharge of all their duties. We want Judges to whom we can look up with respect and reverence; from whom we may expect and receive justice—men whose private lives are as pure as their ermine is spotless. We don't want political Judges; we don't want ignorant Judges; we don't want Judges of evil temper, whose natures are full of petty spite and vulgar revenge, and enmities, and passions, and all uncharitableness. We don't want Judges who violate the law they are sworn to enforce, who trample upon principles they should uphold, who load their favorites with bounty and deny justice to the poor, receive politicians in their court rooms at dead of night, and turn a deaf ear to the appeals of widows and orphans in open court! We ask for men to sit in judgment whose knowledge of the great body of the law is drawn from years of study, and whose hearts and natures are filled with the true spirit of equity. We want as Judges neither tools, nor creatures, nor demagogues, nor boon companions of private detectives, nor prosecutors of the people. We want Judges wrapped up in honor, whom we can trust, knowing that, if the wealth of the Indies were put into one scale and the tears of a widow into the other,

Truth would have a hearing and Justice would prevail. We want men who, at the termination of their service, might not immodestly or untruthfully say:

"The young men saw me, and hid themselves; and the aged arose and stood up.

"The princes refrained talking, and laid their hand upon their mouth.

"When the ear heard me, then it blessed me, and when the eye saw me, it gave witness to me.

"Because I delivered the poor that cried, and the fatherless, and him that had none to help him.

"The blessings of him that was ready to perish came upon me, and I caused the widow's heart to sing for joy.

"I put on righteousness and it clothed me. My judgment was as a robe and a diadem. I was eyes to the blind, and feet was I to the lame.

"I was a father to the poor, and the cause which I knew not, I searched out.

"And I brake the jaws of the wicked, and plucked the spoil out of his teeth."

How far the prosecuting witness falls below this sublime character of the ideal Judge, this record discloses and the people know!

What are the Facts?

What are the facts, gentlemen, which warrant the opinion expressed in the editorial complained of? What are the facts as they have been developed in this case? What attempt has been made to suppress truth, to conceal facts; and who has attempted to suppress the truth and to conceal the facts? Did I not undertake to reveal them? Did I not call for the books; did I not call for every bit of evidence that would throw light upon every transaction? And who was it that sealed the lips of witnesses and locked the books of this bank? Who was it objected again and again, and was successful in most instances, in keeping the facts from your knowledge? I called Judge Denson to the stand to tell of certain transactions in which the bank was interested. Who was it objected and kept the lips of Judge Denson closed? I called Mr. John Flournoy, one of the most able and one of the purest gentlemen practicing at this bar, and who was it that kept his lips closed and denied and prevented him from telling us why he was dismissed and discharged from his position as attorney for that bank? I called Dr. Harris, who was selected by the depositors in meeting to act as a Director, and who was it that prevented him from telling us what the attorney for the Receiver had said to him, touching his relations with the prosecuting witness? I called Mr. Dickson, also selected to act as one of the Directors of this Bank, and who was it that prevented him from telling what this same attorney had said to him? I called Mr. Benjamin Lucy, who, according to the prosecution, has the singular misfortune and the disgrace of being a poor man. Who was it that prevented him telling us what that private detective had said to him when he visited him at the Union Iron Works? I asked Mr. McCarthy what the attorney for the Receiver had said to him in the office of Mr. Hutton, and who was it that kept the lips of Mr. McCarthy closed? I produced the Minute Book and asked to read the transactions of that July meeting. Who was it objected and prevented you from knowing what then and there transpired? I called for and produced the Cash Book, to ascertain where the money of this bank had gone, and to whom, and for what purposes; and who was it that objected to opening those pages and spreading before you the facts which they revealed? I called for every book and paper and document which would throw light upon these matters, and in every instance the prosecution objected, and for reasons which seemed sufficient to the Court, we were denied the privilege of laying before you many facts which we deemed vital and fully justifying the charges preferred against this candidate. And throughout this whole trial there was and has been the cowardly pretense that the Judge of the Department was ignorant of what he did, and ignorant of the law! Why, the most ragged tramp that walks the dusty roads in the San Joaquin is presumed to know the law, and is held liable for the consequences of his voluntary acts. And here have been told that a Judge upon the bench is not to be presumed to know the facts about which he enters important decrees, makes important orders; not presumed to know the law which he is charged with administering. We have been told that he is not presumed to know anything that he does; that he does nothing but sit upon the bench like an automaton, worked by a string pulled by some one else! And when his official conduct is brought into question, when his acts are being scrutinized, when the reasons for his decrees or orders are being inquired into, he throws around him the cowardly barrier of ignorance! In this case, you are asked to believe that he did not know what his Receiver was doing; did not know what his attorney was doing; did not know how they were trampling upon the hearts of widows and orphans, how they were throwing their defenders out of the Bank building, and traducing men who had toiled for their money and who were seeking to guard and husband it; did not know that men were dismissed from office who had been willing to resign; did not know that fraud and trickery, misrepresentation and chicanery had been indulged in to gain and to keep control of a bank whose management and assets should have been turned over to the watchful care of the depositors! You are asked to believe, gentlemen, through all these days and weeks and months of agitation, of appeals, this Judge had ears and heard not; had eyes and saw not! You are asked to determine that it is honorable to make a promise and break it; to appoint a receiver against the law; to appoint him a second time without authority, to appoint him a third time without a pretense of authority; and finally, to discharge him without an accounting! In some countries it might be a crime to criticize such a Judge; but not in this country. In Turkey, in Russia, or in other despot governments it might be a crime to criticize a Czar, or a Sultan, or a Judge, for this reprehensible conduct; but in this country it cannot be a crime to express your detestation for such conduct, whether the person guilty of it be a Justice of the Peace, a Superior Judge, or the President of the United States.

Home Savings Bank Scandal.

I again repeat that if you wish to find a reason which prompted this editorial, you will find it in the facts proved in this case. Against law, in the face of the decisions of our Supreme Court, and directly in the face of a late decision of Judge Ross, of the United States District Court for the Southern District of California, this prosecuting witness, on the first of May, 1891, appointed a Receiver and turned over to him all the assets of the Peoples Home Savings Bank. A complaint had been filed wherein many charges were made against the then Directors, all of whom have since been acquitted and vindicated by juries of honorable citizens, called to look into and pass upon their conduct as Directors of that bank. The attorneys for the bank at that time claimed that the lower court had no power to appoint a Receiver of the bank's property, and their contention was upheld by the unanimous decision of the Supreme Court. At the time of appointing the Receiver, the Court also granted a certain injunction, about which we have heard so much. The injunction was so broad and so sweeping that the Directors were prevented from meeting as a Board of Directors for any purpose whatsoever. The depositors were clamoring against them; the depositors were angry, hostile and aggressive, and they demanded that the Directors lay down the trust which, it was alleged, had been by them grossly violated. In other words, the depositors demanded that the old Board of Directors resign; and, gentlemen, they were willing and anxious to resign. The injunction, however, stood in the way. They were threatened with severe punishment by the Judge if they met for any purpose or transacted any business, however lawful and however necessary for the welfare of the bank, and were in so many terms commanded not to meet for the purpose of resigning. The Judge of the Court, who had appointed the Receiver and granted this sweeping and binding injunction, was then appealed to by the depositors. An interview was held in the Judge's chambers in this very building. The testimony is absolutely uncontradicted that he then and there, pretending to be anxious to serve the depositors, promised to make an order modifying that injunction, so as to permit the old board to meet, resign, and elect their successors. But, it was suggested that they might meet and resign and elect their creatures as successors, and thereby continue their power. Therefore it was agreed between the Judge and all parties in interest, that if the depositors' committee of seven, would meet and decide upon a new Board that was suitable to them, he, the Judge, would modify the injunction, to the end that the old Board might retire and the new Board, a majority of whom, at least, might be depositors, or selected by the depositors' committee, might take charge of this sinking bank. It is in evidence that thereupon a meeting of the depositors' committee, with the counsel then representing the bank, did take place. This meeting resulted in an amicable selection of six gentlemen, all of whom were men above reproach, and all of whom were willing and expressed their willingness to serve as Directors. The names of the gentlemen agreed upon were: Mr. P. B. Flint, the wool merchant; Mr. J. K. Wilson, of Wells, Fargo Express Co.; Mr. S. A. McDonnell, the druggist; Dr. H. M. Logan, Dr. Frederick W. Harris and George W. Dickson, President of various building and loan societies. The seventh gentleman who was acceptable to all parties in interest was a member of the old Board—a man who was, and has been, abused, misrepresented and outraged, more, perhaps, than any other man in this city, but a man upon whom I look and regard as one of the truest Christian gentlemen that ever engaged in charity or Christian work. I refer to Charles Montgomery. If there be one genuine, true Christian in this town—one who has gone, and will go, down into the gutter to lift up the fallen and to put hope into the heart of the despairing; one who goes among thieves and robbers, the outcast and the abandoned, into the brothels, into the dives of iniquity and sin, to rescue men and girls and boys from paths of evil and moral death; one who exemplifies in his work the teachings of Christ—that man is and was Charles Montgomery.

So it was agreed that these seven gentlemen should constitute the new Board of Directors. And I invite your attention to a most significant fact: The attorney for the Receiver, who theretofore had affected to be friendly with the depositors, was informed of the names that had been agreed upon to succeed the old Board of Directors. Thereupon, as we now know, that attorney immediately called upon Dr. Harris to make certain inquiries of him. Dr. Harris was prevented by the objection of the prosecution from telling us what the attorney had said; but you may well imagine what he said from subsequent developments. The attorney for the Receiver then called upon Mr. Dickson; and you can well imagine his purpose. Thereafter, pursuant to notice, the matter of modifying this sweeping injunction came up in open court. The attorney for the plaintiff was present, the attorneys representing the bank were there, the depositors' committee represented by counsel was there; and all joined in asking the court to carry out its agreement and modify the injunction to the extent promised. These depositors, through their counsel, represented nearly three-quarters of a million dollars—over half of the total liabilities of the bank. They asked for, they demanded representation on the board, and the court had promised to give it to them. Indeed, it was in pursuance to that promise, as I have said, that the meeting was held and the new Board agreed upon. Had one word been said against the character or the fitness of the men selected? Was there one word against Mr. Flint, or Mr. McDonnell, or Mr. Wilson, or Dr. Logan, or Dr. Harris, or Mr. Dickson, or Mr. Montgomery? No one in interest had said one word against them because they stood above reproach and enjoyed the confidence of men.

The Court Dishonored its Promise.

And so, counsel and depositors and all parties, other than those in the secrets of the court, confidently expected that the injunction would be modified and the troubles be at an end. But in that court there was enacted a scene which aroused the righteous indignation of every honest man. The Court, disregarding its promise, in the face of the fact that the old Directors sought to lay down their trust, had expressed their willingness to resign, and had, in fact, put their resignations in writing—that Court, turning a deaf ear to the depositors' appeal, refused absolutely to keep its promise and modify the injunction; and so refused, and so violated its promise, either upon its own motion or at the request and at the behest of the Receiver whom he had appointed and the attorney who represented him.

Why did he refuse to modify that injunction, gentlemen? Subsequent events and developments tell us why. Consider for a moment the situation then. Upon the one hand was the old Board, hounded, assaulted, charged with all manner of crimes, called upon to resign, threatened with violence if they did not resign, and begging for the poor privilege of meeting that they might retire, having lost the confidence of the depositors. Upon the other hand, there stood the depositors who should have been, and had a right to be represented, whose wishes should have been respected, asking that the Court permit the old Board to meet and resign, to the end that the depositors might have representation and control of the affairs of the bank. And the Court turned a deaf ear to all, except the Receiver and those who represented him,

In the meantime, however, an appeal had been taken to the Supreme Court, the object of which was to have declared void the order appointing the Receiver. To defeat that proceeding, we now know, that in the dead of night, without authority, without power to do so, the Court, upon the application of the attorney for the Receiver and without notice to any one, appointed John F. Sheehan for a second time Receiver of this corporation. So that, when the unanimous decision of the Supreme Court reversing and annulling the first appointment was handed down, lo and behold, the Receiver was in possession under the second appointment! And so, the old Board of Directors, against their wish and the wish of the depositors, was prevented from meeting and could not resign. Although they were advised that they might safely disregard the injunction of the Court, it being utterly null and void, still, out of deference to the Court and fearing contempt proceedings, they did not venture to disregard the injunction. A proceeding was instituted in the Supreme Court to set aside and annul the second appointment of the Receiver. Then a scheme was set on foot to remove the old Board; and we know now from the lips of Mr. Livernash and other gentlemen what the Supreme Court never knew—we know how that meeting was brought about and the old Board removed. Why, the very Receiver and his attorney, who should have been absolutely impartial, and no more take sides than the Judge upon the bench, engineered and carried out the whole transaction—prepared and published the notice calling the stockholders' meetings; got possession of and voted stock which was fraudulent; and dismissing the old Board, elected successors to do their bidding. We see it all now. Having elected the new Board, the purpose of these conspirators was revealed. They put into the office of Secretary the then Receiver of the bank, and substituted his attorney as the attorney for the bank. Then they went before the Judge of that Department and had the attorney for the Receiver substituted on the record as the attorney for the bank; so that he stood in the double position of attorney for both Receiver and corporation! The purpose of this movement was, to enable this attorney to go to the Supreme Court and he substituted there as the attorney for the bank, and then dismiss as he did dismiss, the petition there of the bank, so that the Supreme Court would have no chance to pass on the order appointing the Receiver for the second time. Thus, and in this way, could the new Board so elected retain its grasp on the assets of the bank; and thus, and in this way, were the depositors denied any representation.

Juggling of the Appointments.

Prior to this last move, however, and fearing that there might be a reversal of the order making the second appointment, these same parties caused to be commenced a third suit; and the Receiver was appointed for the third time. Having got control of the Board of Directors in the manner which you know, there was no one to petition the Court for the reversal of the order making the third appointment. I remind you that the Receiver was first appointed and took possession of the bank's property on May 1st, 1891. He continued to hold possession as Receiver up to the month of January, 1895, when, it seems, having in the meantime been elected Secretary of the bank, having in the meantime got control of the Board of Directors, he desired to be discharged as Receiver and to have his bondsman exonerated. Gentlemen, what do you think of the action of the Court in discharging that Receiver and exonerating his bondsman? It seems that his accounts had been passed upon and approved. By whom? By a Board of Directors who had been chosen through his own influence, and by the use of means which must have amazed and shocked you as they were related by Mr. Livernash! What do you think of the so-called accounting which he filed in Court? It was not even sworn to, nor did he appear in Court in person to swear or testify to its correctness. But there were others in Court. There was Mr. Spelling, who represented somebody in interest, and who objected to a discharge of the Receiver upon a so-called accounting, which he pointed out was utterly insufficient in point of law. There was Mr. Bartnett, representing the California Safe Deposit & Trust Co., the assignee of some twenty-eight hundred depositors, who then and there asked the Court not to discharge the Receiver, but to require of him a full, proper and itemized statement of receipts and disbursements, a full and legal report of his stewardship. Observe the so-called accounting was not sworn to; nor was the Receiver present in person to verify it as correct. Both of these gentlemen asked the Court to continue the matter and to order the Receiver to make a proper accounting. To all of these reasonable and proper requests, the Judge of that department, the prosecuting witness here, turned his deaf ear; to all of these requests he would not listen, and discharged the Receiver and exonerated his bondsman. Why did he do these things? You will answer by your verdict. During all this time, and throughout all these proceedings, the depositors, represented by their committee of seven gentlemen, were protesting, were passing resolutions, were on communicating their wishes to the Court, and when they asked for bread he gave them a stone!

I wish now to consider the relations existing between these two men, and to inquire whether the prosecuting witness, in whose court all these cases were pending knew of these abuses. I say, gentlemen, that common sense and common experience teach us that the Court knew, as we know he did know, he must have known—he ought to have known—of everything that the Receiver and his attorneys and advisors did during and throughout that whole period from May 1, 1894, to January, 1895. Don't suppose for a moment that because he was elected Secretary of the bank at the meeting held in July, 1894, this Receiver did not have possession of all the assets of that corporation from May 1, 1894, to January, 1895. He did have possession of them, according to the record and according to the law, from the time he took possession up to the time of his discharge, or up to a few days before the order discharging him.

When we undertook to find out what that Receiver and his advisers had done during that period of eight months, we were met by the objections that the Court was not aware of his actions, and, therefore, could not be bound by them. Whether in point of fact he did know of each and all the illegal acts of the Receiver, we have claimed throughout this case that the Court was morally responsible and morally liable for the acts of the Receiver, and, therefore, morally responsible and morally liable for the losses that accrued to the widows and orphans whose property was in his keeping. We have said that the Court was the "creature" through whom these men worked out their purposes. We have said that he was the "tool," without which they could not have accomplished their designs, and we have said, and do say, that he was and is morally responsible and liable for the losses suffered. It is a monstrous doctrine—a reflection upon the Bench—to say that a Judge can shut his eyes to the appeals of men and women, and thereby permit wrongs to be done to them, and then claim that he was ignorant of the facts, and seek to escape moral liability. From May 1, 1894, to January, 1895, and later on, we find that certain men were appointed to place and power in this bank, who were the particular political and social friends of that Judge; and that in spite of all protest, in spite of all appeals, in spite of every effort, they continued to hold positions of emolument, either as Receiver or as Secretary, or as agent for the sale of all the real property of that corporation. And never to this day has that Receiver and Secretary and agent been called upon by the Court for a proper and legal accounting!

Who is this great "General" who, if he ever smelt gunpowder, smelt it on some dress parade on a peaceful May day; or, perhaps, mounted on some charger on the Fourth of July? Who is this great Receiver-General? What services did he perform, what abilities had he displayed, which so commended him to the Court, and qualified him to take charge of a great banking institution? The record tells us that he belongs to that very plentiful class in California known as professional office-holders.

Denied the Prayer of Widow and Orphan.

Gentlemen, you remember, and will not soon forget, the startling testimony of Edward J. Livernash. Able lawyer, clever journalist, clear-eyed and brave-hearted, he told you how these conspirators—bogus Generals and office-loving Colonels—gained a victory over the depositors, and held control of this bank. According to the low conceptions of duty of the person who addressed you yesterday, Mr. Livernash was guilty of some impropriety in defending R. H. McDonald, Jr. Mr. Livernash told you that he was at that time the attorney of McDonald; nor did he insult and disgrace his profession by apologizing for defending a man accused of crime. Is there a doubt in your minds as to the entire truth of every word he uttered? He told you how he, as the attorney for McDonald, sought to cooperate with and aid the depositors in modifying the sweeping injunction, and inducing the old Board to resign, and in gaining control of the bank at the July meeting of stockholders; and he told you how his every effort, so worthy and so honorable, was thwarted and defeated by men who should have been fair and impartial. And during all these disgraceful proceedings—outrages on decency—the worthy Judge looked on, nor stayed the hands of those who were striking down the widow and the orphan. If the testimony, or any word, of Mr. Livernash was false, why did you this great Fourth-of-July General and May Day warrior, this Three-Times-Receiver, come upon the stand and deny it? If what Mr. Livernash told you was not true, why not confront him with that lawyer, who at one and the same time was attorney for plaintiff, attorney for defendant, and attorney for Receiver, in a litigation pending before this prosecuting witness? Why not deny and disprove the ugly things with which they were charged? Gentlemen, they dared not; they could not; and they sought the poor protection of silence. Mr. Livernash threw light on those dark transactions, of which the Court had knowledge or means of knowing, and no one has dared to come forward to explain or deny.

The old Board of Directors were bound hand and foot, like slaves in the shambles, and prevented from even resigning, while the Court permitted these conspiring villains to call a meeting to remove them from office and elect as their successors the creatures of the Receiver! The Court had been deaf to the law, deaf to appeal, deaf to entreaty. Petitioned in open court to modify his own void order of injunction—petitioned by depositors, women and children, by lawyers, by the Committee of Seven, the Judge sat there, denied the prayer of the poor, and allowed his own favorite appointee to plan and scheme to secure control of that bank. Yes, in spite of the efforts of Mr. Livernash; in spite of the efforts of the old Board; in spite of the efforts of their attorneys (if you will pardon me for alluding to Mr. Delmas and myself); in spite of the efforts of the Depositors' Committee; in spite of us all, the Court would not move. Think of it. And then, when these poor people went into Court complaining, or as American citizens dared to lay their grievances before the public, and to express their sentiments on his outrageous and infamous conduct, this Judge goes into the darkness of a Grand Jury room and causes seven of them to be indicted! Gracious God! Indict the strong, the powerful; don't strike down the helpless and the poor! And this honest, this "worthy Judge, forsooth," who denied the prayer of the widow and the orphan, now permits, now urges on attorneys to stand in this Court and traduce and vilify their champions and defenders—the Committee of Seven. Do you believe that Mr. McCarthy—you saw and heard him, gray-haired, one-armed teacher in our public schools, honored, respected, loved—was seeking to loot or "hog" that bank—to repeat the vulgar language which was used here yesterday? Do you think that Mr. Lucy, honest, straight-forward workman, was seeking to plunder widows when he acted on that Committee? Do you think that Mr. Pike, intelligent and courageous, burning with righteous indignation, was a scoundrel when he acted for the depositors? Do you believe that Mr. Williams, Mr. Conant, Mr. Kendall, Mr. Casavaw, and Mr. Qualman are each and all thieves because they acted the part of brave men and spoke the words of fearless men? Do you discredit them because they were indicted through the instrumentality of a coward, who went into the secret chambers of a Grand Jury to swear away their reputation and liberty, but dared not confront them here, in the broad light of day, from the witness stand?

Looting the Bank.

Why did he not modify that injunction and permit the depositors to take control and place on the Board of Directors the names of the well known and honorable gentlemen agreed upon? You remember their names—Mr. Fliut, Mr. Wilson, Mr. McDonnell, Mr. Dickson, Dr. Harris, Dr. Logan, and Mr. Montgomery. Why not let them take charge of the bank? The answer is, because the Court knew that that Board would not perpetuate in office the Receiver and his friends. Were the Generals, and the Colonels, and the politicians, and the office-holders—were they the only men who knew how to run banks and conduct business affairs? And when Mr. Livernash sought to have the Crocker-Woolworth National Bank or the Anglo-Californian Bank take charge of and conduct the liquidation of the Peoples Home Savings Bank, why did the Judge of that department not co-operate with, and assist him in carrying out that very desirable plan? Why did the Court prefer this cheap and ignorant office-holder, this May Day General, instead of putting the affairs of that bank into the hands of a corporation such as Mr. Livernash suggested? Had the Court not given his favorite enough? Had he not appointed him referee and allowed him some $11,000.00 for his services? We know now that without any order of Court and in direct violation of law, this great Receiver-General took $4000 from the Peoples Home Savings Bank for a few months' looking on and looking wise. We know that the money was taken during the period of a void Receivership, and we know that the Court against the protest of men in interest, discharged him upon the pretense that that Board of Directors which he himself had called into being, had passed upon and found his accounts to be correct. How much more was paid to him, we were prevented from proving; for you remember that when we began to investigate his accounts, the prosecution would not permit us to open the books of that corporation. How much more he was paid while Secretary, we were not permitted to prove. How much more he has been paid, or is to be paid, for acting as agent for the sale of the real property of that little bank, we do not know; for the prosecuting witness closed the door on inquiry in that direction. How much this Receiver's attorneys or the Directors received out of the funds of that bank we do not know; and for the same reason—a padlock was put upon the books. But we have it in the record that thousands of dollars were illegally paid to this Receiver, because the Supreme Court decided that his appointment was utterly null and void. And I beg to remind you again, gentlemen, that it was after the Supreme Court had so decided that the prosecuting witness here authorized and approved this illegal payment of money to the Receiver.

Gentlemen, it makes me indignant to think that men of the character of Mr. McCarthy, Mr. Conant, Mr. Williams, Mr. Jenkins, Mr. Kendall, and their associates, having been outraged in the past, should now be denounced in this Court as vile persons, when their object was open and above board and their only aim and desire the preservation of the assets of that bank. Observe, they did nothing in secret. They did not go at night to Court for ex parte orders; they did not draft blanket resolutions, passing upon the accounts of a Receiver, nor discharge him without an accounting; they did not violate promises; they did not deny justice; they did not, like cowards, sneak into Grand Jury rooms; they did not employ private detectives; they did not invade and attempt to break up meetings of gentlemen. They acted the part of brave, honest and fearless men, and as such they stand before you, unimpeached and unimpeachable.

A Fatal Comparison.

But what is this prosecution, gentlemen. Is it a crime to say of a Judge who will gather about him a gang of cheap politicians and office-holders, and under false pretenses break into a meeting where gentlemen are assembled, to over-awe free men and to stifle free speech—is it a crime for men to say that such a judge, guilty of such outrageous conduct, is a disgrace to the bench, if he is not a disgrace to humanity? What do you think of that performance at the Bush-street theatre? What do you think of that stenographer of his court going there under false pretenses as a spy to take down the proceedings? What do you think of the Clerk of his Court going under false pretenses, to assist in breaking up that meeting? What do you think of the Receiver and one of the Directors attempting to get into that meeting through false pretenses? What do you think of the Judge, who, forgetting the dignity of his station, called in a Sergeant of Police to force his way without right into that meeting of indignant citizens? Can you imagine Chief Justice Beatty engaged in such a disgraceful adventure? Can you imagine Judge Coffey or Judge Seawell or any other of our honorable Judges, taking part in such a cowardly affair? That whole proceeding and the part played by the prosecuting witness here were characteristic of low-browed and ignorant political strikers, rather than of a dignified, pre-mind, upright Judge of our Superior Court. And yet, because these citizens who have lost their money, who have been denied a hearing, who had been refused a place on the directory, who had been denounced and thrown out by the Receiver, the servant and the creature of the court itself, whose rights had been trampled on, whose petitions had been ignored—because these men expressed their indignation and commented upon official misconduct seven of them stand indicted upon statements made by this prosecuting witness in the secret Grand Jury room. And because Mr. Marriott expressed his sentiments, and gave the depositors a hearing before the people, he stands indicted, and it is asked that you find him guilty of a crime.

Gentlemen, as for myself personally, when the time comes that I shall feel it necessary to turn aside to answer the criticisms or the comments of men, when I feel that the time has come when it is necessary for me to go into court and indict men in order that I may vindicate myself, I trust that I shall meet with such a reception as I hope and believe this prosecuting witness will meet with here. When a man is conscious of his own rectitude, and of the purity of his own purpose, when he knows the truth and dares to stand by it or to fall with it, he does not fear the criticisms of men or of newspapers. As was said in the Pennsylvania case, "The people, sometimes hasty, are in the end always just, and will not long permit any public man to remain under a cloud, unless it is one of his own raising." Thus far in life, I have followed, and shall continue to be guided by the advice of Lord Wolsey to Cromwell:

Cherish those hearts that hate thee;
Corruption wins not more than honesty.
Still in thy right hand carry gentle peace,
To silence envious tongues; Be just, and fear not;
Let all the ends thou aim'st at be thy country's,
Thy God's, and truth's.

Gentlemen, Mr. Marriott is charged with saying that the prosecuting witness was the enemy of numerous widows and orphans. Apart from his past conduct, what is he doing now? What has he done, and what is he doing to their champions? What has he done, and what is he doing to the Committee of Seven, who speak for them and represent them? Indicting them, pursuing them, hounding them—poor men as they are—following them into courts with criminal prosecutions!

Proved Every Allegation.

Gentlemen, the defendant stands here charged with a crime. He is presumed to be innocent. It is for the State to establish his guilt—to establish every proposition essential to a criminal libel. But it is for you to determine what a criminal libel is. It is for you to determine what a citizen may speak of and concerning a candidate for public office. It is for you to determine whether this Judge was morally liable for things that took place. It is for you to determine whether these depositors were justified in opposing his candidacy. This you will determine. Neither libelous, neither malicious, this editorial is the expression of an honest man's opinion touching this particular candidate, and every fact that we set out to prove we have proved. "Creature," "tool," "enemy of numerous widows and orphans," "morally liable for the loss of their little savings," "a disgrace to the Bench"—these, and more, we have proved this prosecuting witness to be. We have justified, and we may safely rest. You know the story; I think you understand it. I think you understand how the first, second and third appointments of Receiver were made; how the old Board was willing to resign; how the Court agreed that they should resign; how they met and agreed upon a new Board; how the Court refused to modify the injunction; how the meeting was called in July to remove the old Board and to elect a new one; how, in January, the Receiver was discharged without any legal accounting, and how these men, by the active assistance or silent acquiescence of this prosecuting witness, have held control of that bank from May 1, 1894, down to the present moment. I think you understand how the depositors have struggled and fought in vain for representation or control on that Board of Directors. I think you understand all this, perhaps quite as well and remember the story just as distinctly as I do. I have only to ask you to render unto others what you would have measured out to yourselves, and I have only to ask you to do what we have been taught is right in morals as it is just in law—"Do unto others as ye would that others should do unto you." And unless you are ready to determine that the citizen has no right to express his opinion upon public questions, and unless you are willing to deny to others a privilege which you demand for yourselves, you must acquit this defendant. Gentlemen, is this to be the beginning of a long series of political prosecutions? We have seven now of these depositors indicted, and Mr. Marriott is on trial for championing the cause of the poor and helpless. Is this worthy Judge to go on and indict the rest of the depositors, or indict others of the committee, or indict other citizens who have opposed his candidacy in the last campaign? Is that the programme? If so, where is this thing to end?

Important Principles at Stake.

I have necessarily detained you long; but I have not discussed the matter in greater detail than I deemed the interests of my client demanded and the importance of the case warranted. I do not apologize to you for performing my duty; but I thank you for your thoughtful attention. The case, I said at the outset, is of great importance—important because of the principles at stake. These principles are alive to-day. They may perish; but I trust in God not at your hands. These principles which are by the State attacked and by me defended, have been fought out for five hundred years by the labor and valor of our ancestors. The moment it is established that we cannot criticize public officers and candidates for office, that moment liberty in the true sense perishes in this country. I do not upon bended knee ask you for merciful consideration. No, no; I ask you for a just, fearless, American consideration of this cause. This is our country, and if there be anything in it worth preserving it is free speech and a free press, and free speech and a free press, to be of any value, include the right of freely and openly commenting upon and censuring public servants. These rights and privileges we must not sacrifice under any circumstances, or at anybody's request or demand. No harm has come to any human being from this publication or from the expression of opinion here complained of; but a great harm, a mortal hurt, may come to us and to our country if you, confused by sophistry or inflamed by passion, shall feel it your duty to say that the citizen shall be punished for expressing his opinion. I feel satisfied that you will not take such a narrow view of this case or the questions involved. I want you to remember that you sit here as your forefathers sat, defending the true principles of liberty, and that you are to decide the law and the facts in this criminal libel case. Each one of you must be a judge for himself, each one of you is answerable to his own conscience, answerable to his country, and answerable to God, for the verdict he renders. Although I hope and believe that, under the law and the evidence, you must and will speedily send Mr. Marriott back to the wife of his bosom, back to his home and his labor, (I have a right to expect it), I do earnestly ask it of you as a citizen, interested as much as any one else in the laws and their enforcement. Acquit him promptly; rebuke this prosecuting witness; condemn him and his confederates, and vindicate the true principles of our government. I ask you to do this in the name of the law, in the name of justice, in the name of these widows and orphans whose property has been squandered, in the name of these seven honorable men who have been traduced and indicted because they took up the cause of the poor and spoke their honest sentiments concerning official misconduct. I ask you to acquit Mr. Marriott on behalf of yourselves, and on behalf of every citizen in this State. Determine for all time by your verdict that there can be no such thing in this State or in this country as political prosecutions for the expression of political opinion.

Gentlemen, I have done. On behalf of the defendant, whose cause I now leave with you, on behalf of myself for the patient attention you have been pleased to accord me, I again return to you my grateful thanks, and await, not without confidence, a verdict which I believe will be approved by all the people.

THE Supervisors are indulging in a criticism of the Board of Health. Perhaps they are doing this to get even on the taxpayers who are in the habit of saying uncomplimentary things of the Honorable Supervisors with far greater cause.

MAYOR Phelan says that he will probably sign the high hat ordinance. Speaking of the proposed law he said: "Whatever may be its weak points, I am of opinion that its moral effects will be felt." The high hats, unlike the ordinance, have no weak points. The trouble is, they are all adult, well-grown, clearly defined, and in aggressive evidence. The Mayor may feel certain the proposed law will promote morality. Men will forget their thirst between acts and cease swearing during the play.

THE great Craven-Fair case is drawing out a vast deal of expert testimony in handwriting. Mr. Max Gumpel, a resident of this city, and who has for many years figured as an expert in all the great local will cases whenever such testimony has been necessary, is one of the principal witnesses; and in his appearance before the jury is demonstrating a remarkable knowledge of the theory and bases of value of such testimony. He is particularly skillful at practical illustrations, and his blackboard tracings are one of the features of this important case.

WHEN Adolph Kutner, the California millionaire and philanthropist, presented himself at the Russian Legation in Washington the other day, and was refused the vising of his passport by the Charge d'Affairs, he was doubtless very much surprised and chagrined. Accumulation of wealth, a position of influence, and the respect of his fellow-citizens in California should be a sufficient endorsement to admit a man into any country where civilization is even partially recognized. The Czar of all the Russias ought to amend his laws so that men of honorable station in life could call upon him without fear of a trip to Siberia. Kutner is a better man than the Czar of Russia, and we can prove it.

WHEN General Dimond was among us he gave his energies and unremitting efforts up to business; and in the course of his honored life accumulated a moderate fortune, which at his untimely death was divided equitably among his children. Not millions were so divided, but an abundance for their comfort, and even luxury. This being true, it is with regret, not unmixed with surprise, that those who knew and loved him see that the heirs of the General have permitted his good name to be drawn into a scandal in the hope that a few extra thousands may be added to the bequests he made. The life insurance, for which suit has been brought by a once-named beneficiary of General Dimond, is hardly worth enough to his children to permit its inevitable consequent scandal. If he were alive, it is unlikely that he would value the $10,000 in issue as of sufficient importance to justify the parade in courts and public print of the circumstances from which this action springs. Without respect to exact material justice—waiving the final distinctions which may have influenced General Dimond in this matter—the friends of his memory, who are legion in this State and wherever he was known, can look on this spectacle only with profound regret.

CLAUS Spreckels has given a practical turn to the efforts now being made to colonize the poor of the city on country lands. The six hundred acres which he proposes to turn over to the colonists is adapted to sugar beet culture. If the theory pans out in practice the labor question will be nearer a solution in this State than ever before, and the Sugar King will have produced another reason for calling him Santa Claus.

THE earth has not yet settled upon the grave of our honored fellow-citizen; but already is the air filled with intrigues, and the wires between San Francisco and Washington made hot with telegrams planning and plotting for the shoes of Frauk McCoppin. The office-seeker is a sort of ghoul who has neither self-respect nor ability. He is oblivious of contempt, and to him true dignity of character is a thrice-sealed volume.

THE Pacific Mail Steamship Company is adding to its Trans-Pacific service. The company desires to meet more than half-way the Japanese vessels soon to be laid on regularly between San Francisco and Yokohama, but it does not wish to cut rates. San Francisco can endure a cutting of rates of transportation with equanimity, even joy, in all directions excepting Hades, Hougkong, Yokohama, et als; but for these ports they cannot be too high to our liking.

IT will be in order for the University Regents to explain why they paid Attorney Julius Kahn twelve hundred and fifty hard dollars for services which it is not apparent that gentleman performed at the last Legislature. The fact is, the whole system of lobbying is bad, and usually operates as a premium upon dishonesty. The Regents should explain. It is obvious that Mr. Kahn will not: being the chief and perhaps only beneficiary of their unusual generosity, his modesty will keep him silent.

AT last the great Blythe case has been settled. Fourteen years have passed since Thomas H. Blythe joined the innumerable caravan, and the final disposition of his estate has just been determined. In view of the location of the property and its increase in value, Mrs. Florence Blythe Hinckley will have something left to remind her pleasantly of her father's sound business judgment after the lawyers have been paid. There is consolation to the profession in the fact that this is the bright particular exception which proves the general rule of universal disappearance through legal absorption.

A. S. BALDWIN recently returned from an Eastern trip, and in response to an interviewer said: "If our people, instead of continually harping on the 'dollar limit,' would go and see what other cities are doing to add to the comfort and enjoyment of their inhabitants in the construction of superb boulevards and new parks, it would arouse some civic pride in their breasts. The proper sort of economy in the administration of the city government is all right, but I tell you strangers won't come to San Francisco to see the 'dollar limit,' and the sooner we realize and appreciate the importance of spending money, not extravagantly, but liberally, for the beautifying of our city the sooner we will have good times." There is more good hard, practical sense in this admirable avowal of Mr. Baldwin than was ever dreamed of in the moldy philosophy of all the aggregated silurians of this city. The "dollar limit" has too long been worshiped as the salvation of the city and the safeguard of the mossback brigade. The fact that the policy outlined by Mr. Baldwin might produce a few deaths from paralysis of the pocket should hasten its practical adoption.

THE TRUTH ABOUT THE CUBAN INSURGENTS.

THERE has all along been a mystery about the Cuban insurgents. Who and what are they? They fight no battles, make no progress, and pretty nearly all the reports favorable to them emanate from a New York syndicate, which, with large promises, has secured more or less press support in this country. But the truth is beginning to leak out. The Boston Transcript prints the reports of two tried correspondents, one from an Eastern and Democratic newspaper, and the other representing a Western and Republican journal. They have recently returned from Cuba, where both men spent some months quietly but thoroughly investigating the real situation. Each found a way to go everywhere and see everything. They agree that there is no army, to be properly described as such, representing the so-called Cuban Government, which cannot be found, and has no existence, except, perhaps, in the aforesaid syndicate in this country. What there is of an insurgent force is formed of bands of brigands, which have for years flourished in Cuba, living off natives and Spanish indifferently. They are pelf seekers, and anything but liberty-loving heroes. There has been "warfare," if the term is to be used at all, against these brigands, but the facility with which they are summoned for action, to be speedily dissolved upon the approach of an organized force of police or soldiers, makes it extremely difficult to come up to them in a body, or to capture or punish them except in detail. The Cuban insurgents are lawless thieves, worse than the moonshiners, who descend from the mountain passes of the South to dispose of their unlawful wares, and steal their way back again, and not at all unlike the early Higblanders of Scotland, who made such frequent and devastating raids upon the flocks and herds of the Lowlanders. The Cuban insurgents do not, it is admitted, include the business or property owning inhabitants of the island. They are lawless mercenaries, who live on what they can pick up by the way, and upon what the schemers in this country can send them. Yet these are the heroes over whom our Senate waxes eloquent, and would violate treaties with a weak but friendly power, and even throw down the gage of battle!

According to both these correspondents, there is nothing to recognize. No head, no cabinet, no responsible men, no seat of government, and nothing but detached bands of brigands, who are here to-day and gone to-morrow. They are much like Geronimo's band of Arizona Indians, who gave General Miles and his sturdy soldiers so much and so prolonged and arduous a struggle. They refuse to stay and be caught. Their knowledge of the fastnesses of the country gives them an immense advantage over the regular troops. If we want Cuba, let us, in the name of all that is creditable, say so, appraise its value, pay the price, and take it. But let us cease this long drawn out pretense of helping an independent and brave people to gain self-government and freedom. To talk of extending belligerent rights to such half-savage knights of the road, is as much like Mexico extending aid and comfort to Geronimo's band, as are two peas. Neither of the correspondents sees any hope for Cuban achievement of independence, and are not clear as to how the trouble can be ended unless the hands are captured and deported, as was Geronimo's. They are agreed that the circumstances are so peculiar that the insurgents may be able to keep up their desultory resistance long after the island has become uninhabitable by civilized workers. Truly a pretty possession to hanker after!

Our only trouble is that not a little American capital is invested in Cuban sugar plantations. We have some show of right to protect our own interests even in Cuba. How can we do that? Certainly not by lending support to guerilla bands, incapable of stable and intelligent government. So long as the Cubans cannot meet the test of international law in regard to their recognition as belligerents, we cannot afford to belittle ourselves in the eyes of the world by a step that would have no justification, but would leave us open to much misapprehension and suspicion. If the Cubans, as Secretary Olney declared as late as December last, have not so much as a "nucleus of statehood," let us approach the Cuban situation from an entirely different direction. There is another way, and that is friendly intervention, or intervention by force in the last resort. If the Cubans cannot show that they are entitled to belligerent rights, as they certainly cannot, the fact remains that they are making a fruitless war upon our interests and on our humanitarian impulses. We have a right to say that this state of affairs has lasted long enough, and must now end. We should stop such irregular and monstrous warfare, take guaranties for the better government of the island in the future, warn other powers that Cuba is not for them, and rest at that, satisfied that we have done the best we could under the circumstances.

Still Humbugging Its Readers. The unscrupulous Examiner refuses to be set right, because it wants to be wrong, to serve a personal end. It persists that we should tax ourselves over $4,000,000 a year to literally give to the Hawaiian planter. It then endeavors to humbug its readers into the belief that there is large profit to us in this absolute gift. It has the temerity to foist these manifestly false deductions upon a people believed to be intelligent. It says that during the last calendar year: "We received from Hawaii $15,244,977 in goods, whilst we sent only $4,184,351 in exchange. On any system in private business, these figures would show that we made a profit of $11,060,626." What arrant nonsense! Fancy those notably avaricious planters being satisfied with about twenty-seven cents on the dollar! But this planters' organ tries again in these words: "We sent to Hawaii during the year 1896 the sum of $1,065,278 in gold, and $73,900 in silver. This is the total shipment in settlement of the balance. The other $9,221,448 was profit. We swapped off $5,323,529 in cash and merchandise for goods worth $15,244,977." It then estimates that we have, during the twenty years the so-called reciprocity treaty has been in existence, received from Hawaii $107,557,455 more than we have paid her. Poor little country of only 8000 whites! How in the name of conscience has she stood such a drain upon her very limited resources? Marvelous, is it not, that such hungry blood suckers of peon laborers should be distinguished by such unbounded and unparalleled generosity towards the rich children of Uncle Sam? But the Examiner's statement is on its face an obvious, bold, and unblushing lie, intended to delude and obfuscate the ignorant and unwary, and to serve an end the Examiner dare not frankly state. The truth is, that Honolulu is not a money center. The little coin it takes from here is what it needs to pay its Japanese, Chinese, Portuguese and native laborers with, and that, it appears, amounts one year with another to only one-fifteenth part of its total export. In other words, the planter pays his labor less than six and one-quarter per cent upon his surplus product, with nothing for that required for the home market. The remainder of the balance of trade in favor of Hawaii goes from here to wherever the planter can find the best use for it, which is certainly not Honolulu. It goes either for investment or debt paying wherever it is needed. It is certain we owe not those money grabbing planters a dollar. We pay either them or their assigns a hundred cents on the dollar all the time. Furthermore, we have made them a total present of $80,000,000 in rebated sugar duties, and this whilst they have exacted from us the same price for their sugar as the least favored nation. All this in the much misused name of reciprocity.

Are the Japanese Handicapping Themselves? A daily contemporary attempts to explain how the Japanese are handicapping themselves in the race for enlarged commerce. It first quotes from an English trade journal, which says that the Japanese are manifesting a strong inclination to prohibit the employment of foreign capital in the development of their industries. There is no doubt but that the tendency to exclude all foreigners from employment in Japan is increasing, and it may safely be predicted that the few outsiders now in her service will soon be discharged. Under the existing treaty foreigners cannot own real estate, except in a few square rods abutting on or near the treaty ports, nor can they own shares in Japanese enterprises. This leads our contemporary to remark that "if such a policy of exclusion be persevered in, much of the apprehension created by the really remarkable forward strides made by the Japanese will be removed. It was feared by many that the Japs would take advantage of the mobility of capital, and permit their cheap labor to be exploited for the benefit of foreigners, but this restrictive system, and the virtual adoption of the gold standard, have decisively settled the matter and removed them from the list of possible competitors for the trade of the world."

Just so. But this is strange doctrine to come from a high protectionist, and a supporter of the St. Louis platform. The Japanese are but carrying the principles of protection to their ultimate conclusion, and are but saying ditto to the Republican gold platform. Here at home the Chronicle predicts that these two things will bring progress and prosperity to our country. But we cannot for the very life of us understand how our contemporary can say that the application of its own principles to Japan "removes that country from the list of possible competitors for the trade of the world." That is precisely what our own free traders have all along been saying must be the ultimate effect of our own exclusive policy. It is true that the Japanese borrow but little, whilst we stretch our credit to its utmost limit. But Japan hoarded money for hundreds of years, and has recently come into possession of a vast sum from China. She appears to have all the money she wants, for she establishes vast steam lines, and is hiding for commerce all over the world, without any disturbance of her finances at home. Well would it be for us if we could say as much. We have borrowed abroad to excess. Our profits in trade and production go to repay the foreign bondholder. Happier is Japan with those profits staying at home. One hundred years to come will not see us in the freedom from debt that Japan now enjoys. Our railroads alone owe to foreigners a sum about equal to all the gold and silver there is in the world, and our country is being drained of its productiveness all the time to pay the interest. Our contemporary must have been nodding when it spread such stuff before California readers.

Inspector Dockery
and Collector Wise.

Whatever the technical merits of the case may be, the sympathies and interests of the public, and the equities of the case, are all in favor of Inspector

Dockery in his fight to prevent the exportation from this city and State of impure brandy. The facts already developed in the case are a sufficient basis for intelligent opinion. The stuff sought to be held by Dockery bears the label "Pure California Brandy," and thanks to the zeal of Collector Wise, is now speeding across the continent, bound for England. The liquor so labeled is known to be a miserable decoction of prune juice, bad whiskey, grape brandy, water, and disreputable "stiffening," and if it were accepted anywhere as a fair sample of "Pure California Brandy," would do the greatest possible injury to the honest industry of this State. This is sufficient cause to justify the pure food inspector in taking the vigorous steps which precipitated the interference of the Federal authorities. Collector Wise can have no object in this matter distinct from the interests of the State, and while he no doubt acted in good faith, there is abundant room for criticism of his judgment. The "brandy" is not perishable; no penalty would have resulted from its detention for three or four days, or until the legal rights of the officials in contact could have been determined. In any event, its shipment abroad is a disgrace to the State, and a direct and positive injury to a growing industry. These facts should have had weight with the Collector.

The publicity that has been given this particular fraud will no doubt defeat its consummation. Telegrams have been sent to Washington to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the consignees of the stuff in England, as well as English customs authorities will be warned of the "Pure California Brandy" to arrive. The English pure food laws are stricter than our own; and while goods for export manufactured there may be impure or adulterated to any degree, under all sorts of labels, foods for consumption at home are subject to the most careful investigation, and violation of the laws are rigidly enforced. This shipment of prune juice and bad whiskey will be given a warm reception should it be lauded in England. There is not one chance in a hundred that a single quart of the fraudulent stuff will find its way down British throats.

California is just now making every effort to prevent the manufacture of impure food products, and also stop their import from the East or elsewhere. This attempt to defy the clear will of the people, perpetrate a gross fraud upon innocent purchasers abroad, and strike a most hurtful blow at the brandy industry of this State, should be throttled. Technicalities may sometimes be interposed in the interests of Justice, but in this instance, no trivial defense should be permitted to defend such dishonorable methods, or shield the perpetrators from the utmost consequences of their acts.

The Tariff Struggle
As It Stands.

The tariff debates in open Senate have begun in excitement which there is little hope of ending until about the 1st of August. As one Senator truly remarked, if closure obtained in the Senate the tariff could be put through within a week, and fully $100,000,000 saved to the Government in duties that would at once be collectable. But there is no Czar in the Senate, and it must as usual drag its slow length along. The final outcome is a mere matter of chance. Compromise is the order of the day and will have to be resorted to in regard to almost every item in every schedule. The state of parties is such that no hard and fast lines can be drawn, and the ultimate shape of the tariff is altogether in doubt. Meanwhile, there is a sudden awakening of Republican organs all over the country to the fact that the proposed tariff will not do, that it violates the principle of protection, and fails to realize the expectations raised by the St. Louis platform. The taxes "for revenue only" are so numerous as to pretty nearly constitute it a Democratic tariff. There is no protection in a tax on tea, and none that is necessary in an increased tax on beer. It is true that a considerable revenue will thereby be raised but that is throwing up the sponge in favor of the Democrats. This is more than consistent Republican journals can stand, and, in consequence, they are kicking up a lively racket all over the land that hodes no good to Senators bound by all sorts of dickers and compromises. The sugar schedule is just where it was when the Wilson tariff was in the Senate. What Gorman and Brice were to that measure, Aldrich, and Platt of Connecticut, are to the one now under consideration. In both parties the sugar trust has friends who must be placated, or tariff legislation is impossible. President Cleveland worn out, disgusted and unable to see his way to better legislation, was constrained to let the Wilson bill become law without his signature. As the new bill gives the go-bye to McKinleyism, it looks as if Cleveland's successor may have to follow in his footsteps.

The Turk Defies
Europe's Concert.

It looks as if the European Concert will have more on its hands than it bargained for. Turkey flatly refusing to relinquish her conquests, has determined to retain Thessaly. She sends defiance as an answer to the collective note of the powers, and at Athens active preparations are being made for a possible renewal of the war. At the same time it is believed that England has made known to the powers her intention to retire from the concert if Turkey be allowed to take territory, except in rectification of boundaries, from Greece. She claims that the principal purpose of the concert was to maintain in all Europe the statu quo as to territory. No power was to be allowed to take more than she then owned. That was thought to remove all motive for war. If that idea is now to be abandoned, the purpose of the Concert is at an end and England proposes to withdraw. The Czar and Emperor William are believed to be secretly directing the Sultan's course. The Grand Turk has been pleased to direct his Grand Vizier to talk out in meeting, and to direct his speech to be published. The Ministers refused to discuss the abandonment of Thessaly and the Vizier urged the Sultan to regard the powers "as enemies, who were plotting to destroy Turkey" and he went on to say that "if we yield to European pressure now we shall alienate Mussulmans. Therefore I employ your majesty for the sake of your victorious ancestors to retain Thessaly. Refuse to be dictated to as you did in the case of Armenia, with the result that your Majesty gained the victory." All of which, if true, looks more serious than anything that has happened since the Greco-Turkish controversy began. What the end of all this secret diplomacy may prove to be no man can tell. It looks like a reopening of the dangerous Eastern question.

The Problem Of Municipal Government. During the past five months Dr. J. H. Stallard of this city contributed to the Overland Monthly a series of interesting and timely articles upon the problem of "Municipal Government as illustrated by the Municipal Government of San Francisco." The articles have since been gathered together and published in convenient form for general circulation. The pamphlet is full of practical matter bearing directly upon the intricate, and as yet admittedly unsolved, questions of Municipal Government, and will abundantly repay careful study. In summing up the subjects treated and the suggestions contained in them we cannot do better than chose Dr. Stallard's own words:

"It would be presumptuous and premature to dictate the details of the form of government proposed in the foregoing pages. It is obvious that great care and deliberation will be necessary. But it may be useful to present a brief recapitulation and also to submit for discussion some important subjects which have not received the attention they deserve.

1. The evils connected with the franchise and the enrollment of the citizens have been pointed out, and the remedies suggested are, some better method of ascertaining the fact of citizenship and the adoption of a special register.

2. The complete separation of the municipal from the State and federal elections is necessary.

3. The question of selecting councilors from electoral districts or from the city at large, is one of great importance. If by districts, the boundaries need to be revised from time to time.

4. It having been clearly proved that the present system of election by a plurality of votes is not truly representative, the introduction of proportional representation ought to be seriously entertained, especially as it seems to promise the election of a better class of councilors.

5. Laws for the prevention and punishment of bribery need to be improved.

6. The initiative and referendum might probably be adopted with advantage, in order to determine the incidence and limit of taxation, the creation of a public debt, the exercise of the right of eminent domain, the imposition of any new duty on the government, the removal of dishonest and incompetent officials, and the control of corporations. With the election of a council, the initiative and referendum will be very little used.

7. The relations between the city and the governor of the State will need to be accurately defined.

8. The construction of the council is of paramount importance, and either the English or Italian systems may be taken as a model, although the former seems more conformable to republican ideas. The number of councilors should be large enough to supply supervising committees for every department of the public service and to prevent the possibility of combinations of seven or nine for evil purposes. From twenty to twenty-five for every one hundred thousand of the population would probably be advisable. A degree of permanence is necessary, and at no one election should it be possible to revolutionize the council's policy.

By this means alone is it possible to exclude the improper influence of politics and popular clamor. The term of office being thus prolonged, every councilor will enjoy the advantage of acquiring knowledge, experience, and interest, in the work entrusted to him, and this becoming known will contribute to his re-election. The longer a councilor retains his office with respect, the better will the citizens be served. The council must be entrusted with complete authority and sole responsibility.

9. The mayor must be divested of his veto, but the proposal to give him disciplinary power ought to be discussed. It would probably be well to give him authority to suspend any member or employee of the city government for malfeasance, dishonesty, or neglect of duty, and if given the power to submit any important question to the referendum of the citizens, the importance of his office would surely be increased. The English method of appointing the assessor works well, and is probably better than popular election.

10. Accounts should be audited and published twice a year,—one auditor to be a member of the council appointed by the mayor, the other elected yearly by the citizens.

The auditors should have no control over the items of expenditure.

11. The people must relinquish their right to put separate checks upon their own elected government. They elect one auditor, but all other officials must be appointed by the council, including the tax collector, treasurer, sheriff, heads of departments, and employees, without restriction as to salaries or numbers. It would be wise to consult the practice of other countries with regard to the conditions under which appointments shall be made, taking the best from each. Special care should be taken that no official be discharged on political or religious grounds.

THE HON. FRANK McCOPPIN.

IN the lamented death of this distinguished gentleman San Francisco loses a most useful and public-spirited citizen. He died full of honors in this city on Wednesday morning last at the age of sixty-three years, from an operation, made two days previously, for cancer in the stomach. He leaves a widow, the daughter of the late General Van Ness, after whom our most celebrated boulevard is named. He came here in the early fifties, when only twenty-five years old, and at once took rank as a clear-headed and a most capable and responsible man. He was at once entrusted with the building of the Market street railroad line, which he managed with success for years. His ability was soon recognized by the voters of the Eleventh Ward, who again and again elected him to serve as a Supervisor, or Councilman, as the office would in some places be called. In 1867 he was chosen by the people at large as Mayor, or Chief Magistrate, of this city, in which place he proved himself a most efficient opponent of the reigning corruption of that period. No jobs could get through the Board of Supervisors without being met with his veto. As an instance of his strict sense of duty, it may be related how, at the last moment, he abandoned a pleasure tour through Mexico as the companion and guest of the late Secretary of State, Wm. H. Seward, in order to defeat the ruling ring and protect his constituents. Mr. Seward's reception in this city much pleased him, and he was greatly taken with its Mayor, Democrat though he was. An invitation to accompany him on his celebrated Mexican tour was given by Mr. Seward, and accepted by Mr. McCoppin, who had but three weeks of his official term to serve. It soon leaked out, however, that with his powerful veto out of the way, the Supervisors contemplated putting through several jobs inimical to the well-being of the young municipality. Mr. McCoppin at once explained the situation to Mr. Seward, begged to be released from his promise, and remained at his post to defeat official jobbery and corruption. He was subsequently elected to the Senate of the State, where he originated legislation which at once stamped him as a practical statesman of no mean order. He took the police out of politics, gave us a uniform street-car fare, and by his "One-twelfth Act" kept San Francisco out of debt from that day to this. He settled the outside land question, and, in spite of much opposition, saved Golden Gate Park to the future use, recreation and pleasure of our people. He was offered by President Cleveland the position of Minister Plenipotentiary to Japan, but avoided its acceptance by giving it as his opinion that the public interests would not be best served by taking the Minister to either China or Japan from this Mongolian-hating part of the country. He was given a most pleasant trip as United States Commissioner to the Melbourne Exhibition, where he discovered the lady-bug which has done so much to save our southern orange groves from the ravages of the cottony cushion scale. He was subsequently appointed Postmaster of this city, which office he held at the time of his death. San Francisco never had a more faithful, upright or useful citizen. He passed through a long period of corruption in official life without so much as the breath of suspicion attaching itself to his name. With all his chances to enrich himself, he died a comparatively poor man. A proud, self-respecting man, he was not always popular with the crowd, but he was at all times singularly trusted by those who knew him, and no man ever found that trust misplaced. Peace to his ashes.

OPINIONS OF THE STATE PRESS.

THE NEWS LETTER has been literally overwhelmed with congratulations from constituents throughout the State upon the now famous libel suit, from which its proprietor emerged completely vindicated. The press comments received would fill this journal if published in full, so we are reluctantly compelled to reproduce only brief extracts taken from articles running from twenty-five lines to a column in length, appearing in such papers as have reached us. But only second to the appreciation of prompt vindication of right as it has been presented to the proprietor of the NEWS LETTER, will ever be held the staunch and hearty support of the contemporaneous Press of his State

MRS. RYLEY'S comedy, An American Citizen, is enduring. It stands the test of repetition securely, and one feels as one felt when Mr. Goodwin produced it first at the Baldwin some six months ago, that the part of Beresford Cruger exploits him in the best quality of his popular work. It does not exact from him anything like the best of which he is capable, but it is a lovable character, human and true in a bright, optimistic way; and even those of us who would always see Goodwin advancing to greater things can take satisfaction out of the fact that he plays this part as no one else could play it. And after a week of public sacrifice at the Goodwin shrine in such misfit roles as those of Ada Ingot and Lydia Languish, common courtesy demanded that Miss Maxine Elliott be given a chance to reclaim herself. I can imagine no one finding fault with her Beatrice Carew in An American Citizen, or praising her beauty to the point of patronizing her art. Nearly all of us who write about the things we see on the stage had more to say of Miss Elliott's beauty than of her acting when she first came to San Francisco and played with the Frawleys. I daresay we were just. The one critic who did not agree with us—a ladicritic, too—thought Miss Elliott foredoomed to fatness, and said, as I remember it, that, all things being equal at the time, if Miss Elliott did not look to her diet, in a twelvemonth she would be more actress than beauty. The time is up; Miss Elliott, it seems, has looked, not only to her diet, but to her acting. I cannot see that she is any less of a beauty, but it is perceptible that she is twelve times over a better actress—which was not exactly what the critic meant.

* * *

Miss Elliott has evidently worked hard, since it is work, and nothing but work, that brings perfection in this craft, as in all others. People prate of the born actor. They might as well talk of the born playwright. Neither ever happened. It is common enough to hear Goodwin spoken of in this way—Goodwin, who by twenty years of incessant work has evolved himself from a song-and-dance comedian into the finest dramatic artist in the country. Acting is a hard art; there are so few really good actors that it must be the hardest of all—bar play-writing. It requires some knowledge of dramatic values to walk across a stage and appear like a human being to the people in front; it requires skill to talk on the stage with a voice that will sound like a human being's to the audience. To be "natural" on the stage requires an artifice that has become second nature and lost every trace of its artificiality. Actors go to school, even when they are their own schoolmasters.

* * *

The critic is not born either, and in the long run the best of critics gets less appreciation from the worst of actors than the actor gets of him. Criticism is a peculiar craft. The critic is commemorative or annihilative, rather than constructive. He is to see much, and out of his experience select, compare, analyze; he is to have effect upon actual dramatic effort by lifting his voice in intelligent, logical praise of what is good, and intelligent, logical condemnation of what is bad; his is not supposed to be the voice of the people, the voice of the people is rather his, for the people will absorb what he writes and unconsciously give it out as their own opinions, and so the word passes round, and public opinion is influenced, if not made. Whether he be a critic of plays, play-actors, pictures or pies, makes no difference: his office is that of taster and commentator. Having made a business of the thing, he will cultivate himself to a point where his senses tell him what is good, or bad, as the case may be, and his technical training tells him how to express the opinion to whosoever may listen. He is not supposed to be able to personally paint a picture, play or write a play, or build a pie, but presumed to have a cultured taste and both facility and discretion in the expression of it.

The dramatic critic is practically an expert audience on whom the author and actor (whose sole aims are to create illusion and produce effect) try their craft. He is sensitive, impressionable, appreciative, fearless, and learned, above influence and beyond prejudice. . . . All this, of course, means the ideal critic, who has yet to be born.

In the meantime, the critic is considered a bane or a blessing by the boxoffice, a self-appointed unnecessary by the actor. For all of which he cares little. His obligations are entirely to the public and himself.

* * *

I have sought the journals of the world for a perfect critic, and found him never. George Bernard Shaw is immense and dazzling, but he loves Shaw and Ibsen too much to be really just to the rest of the world. And he sells plays to Richard Mansfield and calls him a good actor. That is too much. A. B. Walkeley is scholarly and beautiful to read, but he lacks suddenness. Clement Scott has middle-class prejudices and favoritisms, and he writes with painful lack of distinction and without enterprise. William Archer, who brought Ibsen out into the broad glare of English daylight, is placid, conservative, learned, but limited—for he cannot be blithe on occasion—and there are occasions, you know, when nothing but blitheness will do. These all are of London. In our own land the play-reporter usurps the office of the critic. William Winter has tried to preserve some of the critic's pride and elegance, but a generation has passed by his vast, wet rhetoric and his old-school standards. There is no critic whose judgment may be accepted as final and infallible. There is no man in England or America fit to serve his country as a censor of plays and players.

We English-speaking people have some pretense to a standard of moral decency, in our plays and play-actors, but of artistic decency we have none. I see actors on the stage who are obscenely inartistic in every essential of their craft. While they are on the stage vision is fouled hearing outraged, and civilization retarded. There is no mau, there is no law, to banish such as these. If there were, dark thousands of actors and actresses who now exist with the help of soft-hearted, soft-headed writers, would be driven to the sturdier trades. Talk about elevating the stage! Push off the sodden weight of men and women who soil the picture and mutilate the speech, and the stage will rise up with the buoyancy of a balloon. The Dramatic Art is robbing us of too many good plumbers, gasfitters, and chambermaids.

There is undeniable uniqueness in Francis Powers's Chinatown melodrama, The First Born. The locale is unmistakable; any one who has ever visited the Chinese quarter of an American city will feel the realness of the pent, mystic atmosphere which the author has contrived to translate to the Alcazar stage. Compared with the good scheme of general construction and the vivid treatment of externals, the lines are not valuable. One feels that the piece would be more wonderful played as pantomime. The diversity of dialect that Mr. Powers has given his characters is very confusing and, I should say, a drawback rather than an aid to illusion. I cannot understand why a Chinese should speak his own language one moment, a Fenimore Cooper version of ours the next, and pigeon-English the next. He might use the Cooper oratory—I understand that the Chinese tongue translated reads not unlike the garlanded rhetoric of the Leather Stocking Indians—to represent John Chinaman as he is to his own, and the pigeon-English in depicting his discourse with the trustful tourist, and maintain probability; but for the life of me I cannot see the utility of John jabbering something that sounds very much like real Chinese just as we are delightfully accepting him done into Cooper Americanese. The First Born is well staged and well acted by the author, George Osborne, Miss May Buckley, Harry Benrimo, George Fullerton, and other members of the Alcazar company.

I have an apology to make. In alluding to the Baggensens in my Orpbeum paragraph of last week, I stated that Mrs. Baggensen was Mr. Baggensen's mother. I was told this by an Orpheum habitue, and printed it in good faith. I have since learned that my informant falsified. Mr. Baggensen is not Mrs. Baggensen's son; Mrs. Baggensen has no children, and the Mr. Baggensen alluded to is Mrs. Baggensen's husband, and I am pained to learn that all has not been love, kisses, fruit and flowers in the Baggensen ménage since the publication of my paragraph. And furthermore, Mrs. Baggensen is only twenty-three years old, and therefore could at no time have been the mother of Mr. Baggensen, who is thirty-six.

ASHTON STEVENS.

There is rich, new blood in the Frawley Company, and a long list of plays of reputation in prospect for the season which opens Monday night at the Columbia Theatre with The Fatal Card, a modern melodrama that saw 250 performances in New York. The coming of the Frawleys has been long heralded: the company should be stronger than ever this season, made up as it is of such players as Frank Worthing, Blanche Bates, Eleanor Moretti, Gladdis Wallis and J. M. Colville. Monday night will tell the tale. There will be a swell crush at the Columbia.

On the evening of last Friday week the Sherman, Clay & Co. Hall was formally opened by the Musicians' Club. The concert programme was versatile and entertaining, and the new hall easily proved to be the best in town. Having the advantages of size, appointment and location, it will doubtless house whatever concerts of consequence are given here. On Tuesday night it was the scene of a novel entertainment—"An Irish Evening," consisting of Irish poems read by Daniel O'Connell, and Irish songs sung by Denis O'Sullivan. A big audience and a big success.

For next week the Orpheum promises a real sensation in the engagement of Adgie, who dances a serpentine dance in the cage with her troupe of trained lions. Others, too: Billy Carter, the comedian and banjoist; Morton and Elliott, musical entertainers; and The World's Trio, consisting of Perry Ryan, Lulu Ryan and Emma Wood, introducing what they significantly term "the latest craze of the day." The Eclair Brothers, who are a big hit, the Garrisons, Omene and others of this week's show will be on the new bill.

Mr. Goodwin closes his engagement at the Baldwin to-night, presenting a special bill composed of Act II David Garrick, The Silent System, Act II The Rivals, and Act III An American Citizen. Our diminutive friends The Liliputians will open at the same theatre a week from Sunday night, presenting their latest spectacle, Merry Tramps.

Martha will continue to be the bill at the Tivoli until Monday night, when Nanon will be revived, with Miss Morella in the title role, and Raffael, Hartman, Thomas, West and Miss Millard, Miss Holmes and Mrs. Seabrooke in the cast. The week following will bring out the Tivoli's first annual review, Miss Frisco.

Traviata will be sung at the Baldwin to-morrow night by the Italian Society Philharmonic.

THERE are many pretty places for summer residence outside of the city and near by it, and among them the man who forgets Blythedale will overlook the most beautiful of all. Nestling at the foot and in the shadow of grand old Tamalpais, lying directly on the route of the scenic railway to the mountain's peak, and within frequent and comfortable reach of the city, it presents really ideal attractions for summer residence for city folks. There are numerous convenient cottages at that place, and Mrs. Gregg, who has had very large experience in the hotel business, and is most favorably known, has charge of Blythedale—which is another way of saying that the guests of that pretty place are well treated.

The Second Summer,

many mothers believe, is the most precarious in a child's life; generally it may be true, but you will find that mothers and physicians familiar with the value of the Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk do not so regard it.

"Prisoners of Conscience," by Amelia E. Barr. Published by the Century Company, New York. 1897.

Liot Borson, of Lerwick in the Shetland Islands, is a brave, strong, tall fellow, the descendant of a long line of sturdy fighters and fishermen, but oppressed by the feeling that he and his family lie under the curse of God, and that none of his undertakings will prosper. He falls in love with Karen, the handsome niece of Matilda Sabiston, the richest woman in Lerwick and a pillar of the church. But, though Karen's heart is soon won by Liot, Matilda favors Bele Trenby, Captain of The Frigate Bird, as her niece's suitor. Bele and Liot, being candidates for the hand of the same girl, naturally become enemies, and one stormy night, while Liot is guiding Bele across a dangerous morass, his (Liot's) shoes become undone: he stops to tie them: Bele, angry at the delay, foolhardily presses forward alone, misses the only safe crossing, and perishes in the black peaty waters. Matilda accuses Liot of being a murderer, but no one believes her. Karen leaves her aunt's house and marries Liot, who grows very fond of their only son David. But soon Karen sickens and dies: Liot, broken-hearted, and attributing her death to God's displeasure, leaves Lerwick and sails away with David, his only and dearly-beloved son. He suffers wreck and sickness, and after years of hardship in a strange land, dies, an exile, in the island of Skye. After his father's death, David, now a strong young man and a splendid sailor, is seized by a fervent longing to return to Shetland and revisit his kindred. The story of his love-making, and of his slow release from the stern Calvinistic creed in which he had been brought up into a brighter belief, is strongly told. Evidently Mrs. Barr has had good opportunities for studying the people of the Shetland Islands and familiarizing herself with their habits of life and modes of thought. The unyielding, harsh Calvinism that plays so important a part in "Prisoners of Conscience" appeals with strong force to religious, narrow, and bitter natures, and is capable of being used by them as an instrument of the greatest cruelty. Gentler natures are embittered, stunned, oppressed, and frequently crushed by it. Matilda Sabiston exemplifies the former effect, and Karen and Nanna (David's cousin) the latter. The story, though sombre, is strong, and shows that an excellent tale may be woven out of simple and apparently unpromising materials by one who has the art to use them skillfully. The volume has scattered through it several photogravures which really serve to illustrate the text: they are reproductions of sketches by Louis Loeb, who was sent to the Shetland Islands to make them.

Godey's Magazine for May contains "Washington Favorites," by Carolyn Halsted, illustrated with about a dozen portraits; "Power Boats," by Fred Worden, with pictures of electric launches and boats propelled by gas-engines of various sorts; and Beaumont Fletcher's "Eulogy of Vaudeville," with portraits of Cissy Loftus, Marie Dressler, Juniori Valarez, and several other lights of the variety stage. Of course, it is impossible to avoid seeing the cloven foot in these articles, but it seems that a ten-cent magazine cannot get along without interjecting revenue-producing articles among its letterpress. The great superiority of the six-penny "popular" English magazines over the American ten-cent periodicals lies largely in the fact that you do not meet in their pages with obvious puffs of manufactures, paid-for eulogies of unknown persons, or advertisements of notorious ones. Some of the ten-cent periodicals are galleries of portraits of high-priced members of the half-world. You do not see these things in the pages of The Strand, Pearson's, or the New Illustrated Magazine. The passion for cheap notoriety seems by no means so highly developed in Europe as it is (thanks largely to the daily press) in this country, where it seems possible, by persistent spending of money, to swell almost any frog into a bull. An article on "American Literary Diplomates" mentions many of the writers who have at various times held office as Ambassadors, Ministers, Envoys, or Consuls. But we must object to "Consuls" being termed "diplomates": there are, properly speaking, no "diplomates" at all in the United States, there being no diplomatic service. It is the quaint practice of the Government of the United States to send men who have spent their early days in measuring ribbons behind a dry-goods counter, setting up type in the office of a little country newspaper, or inhaling the atmosphere of Police Courts, ignorant, moreover, of the language of the people among whom they are to live, to cope with men who from boyhood have made modern languages their study, have lived among statesmen and men of affairs, and since twenty years of age have passed through all the grades of a highly organized diplomatic service. And, even if there were a diplomatic service in the United States, "consuls" would not be "diplomates"; consuls are commercial agents. However, for lack of others better fitted, the literary men of the United States have honorably represented their country in foreign lands, and it is earnestly to be hoped that the important Ambassadorships may not be made the prizes of political party service. If you cannot get trained men as Ministers, it is at least well to get men of cultivation and wide reading.

The International Magazine for May announces that hereafter its price will be 25 cents per copy, and three dollars per annum, instead of ten cents and one dollar, as hitherto. The proprietors say that it is not possible to supply a really good magazine for ten cents, unless advertisers are permitted to enter the body of the publication, and largely to influence its contents. It is just this necessity which has rendered the most successful of the ten-cent periodicals—Munsey's—little else than a collection of inferior stories and portraits of actresses and other people willing to pay for notoriety. Interspersed among the pictures of the people who pay are the portraits of a few real celebrities, just to keep up appearances and lend an air of genuineness to the whole business. So far as we have observed, the Cosmopolitan is the only ten-cent magazine that has kept its pages clear of this advertising matter, and it has gained greatly in dignity thereby. Our own Overland Monthly is just about to make exactly the opposite change to that proposed by The International, that is, whereas it has hitherto been a twenty-five-cent magazine, it will, beginning with its June issue, become a ten-cent one. It certainly does seem, with so attractive publications as the Cosmopolitan, McClure's, and Munsey's before the public, almost impossible to secure a very large circulation for a two-bit magazine. In Great Britain, the magazines of large circulation are retailed at nine or ten cents, and the New Illustrated and the Strand are sold in the United States at ten cents. Pearson's and the Ludgate, both of them excellent periodicals, do not seem to have much sale in this country, though Mr. Arthur Pearson some time ago told us that he hoped to introduce his monthly here. The Pall Mall Magazine sells at one shilling in Great Britain, and at twenty-five cents here, and is a very handsome publication. We wish the Overland success in its new departure.

Mr. P. J. Healey, of this city, is about to publish a little volume of poems by Howard V. Sutherland, who has for several years been a well-known contributor of verse to the newspapers of San Francisco. The volume will contain eighty or ninety poems, many of them reprinted from various publications, but many which will be presented to the public for the first time. The collection has our best wishes, and will, we doubt not, add to Mr. Sutherland's reputation as a writer of graceful verse.

THE Dog Show was great fun. The girls gushed over the canine beauties and petted them so unremittingly as to rouse the jealousy on Saturday of one young man, who uttered the plaint that he would like to exchange places with "the curs" if only for that evening. "You are in quite another grade," was the reply made by a society girl; while another girl of the swim, who sparkles with subdued insolence "on occasions," remarked that, after all, one could see the same thing in society life at any time, if only the human brutes were classified, the same names even would suit, curs, puppies, etc., being peculiarly fit, while other dog names were also equally applicable. This remark so ruffled a man of the party that he turned to her and said, coolly: "Well, you would never be put on the list of thoroughbreds, that's quite certain."

This has been a week of harvest for jewelers and art dealers, as wedding presents have been flying about in profusion, the two charming next week's brides being the happy recipients. It is safe to say that the Unitarian Church of Brother Stebbins has never seen such an assemblage of beauty and fashion as will crowd it to see Miss Ethel Cohen and Lieutenant Bent united, while the wedding reception of Miss Burton and Lieutenant Pearce will fill her father's residence to its utmost capacity. The swim is agog over these two weddings, but one that is not yet announced as coming, will, it is safe to say, astonish society more than anything in the line of nuptials for many a long day.

San Rafael holds its own bravely, and each week Fashion sends over a quota of her followers to swell the crowd of guests already there. A great point in favor of this resort is the number of dwellers in Ross Valley who are always ready and willing to do the civil towards the hotel guests; and picnics, riding parties, and tennis ditto, are of frequent occurrence. The hospitable home of Consul-General Warburton is sure to be a head center of enjoyment during the summer; his charming daughter, so noted as a perfect horsewoman, is very popular with the residents of the Valley.

The insolence of wealth, as it is called, is getting more apparent daily. Time was when shocking bad manners and bad taste were endured socially if the exhibitor thereof were rich, and there was an air of deprecation on the part of the newly rich which appealed for tolerance, but now— The swagger and assurance of the money-bag contingent is as marked a feature as their wealth. It really seems a pity that the people who go about with a "can buy any or everything" air, do not purchase good manners.

Del Monte still stands first with the tourist fraternity, notably the British traveler, who finds the hotel, with its perfectly appointed service, its highly ornamented grounds and delightful bathing advantages unequaled the world over. Our city folk seem to fancy the mountain air of Castle Crags where, even when old Sol beams most fervently upon them, the air has a bracing effect and the thoroughly unconventional life that may be enjoyed—if one so minds—is very attractive to those seeking a respite from the cares of society.

Gossip says that the English friend of the Sharons, who rejoices in a name composed of one for Christian and surname alike, will at last decide to take a Californian bride, and the fair lady will be a connection of his patron.

Rumor has it that the queenly Emily has switched off from railroad tracks to a time table of quavers and semitones, but alas, there are bars in music as in other things,

Our pretty belles have serious cause of complaint against the Sunday newspapers for giving out such fearful caricatures of their sweet faces, and many are the pouts in consequence. As one maiden says: "Just as if we were more Durrant witnesses, on one side notorious characters and on the other, ours; it's simply outrageous." Miss Leila Burton, too, has been unceasingly dubbed "Lulu," much to the disgust of the admirers of her poetical cognomen.

Apropos of British Consuls, "Oldman Booker," as his numerous friends delight in styling the venerable ex-Consul of Her Britanic Majesty at this port, has, with his American wife, gone back to England, after a lengthy visit to his old haunts here. He found so many gaps in his circle of by-gone days he felt strange, so he said, and he bled him, like a loyal Briton, to take in the sights of his Queen's Jubilee.

On dit that the Presidio people are whispering about giving a welcome home to Lieutenant Bent and his bride upon their return from their honeymoon trip, and one of the bridesmaids is credited with the intention of playing hostess at a dance in their honor, so no wonder the girls prefer choosing an outing place that is of easy access to the city with all this gaiety in perspective.

The Hotel Rafael guests will take much to console them for the loss of the Baron von Schroeder and his family, who have all departed for their San Benito ranch, and much speculation is indulged in as to who can, and will, take the popular German's place in giving the young people a good time.

A WOMAN REPORTER'S FATE

From The Argosy

"A LADY to see you, sir."

Jeremy Grigson used very unparliamentary language, but taking into consideration the fact that his visitor might be close at hand, in compliment to her sex, his anathemas were uttered in German.

"How charming!" she exclaimed, coming into the room with a little rush. "I got my first point already. You are familiar with the modern languages." And she made a note.

"Madam," said Jeremy Grigson, with a severe bow, "I have an excellent memory, but I cannot recollect having made your acquaintance on any previous occasion."

"You have an excellent memory? Thanks." She made another note. "May I set down? I am rather tired."

"Certainly, madam," Jeremy placed a chair for her. "And you will then, perhaps, kindly let me know to what I am indebted for the pleasure of your company."

"Just let me take down"—she scribbled rapidly, murmuring to herself: "Rigid manner, stately, old-world form of address, furniture chosen with an eye of comfort rather than beauty."

Her pencil paused, and she glanced at him with a smile apparently intended to set him at his ease.

"I am from the Weekly Chatterer," she said. "Can you let me have a photograph to go in with the interview?"

"Never had one taken in my life," said Jeremy. He was not a handsome man, yet there was something in his face better than good looks.

"Not even when you were a baby? Almost anything would do."

"Not even then."

"Abl of course not. And you were reared on—"

"Green tea, I believe. Don't I look like it?"

She wrote down. "Highly nervous, rather dyspeptic," and went on. "Talking of things that came after your time—how old are you exactly! Of course it is only women who are guilty of the weakness of objecting to tell their ages."

"I shall be a hundred if I live to the end of this. Allow me one question: What have I done that I should be interviewed."

She wrote again, murmuring: "Modest, and apparently unaware of his own fame," and then answered:

"Don't you know that the whole town is talking of your book?"

"I don't know anything about it," he said savagely, "except that I sold the copyright for £20, and that the £20 pounds is spent."

She had got hold of an immense fact, but she dropped her pencil, and her flippant, aggressive air with it.

"What a shame!" she said; "what a wicked shame! Your publishers will make hundreds and thousands out of that book. It is creating a furor. Such a case should not be possible; and especially when a man really needs the money."

He looked attentively at her for the first time. He had seen already that she was young and pretty; but he noticed now that there was a worn, pinched look about her small, very pretty face. He had seen the same look growing on other faces in Bohemia; it had grown upon his own; and he knew the meaning of it.

"You understand about needing money?" he asked her.

"I should think I do," she answered sharply. "Do you suppose I should be here now if I didn't?"

"Sometimes people work at a trade because they like it."

"If it were a trade I liked, everything would be different. I aspired to literature once, but I could not even make dry bread by it. Ever since I have been hanging on to the skirts of journalism, and sometimes there is a great deal of mud on them. If you only knew how people treat me now and again when I go to interview them! You may thank your stars and your genius for having placed you above all that at any rate."

"Are they often as brutal as I was?" he asked gently. "I am awfully sorry; won't you forgive me?"

"Don't mind about it," she said huskily. "I know very well what I must have seemed like to you—an impudent, brazen little wretch. I am horribly nervous by nature, and I put all that side on just to cover up the fright, and impress people with the idea that I intend to get any information I want, no matter how reticent they try to be. Often they tell me more than they intend—as you did just now—merely to get rid of me, because they think I am writing down a whole lot that they don't want said about them. I should stand a bad chance if they only knew that I am quite as anxious to get away from them as they are to get away from me."

"If this interview is any object to you," he said, in an awkward, shame-faced way, "I will tell you all you want to know. I am not quite such a churl as I pretended to be. Only—well, I am proud as well as poor, and I suppose there is no need to make the details of my poverty public?" He glanced first at the meager furnishing of the room, and then at his threadbare clothes.

"Oh!" It was actually a little cry of pain. "Do you think so badly of me as that still? I will go now. I wish I had not come."

She turned very white as she rose, and caught at the chair to steady herself.

"For heaven's sake, don't faint!" cried Jeremy, desperately. He made a stride toward her, and without a word of apology he caught her by the arm and pushed her back into the chair. "What did you do it for?" he asked with a great show of indignation. "What is the matter with you?"

"I couldn't help it," she said. "If I had gone on walking I should have been all right, but the short rest finished me. I am very tired, and"—she gave a little gasp and her eyelids fluttered.

Jeremy dived into the wall cupboard, and came forth with a brandy bottle. There was very little in it, but enough for the purpose. He stood over her in a threatening attitude until she consented to drink a teaspoonful. He tried to insist on a second.

"I cannot, really," she said. "I dare not. It would go to my head at once, because—because—"

Jeremy Grigson knelt down beside her and took her hand.

"Is it because you have had no luncheon?" he asked.

"Yes," she said; and her color began to return.

"Do you know how it feels?"

He nodded with sympathetic gravity.

"Been there dozens of times," he said; and he did not let go her hand, neither did she withdraw it. "Possibly you have walked the whole way from the Chatterer's office to this house!"

"I had no choice. This represents my whole fortune until such time as I am paid for the interview."

She pulled three half-pence out of her pocket and showed it to him lying on the worn palm of her little gray glove.

Quite involuntarily he lifted to his lips the hand he was holding. Then she drew it away, and tried to return to her former manner.

"Just tell me where you were born," she said, "and how the central idea of your book first occurred to you, and I will go."

"You will do nothing of the kind," said Jeremy, firmly. "I am just going to have my tea—'high tea'—because I am a homely sort of fellow. I will not tell you another word unless you stay and share it with me."

"But I have to write up the interview now at once. It must be put into type to night."

"Very well. You can do it here while our cutlets are being cooked. You will find plenty of paper, pens, and ink on my writing table, such as it is. Here are a few notes for you. He filed half a sheet of paper quickly in a small, clear hand. "Now I shall leave you for half an hour to your work, if you will solemnly promise me not to run off while I am away."

"I don't want to run off in the very least," she said; and she looked away from him to hide the tears in her eyes. But he saw them all the same.

When he came back he was accompanied by a waiter laden with material for a feast, brought from the nearest restaurant, and he had letters in his hand, because he had encountered the evening postman on the doorstep.

She wanted to help him to spread the tablecloth and arrange the food, but he said it would make him ill if he did not wait on himself, because he was so used to it. So she read her manuscript aloud to him instead, and he criticised it as he stumbled about with plates, knives, and forks.

They took their meal together in merry, picnic fashion, like children who had known each other all their lives, and when hunger was satisfied they exchanged some further confidences. They were both alone in the world, both dependent on their pens, although in vastly different lines; and they were both young, notwithstanding the fact that Jeremy's hair had a sprinkling of gray in it. Her name was Margaret, and he told her that had been his mother's name. She was very glad, although she scarcely knew why.

"I have several literary irons in the fire," he said, presently, "and those letters look like business. May I open them? Thanks. Then, if the news is good, you will be the first to congratulate me; and if it is bad, it will be some consolation to hear you say: 'Poor dev—I beg your pardon, I mean 'poor fellow'—I have not spoken to a lady for three years."

He opened the first letter.

"Good," he said. "The Tip-Top Magazine accepts Mr. Grigson's serial, the first installment of which will appear next month. That manuscript has been lying at the office of Tip-Top for six months, and I have written about it three times without being able to elicit a reply."

"Nothing succeeds like success," said Margaret. "Open the next."

He did so.

"Still better!" he exclaimed. "I applied for a post just vacant on the staff of the Pulverizer. It means $300 a year for a weekly column of criticism. The last man was a great swell, and he gave it up because one of his own books was smashed to atoms by mistake in another part of the paper. Well, I have got the post."

"Splendid!" she said. "Now, the last one."

"Best of all!" he cried, as he glanced through it. "Because it shows human nature in an agreeable light. My publishers inclose a check for £200 in consideration of the phenomenal success of 'The Book,' and they will be happy to allow me to make my own terms for the next one. Margaret, I am waiting to be congratulated."

He had called her by her Christian name quite unconsciously.

She sprang to her feet, blushing furiously, and began hunting for her gloves.

"I can't say half I mean about it," she stammered. "Won't you take for granted how glad I am? I must go now; the evenings are long, but they don't last forever. I want to thank you, and I don't know how."

"When may I come to see you?" he asked, retaining her hand again.

"Oh, never! I live in such a wretched place, and you are among the great ones of the world now, you know."

"Of course," he said, coolly, "it doesn't matter in the least whether you give me your address or not, because I am going to escort you home, and then I shall find it out for myself. Are you ashamed to be seen with me? We could stop at a tailor's on the way, but there would be certain drawbacks to that compromise."

"My clothes are infinitely worse than yours," she said, bumbly.

"Quite a different case," he assured her. "I believe you would look well dressed in a 'gunny-sack.'"

Then they set out together. He did not offer to take a cab. An hour earlier he would have done so, but he was, comparatively speaking, a rich man now, and he dared not run the risk of seeming to patronize her poverty. She understood, and liked him all the better for it.

This was a day to be remembered in both their lives.

Three months later there was a much-talked-of little wedding breakfast, at which most of the guests were literary celebrities, but another interviewer "wrote it up" for the Weekly Chatterer. Jeremy had married Margaret.

Quaint carvings, rich tapestries, and the most curious of curios are to be found at George T. Marsh & Co.'s, at 625 Market street. Japanese art is distinctive, unique, delightful. Marsh always carries a full line, and the newest as well as the oldest creations of Japanese skill are to be seen there.

The New Mining Law.

On Wednesday last the new State mining law went into effect. Under its provisions locators of mining claims within this State are given sixty days' time in which to perfect their locations, subject to the following requirements: viz., the discoverer of any vein or lode shall immediately upon making a discovery erect at the point of discovery a substantial monument or mound of rocks, and post thereon a preliminary notice which shall contain: 1. The name of the lode or claim; 2. The name of the locator or locators; 3. The date of the discovery; 4. The number of linear feet claimed in length along the course of the vein each way from the point of discovery; 5. The width claimed on each side of the center of the vein; 6. The general course of the vein or lode, as near as may be; 7. That such notice is a first or preliminary notice. This first or preliminary notice must be recorded in the office of the County Recorder in the county in which the location is situated within twenty days after the posting thereof. Within sixty days from the date of discovery the discoverer must do $50 worth of work in developing his discovery, and distinctly mark the location on the ground, so that its boundaries can be readily traced, and within that time the locator must file in the office of the County Recorder of the county in which the claim is situated a certificate of location, which said certificate shall state: The name of the location, name of locator, date of discovery and posting of notice; description of claim, defining boundaries, etc.; also a statement that the aforesaid $50 worth of work has been completed. Further than this, it must be remembered that the work required by the State law upon a mining claim is in addition to the annual assessment work required by the United States law, as such labor must be done during the second year of the location to be effective. One thing can be said of the new law, that it will be fruitful enough in dispute, being just sufficiently complicated in its requirements to slate the efforts of the illiterate prospector, no matter how good his intentions may be to carry out its provisions to the letter. It will serve, however, to bar out a lot of individuals who never overlook jumping a piece of ground when nothing more was required than to stick a notice up.

That Thirteenth Mining Report.

The thirteenth annual report of the State Mining Bureau is the subject of caustic criticism by the Mining and Electrical Review. Among other things the Review says: "No sane business man will suppose for a moment that certain so-called mines, some of them mere prospects, would be written up and even 'puffed' with half-tone illustrations, unless somebody had paid for the advertising." Also that "it is a significant fact that the mines which have received extended notices and illustrations in the report are, with a few exceptions, for sale." The NEWS LETTER expressed its opinion of the report at the time it came out, and citizens and taxpayers generally are privileged to their own views on the production, and whether it fairly represents an outlay of the thousands spent annually in support of the institution. Of course, it is not fair to pull the newly appointed State Mineralogist into a matter for which he is not responsible, and for this reason it is unfortunate that the present charges have been delayed until this late day. We understand that one of the Directors has written to the proprietor of the paper, asking for some proof of his charges, and also that, the paper avers, this will be forthcoming in at least one case. An investigation into the matter by the Board of Directors, which consists of men of the highest reputation, will be satisfactory even at this late day. Let the truth be told on whichever side it exists.

A New Copper District.

A company has just been formed in London, with a capital of $400,000, to open copper mines in the districts of Ario and Morelia, in the State of Michoacan, Mexico. This find is a more modern one than the usual run of investments of the kind in this quarter, and something of an experiment.

The Pine Street Market.

Business during the past week has been kept active by Chollar, where an improvement has taken place in drifting south on the 500-level of the Brunswick ground. The ore was cut in the east side of the drift, but was not followed for the present, the workings being more westerly of late. The change for the better in this ground again has been a source of much gratification to those who believe that the Brunswick lode has a future before it, and that on it depends largely the salvation of the market, notwithstanding the maledictory croaking of its enemies, who have poured forth their virulent denunciations ever since the first pick was stuck in the ground. The ore from the new find, above 1650-level of Con. Virginia, has been lower in grade of late, but the Superintendent still speaks hopefully of the appearance of the mine in that section. That the ground thereabouts is fertile in mineral there is no doubt. Whether the stringers found from time to time are feeders of a new ore body or not, is another question, and a highly important one for the shareholders. The drift, or cross-cut, in the South-end mines, run jointly by the Confidence, Challenge and Imperial companies, is still being pushed westward in search of the ore supposed to exist in that direction. The results so far have been far from satisfactory, but the management do not seem to have lost any of their confidence.

American Flat Development.

A proposition has been made by the company formed to develop the mines of American Flat by draining them through connection with the Sutro Tunnel, which seems very fair on its face. These companies are asked to give up two-thirds of their ground, and in return will have their ground opened up for them free from cost if no ore is found, and on a percentage if it is. The sticking point, of course, is the Comstock Tunnel, which does not seem disposed to act as promptly as might be desired. The trouble at this end is lack of funds to carry on work of the kind independently. The treasury of the concern is not overflowing with money, and it is not likely that any of the wealthier men who hold stock are going to take the money from their own pockets in the interest of the small fry who have nothing wherewith to meet demands of the kind. It is a pity that this company is not better heeled financially, as it could do much to help matters out many ways if it were. Vesting the control of the different mining companies owning in this location in one corporation is also a good idea, if it serves to check the rapacity of the chronic office-holder, who only sees in operations of the kind a chance to levy assessments for salaries.

The Local Stock Board.

Outside of the sugar stocks there is little going on in the local Stock and Bond Exchange. The brokers manage to keep the pot boiling, and that is about all. The combination in the powder stocks has rather deadened speculation in that line, and lighting shares are about as dead. By way of variety, the Board keeps a discipline among its members, and its laws are like those of the Medes and Persians—unalterable—unless at a heavy cost to those who make the attempt. The Directors, in such a case, unite into a veritable personification of the great Artaxerxes, and their vengeance is swift and sure. Just now two members are walking the pave as exiles from the Board, under a sentence of suspension for a twelve-month, each $1000 poorer in pocket, the extent of fines which have found their way into the treasury of the association. It pays the Directors to be strict in more ways than one.

African Nitrate has Petered Out.

Not long ago the reported discovery of nitrate in South Africa was announced with a flourish of trumpets which made South American holders quake in their shoes. A company was immediately formed in London to open up the industry, known as the African Saltpetre Company. Its capital was $1,500,000, out of which $225,000 was paid in cash to the owner of the ground. He is just that much richer and the company the poorer, as the ground is not worth a cent upon investigation. Storms do not improve a deposit of the kind, but the interposition of a Divine Providence was not taken into consideration by the experts who made the examinations. An effort will be made now to rent the land as a farm to pay office expenses.

Down Crier

"Hear the Crier!" "What the devil art thou?"
"One that will play the devil, sir, with you."

THE number of "actresses" recently graduated from the courts is so great that it is impossible for them all to shine as stars, despite their willingness to assist theatrical managers by appearing in a minimum of clothing—there are not firmaments enough. It is therefore suggested that they all come out together in a ballet, thus enabling many people, whose respectability prevents them from observing the planets singly, to indulge their curiosity under cover of a constellation. Each lady should be ticketed with the name of her particular affair to prevent confusion among the audience, as the stage is likely to be extremely crowded.

THE CRIER notes with pain to his civic pride that Eastern despatches relative to the doings of such notorious gentry as thieves, cut-throats and professional thugs, including the passing of senile rich men from the sepulchre to the will-contest courts, now invariably conclude with the significant statement: "It is suspected that he has a wife in San Francisco." Is it possible that our city has in the eyes of the world become but an incubator for wives, widows and fatherless progeny? Away with such lying insinuations.

TAXPAYERS of this glorious commonwealth are paralyzed by the statement of Inspector O'Brien that $283,770 must be forthcoming to repair the school buildings of the city. Strange what a difference the object makes in the willingness or reluctance of taxpayers to part with their coin. To the high and noble cause of education our wealthy citizens are apt to give the glassy eye, while in little matters of the heart the miser and his money are easily parted. Education is great, but petticoat persuasion is greater. Selah.

COLONEL A. Andrews believes that California is a good diamond field, and that by exploring in hidden places in the interior he can unearth these coveted treasures. The Colonel is not alone in his theory. It is not necessary, though, to pay railroad fare in order to strike a diamond pocket. San Francisco offers a lucrative field, and one which women have worked with brilliant success. The latest operator in this interesting industry was a young woman of the name of Blair.

WATERFALLS will replace asbestos as fire-protectors in the theatrical drop curtain. The next move in the line of stage improvements should be a patent of some kind—a hose or any old thing that accomplishes the purpose will suffice—to quench the conflagrant fires of genius that burn with such alarming persistency in the brain cavities of stage-struck thespians hereabouts. The CRIER craves permission to turn on the faucet.

JELLY is doing such deadly work in our midst that we have flown to fresh fruit as a substitute. Now comes Inspector Dockery with the alarming intelligence that there are disease germs in fruit. The CRIER is indifferent to all these discoveries so long as his favorite regime of beer and hardtack is not proscribed by scientific investigation. May science pass favorably upon the pretzel; and may the beer supply never be damned.

SINCE one reform is being made among theatrical audiences, why not several more? Small fines should be exacted for petty nuisances, such as late arrivals and whisperings, and a penalty of not less than one thousand dollars upon the atrocious nuisance who persists in telling you what's coming next.

EMMA Ashley's theatrical debut in tights as a statue may not be an outrage upon the poseur's feelings, but it is a most frightful outrage upon art. The Ashley curves are fearfully and wonderfully made.

FULLY four days have elapsed since Mrs. John Martiu has been heard from. The circumstance is suspicious. Silence from such a source is ominous, and points to foul play.

PROSPECTS are looming up cheerfully for the permanent retirement from local courts of dank and mouldy family skeletons, whose bones have erstwhile made music like unto the clicking of castanets at a legal dance, or the merry rattle of bits of vertebrae in the dexterous paws of a minstrel end-man. Bones must and shall go. In their place come job lots of ashes, fresh from the crematory, duly labeled and classified like other exhibits. Such is the convenient and novel custom inaugurated this week in the Davis will contest. Certainly, for cleanliness and sanitary recommendations generally it can't be beat.

IT is said that Mr. Leggett and his satellites are rejuvenating the Mechanics' Library to suit the fabulous taste of la jeune fille, and are about to close their present extensive premises, as they find that one small apartment will be sufficient accommodation for their volumes. The TOWN CRIER is apprehensive about the results of this action, for at present it is only through reading novels that la jeune fille acquires a knowledge of the spicy side of life, and if this channel is denied her—well, she's bound to find out somehow.

WE are threatened with another influx of Brahmins in this unfortunate burg, and now comes the terrifying intelligence that William J. Bryan will swoop down upon us with his cyclonic oratory in the near future. What we need is a supply of Gatling guns and the legal authority to use them upon all such noisy disturbers of our peace. We already have a Cator and an O'Donnell, and all other windy Demosthenes politicians of the stump variety should be kept at bay.

FORKED lightning is synonymous with flashes of anger in frail humanity, according to the philosophy expounded by Theosophist Besant, the lady who has succeeded Blavatsky in the occult right to reicuarlate herself and smoke cigarettes. Now we know what it was that struck the Woman's Congress all of a heap, when the turbulent and turbulent Bramacharin Bob sortied forth his wrath because his Hindu trousers were tweaked.

WITH the passing of the high hat ordinance, some lively sceues are expected at the theatres. The ushers are already practicing warwhoops, in anticipation of scalping excursions between the acts; these will excite the keenest emulation, he who has the greatest number of millinery trophies depending from his girdle at the end of the performance being accounted the most valiant.

KYTKA, handwriting expert on the witness stand in the Fair case, referred familiarly to the Lord the other day, for which he was justly rebuked by Judge Slack. His Hour realized that the Deity ought not to be called into the case. A San Francisco court room is the last place on earth where the Lord's influence could penetrate.

THE protraction of suspense about Durrant's fate is an intolerable nuisance in more ways than one. It is serving as an excuse for obscure persons to gain free advertisement for themselves and their wares after the manner of Mrs. Schwartzler and her cosmetics.

BELSHAZZAR, of biblical fame, was startled by handwriting upon the wall. He would probably have succumbed to heart failure then and there had it assumed the terrifying proportions of the pencil-will characters as magnified in the Fair-Craven case.

"THE tightening of the rope around his neck caused Lopez to complain," says the Examiner in describing the hanging of the ancient Spaniard. This complaint is so commonly heard at the scaffold that it seems hardly worth a special mention.

HOWLS are going up from the site of the Hall of Justice, concerning the delay in the construction of that building. It is comforting to know that Justice in these diggings is blessed with any sight at all.

THE difficulties of the uphill road to Fame have been so often proclaimed that people have become discouraged and taken to the down grade—it's much quicker and just as sure.

A CONTEMPORARY observes that the difference between Democracy and Americanism is the difference between "Any man is my equal" and "I am any man's equal."

THOUGHTS OF MIDDLE AGE.—CHAPERONE MAGAZINE.

I STOOD on the level hilltop,
 In the glowing hour of noon;
 I knew my faithful shadow
 Must fall behind me soon.
 I sighed as, looking backward,
 I saw, in the light of Truth,
 So little but vain endeavor,
 And the barren dreams of youth.
 There were broken cups of promise,
 There many a wasted day;
 There were shrines my hands had builded,
 To gods with feet of clay.
 Then I wept to know the morning,
 With all its blossoms fair,
 Had left but withered thistles
 To fill the noontide air.

THE PHANTOM JOY --CHARLOTTE MELLEN PACKARD, IN CURRENT LITERATURE.

"I see their unborn faces shine Around the never lighted fire."
 Forever and forever they will shine,
 The mocking flames consume
 Shadows that lurk about a phantom hearth,
 Within a phantom room.
 For Love and Fancy paint in rarest tones
 The things that shall not be,
 And light with haunting faces many a hearth
 No human eye can see.
 In song-pierced twilight, in the hurrying dark
 Of winter afternoons,
 In lonely watches of the solemn night,
 Beneath fair harvest moons.
 The life forbidden, sways the life that is,
 Through the one joy we miss,
 Husband, or wife, or child, who never came
 To take the waiting kiss.
 As it hath been, it evermore shall be,
 With vague, unmet desire,
 Men will behold the unborn faces shine
 Around an unlit fire.

KISSES—CURTIS HOOEN PAGE, IN COSMOPOLITAN.

I kiss thee first, love, as I would a queen—
 Kneeling, just touching with my reverent lips
 The quivering sweetness of thy finger-tips.
 And then I kiss thy hair, where with the sheen
 Of shredded jet, it falls to cool and screen
 Thy heating breast. Then, as a bee first sips
 In honey-longing round a rose, then dips
 Deep into it, as if there'd never been,
 Nor ever was to be, another flower,
 So I first touch—just touch—my lips to thine;
 Then with deep kisses, that are strong to bring Thy inmost soul beneath my passion's power,
 I take possession, make thee mine, all mine.
 My rose thou art! My queen, I am thy king!

LIFE—UNIDENTIFIED.

We meet and part; the world is wide;
 We journey onward side by side
 A little way, and then again
 Our paths diverge; a little pain,
 A silent yearning of the heart
 For what had grown of life a part,
 A feeling of somewhat bet fit,
 A closer clasp on what is left,
 A shadow passing o'er the sun,
 Then gone, and light again has come.
 We meet and part, and then forget,
 And life holds blessings for us yet.

A MADRIGAL.—LAURA C. BEOEN.

The sun stole to a red rose, and wiled her leaves apart;
 May dew and June air had wooed her at the start;
 But was't not fair the sun should have her golden perfect heart?

He swore that for true love he'd marry;
 In a cottage he'd live rather tarry,
 With his love by his side,
 Than take for his bride
 A girl who had millions to carry.
 He was twenty.

Years passed, he was thirty and single;
 In society's gay whirl he'd mingle.
 He had loved half a score;
 He was loving once more.
 A lass? No. Her coin's golden jingle.

A bachelor still, the old sinner
 Met a maiden and tried hard to win her,
 Not because she was fair
 Or had money to spare,
 But—because she could order a dinner.
 He was forty. —What to Eat.

NOTES OF THE ARMY AND NAVY.

THE retirement of officers who have recently been promoted to the rank of Major General is due to certain conditions precedent to their advancement and not particularly a matter of personal desire. By those in the service the motive of President McKinley is deemed highly commendable, as its proper execution will result in a large number of promotions in all grades of the army. Our chief executive has borne in mind the fact that all brigadier generals should become major generals before retirement as a reward for long and valuable services rendered to the country. His plan of nominating three new major generals means the promotion of three colonels, three lieutenant-colonels, three majors, three captains, three first lieutenants, and three second lieutenants, in addition to one officer in each of these grades who will be advanced as the result of the selection of Major-General Forsyth.

The composite gunboats Wheeling and Marietta took preliminary spins around the bay last Monday and Tuesday. It is confidently expected that on their trial trips they will attain a speed of fifteen knots an hour, which is three knots in excess of the contract rate.

Owing to the present scarcity of seamen to fit out the new gunboats it is possible that the Marietta and Wheeling will have to wait a couple of months for their crews.

The Petrel has arrived at Yokohama. The Adams left Honolulu last Thursday en route to Port Angeles.

Major-General Nelson A. Miles, U. S. A., and his aide-de-camp, Captain Marion P. Maus, U. S. A., were granted a special audience by the Sultan, at Constantinople, on May 21st. They were introduced by United States Minister Terrill after the ceremony of the Selamluk which the party attended. President McKinley has assigned General Miles to represent the United States military service at the Queen's Jubilee in London, and he will arrive there on June 16th.

Major-General James W. Forsyth, U. S. A., formerly Commander of the Department of California, and his successor, Brigadier General William R. Shafter, U. S. A., were the guests of honor in the evening of May 21st at a banquet given at the Pacific Union Club by a number of their friends. Covers were laid for about fifty prominent gentlemen and a most elaborate menu was enjoyed. Some happily expressed toasts were given and responded to. Colonel O. D. Greene, U. S. A., Major A. E. Bates, U. S. A., and Major Charles P. Eagan, U. S. A., were among the officers present.

When Major-General Frank Wheaton, U. S. A., was placed upon the retired list it was after a continuous service of more than forty-two years, exclusive of five years of service with the topographical engineers. This length of service is greater than that of any officer on the active list. During the war of the Rebellion he participated in more than fifty-five battles and skirmishes, and since then his services have been valuable and creditable.

Major-General Z. R. Bliss, U. S. A., after one day's service with that rank, was placed upon the retired list last Saturday upon his own application under the forty years' service clause.

Brigadier-General John R. Brooke, U. S. A., commanding the Department of the Missouri, has been promoted to the rank of Major-General, succeeding Major-General Z. R. Bliss, U. S. A. retired. It was generally supposed that Brigadier-General J. J. Coppinger, U. S. A., would receive the advancement, but as he has been promoted twice over the head of General Brooke, the latter's promotion was deemed advisable.

Brigadier-General E. S. Otis, U. S. A., assumed command of the Department of the Colorado this week, having been relieved of the command of the Department of the Columbia by Colonel T. M. Anderson, Fourteenth Infantry, U. S. A. General Otis has his headquarters in Denver. Lieutenant F. W. Sladen, Fourteenth Infantry, U. S. A., is his aide-de-camp.

Brigadier-General William R. Shafter, U. S. A., commanding the Department of California, has appointed Lieutenant R. H. Noble, U. S. A., and Lieutenant John D. Miley, U. S. A., his aides-de-camp.

It seems that Rear Admiral T. O. Selfridge, U. S. N., is considerably nettled over the detailing of Rear Admiral Miller, U. S. N., as the naval representative of the United States at the coming celebration of the Queen's Jubilee, and has so informed the Secretary of the Navy by cable, much to the displeasure of the latter official. Admiral Selfridge was promptly notified to keep in close communication with the United States Ministers at Athens and Constantinople, in order that he might be able to dispatch a vessel to any point where American interests were in danger. Rear Admiral Miller will go to London.

There is an esoteric rumor that Commodore H. L. Howison, U. S. N., will be appointed to the command of the Pacific Station instead of Rear Admiral Miller, U. S. N. The selection would be an admirable one, as Commodore Howison is well and favorably known here, and through years of service is thoroughly cognizant of the requirements of this station.

Commander George M. Book, U. S. N., has been ordered to the command of the Marion, now at Honolulu.

Chief Engineer R. W. Galt, U. S. N., arrived here from Portland, Or., last Sunday, on a visit, and is at the Palace Hotel.

Chief Engineer W. H. Harris, U. S. N., formerly of the Columbia, sailed from New York last Saturday to join the Sau Francisco as fleet engineer.

Passed Assistant Engineer T. F. Burgdorff, U. S. N., of the Oregon, has been commissioned Chief Engineer.

Passed Assistant Engineer Horace W. Jones, U. S. N., has been detached from the Thetis and assigned to the Concord.

Paymaster A. W. Bacon, U. S. N., came down from Mare Island last Sunday for a brief visit, and registered at the Palace Hotel.

Assistant Surgeon Richard G. Broderick, U. S. N., has been detached from duty at the New York navy yard and ordered to the Concord. He was formerly on the training ship Constellation.

Captain Cunliffe H. Murray, Fourth Cavalry, has been transferred from the Brown University at Providence, R. I., to the Starrs Agricultural College, at Starrs, Conn., where he will act as professor of military science and tactics.

Captain and Mrs. Nicoll Ludlow, U. S. N., are passing the summer at their country place on Long Island, and will remain there until next fall.

Captain Seldon A. Day, Fifth Artillery, U. S. A., who has been passing part of his leave of absence at Fresno, came to the city last Sunday to visit his fellow officers at the Presidio.

Captain G. W. Crabb, Fifth Artillery, U. S. A., now on leave of absence, is quite ill at Fort Hamilton.

Captain E. Rice, Fifth Infantry, U. S. A., of Fort McPherson, Ga., has been assigned military attaché of the United States Legation at Tokio, Japan, upon the request of Mr. Buck, the newly-appointed Minister to Japan.

Captain Rogers Birnie, U. S. A., has been visiting Fort Stevens, Or., and Seattle, Wash., on official business connected with the ordnance department.

Captain Merritt W. Ireland, Assistant Surgeon, U. S. A., has been assigned to duty with Troop K., Fourth Cavalry, at the Yosemite National Park.

Captain Alexander Rodgers, U. S. A., Lieutenant Samuel McP. Rutherford, U. S. A., and Lieutenant Harry A. Benson, U. S. A., of the Fourth Cavalry, left the Presidio on Saturday for the Yosemite and Sequoia National Parks.

Lieutenant J. C. Cresop, U. S. N., has been detached from the Franklin and ordered to the Concord.

Lieutenant H. H. Ludlow, Third Artillery, U. S. A., will return to duty about June 10th.

Lieutenant Frank L. Winn, Twelfth Infantry, U. S. A., has been granted four months' leave of absence, to commence on August 14th. As he has permission to go beyond the sea, a trip to Europe is within the possibilities.

Lieutenant Milton F. Davis, Fourth Cavalry, U. S. A., after enjoying part of his leave of absence in Los Angeles, is visiting the City of Mexico and other points of interest in the land of the Montezumas.

Lieutenant H. A. Field, U. S. N., has been detached from the Monterey and assigned to the Alert.

Lieutenant R. M. Sturdevant, U. S. R. C. S., has been detached from the Grant and ordered to the Perry.

The Concord will remain at Mare Island about one week more, and then make her trial trip under the supervision of the Board of Inspection. She will be assigned to the Pacific Squadron and ordered to Honolulu. Her officers will be Commander Asa Walker, U. S. N.; Lieutenant G. P. Colvocoresses, U. S. N.; Executive Officer: Lieutenant T. B. Howard, U. S. N.; Navigator, Lieutenant P. W. Hourigan, U. S. N.; Ensign Guy H. Burrage, U. S. N., and Ensign L. A. Kaiser, U. S. N.; watch officers; Paymaster, E. D. Ryan, U. S. N.; Assistant Surgeon, R. G. Brodriek, U. S. N.; Assistant Engineer, H. P. Jones, U. S. N.

General Nelson A. Miles, U. S. A., left Constantinople last Wednesday for Athens.

Lieutenant Commander C. A. Adams, U. S. N., was detached from the Richmond last Wednesday and ordered to the command of the Monterey. Lieutenant Commander A. B. Speyer, U. S. N., has been ordered home and placed on waiting orders.

Lieutenant R. E. Peary, U. S. N., was detached from duty at the Brooklyn Navy Yard last Wednesday, and granted five years' leave of absence. The Secretary of the Navy took this action in order to allow Lieutenant Peary to continue his Arctic explorations. The latter has made no definite arrangements yet, and will not leave for the Far North until next year.

The order issued detailing Lieutenant J. C. Cresop, U. S. N., to the Concord was revoked, and Lieutenant T. B. Howard, U. S. N., was ordered here instead.

Assistant Engineer D. E. Dismukes, U. S. N., has been appointed Passed Assistant Engineer. He is now at the Norfolk Navy Yard.

The Bennington went to the Mare Island Navy Yard last Wednesday to receive a thorough overhauling in the dry dock.

The Oregon has gone to Port Angeles for target practice and hattalion drills.

The Comanche will soon take the Naval Battalion out for a cruise, after which she will go to the Mare Island Navy Yard to be overhauled.

Lieutenant P. W. Hourigan, U. S. N., who has been on duty at the Naval Academy in Annapolis, Md., has been ordered to the Concord.

Lieutenant D. P. Menefee, U. S. N., who has been on duty with the Monocacy at the Asiatic Station, arrived here May 21st, en route home on a leave of absence.

Lieutenant John W. Joyes, Fifth Artillery, U. S. A., has been relieved from duty at the West Point Military Academy, and ordered to report to the Chief of Ordnance for assignment. Lieutenant Joyes was formerly on duty at the Presidio, and is well known in society circles here.

Lieutenant T. B. Howard, U. S. N., has been ordered to take a draft of men to the Concord, instead of Lieutenant J. C. Cresap, U. S. N.

Lieutenant C. C. Marsh, U. S. N., and Miss Charlotte Evans, daughter of Captain R. D. Evans, U. S. N., were united in marriage recently at Port Monroe, Va.

The home of Lieutenant R. E. Coontz, U. S. N., in this city, was brightened recently by the advent of a son.

Lieutenant George P. Colvocoresses, U. S. N., has been detached from duty at the Naval Academy in Annapolis, Md., and ordered to the Concord.

Lieutenant H. McL. Powell, First Infantry, U. S. A., of the Presidio, has been joined by his charming wife and her mother, Mrs. McClelland, of Omaha.

Lieutenant C. P. Elliott, Fourth Cavalry, U. S. A., is passing his leave of absence at San Diego.

Lieutenant Paul F. Strauh, Assistant Surgeon, U. S. A., has been assigned to duty with Troop C, Fourth Cavalry, at the Sequoia National Park.

Ensign F. B. Bassett, U. S. N., has been detached from the Thetis and assigned to the Alert.

Ensign L. S. Thompson, U. S. N., has been detached from the Alliance and ordered to the Naval War College.

THE Partington School of magazine and newspaper illustrations, at 424 Pine street, gives an exhibition of work by the scholars to-day from 2 until 6 o'clock.

THE Pacific Coast Jockey Club assisted the Boulevard fund by the races given last Tuesday and Wednesday, something more than $2,000 being turned over to aid the work. President Androus and Vice President Henry J. Crocker in particular deserve credit for their efforts to make the races the success the handsome check proved them to be.

ONE of the most dashing and dehonair members of the Stock Exchange is not quite so happy as he was, but with his lost peace he has purchased some valuable experience. He has long prided himself on the number and variety of his feminine conquests, and his trail is easily identified by the broken hearts strewn in his wake. At an adjoining table in a fashionable restaurant, he noticed, one evening not long ago, a handsome young woman dressed in black. As he gazed, a passing diner, much the worse for wear, upset the carafe on the lady's table, deluging her somhre garments with the water. The gallant broker hastened to her assistance, and so cleverly did he turn to his advantage the little accident, that before her departure for Boston, three days later, he had been permitted to pay various little attentions, including a long drive in the Park, to his new friend, who proved to be a fascinating widow.

As he wished her bon voyage, he could not conceal his elation at her evident sadness, which he attributed to sorrow at leaving him. Noticing his ill-concealed air of triumph, she explained that her depression was the result of her assiduous labors in nursing her husband, whom she had lost only about five days earlier.

"Ah, ha!" said Mr. Narcissus complacently to himself, "she does not wish me to see that she cares for me."

Then, by way of showing a polite interest, he asked:

"Of what ailment did your husband die?"

"Smallpox!" replied the sorrowing widow, demurely.

That unhappy broker now fumigates himself twice daily, to the great edification of his friends, who happen to know that the widow's hereavement occurred two years ago, and that her husband died of no more contagious disease than old age.

A little story, hitherto unpublished, concerning Henry M. Stanley, is told by Chief Engineer Robert Ware Galt, U. S. N. The anecdote concerns Stanley's early days at Charleston, where, on one occasion, a negro lad who had stolen a package of cotton, or had committed some other equally heinous crime, was in imminent danger of lynching at the hands of a mob. In behalf of the life of the condemned boy, Stanley essayed to make a mollifying speech to the crowd. This oration was worse even than some of his efforts recently delivered before his English constituents.

"Hang it all, boys," he said, "you don't want to hang the boy."

Crude as this rhetoric was, it served to effect the release of the captive. The Southern crowd, with its inherent love of eloquence, was so disgusted with Stanley's attempt at oratory that they turned their indignation against the speaker, and meanwhile the boy, in whose behalf he had interfered, made good his escape.

Bohemianism in San Francisco suffered a sad blow three years ago, when Eddie Morphy, the gifted, went to Japan as a war correspondent. Every one predicted that he would return by the first steamer, but Morphy disproved all prophecies, and not only remained in the Orient until the conclusion of the trouble between Japan and China, but is there still, the editor of a Tokio paper. His brother Alex not long ago received an appointment in the service of the China fleet, and upon his arrival at Yokohama on his first trip across the Pacific he sent a message to Eddie at Tokio that "a gentleman who had formerly known him would like to see him." Eddie somewhat grumhlingly obeyed the summons, and was met by a figure gorgeous in brass buttons and gold braid.

"And is it you, Alex?" he asked, in inimitable greeting. "What a lovely creature you are! Now, tell me, do you own the ship, or are you only the captain?"

On the following day no issue of Eddy's paper was obtainable.

A notable instance of a man rising superior to his calling is that of Jim McGinn, who, although an undertaker, is exceedingly popular among the Native Sons, enjoying a practical monopoly of the patronage of that order in his particular branch of the pathetic business. In the parlor to which McGinn belongs, the Committee on Visiting the Sick was drafted, for the current quarter, from the M's on the roster, the names including that of the subject of this anecdote. Now, Jim's visits are not usually made to the sick, and he feared such an innovation on his part might be considered a trifle premature, but as a fine is imposed on each committeeman derelict in his duty, he could not profitably avoid the service assigned to him. So, despite his distaste for the duty, he determined to perform it conscientiously, and promptly called at the residence of the Native Son at the head of his list. The young undertaker's praiseworthy motives deserved a more happy result, but the fact remains that at first glimpse of him, the sick brother suffered a severe relapse.

"No, Jim. Not yet! Not yet!" he constantly cried, in the delirium which succeeded the visit of the committeeman. "Go away! Oh, Jim, not yet!" he moaned, in an agony of apprehension.

In vain McGinn assured the invalid that his call was not professional, but fraternal. The sick man was driven frantic at mere sight of his gruesome visitor.

Jim's name no longer glooms the roll of the Sick Visiting Committee.

Police Judge H. L. Joachimsen has been almost twenty years on the bench, and the worst enemy of the usually genial old gentleman is the gout, which periodically turns him into a suffering cripple, and which has as injurious an effect upon his temper as upon his gait. With his feet swathed in countless bandages, the lenient disciplinarian of the followers of Bacchus hobbled into the lounging room of the San Francisco Verein a few days ago.

"What's the matter, Judge?" inquired a callow youth, who has not yet discovered that he possesses a liver.

"Gout," replied the jurist, shortly, disliking the reference to his ailment.

"That's too bad," was the sympathetic rejoinder. "How does it affect you, Judge?"

Joachimsen looked at his interrogator with wrath in his optic. He meditated committing him for contempt, but the young clubman looked innocent and interested, so the judicial anger was slowly transformed to disgust. He turned away without answering.

"How does it affect you?" repeated the tormentor, thinking his question had not been heard.

"First in one foot—then in the other," snorted the gouty Judge, as he stumped out of the rooms.

If the Reverend Robert C. Foute had not chosen to leave the deck for the pulpit, his qualifications for command would have ensured high rank in the navy, of which he was an officer many years before he became rector of Grace Church. Among the worshipers in that fashionable temple on the California-street hill, last Sunday evening, were two sailors who had migrated by easy stages from Chinatown into the sanctuary. They watched the progress of the service with more curiosity than devotion, until finally Mr. Foute thundered out in stentorian tones; "Let us pray."

The peremptory accents reminded the sailors of the quarter-deck. They exchanged glances apprehensively, the influence of long discipline strong within them.

"I guess we had better," whispered the older mariner, fearfully, referring to the rector's command, and then the pair sank submissively to their knees.

When Governor Budd appointed Druggist Waller to membership in the State Board of Pharmacy, the latter signified his desire that the further honor of the Secretaryship should also be conferred upon him. The Governor suavely "thought it could be managed," and straightway proceeded to forget all about the matter. Relying on what he considered as equivalent to a gubernatorial promise, Waller prepared to assume the secretarial functions, and on the night of the first meeting of the new board he ordered an elaborate banquet at a French restaurant in honor of his forthcoming election. The board was duly constituted, a President selected, and then nominations were invited for Secretary. As in a dream, Waller heard John Calvert proposed, and a motion that nominations close, without any mention of his own name. Fearing that he had been overlooked, the man who had trusted to the Governor hastily proposed himself, but Calvert was elected, only one vote being cast for Waller. The latter was dazed for a few moments at the sudden collapse of his ambition. Then he thought of the costly feast he had prepared.

"Oh, well," he said, philosophically, "we may as well gather around that table. It's Calvert's board—but it's my whistle."

CATCHING THE PUBLIC EYE.

CATCHING the public eye in the chase for the elusive dollar has in one particular, at least, in San Francisco, developed into astounding popularity. This is out-door advertising. Its success has been phenomenal and unquestionable. Closely identified with its growth and now recognized as leaders and masters of the field, are George H. Siebe and J. Charles Green, comprising the firm of Siebe & Green. They own three-fourths of all the bill posting and painted sign privileges in San Francisco and all in Oakland and Alameda Co., having lately succeeded to the business of the Stillwell Advertising Co. of Oakland. Under their aggressive business methods, out-door advertising has become better understood and has demonstrated its usefulness to the general satisfaction of most advertisers. Both Mr. Siebe and Mr. Green have ripe business experience and are known wherever there is business as an alert, up-to-date business team, who have won success by working for it.

PROFESSOR Charles F. Graeber gave a very interesting musical entertainment at Native Sons' Hall on the evening of May 21st, which was enjoyed by a large number of people. The Professor is teacher for the banjo, mandolin and guitar, and has the distinction of having gathered at one time on a single stage the largest number of pupils in concert ever seen in this city. At his concert of Friday evening sixty-four of his scholars were present and took part in the entertainment. He has large classes for each of the instruments named, and is a popular instructor.

THE races to be given on Monday afternoon next, 31st inst., by the Pacific Jockey Club, at Ingleside, in aid of the Boulevard fund, promises to be largely attended, as it will be unusually interesting. Many fast horses will be entered, and both trotting and running races are on the card. The Boulevard Committee hope that Monday's effort will close the active work of money getting for the completion of the work. As the 31st is a holiday, and the charity doubly worthy, thousands of people of the city will doubtless attend.

THE camping paraphernalia of the average California is so complete that it is small wonder that people prefer to live in tents rather than cottages. What with awnings and partitions, floors and hammocks, to make one comfortable, the odds are rather in favor of the camp. Neville & Co. say they are outfitting an unusual number of campers with these facilities for a month's comfortable outing among the trout streams and many resorts about the State.

EVERYBODY goes to El Campo on Sunday for a pleasant outing. Frequent boats each way, and round trip costs only twenty-five cents.

SOCIETY was well supplied with attractions last Saturday. At the Maria Kip Orphanage there was a large crowd of fashionables to inspect the new building and listen to the music, which was both vocal and instrumental. The Dog Show had its devotees also, and in the evening, which was the closing night of the exhibition, the place was fairly packed when the awards were announced and the prizes bestowed by Henry Crocker, who, his friends declared, performed the ceremony with a happy blending of grace and dignity.

Gastronomy has been taking quite a leading place of late with our entertainers, dinners and luncheons being almost the sole items to be heard of in that line. Mrs. Charles Josselyn's luncheon was a veritable feast, as was to be expected; Mrs. McBean entertained fourteen ladies at her rose luncheon, and Mrs. Charley Page had eleven guests at hers. Of the two most elaborate dinners, or rather banquets, to properly designate them, the one given by Mr. James Phelan in compliment to Mr. and Mrs. Harold Sewell, took place at the Cliff House; and the other, which had General Forsyth as a guest of honor, was at the Pacific-Union Club, General Shafter, our new Commanding General, sharing the honors of the occasion. Mrs. James Otis, Mrs. Hager, Mrs. Center and Mrs. Hopkins have also appeared among the dinner hostesses.

Last evening the Loring Club gave the closing concert of their season at Odd Fellows' Hall.

To-day the Lawn Tennis Association will hold its annual tournament at the Hotel Mateo, where there will be a hall given this evening in celebration of the event. Tennis will be one of the leading attractions at the Hotel Rafael this summer, the courts there being admittedly among the best in the State, and are always occupied by devotees of the game.

The present week has not been so prolific of weddings as the previous weeks of May have been, while several of those to take place the first week in June will be among the most brilliant known in our social world. One of last week's wedding celebrations was a very pretty one, taking place at the California Hotel on Thursday evening, when the Rev. Jacob Nieto united in marriage Miss Florence Olcovich and Henry Goldstone in the presence of a large number of guests. The bridal procession entered the parlors led by the three flower girls, Miss Pauline Olcovich, Miss Ethel Cooper and Miss Jeannette Lewis. They were all dressed in pink satin, covered with white accordion pleated tulle and trimmed with pink roses. The maid-of-honor, Miss Esther Goldstone, was dressed in light blue satin covered with white mousseline de soie, and was accompanied by Joseph Goldstone, the best man. The bride was accompanied by her father. Her gown was white satin covered with tulle and trimmed with point applique lace and satin ribbons. The veil was attached to the hair with a diamond sunburst, the gift of the groom, and she carried a shower bouquet of bride's roses and orange blossoms. The mother of the bride wore a corn-colored moire, trimmed with duchesse lace, and diamond ornaments. Mr. and Mrs. Goldstone will leave for the East Thursday evening for a six weeks' tour. On their return they will reside at 1716 Geary street.

One of next Tuesday's weddings will be that of Miss Helen Wright and Charles L. Davis, which is to take place at noon at St. Mark's Episcopal Church in Berkeley. The marriage of Miss Quita Collier and Atherton Macondray will be solemnized at Lakeport on Wednesday evening, and a number of their friends will go up from the city to be present at the ceremony. The young couple will make their home at Menlo Park, occupying one of the Atherton cottages in that vicinity. The wedding of Miss Anna Grube and Harry Durhrow will also take place on Wednesday evening, at the residence of Mrs. Henry Williams on Octavia street. It will be a very quiet one, with only relatives and intimate friends present. One of this week's announcements is the engagement of Miss Stella Locan and Fritz Denicke.

The wedding of Miss Bessie May Stevens, daughter of Mr. Wm. T. Stevens, of this city, and Dr. Henry Simpson Goddard, of Goldendale, Washington, took place on the afternoon of Wednesday, the 19th inst., at the home of Mrs. J. W. Carlyle, sister of the bride, in Portland, Oregon. The wedding was private, only relatives and intimate friends being present. The young couple will make their home at Goldendale, Washington. The bride is a sister of Mr. A. C. Stevens, well known in this city.

There will be three weddings next week in which army officers will be interested. On Tuesday, June 1st., Second Lieutenant Thomas A. Pearce, Seventh Infantry, U. S. A., will be married at half-past one o'clock to Miss Minnie Burton, daughter of Colonel George H. Burton, U. S. A., Inspector General of the Pacific District. The wedding will take place at the home of the bride's father, 2111 Pacific avenue. The Misses Kathro and Lulu Burton will be the bridesmaids, and Lieutenant William Sells, U. S. A., will act as best man. There will be a small reception after the ceremony. Lieutenant Pearce will take his young bride to Fort Logan, Colo., where he is stationed. The next wedding will take place at the First Unitarian Church on Wednesday evening, the contracting parties being Lieutenant Charles Lyman Bent, First Infantry, U. S. A., and Miss Emilie Ethel Cohen, daughter of the late A. A. Cohen, of Alameda. Several hundred invitations have been issued. Miss Emma Butler will be the maid of honor and the bridesmaids will comprise Miss Julia Crocker, Miss Bernie R. Drown, Miss Marguerite Jolliffe, Miss Moffitt, Miss Helen Wagner, and Miss Ida Gibbons. Lieutenant T. G. Carson, U. S. A., is to be best man and the ushers will be Lieutenant S. M. P. Rutherford, U. S. A., Lieutenant D. E. Nolan, U. S. A., Lieutenant L. F. Kilbourne, U. S. A., Lieutenant R. F. Gardner, U. S. A., Lieutenant John P. Harus, U. S. A., and Lieutenant R. C. Croxton, U. S. A. A reception will be held afterward at the residence of Dr. and Mrs. Henry Gibbons, 920 Polk street. The third wedding will take place at half past eight o'clock next Wednesday evening at the home of Captain William Bell Collier, U. S. A., retired, in Lakeport, Lake Co., Cal. The bride will be his daughter, Miss Mary McPherson Collier, and the groom Mr. Faxon Atherton Macondray. Gerald Rathbone will act as best man.

The marriage of Miss Helen Elizabeth Wright to Charles Lott Davis will take place on next Tuesday, June 1st, at 12 o'clock, at St. Mark's Episcopal Church, Berkeley.

Mrs. Lilly Cort and her mother, Mrs. Hitchcock, are on the eve of departure for a visit to Europe, which may extend over the rest of the year. They expect to take in the Queen's jubilee in London, and afterwards spend some time in Paris. Mr. and Mrs. Douglas Dick and family left this week for a trip to Europe—especially Great Britain—and will be away several months. Major Groeshack, U. S. A., accompanied by Mrs. Groeshack, left last Saturday to spend his leave of absence in the East, and expects to return about the first week in August. The Von Schroeders have gone to their ranch near San Luis Obispo for the summer months. The Ignatz Steinharts have been visiting their ranch in Napa Valley.

Raphael Weil, of the White House, who has been absent in Paris for some time, has returned to this city.

Boardman, Mrs. Boardman, Miss Kate Dillon, S. D. Freshman, E. M. Greenway, S. Lewis and wife, C. W. Rosenbaum and wife, Mr. and Mrs. Warren D. Clark, San Francisco; Miss Hannah Lynde, Melrose, Mass.; Mrs. W. Buckman, Caroline Wharton, Trenton, N. Y.; Dr. W. N. Watson, Dr. J. H. Grove, Philadelphia; Mrs. Thos. Dibblee, Santa Barbara; Hugo H. Moore, wife and child, Chicago.

Walter Raymond, President of the Raymond & Whitcomb Excursion Company, and owner of the Raymond Hotel at Pasadena and Colorado Glenwood Springs, arrived at the California Hotel, this city, from the Yosemite last Saturday afternoon at 2 o'clock. One hour later he left for San Rafael, returning at 6 o'clock, and at 8 that evening was on his way to Portland. The veteran excursionist could not visit San Francisco without taking a glimpse at the Hotel Rafael, where he sends all his people who visit the West.

On Thursday, June 3d, the marriage of Miss Annette Lander West and Hugh McDonnell will be solemnized in this city. Miss West is well known in society circles, and is the daughter of the late Charles L. West, a pioneer of 1850. Mr. McDonnell is a successful miner, and has accumulated a fortune in these enterprises during the past few years, and is a widely known and popular gentleman. Mr. and Mrs. McDonnell will extend their wedding tour to Europe, and will be absent from the city for several months.

All those who recall what a delightful success the historical carnival, given by the Woman's Educational and Industrial Union, proved to be last year, will be pleased to hear that it is to be repeated, and will be held, as it was before, at Odd Fellows' Hall, commencing on the 20th of September; and the indications are that it will be in every way even better, were that possible, than its predecessor.

Dr. Luella Cool, who has been practicing dentistry for two and a half years in Central America, and recently escaped death from yellow fever, is slowly recovering, and will return to California about June and open dental offices in Oakland and Haywards.

Another Victory In Court For The Imperial Hair Regenerator.

After the remarkable victory which the Imperial Chemical Manufacturing Co., of 393 Fifth Avenue, New York, obtained in the Circuit Court of the United States, against the firm of Stein, Hyman & Oppenheim another infringer was enjoined Saturday.

This time it was the so-called Victoria Hair Regenerator which Judge Kirkpatrick of the United States Circuit Court in Trenton was decided to be an infringement of the Imperial Chemical Manufacturing Company's patent. The decisions hold that the invention of complainant, which consists of ingredients that restore the natural color to gray hair, and which at the same time has been proven perfectly harmless, is one of the most important discoveries of the age and properly patented.

Practice makes perfect; and Max Abraham, at 428 Geary street, is master of the art of preparing banquets of any dimensions, dinners at all times, and marriage suppers to suit parties large or small. He officiates at all the swell weddings and functions, and always gives perfect satisfaction.

FRED. T. HOPKINS, Prop'r,

37 Great Jones St., N. Y.

DEAR EDITH:—How can a woman make up her mind what is "style" when almost everything seems admissible, and yet there was never a season when the indefinable balo of vogue was so indispensable to any costume, no matter how simple. In mid-winter we were told that fancy waists were on the wane, yet as the season for making ourselves comfortable in warmer weather approaches fancy waists multiply. And while they are all stylish, yet so varied are they, and the "style" is accomplished in so many different ways that the investigator becomes confused. The adviser, too, finds it difficult to convey instruction. She cannot proclaim that round waist effects are essential, because many of the prettiest models disappear under some sort of belting at the waist. It won't do to insist upon frills and elaborations, for lots of stunning bodices are dependent for their style on the dashing attractiveness of the material of which they are made. And yet you can't dictate tailor-made severity, for what has a ruff away up about the ears to do with a tailor-made effect?

The strictly tailor girl may follow the collar-and-cuff dictates of her brother's taste, but the feminine girl, shirt-waist beauty, runs her hard with an apparently severe, yet all feminine, affair. This type of waist hasn't a frill, except the fetching one about neck and ears, and the other at the wrist. It fits neither in flat-chested, gentlemanly fashion, nor yet in rounded, unyielding and skin-tight modeling of the form.

The material of these waists, which are a blend of shirt waists and fancy bodices, may be either glazed, stunningly plaided gingham, chevot, or silk, or a gossamer lawn, with filmy lace insertions. Only one thing may be claimed; the belt usually droops at the front. Much of the stylish effect depends upon the kind of belt and its management. Nearly all droop a little towards the front, but that is not essential. Many of the newest belts are finished with buckles set slightly aslant, which aids the down-droop in front, and yet permits the belt to be drawn close about the figure. Belts of plaided ribbon, the plaid bearing no relation to the color or material of the bodice with which it is worn, or with anything else in the costume, are entirely correct, and seem to make the waist especially small. Such a belt may be worn either as a finish to the edge of a bodice or the bodice may appear below it. Other belts fit the figure with elastic smoothness from the waist line to just below the bust line. Many of these bodice belts as they are called, are actually of elastic webbing. They lace at one side, and a flap goes over the fastening almost invisibly, so that when adjusted the belt seems to be all in one. Quaint and becoming effects are secured with these belts, by allowing them to pass over the bodice except here and there where tabs, folds, or other portions of the bodice itself fall free over the belt. Length of waist is restored by these effects, while all the trimness of waist circumference is still given by the round of the belt.

All sorts of expedients are restored to increase the apparent round of the bust, and at the same time to emphasize, or at least not to sacrifice, the length and slenderness of the waist. The bolero is much used, though often, it is simulated by braiding, the "cut-off" under the arms and under the bust seeming to exist. The back, extending long and panel-like to the edge of the bodice in such cases usually appears below the belt. The panel piece may pass under the belt or not, as seems most becoming.

THE Security Mutual Life, of Binghamton, New York, will establish an agency in this city. The office will be located in the Columbia building.

The Fidelity Mutual Aid Association, J. L. M. Shetterley Secretary and General Manager, has established a general agency in Michigan, with headquarters in Detroit.

J. D. Maxwell is in Los Angeles.

James N. Reynolds, of the Royal, was in town this week.

The notorious Jos. R. Dunlop, of Chicago, at one time busily engaged in throwing mud, through his journal, at reputable insurance companies, and who was convicted of sending obscene matter through the mails and sentenced to two years at Joliet, has failed in his efforts to secure a pardon from President McKinley. During President Cleveland's administration he was refused a pardon in very vigorous language, President Cleveland saying that in his opinion the sentence was a righteous one and should be served out.

John W. Connell, of Montana, was injured by a falling tree at 11 A. M. November 22d last. He held an accident policy expiring at noon the same day, but at the time of the accident it was 1 o'clock at the place of issue, New York, so the company disclaims liability. This is splitting hairs with a vengeance.

State Auditor McCarthy, of Iowa, excluded the Bankers' Life, of St. Paul, from that State, and in retaliation Commissioner Dearth, of Minnesota, excludes the Bankers' Life, of Des Moines, from his State, although the latter has complied with the law in every respect. Now McCarthy threatens to expel all of the Iowa associations from his State, some thirteen or more.

An asbestos fireproof wallet, to keep valuable papers in, is the latest offer of fire insurance companies to clients, and in cases of fire certainly would prove to be very useful. The entire envelope, pockets and flap, also encircling strap and loop, are of asbestos. Smaller envelopes are also made by stationers for single papers or cherished souvenirs of our sentimental age.

The purchase of the Pacific Bank premises from the Continental Insurance Company by the Royal Assurance Company, of London, represented on this coast by Rolla V. Watt, will add to that company's popularity among those having the city's interests at heart, and make a convenient office for the Royal and Queen Insurance Companies. Improvements will be made and the premises he occupied by the new purchaser within the next sixty days. Office buildings are now owned in this city by the following insurance companies: Fireman's Fund, Home Mutual, Liverpool and London and Globe, Mutual Life of New York, Royal Assurance, Pacific Mutual Life, and Alliance of London.

The Norwich Union Fire Insurance Company, of Norwich, England, celebrates its centennial this year, and the event is celebrated in the issue of a special stamp to be used on all correspondence sent out by the company and its numerous employees throughout the world.

 office as Second-class Matter.

 Representative), where information may be obtained regarding subscription and advertising rates.

NOW let the high hat be heard to cease.

THERE appears to be some question among the gentlemen having charge of the Queen's Jubilee banquet, to be given at the Palace Hotel on the 21st inst., as to the admission of ladies. The dinner without the gracious presence of the fairest of God's creation would be much like the play of Hamlet without the melancholy Dane. Gentlemen, let us solemnly remind you that Queen Victoria is a woman.

THE Yosemite Commissioners contemplate making improvements in the Valley by the erection of a more commodious hotel and the construction and improvement of the roads. No doubt the utmost care will be taken to add to the attractions of this marvelous picture land, and this can be done by leaving the majestic scenery in all particulars as it is, aside from a more commodious tavern for travelers and the mending of the means of locomotion.

IT is gratifying to note that the "pure" California brandy, sent out of this State despite the vigorous efforts of the health authorities here, will be detained at New York pending investigation. Ex-Collector Wise may find food for thought in the action of the Eastern authorities. His zeal exceeded his judgment by the difference between right and wrong. The disgrace of sending a fraudulent and hurtful product out of the country as an article of California manufacture would have been his, excepting for the prompt action and clearer judgment of the Eastern authorities.

THERE is to be a monument in honor of Frank McCop-pin placed in Golden Gate Park. Such remembrance of that honest citizen has been earned by him many times.
 The people of San Francisco owe to him more than any other man their beautiful park—a heritage for all time.
 The qualities possessed by McCoppin, and which were recognized by every one who knew him, were enduring.
 With many opportunities for wealth in public service, he died a poor man. Let the marble shaft be reared. It will speak a well-defined and lasting tribute to a lofty and self-respecting character.

CLAUS SPRECKELS has sued the Examiner for $1,000,000 because that object of general disesteem has made false statements about certain transactions of his. In this community, where the character of the Examiner is known, it would be hard to convict of libel, for the reason that its bad reputation destroys the venom of its utterances. But Mr. Spreckels has large interests, and his business connections extend beyond local conditions and influences. The untruths appearing in the Examiner are likely to be copied by publications throughout the country, where Hearst's paper is not appreciated at its true value. For this reason, doubtless, Mr. Spreckels feels called upon to take notice of the Examiner's utterances, and bring it to account for its libelous statements. Wherever it is known the Examiner, being without character is without influence, is powerless for either good or evil.

EUGENE V. DEBS is sending missionaries out West, in the hope of organizing labor for the seemingly inevitable struggle between labor and capital. Mr. Debs is forwarding his missionaries in a "co-operative commercial van," and his representatives are men who were connected with the Chicago riots and the events which preceded them. Debs will find in many localities soil awaiting this sort of seed; and if the harvest is not ripe by the fall of 1899, we shall be surprised. The elements are plainly to be seen looming through the distance, and their combination may very well excite apprehension.

WORDEN, the murderer and train wrecker, has been respited, pending the action by the Supreme Court upon his case. In the interests of good order and the sanctity of life, this man should pay the penalty of his crime.
 Governor Budd did well his duty when he refused to interfere in his behalf. When Worden planned to wreck that train at Sacramento he did not know whether the life of one man or of a dozen men would be sacrificed; and it is evident that at that time he did not care. The bones of engineer Clark lie under the ground, but they call in an unmistakable voice for justice. The safety of society demands that Worden shall hang. Durrant's life is also temporarily spared; but there is the least possible hope for him. These delays will put off but not defeat the day of retribution.

SEÑOR ANDRADE, the new Mexican Consul at Los Angeles, is the right sort of a man. On the 21st inst.
 the Manufacturers' Association of that city holds a meeting, and Señor Andrade says he will urge upon that organization the sending of two energetic representatives to Mexico for the purpose of drumming up trade for Los Angeles. The Consul says there is business in his country to be had for the asking, and that the merchants of Los Angeles are entitled to it. This is an object lesson for San Francisco. There is business in Mexico that belongs to this city, in the sense that San Francisco has the best facilities for getting it and holding it. But it will be necessary to be awake, to utilize every advantage, and to overcome every opposition. Beautiful resolutions and ponderous whereases will hardly fill the bill. The people at the South use a different sort of ammunition to bring down their trade.

A NOTORIOUS woman chose to end her life in this city one evening this week by taking poison, because of the sudden termination of a temporary attachment.
 There was nothing remarkable in such a tragic ending of an unfortunate existence, for the records of every great city remorselessly spell out the fate of those who travel such a path. But the daily press of San Francisco seize upon this dragged page torn from the half-world's history, and flaunt it in the face of innocent youth and self-respecting men and women in all its repulsive and unclean details as being worthy of their attention and fit for the atmosphere of their homes. Pictures embellish their pages, and columns of space are devoted to the parade of subjects that ought to be excluded from the fireside as one would shut the door against the plague. And if in its recital the reputations of respected and innocent persons can be dragged into the circle of the nameless creature of a moment, so much greater the satisfaction. There is no limit, no bound, to the brutal "enterprise" of the daily press, which thrives on scandal and gloats over the repulsive.

THE PRACTICE OF THE LAW AND OF MEDICINE

PROFESSOR JORDAN, President of the Stanford Junior University, invariably knows the truth of the matter about which he is going to talk, before he opens his mouth. He is not a man given to making assertions first and seeking proof of them afterwards. He has just said substantially that there are not more than twelve able lawyers of the first class in the whole bar of San Francisco, and not more than the same number of really skilled physicians in the whole city. This is a strikingly small percentage of genuine ability to find in a city that contains about 1,800 lawyers and 1,200 doctors. According to this showing, there is but one lawyer in every 150 to whom a man may, in case of need, entrust the legal safeguarding of his life, liberty, or fortune, and only one physician in every hundred who excels in the greatest of all the professions. Of course it is not possible to demonstrate the truth of these statements with the accuracy of absolute mathematical precision. But with good opportunities for judging, and undoubted capacity to judge, it is very possible to come near enough to the facts. In opinions formed in that way, Professor Jordan's judgment does not stand alone. It has been expressed in these columns, time and time again, during the past twenty years. Indeed, in regard to the doctors it has been more than expressed. Some years ago it was pretty well demonstrated by the NEWS LETTER in one of the most persistent and thorough journalistic efforts ever made anywhere. Something like 400 doctors (?) were found to be in active practice, who were mere charlatans without education, license, or fitness. After a long struggle against this state of affairs, a law was placed on the statute book which required doctors to have a license from some school "incorporated" for that purpose. It was a poor measure of relief, but was the best that could be had at that time, and has only been slightly improved since. As a result, all the medical-isms "incorporated" and began to turn out others of their own kind at short order. That is how it comes that the State is flooded to-day with the class of medicos that President Jordan must have in his mind's eye. Even at this late day, there are five medical "schools" in this young city, where there are not hospital and other facilities for more than one. Though both the Toland and Cooper Colleges are making very creditable efforts to reach a fair degree of efficiency, they are not producing physicians of a high order of merit. Even their own faculties seem to be conscious of this, for they persistently resist every effort to have their graduating classes examined by an independent State Board, or by anybody but themselves.

The same lack of sound and thorough training afflicts most of our lawyers in about the same degree that it does our doctors. Half-educated attorneys are the result of any legal education being imparted in this State at present, and, unfortunately the office practice that young men can acquire with too many firms is about as bad as it can be. In the pioneer days, the gold fever drew many able lawyers here, and the Bar of the State was at one time a credit to it. But the giants of those days have nearly all passed away, and their places have seldom been taken by men of anything like their mental stature. The practice of the law has fallen from its high estate, and many of the successful attorneys of to-day are those who join clubs, societies, and even churches for unworthy personal purposes; who dip into the filthy pool of politics in order to secure pushes, and pulls and other malign influences with which to defile our Temples of Justice; who fix juries, tamper with officials, find witnesses to order, and even trump up cases with which to bedevil honest citizens. To stem this evil tide we have underpaid judges at the mercy at every election of these corrupt owners of pushes and pulls. It is really a marvel that we have judges as good as the many who now adorn the Bench. The twelve really able and strong men, who are at the head of their profession and to whom President Jordan refers, are the men who ought to be our judges. Seats on the Judicial Bench ought to be the Supreme ambition of such men's lives. It is the fault of the State that it is not. It would find it cheaper in the long run, and in every way more acceptable, to attract the best talent in the only way that it can be attracted, i. e. by paying for it. As to the trickery, unscrupulous, and, in too many instances criminal practices of attorneys, some way must early be found to bring them out into the light of day, and to prevent them further abusing the high privileges conferred upon them by law. New York has made a fair beginning in this direction. The Legislature has provided a new and easier way of purging the profession of the law of its unscrupulous members. Proceedings for disbarment in this State are available, but the initiative is left to the Bar Association, and, as a consequence nothing is done. There is a feeling growing up in the public mind that will not much longer tolerate the crying abuses found around too many of our Courts.

Cover the Patrol Wagons. The patrol wagons of the Police Department of this city should all be covered, so that those who are compelled from any cause to ride in them, may be hidden from the gaze of the curious. Nor is it at all an inspiring spectacle to note the hurried transit through the streets of gentlemen inebriated or injured, elevated to the view of all the street, on the seat of a patrol wagon, and literally forced upon the gaze of everyone within the block by the violent and continuous clanging of a bell. No sight can be more disgusting to the refined, or brutalizing to the vulgar than the view of a broken and bruised head or face—bloody, dirty and sickening, as its unfortunate possessor is literally paraded toward the Receiving Hospital on a perch in the official van. The innocent unfortunate deserve no such disgraceful distinction, and the guilty should not be thus inflicted upon the sight of inoffensive citizens abroad on the streets. There ought to be a defense for both; and it can be brought about at once at small cost, and to the distinct advantage of San Francisco's good name. Not being harbarians, we should look upon this sort of thing as civilized people elsewhere do. The wagons should not be sent out uncovered.

Again, there is another feature of this particular branch of service which requires different treatment. When the patrol wagon is sent from the Receiving Hospital, it should be accompanied by one of the attendant physicians. Within the memory of the writer a considerable number of injured persons have died in the wagon from their injuries on their way to the hospital. A few simple remedies taken by the physician to the scene of accident or sudden illness—a brief account of which might in the great majority of cases be telephoned to the office—and by him judiciously used, might save life that would otherwise be lost. In cases of poisoning, or apoplexy, or violent hemorrhages, and in many other troubles, the time lost between the scene of accident and the hospital frequently means death. Should the patrol wagon be accompanied by a physician, temporary relief could be at once given, and so much precious time saved.

But, first of all, let us have no more such disgusting spectacle as was witnessed on last Wednesday afternoon, when a poor wretch was hauled through Kearny and Market streets in the clanging patrol wagon, his face streaming with blood and his hair matted with gore—a sight to sicken men and horrify women.

Bibles, Philanthropists and Chinese.

In the minds of intelligent and unprejudiced men, who are by careful observation entitled to respectful consideration and weight, the opinion is practically unanimous that the efforts made by Eastern philanthropists and Western enthusiasts for the moral elevation of the Chinaman and his ultimate salvation along the perplexing and multiplied theological highways honored by civilization, have been a disappointment and a failure. It is held, and not without corroborative testimony strong as proof of Holy Writ, that the well-meant efforts of the Christian churches are wasted upon the child-like Celestial, whose Confucian philosophy, hacked by four thousand years of tradition and precedent, has thus far been able to withstand the tender messages of the gospel of peace on earth, good will to men, so justly dear to the hearts of the faithful. It is asserted that the thunderbolts of truth have been broken and shivered about the feet of Joss, whose followers absorb only such knowledge from the wreck as is instructive in the ways of wickedness and a light to the paths of deceit. Those who have watched with dispassionate eye the grafting of our civilization upon the peculiar character of the Chinese, through uncolored spectacles noted practical developments, and summed up the Celestial vineyard, have abandoned hope of the contest, and declare loudly that the prayers of the righteous and labors of the missionaries avail not; that the millions of bibles sent them effect no good end, and the millions of money lured from the reluctant pockets of Eastern philanthropists and poured into the Chinese Empire accomplish nothing.

There are two sides to this question, as there are to all others. Those who are looking at the moral advancement of the Chinese, through the importation of millions of bibles, have confined their observation to the Chinese character alone; they have failed to follow out in all its branches the vast industry of book-making as applied to the Chinese trade, and have overlooked the beneficent results of such enterprises. It is a fact that the Chinese use many of the bibles sent to them for fuel; and it is equally undeniable that the thrifty heathen have a habit of stuffing the leaves of their missionary bibles into the soles of their shoes. Owing to the primitive make of celestial walking gear, they are of great thickness, and it is undeniably true that the Chinese use up thousands upon thousands of bibles in making their shoes. As a means of education applied in this manner, even the bible would be seriously handicapped, and its power for good very greatly curtailed. But there is another and much more hopeful view to take of this industry of Chinese bible trade. The manufacture involves the employment of many thousands of deserving and industrious people of our own color. Men, women, girls, and boys are necessary to the production of these books. Machinery, paper-makers, bookbinders, packers, ink-makers—and a hundred and one articles necessary to the work must be paid for. The wealthy philanthropist whose generosity turns toward China as a field for spiritual development and moral elevation, usually has no time to note the wants of humanity at home, nor has he particular care for the sufferings of those about his door. He is not, as a rule, the man who heads the subscription for fresh-air funds, free ice in summer and free coal in the winter for those of his own blood whose misfortunes bring them want and suffering. In his advance upon idols beyond seas he unconsciously tramples on the flowers at his feet. If his money did not swell the Chinese bible funds it would remain hoarded in his strong boxes. When his purse strings are loosened for the saving of the beathen he sets machinery in motion, gives employment to thousands of deserving poor, and thus indirectly is made to perform a valuable service—circulate his wealth at home and his bibles abroad—at once putting bread in the mouth of want and a covering to its body, and affording fuel to the beathen and a foundation for their feet.

As To The New Water Rates. The Board of Supervisors by a vote of eight to four have adopted a schedule of charges which the Spring Valley Water Company may not exceed in its dealings with its customers. It is admitted all round that under this schedule the company will have difficulty to maintain the 6 per cent dividends which it has paid for years. Under no circumstances can it earn more, whilst the chances are that it will earn less. The owners of a public use, such as our city's water supply undoubtedly is, are entitled to earn a reasonable interest on their capital stock, and any rates that will not permit them to do that are clearly illegal and void. There can be no doubt about that fact, because the law of the matter has been finally determined in our Courts. In the case of this very company a test case was made up and taken before three of the ablest and most upright judges that even sat upon the Superior Bench, and it was by them decided that the Supervisors could not fix water rates at a point below that which would permit of the payment of reasonable dividends. We all know that 6 per cent per annum is below, rather than above, the earning power of loanable money in this city. Our principal Savings Banks charge from 6½ to 7 per cent for loans on the most stable securities. With risks of damage from floods and other causes, and with the cost of repairs and betterments that are nearly always needed, our local water company has every right to earn a margin above the market value of money.

It follows necessarily that a bare 6 per cent is a very low allowance. It is not up to what the use of money well secured, brings in this market, to say nothing of the attendant risks in the case before us. In fixing the rates they have, the Supervisors favored water consumers as much as they dared to do, in view of the law. It is almost certain that they went too far, and that a test case would result in the setting aside of schedules of more than doubtful adequacy. We know not what the company may decide to do, but we do know that many of the stockholders favor legal resistance to the reductions.

In the face of this plain and undeniable statement of the situation, that demagogic organ of the mob and enemy of everything that is fair and of good repute, the Examiner, comes with glaring head-lines, statements that it must know to be false, and accusations that are as atrocious as they are libelous, and endeavors to work up an excitement that either means destruction of the company's investments, or its inflammatory words mean nothing. The eight Supervisors who went as far on the road to confiscation as they dared, are nevertheless branded as "enemies of the people," and charged with a "brazen disregard of duty," as "men who have betrayed their friends," and have "abandoned honesty for plunder." All this and much more of the same tenor. These Supervisors, be it remembered, have not been deciding a political question, but one of mere equity. They were in a sense judicial officers, and were bound by clear decisions of the courts. They knew, by hard figures, that they could not travel further on the road with the Examiner than they did, without their work being set aside, to the great detriment of everybody concerned. Yet we are told that these men "violated their public and private pledges" (which, by the way, they had no right to give in a quasi-judicial matter), and that they stand out as "a band who have sacrificed honesty, decency, and reputation," and as having been "elected for honesty but worked for plunder." Is this outrageous language such as self-respecting men ought to endure without rebuke, such as, perhaps, only the courts can administer? We think not. It is due to public life, and to the men in it, that such charges should be answered. That they are without an atom of truth is obvious to every man with an understanding of the situation. This annual recurrence of turmoil and attempts at confiscation of vested interests, ought to be brought to an end, and no better time to end it could possibly be than right now. It should be remembered that there are something like 8,000 stockholders in the company, and that its shares are well scattered around among the thrifty middle class.

They have invested their money for the city's good, and have no right to be annually subjected to the hounding, harassing, and plunder-threats of this unscrupulous organ of the great unwashed, who for the most part pay no water rates. If the popularly elected Supervisors withstand this pressure as well as they do, it is because of the persuasion and influence of the many friends they have among the respectable classes of our citizens, who are interested in Spring Valley. It is well that the stock of the company is so well held at home. It is that fact which annually defeats the would-be confiscators, and will, let us hope, succeed in protecting this valuable public use, until the people see fit to make it their own by honest purchase.

Our Penal Institutions. The outbreak of the prisoners at San Quentin should bring home to every reflecting mind the truth of what the NEWS LETTER has been saying for long years past, namely, that our whole penal system badly needs reforming and should be made to conform more nearly to the practices and principles of modern penology. The world during the last half century has not been standing still in the matters of deterring and reforming criminals. Penology has become almost an exact science, and very beneficent have been the results of its rigid application. Goals once crowded are now almost empty, and crime has been lessened from sixty to seventy per cent. Those are the latest figures of the British Penal Department. In our own land good work has been done. The prisons of Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, and New York are a credit to those States. Unfortunately, up to this time little or no attention has been paid in California to reforms in this direction, and, as might well be expected, we are bound to pay dearly for our neglect. Our easy-going prison discipline is attracting criminals from all over the union, whilst it is failing to reform those of home manufacture. Our two penitentiaries are full to overflowing, and the end is not yet, for the criminal classes are increasing at a lamentable rate. The trouble at San Quentin may be subdued for the time being, but it will remain a smoldering fire that will, as surely as effect follows cause, break out into a flame some day. It is the system, or rather want of system, that is to blame. Warden Hale we know to be a kind-hearted man, and that the prisoners are only too well fed and treated generally, we have reason to believe; but he is not a good disciplinarian, and has not the means and appliances to be one, if his bent were that way. No man alive to-day could make good prisoners out of the congregated system, which necessarily prevails in the inadequate buildings at San Quentin. Of the inmates, about one-third are young hoodlums, who freely mix with hardened criminals, of whom many have passed half their lives in durance vile. In consequence, the youth who once enters those walls leaves all hope behind, and we manufacture criminals instead of reforming them. Young men with criminal opportunities, and perhaps inclinations, can be reformed, and it is being done in a most marked degree wherever the principles of modern peology are applied. It is not possible within the limits of a newspaper article, to give a clear and intelligent description of what have become the tried and established principles of prison treatment, nor to spread before our readers statistics of the happy results that have flowed from their adoption. These things must be studied by our Legislators and others responsible for the management of our public institutions. Perhaps a special commission, composed of the right kind of men, would be better still. Clearly our stock of knowledge on this exceedingly important subject badly needs to be increased. For the present it is enough to say that it is a burning outrage and a shame that women prisoners are confined within the walls of San Quentin in the sight and hearing of men there for the period of their natural lives. There is more in this than meets the eye, but it may not be stated. It is found to be a disturbing element as long as it continues. Again, there is little doubt that the sudden stoppage of opium sales produced the recent outbreak. It ought not to have been done in the way it was, and especially as the officers were mainly responsible for its existence. For many years, and under all administrations, guards have engaged in this traffic and grown rich on official salaries of $60 a month. The penitentiary at Folsom should be enlarged and improved. Its large area of untilled land should be walled in and made to produce most of the food required by the prisoners, and those nearing their discharge should be treated differently from the others, and taught how to use their liberty when they get it.

John H. Wise John H. Wise, the ex-collector of the Port, is in an unenviable position with certain strong-minded, out possibly mistaken women after him with grave charges that whilst in office he lent aid and comfort to Chinese engaged in the nefarious traffic of importing Chinese slave girls for immoral purposes. We do not pretend to know what truth there is in the charges, but, if they can be proven, he has violated a law that is very sacred in the eyes of many of our people, and the case against him is all the worse, in that he was the chief executive officer whose oath and duty alike made it obligatory upon him to rigidly enforce the law. If he has been aiding and abetting the rascally Chinese engaged in its violation, or even winking at their operations, he is in a bad fix. Whilst referring to this matter, however, we can not refrain from saying that whereas that law was approved by almost everybody at one time, circumstances have since arisen that render its wisdom more than doubtful. We have amongst us in this State over 100,000 China-men, and only a few hundred China-women. The world is the world, and the men and women in it do not much change because of the color of their skins. We know how it would be in a like case with men of our own race and higher civilization. There are startling facts within our knowledge that this restrictive law is indirectly responsible, together with the hard times, in instilling a very shocking degree of vice, and demoral-ization generally, into women of our own race. The subject may only be very lightly touched here, but it needs probing by some authorized body. If an ordinance existed rendering it a misdemeanor for white women, (female missionaries and teachers included) to be found within certain described limits known as Chinatown, we believe it would soon prove a measure that would commend itself to all men. If there be any doubt about the urgent necessity of such an ordinance, the Finance Committee of the Board of Supervisors has full power to investigate and get at the bottom facts. If they could be fully published, we think there would be danger of Chinatown being razed to the ground within 24 hours. Australia, notwithstanding a British treaty, adopted an exclusion act 25 years before we did, and did it on the sole ground of the social demoralization that would inevitably flow from a one-sexed immigration. Our people will yet be driven to attack the evil from that point of view.

Marriages The people who are rushing off in tugs to be married in evasion of the laws of the State are likely to bring upon themselves a peck of trouble. They remain citizens of the State and as such are bound by its laws. Our statutes provide how, and between whom marriages may be contracted, and it is a well known rule of law that that cannot be done indirectly which is forbidden to be done directly. A tug or other vessel with an American register is deemed at sea to be part of American soil, and a marriage entered into on one is subject to the laws of the State whence she hails or to which she returns. A marriage on a local tug outside the three mile limit is as if it were entered into within the boundaries of the State, and, to render it legal, it must be recorded in the same manner that all other marriages are. The rule that a marriage that is legal where it is contracted is legal everywhere, does not apply to the class of cases we are discussing. That rule is intended merely to legalize foreign marriages. There is no law at sea, except the Captain's will, and that must not be exercised in contravention of his country's laws. He cannot by any act of his legalize that which would be illegal if done at home. He cannot, without the consent of parents or guardians, legalize marriage between parties under age, nor those within the forbidden degree of consanguinity, nor protect bigamy from its due punishment. Divorced persons cannot now remarry in California within twelve months of the filing of the final decree. No sea Captain, at any distance from the shore, could relieve parties of the disability imposed by this section. It is a popular fallacy to believe that a streak of water three miles wide legalizes that which would otherwise be illegal.

The Labor Leaders' Way To Prosperity. The labor leaders have recently been attempting to solve the problem as to how to bring about better times. The Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor, at the head of which stands Mr. Samuel Gompers, has addressed to the President, Cabinet, and Congress of the United States, a memorial describing in strong terms "the humiliating poverty and countless privations suffered by multitudes of our working people," and appealing to the National authorities for speedy relief. It is to be feared that there is only too much truth in many of the representations made, and if there were any merit in the remedies proposed, the Labor League would be entitled to all possible sympathy and support. It makes four recommendations for immediate adoption: (1) it wants a rigid enforcement of the 8 hour law, (2) restricted immigration, (3) an increased volume of the National currency, and (4) "liberal appropriations for government public works and for the improvement of rivers and harbors." If all classes of labor are to work but 8 hours, the cost of production must be enhanced, and our commerce correspondingly reduced. The exclusion of the right kind of immigrants is an impossibility in this country. An inflated currency never has and never will prove a lasting benefit to working men. Appropriations for public works are simply taxes, of which the poor have to bear their full share, and usually prove wasteful devices to rob Peter in order to pay Paul. The Labor League should try again. There is obviously nothing for them in their present recommendations.

The Man for Postmaster.

The duties of the postmaster of this city are of a practical character. The fact that an aspiring and ambitious citizen has made a certain number of speeches during a political campaign, or that he has held office through the kindly assistance of political friends who may have found him useful to their personal ends, do not constitute a valid claim to the place made vacant by the death of the lamented McCoppin. It has been the custom to regard this high and responsible office as a political perquisite, and, as a result, the best men have not always filled the position. If the will of the people of San Francisco were consulted in the selection of their postmaster it would be found that they would select one of two men—either an employee who has been in the department for years, who has shown himself capable and efficient, and who has by practical application mastered the intricacies and details of the service; or they would choose a business man whose successful efforts were known to them and whose recognized qualities would guarantee their application to the office. A practical business man would necessarily measure the position of postmaster by the same general principles obtaining in his private fortunes; and such application would mean that the postoffice would be conducted on strict business principles. The introduction of civil service into the various branches has gone very far toward relief of the public from the unfortunate effects of changing administrations; but why not go a step further and advance to the highest office a subordinate who is familiar with all details and personally well-equipped for the greater responsibility? Such a course would meet the hearty approval of business, which knows little and cares less about politics, and reward faithful service by merited recognition. But if this cannot be done, then give us a business man who will devote his personal attention to the details of the office. The politician who is always hanging on for something to turn up—whose lips are expectantly puckered to grasp the plethoric public teat, should be given a prolonged rest.

The Queen's Jubilee. Long to be remembered will be the scenes to be witnessed in and around London during the week of the Queen's Jubilee.

The press of that city came down hard on the disposition at first evinced to make money and a gaudy display of wealth out of the occasion, and matters are reported to have improved in that regard. It would have been a pity if the idealism that should mark this great commemoration, should have been lost sight of in the most sordid money grubbing. It is not alone the 60th anniversary of the Queen's reign that is to be celebrated, but the idealism of a mighty, peaceful and prosperous Empire upon which the sun never sets. The British people at home and abroad, owe even more than they probably realize to their constitutional Queen, who throughout her long reign has reconciled the theory of Monarchy with the fact of Republicanism, without diminishing either the dignity of the throne, or the self-governing habit of the people; who has enabled the unwritten constitution to pass in quiet and safety over the deep ravine which divides the England of the past from the England of to-day. Her people everywhere are rejoiced at the length and achievements of a reign not even yet terminated, and with a very natural instinct are disposed to look upon it as an answer to their oft repeated prayer, "God save the Queen!" Our local British residents will on the occasion be as united and as enthusiastic as are their brethren all over the world. For Americans, we think, we can truly say that they respect good Queen Victoria, and are at one with their kinsmen in doing her honor.

THE third season of the Frawley Company opened Monday night at the Columbia Theatre, with an indifferent performance of The Fatal Card, a worse than indifferent melodrama made by Haddon Chambers and B. C. Stephenson. The theatre, freshly beautified for the occasion, was crowded to the walls with a fairly representative first-night audience, many of whom could, without exceeding the bounds of modesty, feel themselves to be persons of better taste than Mr. Frawley's choice of play would pre-suppose. There were those, however, who approved the piece riotously, and others still who, loving the Frawleys with something of fierce, domestic loyalty, found entertainment in the personalities of such members of the old band as were in the cast, which was wholly disproportionate to their enjoyment of the drama itself. I have a friendly feeling of my own for the Frawley players, a little of that local pride which seems to have infected the community; but fortunately for the entente cordiale that exists between my editor and my conscience, it is the kind of friendship that is an incentive rather than a drawback to candor. In all goodwill, I can say that I did not enjoy myself Monday night; that The Fatal Card is not the sort of a play to invite the enjoyment of persons who purposely stay away from Morosco's; that it was a big managerial error for Mr. Frawley, in the face of having seen an Eastern performance of this nightmare, to have been gulled into purchasing the rights to it by the old gold brick game of "New York success;" and, after once having it on his hands, that it was a bigger managerial error still to have unloaded it upon himself on the very first week of the most ambitious and expensive season he has yet undertaken in San Francisco. The present Frawley Company is no joke; it is a high-salaried organization, consisting mainly of players of reputation. It is not to be slighted by faint praise from the critics, for it aims to give first-class productions that as such challenge criticism. The opening week is naturally the most important of the season—it is supposed to give us a fair sample of the quality of the plays and the quality of the players. And in justice to the company and the repertory, it must be said that both had a very bad introduction on Monday night.

It is a question if even a good melodrama would have justified opening the season with a type of play so foreign to the clean and Godly drama in which the Frawleys have made their prosperous record. I am not on principle opposed to melodrama, even of the common or kindergarten variety; there are melodramas that are wholesome, exciting and diverting. Bar the scene between the father and son in this Fatal Card, and you have a play that is an offense to sanity. In it there are practically no inventive originality, no legitimate constructive skill, no picture of manners that may appeal to civilized man—absolutely nothing that is not an affront to the intellectual and artistic senses. It out-yellows fake journalism on its own field of crime, underclothes, illiterature, disordered sensation and cheap vulgarisms.

The fatal card—an ordinary playing card—is torn in two in the prologue, which is laid "At the foot of the Rockies" (a London pastoral picture of the wild and bleeding West, which looks as though the author's credulity had been imposed upon by one of those daring tourists who shoot bear and bison in Golden Gate Park), and it takes four acts loaded with action and remarks of an extraneous character before they are brought together again. The hero saves the villain from the lynchmen's rope, and receives from him one-half of the card to serve in lieu of a strawberry mark for future identification. And later, after the Wild West has gone home to England and the villain has been an accomplice to the murder of the hero's father and finally got the hero himself bound to a newel post in front of an infernal machine that is guaranteed to blow him into shreds in five minutes by the clock, the long-lost pasteboard is discovered in the hero's bosom—and he is sa-haved. Somebody has to die in order to oblige the plot, so the villain does it in dynamite and pink calcium. The hero loves the villain's daughter, and they are united in the same rosy glow that illumines poppa's demise.

I have only told the beginning and end. I could never hope to tell all that happens between. There is a bathing scene that for sheer, clumsy vulgarity beats anything I have ever seen. The suggestion of a naked man behind a fence, decorating the air with his raiment, being peered upon by a lascivious old maid, wallowing in disreputable double entendre with the soubrette, is something of a shock even to my shiny morals. Mr. Thomas Ross was to have played this part of the merman, but it was announced from the stage that Mr. Ross had been attacked by tonsillitis (doubtless having caught cold at the uddress rehearsal) and Mr. Frawley sacrificed himself to the occasion. Mr. Frawley had already announced his annual forswearance of the stage, and I felt rather sorry to see him make his annual reappearance under these embarrassing circumstances. I can only hope that the complications which attended Pilar Morin's similar specialty will not overtake Mr. Frawley in the very flower of his career.

As I intimated earlier, there is one good scene—that between the hero and his father. It is the single touch of character in the play, and Frank Worthing and Theodore Hamilton make it stand out beautifully. Mr. Worthing's acting in the prologue was surprisingly ghastly and atrocious, but after that he pulled himself together and put some very excellent work into this very bad play. Mr. Hamilton had only the one scene, but it was enough to mark the artist.

Miss Gladys Wallace acted a poor soubrette role rather uneasily, and Miss Eleanor Moretti's genius was smothered in a bad dialect. There seems to be a superstition at the Columbia that because Miss Madge Carr Cook is an impossible actress she should always play an impossible part. If this is going to continue I should prefer Miss Cook when there is no impossible part in the cast—she fits altogether too well. Miss Bates, as the heroine, had little to do and accepted it gracefully. Wilson Enos had a great deal to do as the assistant villain, and I am sorry to say that he largely overdid that. If Mr. Enos would be satisfied with exerting the energies of one man instead of two, I see no reason why he should not be a character actor. J. M. Colville, an actor of excellent experience and repute, added gratuitous comedy to the agonies of the villain. The part is had enough as it stands, an arrogant, introspective, self-worshipping, and self-pitying villain, highly psychologized and gloweringly pessimistic, who envies the dead and makes wide ironic speeches as he crimes. A character of this kind, abetted by blind staggers and other wild actorisms which Mr. Colville brought to bear upon it, not only exceeds humanity but passes imagination.

At the end of the third act Mr. Frawley, in a characteristically sincere and ineloquent speech, thanked everybody, including the critics, for having made the Frawley company a possibility. He said that he believed in, asked for, criticism, but that he did not believe in personal criticism which ridiculed the player. Then he said, "I am glad of this opportunity to square myself with the critics." This was apropos of an interview with Mr. Frawley, published by Mr. Frawley in the Dramatic Mirror, wherein it would seem that the only criticism in San Francisco that Mr. Frawley admires is written by Mr. Peter Robertson for the Chronicle. Some of the other critics, it was intimated in the interview, indulge in "brutal personal attacks" that are very trying to the manager and the actor. Now, for the life of me, I cannot see that it was necessary for Mr. Frawley to thus publicly "square himself," as he phrased it. Mr. Frawley has just as much right to publish his opinion of the critics as the critics have to publish their's of him; and I cannot find it in my heart to believe that any of us are so vindictively sensitive as to resent Mr. Frawley's judgment to an extent where it would influence our judgment against him. Criticism, as I take it, considers the actor, the author, or the manager only as subject matter of a particular department of art in which the people are largely interested.

The critic is supposed to be the opinion of one man written to the best of his knowledge, and impartially for an impartial public. If the critic's reward were only to bask in the sunshine of Mr. Frawley's, or any actor-manager's approval, Mr. Frawley's "squaring" of himself on Monday night would have had promise and purpose. But Mr. Frawley forgets that criticism is not written for the actor, but about the actor, and while it is part of the actor's business to please the critic, I have never heard that it is any honest concern of the critic's whether he pleases the actor or not.

ASHTON STEVENS.

Daniel Boone, the veteran lion-tamer, contends that it is only a question of time and opportunity when the best regulated lion in the business will try to make a meal of his master. At the Orpheum are three lions, all in the pink of appetite, and a young woman named Adgie, who sings, dances and makes general merriment with them in the cage. Up to the time of writing Adgie is still alive and active, but she can scarcely be regarded by life insurance men as a good risk. There is excitement in Adgie's act, and there is a lot of fun left in old Billy Carter, who is again at the Orpheum with his trusty banjo. Next week Russell Brothers, "the Irish servant girls;" Vaidis Twin Sisters, aerial experts, and Johnson and Dean, imperial exponents of cultured colored aristocracy.

Nanon is being well done at the Tivoli. Next week comes the long-promised review of the town, Miss Frisco, mirroring familiar characters, scenes and incidents in the manner of the New York, Boston and Philadelphia reviews, which have been very successful. Emperor Norton, Ned Weanaway, and various local celebrities will be gently satirized. The entire Tivoli company, augmented by Tommy Leary, who has just finished a successful season in the East, will be cast in the production. Special features will be the ballet, and a novel light dance executed by Miss Ida Watt.

Sunday night the Lilliputians open at the Baldwin in their new extravaganza, Merry Tramps. Bertha Jaegar, Adolph Zink, and Franz Ebert have tramp parts, and tiny Ludwig Merkel is said to be drolly cast as Pisang, the missing link. The scenery will of course be gorgeously spectacular, and it is promised that the music is new and snappy. Special matinees will be given on Wednesdays for children, old and young.

The Fatal Card will run another week at the Columbia, at the expiration of which the Frawleys give the first production of Lorimer Stoddard's new comedy, which has been named The Interloper. The author is now in San Francisco, and will witness the premiere.

Mr. Denis O'Sullivan will be given a testimonial concert at the Native Sons' Hall on Monday night, prior to his departure for London. Mr. O'Sullivan will sing fifteen or more songs. Mrs. Walter McGavin will also sing. Mrs. Carmichael-Carr, accompanist.

Mrs. Eunice Westwater, whose fine contralto voice has won her the reputation of an artist of ability, announces a song recital to take place next Wednesday evening at Native Sons' Hall. The lady will present an excellent programme, and this, with her rich voice and artistic method, should, and doubtless will, insure a large attendance of music lovers.

Moët and Chandon.

The cellars of Messrs. Moët & Chandon, the largest champagne house in the world, contain over eight miles of walks and about twenty-six million bottles of champagne. The different sections of the vast cellars are named after the various countries to which shipments are made. Russia and England occupy the largest place, special provision having been made for the requirements of the Courts. In this country Moët & Chandon has also been received with great favor.—Hotel Gazette.

That intelligent person who declared that the way to a man's heart was through his stomach, must have just dined at the Maison Riche, Grant avenue and Geary street, where the magnificent service, splendid viands, fine wines, and appropriate music, drive discontent and care away every evening from 5 to 9 o'clock. The man who hasn't dined at the Maison Riche has yet a delightful surprise in store for him.

The Ape, the Idiot, and Other People. By W. C. Morrow. Published by J. B. Lippincott Company, Philadelphia. 1897.

In a brave cover gleaming with scarlet and gold there comes to us from the Lippincott press a collection of short stories by Mr. W. C. Morrow. Who Mr. Morrow is it is not necessary to tell the readers of the daily or weekly papers of San Francisco (and how few there be that escape reading them!) for of the fourteen stories in the volume a baker's dozen appeared first in The Overland, the NEWS LETTER, the Argonaut, the Examiner, or the Call. They are remarkable stories, and manifest a strong and active imagination—an imagination predisposed to dwell upon the weird, the terrible, and the abnormal. It is not easy to say which is the best of the stories: suffice it to say that we read all with interest and pleasure, and liked best "The Inmate of the Dungeon," and "An Uncommon View of It." Some of the stories tend to raise the hair more than we, personally, quite like: but then we have perhaps an over-fastidious dislike to getting our locks ruffled. For this reason "An Uncommon View of It" pleases us better than "His Unconquerable Enemy" or "The Monster-maker," both of which, however, are excellently told. "An Uncommon View of It" tells how an able and prosperous lawyer discovered that his most trusted and intimate friend had stolen his wife's affections: and follows the workings of his mind from the first wild animal desire to kill the guilty pair to his ultimate resolve to kill himself, and leave them all his property. There is little that is funny in any of these stories: indeed, only one of them can be said to have any humorous touches at all; the one entitled "Two Singular Men." Mr. Morrow is a practised and skillful teller of a short story: indeed, he tells a tale so well that we would fain see him now and then devote his pen to themes less somber and tragic than these, to gentler scenes and a lighter vein. Why should the writers of Western short stories turn so constantly as Mr. Morrow, Francis Emma Dawson and Ella Higginson do, to the tragic and terrible? Is there nothing light, gay, or joyous in this Western life? Of course, there are tragedies, wasted lives, broken hopes, shattered fortunes, and blasted characters in plenty: and it is not the fashion nowadays to retain the simple faith that sustained our parents in their hours of suffering and adversity, but are we therefore to be forever deprived of our just due of "cakes and ale?" Even the tragedies of Shakespeare are relieved by touches of humor and flashes of fun. Aristotle tells us that the function of tragic poetry is to excite fear and horror by contemplation of fit objects of those emotions, and we suppose that the rule is applicable to the short story as well. We congratulate Mr. Morrow upon the elegant appearance of his little collection of stories, and thank him for the pleasure which a perusal of them has given us.

Lady Kilpatrick, a tale of to-day, by Robert Buchanan. Published in the Globe Library by Rand, McNally and Company, of Chicago and New York.

Many years before the date at which the story opens, a young Irish nobleman had fallen in love with a beautiful peasant girl, Moya Macartney, by whom he has a son, Desmond, who is brought up in ignorance of his parentage, and becomes a great favorite with the people who dwell in and around Kilpatrick Castle. He is a handsome, jovial, open-hearted youth, full of fun and love of sport. His father has long believed Moya to be dead, but in due time she turns up, is rescued from a burning building by her son, and acknowledged as Lady Kilpatrick. For it is satisfactorily proved that the good-for-nothing fellow who performed what was believed to be a mock ceremony of marriage between the peer and the peasant was really a clerk in Holy Orders, and that the marriage was binding. Thus the schemes of the villains, Conseltine and his son (the latter of whom expects to be the next Lord Kilpatrick) are foiled, and Desmond and his sweetheart, Lady Dulcie, a charming, saucy, Irish girl, are united. The best character in the book is the old Scotchman, Peehles, Lord Kilpatrick's body-servant and conscience, and the deus ex machina who solves all the difficulties in the path of the lovers. The tale is interesting, but seems hardly to possess the strength that we expect to find in a story by the author of "God and the Man."

Recently, in commenting on Mr. Edmund P. Dole's novel, "The Stand-By," we remarked on the singular and distorted views of morality entertained, and strenuously fought for, by John Denman, the millionaire whiskey-dealer in the story. In connection with this it is interesting to read the following words recently spoken by one of the officers of the Liquor League of Ohio, and quoted in The Outlook of May 1st: "The success of our business is largely dependent upon the creation of the appetite for drink. Men who drink liquor, like others, will die, and if there is no new appetite created, our counters will be empty, as will be our coffers. After men are grown, and their habits are formed, they rarely ever change in this regard. It will be needful, therefore, that missionary work be done among the hoys; and I make the suggestion, gentlemen," (this is the word actually used) "that nickels expended in treats to hoys now will return in dollars to your tills after the appetite has been formed! Above all things, create appetite." Exactly so: and a few dollars expended now in strong rope for the necks of these "gentlemen" of the Liquor League will save thousands of lives from misery, of homes from ruin, of souls from damnation.

People who are sick unto death of the vapidity, inanities, banalities, vulgarities, and brutalities of "metropolitan journals," may now boldly abandon the reading of the daily papers, and trust to a weekly for their news. The Outlook is published every week: it costs ten cents a copy: is of convenient size to hold in the hand: is decently printed on decent paper: tells all that one need know, and a hundred times as much as the reader of daily papers remembers after an interval of seven days, and has as many illustrations as, even in this age, when a world that is entering its second childhood has reverted to picture-writing, seem necessary. Each issue has about 140 pages, quite as many as are required to chronicle and comment upon the really important doings of the world during the space of a week. Mr. Justin McCarthy's "Life of Gladstone" is running through the pages of The Outlook, and has already reached its twenty-fourth or twenty-fifth chapter. It is copiously illustrated with portraits and other pictures. "The Higher Life of Paris," by Charles Wagner, is another fully illustrated article.

The Inceudinary, a story of mystery, by W. A. Leahy, has just been issued in book-form by Messrs. Rand, McNally & Co., of Chicago and New York. To this tale was awarded the fourth prize in the Chicago Record competition. It is the story of a mysterious fire, and of the efforts made to trace its origin. The volume is well-printed, and has an effective cover in light green, with red and gold embellishments. We do not doubt that the complications of the story are as numerous and puzzling as the most devoted admirer of the apparently inexplicable could desire. As we do not care a particle whether A. B. or C. D. or the devil himself, started the fire, we have wisely refrained from burning the midnight (or any other) oil in disentangling the confusion of a tale which is entirely out of our line. But we do no wish to throw cold water upon the fires of enthusiasm of those who care for printed things of this sort: and we feel satisfied that lovers of the mysterious will suck out of this tale much satisfaction.

The Japanese temperament is truly artistic, and the art work, carvings, tapestries, and curios, to be seen at George T. Marsh & Co.'s, 625 Market street, under the Palace Hotel, are both interesting and instructive. A visit to their store will repay the time it takes, and also give the visitor some fine bargains.

When playing poker drink Jackson's Napa Soda.

THERE is an old proverb which runs: "To him who hath shall be given," and the recent appointment of Oddy Mills (son of D. O. Mills) as secretary to his brother-in-law, Whitelaw Reid, the special Envoy of the United States to the Queen's Jubilee, would seem to forcibly illustrate the truth of it. Truly the country is called upon to pay the junketing expenses of enough military and naval representatives, attachés, and the like, without helping the Mills family to pay its passage to Europe. This is the view the taxpayer takes these hard times, when more taxation is called for to meet national expenditure.

How funny our fashionable set is. Here the town has been as stupid as possible, nothing but Wiltsee's theatre parties to enliven it ever since Lent closed, the promised Easter gaieties having turned out "nit," and then came several weddings, all crowded into three days. Miss Burton had the advantage of no counter-attraction; but the Collier-Macondray wedding up at Lakeport the same night as that of Miss Cohen, carried off a number of society beaux and belles—notably Al Bowie, El Sheldon, et al., and Miss Emily Carolan, Edith McBean, and Mollie Thomas. However, there were enough and to spare of lovely faces at the Unitarian Church on Wednesday evening. Which was the prettiest bride of the army weddings? is the question on all sides. There was no comparison to be made at all—they were each so different. One was tall, sparkling, and dashing; the other dainty, quiet and clinging. Both extremely distingué, and both exquisitely gowned, while the bevy of lovely maids in attendance on each showed the beauty and fashion of our buds in an eminent degree. Gossip whispers that a third military wedding will be seen ere the winter comes; a pretty maid-of-honor and a gallant soldier the parties thereof.

The Taylors are going to spend the entire summer out of town. Mrs. George Pope having rented the old Howard homestead at San Mateo, will undoubtedly add another attraction to B'lingham, and although that settlement has been somewhat dormant of late, when it does wake up things will "hum" in a lively manner. Joe Grant will soon bring his bride to his home there, which arrival will be the motif for many social attentions at this swagger spot, and no doubt when the Wilsons and Crocketts are in residence there, much gaiety will ensue. The place needed new blood to avert stagnation. Much pressure is being brought to bear on Herman Oelrichs, they say, to induce him to bring his wife and Miss Fair down there as householders this summer, but the chances are strongly in favor of Del Monte being the chosen locale of these ladies in the event of their summering among us—the love of Miss Fair for aquatic sport making a swim to the raft a thing of joy to her not equaled by anything B'lingham can offer.

The Hotel Rafael is now in the full swing of a prosperous season, and every day adds an accession of people from the city's beau monde. Various schemes for the pleasure of his guests are concocted by the popular Warfield, who lives but to please the ladies; hence his being such a favorite with them. Tennis is being played vigorously these cool days before the heat of summer sets in.

It is astonishing that fashion does not take up the Tamalpais trip more than it does. Surely no better opportunity for a girl's making a conquest could he found than a jolly companionship up the mountain the utter sans gene of it all making it doubly attractive to people satiated with the fuss and feathers of conventional regulations of society life.

Can the report be true that our own Donald deV. is meditating matrimony? The Bohemian Club must be in a twitter about the possibility of such a thing.

Menlo Park folks are credited with the determination of running a race with B'lingham this summer in social festivities, the arrival from the East of Ed Hopkins's young daughters to spend their vacation there and the newly-married young Macondray couple will make things lively at the same place. Mrs. Willie Howard having become the chateleine of the Moses Hopkins place at Redwood City is another cause of hilarity to Menlo residents, that lady being noted for her hospitality.

Santa Cruz is pretty sure to have many sweet speeches made by the sad sea waves this season, that little place having been chosen for their summer residence by Miss Julia Crocker and Miss Emma Butler. Castle Crags will have several wealthy widows as guests at the Tavern, and some of our prominent men are going up there for their holiday. The absence of form and ceremony in the life make the Tavern an ideal spot for those who seek repose as well as healthful recreation, and it is a perfect Paradise for those who love the dolce far niente in life, while the children find fun and freedom combined.

Is there any place except California where the sensibilities of people appear so blunted that it is possible for a lady to figure as testifying to her husband's insolvency one day and as the hostess of a theatre supper party the next?

One of the sights of the day is the carriage exercise of Mrs. Craven and her lovely daughter Margaret, accompanied by the "will smasher," Counsel Curtis, as they take their outing.

Shakespeare says, "the evil that men do lives after them." Speculation as to what the heirs of a prominent citizen—now defunct—think on this point, is rife at present. Who next?

Is there to be another match in the Kip and McCreary families? ask the guests at the Hotel Rafael.

CHAPTER I.

WAS she beautiful? Yes. From her limpid and pleading eyes to the small foot, there was a melting of serene dignity into fragrant suppleness. Everything was perfect: the Greek masters could have conceived of no finer symmetry, could have given no more majestic pose. From her wonderful face to the gentle motion of her full bosom, thence to the gracefully contoured hips—she was as desirable as Eros in the gown of a nun.

To be sure, her name and her relations were just a little disappointing at first—but nature does not take into consideration names and relations, and Mary Ann O'Flannigan was more beautiful, aye, more desirable than a titled dame, and her teeth and complexion far more reliable and charming.

Her smile was intoxicating; it made one deliriously happy.

I cannot recall, nor do I care to, the many thoughts we exchanged or how often we met. She was an assistant school teacher, and I became madly interested in educational affairs. I could afford the luxury; there was a triple combination that assisted in this laudable purpose: love, education; and money, of all of which, singly and collectively, I had an abundance.

But happiness is a relative term, and though prismatic in color, it sometimes turns into positive blue; and one day Mary Ann was blue; and I was blue, because she, my bright sunbeam, would not smile.

Her father had an exaggerated notion of a parent's prerogative and the destitution of young men's morals in general.

By a certain intuitiveness quite unaccountable, I sought to eschew an acquaintance with the father of Mary Ann. It might have been due to the fact that he was big in stature, with fists like sledge hammers. But it was more probably because he was a blacksmith and his hands and face would naturally be black—I had never seen him in person.

Be that as it may, Mary Ann felt blue, and as this was the first time this color had become thus manifest, I inquired the reason.

The information was not tranquillizing. Her father had discovered her secret and had "an eye on her," which annoyed me—no one should have an eye on Mary Ann but myself.

She implored me to go and see her father; I promised and asked her to meet me next day in Golden Gate Park in San Francisco at 10:30 A. M. For once I wanted to be alone with Mary Ann and consider means of straightening our tangled affairs.

"Never fear, darling," I said, "I will settle that business, and then you shall introduce me to your folks."

And thus it was settled: she was to go to Golden Gate Park and—in case I was not there—wait for me behind the new music stand. But I was sure to be there ahead of time, for "time has the pace of a snail in the race with love."

CHAPTER II.

"Hello, Al, what are you doing round here so early?" said Jim Peterson, the champion middle weight of the world, meeting me on the way to the music stand.

"Why, hello, Jim," I cried, "I am delighted to see you." May I be forgiven this prevarication; for, as a matter of fact I wished Jim to the wilds of Africa just then. This statement is made to assist my soul at a time when an open confession may prove an advantage—

"Wither are you bound, Jim?" I asked with dread in my heart.

"To the music stand," he said.

"Ah, I am going there myself," I said, with an emerald smile that would have offended any person less coarse grained.

"I have an appointment at half-past ten," he said.

It was fortunate that I had left my batchet at home—

"You know, Jim, I am not inquisitive, but I'll bet the drinks you are going to meet a woman."

"They are on you, old man," he said, with a grin.

I could have embraced him; but I refrained. Nor could I have explained to him the situation; Jim Peterson was the slowest thinker in the world and dreadfully prosaic.

On reaching the coveted spot, I thought of many schemes to remove Jim from this world, but it was easier to think than to act. Seeing no way out of the dilemma, I told him that I was going to meet a certain party somewhere in the vicinity, and left him ensconced in my place with a paper in his hand.

Taking a position whence I could overlook the entire field I waited for Eros (as I loved to call Mary Ann), with a melange of misgiving and delight. To while away the time I smoked.

I was just about lighting a fresh cigar, when I saw a man cross the "equestrian ring" and walk toward the music stand.

"That lucky dog, Jim," I thought, "here comes his man, and God knows how long I shall have to wait for my sweetheart—if she comes."

As I looked at the man, a strange thought entered my mind—there was something in his movements that spoke of "fight." I wondered if Jim was going to have an "open-air bout"; in that case, Jim Peterson, I thought, was going to have a fair subject for lunch, as the man was gigantic in stature, and was sure to give a good account of himself.

The big fellow peered sharply behind the music stand, jumped nimbly over one of the benches and walked up to Jim.

The latter looked up for a second, and then continued reading his paper. The man was evidently not the one he expected.

The big fellow planted himself squarely before Jim, and said:

"Who in — are you waitin' fer here, you —"

As I said, Jim was not a fast thinker at the beginning of a proposition, but when he had mastered it, then a casual observer would have been struck—if he happened to be the proposition—by the marvelous quickness of Jim's thinking ability and the power of his logic—a sort of sledge-hammer logic.

For a moment Jim looked into the man's face without dropping the paper—then Jim's foot shot out and the man dropped.

In a moment Jim was on his feet, calmly waiting for the man to rise. The fellow did rise with some difficulty; but he was no sooner on his legs than he squared off, and in spite of Jim's watchfulness, caught him straight between the eyes. It was done so quickly that it surprised Jim. But it left him undaunted, and a moment later he was executing his marvelous feats of fighting that made him famous.

Forgotten were love and disappointment. I took out my watch and timed them, and behold, in precisely two minutes and four seconds the big fellow was knocked out.

Who was the man? I did not know, nor did I care to inquire even of Jim, as a crowd was fast gathering and a policeman approached. I did what any sensible man would have done under the circumstances—I walked rapidly away.

At the Haight-street entrance to the Park I experienced a shock; for there, right before me, stood the ideal of my sleepless night and watchful morning.

She colored to the proverbial "roots of her hair," and a few minutes later we were flying toward the historic Cliff House.

Seated in a nook facing the "Cliffs," I told her how anxiously I had awaited her arrival, and that I was quite determined to call on her the very next day for the purpose of asking her parents' consent to our engagement.

Mary Ann's face lit up with heavenly smiles; she sank into my arms with the abandon of pure love.

"I told Pa that you were honorable," she said.

I felt touchy.

"You don't mean to say that your father thought me otherwise?" I cried.

"Oh, darling, don't be angry; but papa is awful strict. At first, he would not let me go out, and swore he would take me away from school. Then he made me confess all, that you called on me at school. You won't be angry, pet, will you?"

"No, no, sweetheart: go on—it is all right."

"Well, I had to tell him of my appointment at the music stand—and—and—he said he would teach you a lesson—he was going to fight you. Oh, he is terrible. But, thank God, he did not meet you."

"No, darling, he did not meet me," I said, with a sigh of relief.

L'ENVOY.

Our boy is seven years now. He goes to school and is exceedingly bright for his age. The other day he asked his mother what "proxy" meant.

"Ask papa," said his mother, with a knavish smile.

The dear little fellow encircled my neck.

"Papa, what is a proxy?"

"A proxy—is—a proxy—is——" I stammered; "a proxy is—you see, my son, if you deserve a punishment and another boy takes it, that is a proxy."

"Was you ever a proxy, papa?"

"No, dear; your grandpapa was once."

Mary Ann smiles and threatens me with her finger.

"Naughty boy," she says.

THE SOCIAL SECRET.

"Oh, my! How charming you look this morning, Mrs. Cleveland. Do you know, Mr. Redington made us all envious of you by saying you had the most beautiful complexion of any lady at the Browning Reception. We are old friends, and if I appear a little inquisitive on this matter, pardon me? There are half a dozen of us in our set, of about the same age, while you are the only one who looks positively ten years the youngest of us all. There is some secret in this; as a friend, you should impart it to me."

"My dear Lillian, if I did not know your sincerity, I would surely believe you were trying to flatter my vanity; but, knowing your candor in all our affairs, I will tell you to what I attribute those charms you mention, and how I was induced to use the great Elixir, Dr. T. Felix Gouraud's Oriental Cream. My mother has always been, and is now, a very beautiful woman—her years lending a charm to that beauty, which care and art have preserved by the aid of Gouraud's Beautifier and Purifier of the skin. Although she is now over fifty, she passes for forty, thanks to the 'Oriental Cream' that has been prescribed for nearly half a century to the very elite of American and continental society; it is easy of application and harmless in its effects. By applying the 'Cream' through the day or evening and washing the face well on retiring, afterwards using Mutton Tallow or Camphor Ice, the skin is given a soft, pearly whiteness, removing all skin blemishes, leaving the complexion clear and bright as crystal, while its certainty and naturalness of operation are such that the use of a cosmetic is not suspected, and, dear Lillian, it is the only preparation that meets the wants of refined ladies, who require a harmless and efficient beautifier, and we all do. You possess the secret; I follow in the footsteps of my mother."

"Wise as the serpent, harmless as the dove."

Pine Street Mining Market.

Business during the past week has been dull in the local mining share market. Prices have held firm in the Middle and North End shares, however, much to the satisfaction of dealers, who still look forward to a lively deal in this quarter. At one time it looked as though Con. Cal-Virginia might lead off with some of the old-time vigor, but, although it must be admitted that the news from this mine is favorable enough, interest seems to center again in Chollar, where the Brunswick workings on the 500 level are especially flattering just now. This, of course, will serve to wake up the gnats in the business, who will die hard battling against the Brunswick lode. Results so far have established very clearly in the public mind the fact that this antipathy is due entirely to purely personal reasons. The Chollar mine has turned out considerable money from the 200-level down to the point where work is now being carried on, and nothing serves to offset unfriendly comment like the steady extraction of a high grade of ore. Friends of the business who are not swayed by prejudice in matters of the kind, will continue to hope that this new ground will develop into a valuable property. The prospects that such will be the case are favorable just now, and this serves to sustain confidence among live operators who never falter in their belief that there is a future for the market, despite the dull times which have prevailed for years past. At the South End interest still attaches to the drive now being made westward by the Confidence and other companies. A strike there would in itself ignite a flame that would soon spread along the entire lode, ushering in a new era of prosperity and activity in pushing exploring work in this direction. From whichever quarter it may come matters little to the folks on the street so that the happy event is hastened. Assessments are not coming along very heavy at present, and collections of those now pending are good in the majority of cases.

Dredging the River Channels. The work of recovering the gold deposits in river beds by dredging will soon become fashionable. A company has been formed in London to begin operations on the Fraser River, and within the week another syndicate at Tacoma announces its intention of starting work with a Bowers' dredger on rivers in Washington. A concession has also been granted by the representatives of the same machine in this city to Eastern people for Rogue River, and work is about to begin there immediately. So far, the idea does not seem to have caught on with Californians. This might be strange were it not for the pronounced slowness which always attends the formation of any home enterprise which would necessitate the outlay of money for a plant. With millions of dollars on hand for a gamble of any kind, from horse racing down to lotteries, and betting on prize-fights, capital becomes shy at once when sought for the legitimate work of developing the vast resources of the State which are still practically uncovered. Time will undoubtedly change all this, but it is a weary wait for the man of energy and progressive ideas. With the knowledge that no richer river beds exist than those of the Golden State, it is more than likely that before long Eastern or outside money will be forthcoming to carry out plans of work similar to that now inaugurated on the other side of the line.

Gold Mining
In California. Outside of private enterprise, which is slow enough, and the one or two large mines going in full blast, investment in California gold mines is not what people might infer from the rose-tinted narratives which appear continuously of sales. The names of certain properties here become like household words, and prospectuses are hawked around from office to office with a freedom which does anything but benefit the reputation of the mines. Mining engineers who have yet to win their spurs as successful guarantors in effecting a sale, are as plentiful as the ubiquitous promoters, but everything goes now, it seems, in this line of business. The only scarcity noted in the way of making up the deficiency is the supply of men with money, and people are beginning to wonder why they do not come along to pick up the good things tied up in their behalf. English and continental money is plentiful enough over the border, and British Columbia miners find little difficulty in obtaining all the financial aid they require. This is explained to some extent by one of the London financial papers in commenting on the absence of any desire for California mines, by a statement of facts showing that the Canadians, like the Australians, are ever ready to back their propositions up with their own money. Outsiders only share the investments in the northern mines; they do not, nor are they expected to monopolize the business for stock jobbing purposes. Confidence begets confidence here as elsewhere. There is much truth in these remarks as applied to California. Here a property might go a-begging at a reasonable figure, so far as interesting a dollar of San Francisco capital, and if it is taken up abroad the value is inflated to a degree calculated to awaken a suspicion of robbery among all sensible investors and drive them away. It is nothing to find commissions tacked on by middlemen, aggregating in many cases over twice the purchase price of the property. It is not a promoter seeking the sensible, level-headed investor, but a hungry horde of irresponsibles angling in muddy waters for "suckers." This game has been played once too often, with the result that the "pig in the poke" trade is played out so far as California is concerned. The worst of it is that honest men are forced at the same time to suffer for the sins of others.

Mined Gold
in Wales. W. Pritchard-Morgan, M. P., who arrived here from Australia the other day, is set down very truly as one of the great miners of the day, and accredited with most wonderful success in Australia. No one, however, touched on one of his greatest achievements—the mining of gold in Wales. Some years ago Mr. Pritchard-Morgan began work in his native mountains on a large scale, and with good success. The Crown rights in the product brought him eventually into a dispute with the authorities, who found a lively fight on their hands before they got through with the sturdy Welshman. It will be hoped that the influential visitor will find time to visit our leading mining districts and thereby familiarize himself with California mines to an extent which may prove useful at times in the hereafter.

A Visitor
From Colorado. F. H. Pettingill, one of the most energetic and prosperous mining men of Colorado, registered at the Palace during the week from Colorado Springs. Mr. Pettingill is well-known all over the States and abroad where the circular letter of his firm has penetrated. As a man well informed on mining matters his visit to California will doubtless put him in touch with the situation of affairs in the industry. The resources of California in the way of mineral are unexcelled. So far, with a few exceptions, it has been all surface scratching. There is no reason, outside of lack of enterprise, why this State should not be the largest gold-producing territory in the world.

The Jubilee
Pandora Box. It is an unusually cold day when the London promoter fails to take advantage of a chance to bring grist to his own mill. The Jubilee season is to be worked for all there is in it. Companies have already been launched by benevolently inclined individuals who link patriotism and coin together. Among these may be noted the "Commemoration Syndicate," "Unparalleled Reign Syndicate," "Prince of Wales Hospital" Jubilee Syndicate, and half a dozen others similar, all ringing the change on "The Jubilee."

MR. Ernest Terah Hooley, the latest financial accident of the century in London, is behind a scheme to promote Schwebbe's, a company brought out to take over the old firm's business in aerated waters for £950,000. The magic name of Hooley is expected to scare up the millions in short order.

NEXT to Tuolumne County, Amador is the most active mining region of the State just at present. A number of mines there are opening up well under the intelligent management of men who learned their business thoroughly before branching out as mine managers.

The Town Crier

"Hear the Crier!" "What the devil art thou?"
"One that will play the devil, sir, with you."

THE TOWN CRIER has long felt that his views on the marriage question are quite unfit for print, but he was in hopes that some of the difficulties incidental to their realization might be overcome when he heard that "Bob" McCaully of Portland had eloped with Mrs. Brady and her nine children. Though the risk of detection by Paterfamilias Brady must have been great while the ten descents from the lady's lattice were in progress, the escape was accomplished successfully, and the problem of the disposal of children in cases of temporary marriage seemed at last solved. But subsequently the family flight was arrested; Paterfamilias experiencing no difficulty in getting on the trail, owing to its unusual length, and now the TOWN CRIER, like Senator Perkins in a crisis, doesn't know what to say.

THE mauling of helpless infants, with which gentle diversion the "Reverend" Allan L. Kennedy has beguiled his leisure hours at the so-called home presided over by himself and wife, is regarded by Judge Whiskers Campbell as so trifling an offense that a $25 fine is quite sufficient to cancel it in the courts. It is many a decade since the Judge graduated from swaddling clothes, but if he had been subjected to similar facial punishment in the long ago, the chances are that his injuries would have been such as to make his present luxuriant hirsute crop a failure, and San Francisco would have been deprived of a peculiarly picturesque bench show.

IT is useless for Mayor Phelan to try and improve the appearance of the streets while they continue to be used as picture galleries illustrating the horrible results of scandal. It is high time some restriction were placed on the revolting exhibitions of matronly limbs, hulging like over-charged sausages, which were lately so numerous. It was bad enough, though more natural, when the premiere of a cause celebre revealed herself to our disgusted gaze, but if sisters and cousins and aunts are allowed the same privilege, where is the nuisance to stop? If the ladies must pose, let them wait till the new zoo is ready; that's the proper place for Fat Woman Shows.

THE CRIER understands that the Book Committee of the Mechanics' Institute Library (the chairman of which is Joseph Leggett) objects to a passage in Mrs. Gertrude Atherton's story, "Patience Sparhawk and Her Times," because it contains mention of a girl's legs. Surely the chaste chairman must blush every time he hears his own name mentioned. How did he, or will he, ever dare to ask a lady to become Mrs. Leggett? In certain strata of society "lower limb" is the accepted euphemism for the offending "leg." Why not, in the interests of propriety and delicacy, let the worthy man change his name to Lower-limb-het.

ONE of the most remarkable characteristics of the age we live in is the variety of accomplishments found in a single individual. An actor is at the same time a poet, a painter and a musician, or a business man is also a novelist just as Governor Budd and the Emperor William, not content with governing, are ambitious to shine in the world of art or journalism.

RETRENCHMENT is the order of the day. Mayor Phelan has been making sweeping reforms at the City Hall and his excellent example has so permeated the whole State that an enormous decrease of public expenditure is expected. The judges are all to be discharged as Governor Budd considers them entirely superfluous.

W. R. HEARST'S extravagance has broken out in a new form. From dogs to haberdashery is a far cry, but Willie's fickle fancy has lightly turned from canines to a brand new million-dollar suit.

A WIT of the TOWN CRIER's circle objects to the French Hospital being used as a home for fallen women. Last Sunday a girl was taken there after falling out of an upper story window.

IT is true that the purpose of the drama is to hold the mirror up to nature, but when it comes to holding the mirror up to San Francisco, the most unprejudiced must admit that there are subjects which are unfit for dramatic representation. Miss Frisco, who makes her début at the Tivoli next Monday evening, promises us "a review of the town's doings for the year." After this announcement, no one need be told that we have no public censor of plays, interludes, and other entertainments of the stage.

ONE Maguire, who became a bridegroom this week, had a little altercation with somebody on his wedding day, and went home with a broken nose. It is easy for any loving spouse to make the best of such a misfortune, but he who values domestic peace and would keep forever huring the altar-fires to wifely devotion, would better confine his mishaps to broken bones. The one calamity that tender woman cannot forgive is to have hubby come home with his pocketbook broke.

BOSTON blushed at Bacchante, and the raimentless statue was hustled hack to the sculptor's studio. Out here, however, we are not so careful of our art reputation. The hapless ladies whose plaster-o'-Paris curves are harked at by the distant seals and blushed at by the art connoisseurs who stray unguardedly to Sutro Heights, still totter on their pedestals. They should without further delay be encased in nice, warm, opaque bloomers.

SAN QUENTIN has been the scene of remarkable wholesale conversion this week, and Warden Hale appears in a new but eminently successful role as an exhorter of sinners to repentance by the nozzle route, smashing all previous records and casting the Salvation Army completely into the shade. In one day he baptized no less than 600 insubordinate souls and brought them to repentance. Evangelist Hale's methods may be damp, but they are efficacious.

YOUNG Lynch, the bosom friend and confidant of Dur-rant's former spiritual adviser, has taken the terrified Gibson under his wing, and will hereafter protect the parson from kidnapers and newspaper reporters. He declares that he will not permit his dearly beloved associate to write any more letters to local journals. The CRIER herewith offers up a hymn of thankfulness that Pastor Gibson is within jurisdiction of Lynch law.

TEMPTING bargains in baby carriages are being offered this week by a local firm, and the public patronage in response ought to be encouraging to such pessimistic souls hereabouts as gloomily exaggerated the blighting influence of the new woman. Even Dr. George Fitch would be gratified, could he know the present activity of the perambulator trade in our midst.

MATTERS in the pencil-will case, now dragging its Fair-Craveu way through the courts, are assuming an alarming aspect. Judge Denson has been accused by a brother lawyer of perpetrating poetry, and very naturally smarts under so damaging a reflection upon his character. The will-smashers should be at once bound over to keep the peace.

IT is something of a coincidence that the pastor of Oakland's First Congregational Church should bear the name of C. R. Brown. The cognomen is painfully reminiscent of our own First Congregational and its erstwhile evil genius, C. O. B. Fortunately for Oakland the Overman is missing.

REVEREND E. H. Jenks gave an address on "The Perfect Man" at the Young Men's Christian Association last Sunday afternoon. As the ladies are always on the lookout for this desirable specimen, it seems a little hard that they should have been excluded on this interesting occasion.

LANGTRY, the Jersey Lily, fearing that her California ranch is going to pieces for lack of her personal supervision, is hastening hither to repair it. The actress evinces far more interest in her farm than she has ever manifested in her reputation.

"IN the Kingdom of Heaven there is neither marrying nor giving in marriage,"—a highly scandalous state of things, considering that love is not tabooed, but one which will commend itself to the California contingent of "angels."

ORGIA.—BY CAYLPSO.

A RHAPSODY OF MADNESS.

WHO cares for nothing alone is free—
 Sit down, good fellow, and drink with me,
 With a careless heart and a merry eye,
 He laughs at the world as the world goes by.

He laughs at power and wealth and fame;
 He laughs at virtue and laughs at shame:
 He laughs at hope and he laughs at fear,
 At memory's dead leaves crisp and sere.

He laughs at the future cold and dim,
 Nor earth nor heaven is dear to him,
 O that is the comrade fit for me,
 He cares for nothing his soul is free.

Free as the soul of the fragrant wine,
 Sit down, good fellow, my heart is thine,
 For I heed not custom, nor creed, nor law,
 I care for nothing that ever I saw.

In every city my cup I quaff,
 And o'er the chalice I riot and laugh,
 I laugh like the cruel and turbulent wave,
 I laugh at the church and I laugh at the grave.

I laugh at joy, and well I know
 That I merrily laugh at woe.
 I terribly laugh with an oath and a sneer,
 When I think that the hour of death is near.

For I know that death is a guest divine.
 Who shall drink my blood as I drink this wine.
 And he cares for nothing, a king is he—
 Come on, old fellow, and drink with me.

With you I will drink to the solemn past,
 Though the cup I quaff shall be my last,
 I will drink to the phantoms of love and truth,
 To ruined hope and a wasted youth.

I will drink to the woman who wrought my woe
 In the diamond morning of long ago.
 To a heavenly face in sweet repose.
 To the lily's snow and the blood of the rose,

To the splendor caught from Orient skies
 That thrilled in the dark of her hazel eyes.
 Her large eyes wild with the fire of the south,
 And dewy wine of her warm red mouth.

I will drink to the thought of a better time,
 To innocence gone like a death-hell chime,
 I will drink to the shadow of coming doom,
 To the phantoms that wait in my lonely tomb.

I will drink to my soul in its terrible mood,
 Dimly and solemnly understood,
 And, last of all to the monarch of sin,
 Who conquered that palace and reigns within.

My sight is fading—it dies away—
 I cannot tell, is it night or day?
 My heart is burnt and blackened with pain,
 And a horrible darkness crushes my brain.

I cannot see you—the end is nigh.
 But we'll laugh together before I die.

SOMETHING MISSING —HARRY ROMAINE, IN LIFE.

I know that she is going away,
 Because the sodden skies are gray
 Instead of blue;
 Because the sun shines hot and fierce,
 Or else too cold and weak to pierce
 The dull clouds through.

Because the thronging crowds I meet
 Wear mournful faces on the street,
 And downcast eyes;
 The horses have a jaded look;
 The sparrow chirps from out his nook
 With restless cries.

I know that she is gone away,
 Because each moment seems a day:
 Each day a year;
 Because the city lacks that grace
 Which marks here mere abiding place
 When she is here!

"It's very absurd for men to make fun of the fashions which women adopt," said Miss Cayenne, "when their own attire is so unreasonable." "It seems to me," replied Willie Washington, "that men dress very sensibly." "But look at the absurdly high collars they wear!" "Don't you know what they are for?" "No." "They're for us to rest our chins on so that we won't get so tired looking over the hats in the theatre."—Washington Star.

Mr. Rounder (who has been reading the Greck war news)—Actium? Let's see, wasn't that the place where Anthony learned the folly of depending on a woman's fidelity? Mrs. Roender—No, sir, it wasn't! Actium was where Cleopatra taught an old masher the folly of middle-aged men in running after other women, instead of staying at home to support their families. Served him right, too.—Truth.

Farmer Hayrick—Yaas, back f'um collidge, and yer don't do nawthin' but set 'roun' an' see other folks work. I've a daru good mind tew send ye up tew t' county fair as a prize pig! CLAUDE HAYRICK—I wouldn't take a prize, father. "Ye wouldn't! Yer a big 'nuff pig!" "Yes, father, but I haven't any pedigree!"—New York Evening Journal.

"I think," said the man who had bought a season ticket to the opera, whispering to his neighbor, "that I'll try to have my seat changed. Food Value of Cocoa.

The International Journal of Surgery says: "Experience has shown that a properly prepared cocoa product constitutes an ideal beverage for invalids and convalescents, acting as a mild nerve stimulant and at the same time supplying a considerable amount of available nutritive material. Such a product is Walter Baker & Co.'s Cocoa, which differs from all preparations of its kind in that in the process of manufacture great care is taken to retain, in a pure and unaltered form, those active principles and nutritive elements of cocoa seed which render it both a luxury and a food. This preparation is esteemed an agreeable, comforting, and nourishing beverage in chronic disorders, during convalescence from exhausting diseases, for feeble children, and during the after treatment of severe surgical operations."

NOTES OF THE ARMY AND NAVY.

THERE has been considerable talk about a wholesale transfer of troops this year from one station to another, which would have involved the removal of the First Infantry from this coast, but as the cost of transportation and other necessary expenses would mean an outlay of about $75,000, Secretary Alger has decided not to make the transfers.

A matter of interest to army and navy officers who contemplate going abroad is the fact that hereafter special passports will be issued to them whether the trip be made officially or personally. Heretofore only those officers who went on official business were granted these special passports, which was a certain deprivation to those who traveled for personal reasons and at their own expense.

In New York city, on May 20th, Mr. H. E. Keyes, son of the late General E. D. Keyes, U. S. A., was married to Miss Mary Louise Ward, daughter of Captain G. S. L. Ward, U. S. A., retired.

One of our esteemed weekly contemporaries indulged in a semi-satirical editorial last Saturday, in which it inveighed against Lieutenant Peary, of the United States Navy, who is known prominently as the Arctic explorer. There was one thing correct about the editorial: to wit, that Civil Engineer C. E. Peary is not a naval officer. There is not an officer of that name in the naval service, but there is a Civil Engineer R. E. Peary in the naval service who is properly registered as an officer in the United States Navy, and who bears the relative title of Lieutenant. It may also interest the writer of the article to know that a Lieutenant is never addressed colloquially by his title; he is simply Mister.

The vessels in the United States Revenue Cutter Service on this coast are the Bear, en route to Bering Sea, the Grant, Perry, and Rush, all at Seattle, Washington, and the Golden Gate, at San Francisco.

The Minneapolis will be ordered home and go into the reserve squadron as soon as hostilities cease in Europe. She has been found to be too expensive to keep in active service when the extent of her usefulness is taken into consideration.

The Marion, which was scheduled to sail to Samoa, is disabled at Honolulu. A board of officers declared a new engine bed necessary to make her seaworthy, and it is now being constructed.

At last accounts the Adams was at Honolulu preparing to sail for Puget Sound.

Rear Admiral J. N. Miller, U. S. N., will sail to England on the cruiser Brooklyn to represent the United States Navy at Queen Victoria's Jubilee. His staff consists of Commander William H. Emory, U. S. N., chief of staff; Lieutenant T. S. Rodgers, U. S. N., flag lieutenant; and Lieutenant Philip Andrews, U. S. N., secretary. The Brooklyn was recently presented with a handsome set of silver service by the citizens of the city of Brooklyn.

Rear Admiral George Brown, U. S. N., the senior rear admiral in the service, was placed on the retired list last Tuesday.

Major General Frank L. Wheaton, U. S. A., retired, and his family intend to pass the next two years abroad.

Three Colonels have been promoted to the rank of Brigadier-General. They are Colonel William M. Graham, Fifth Artillery, U. S. A., Colonel James F. Wade, Fifth Cavalry, U. S. A., and Colonel John K. Mizner, Tenth Cavalry, U. S. A.

Lieutenant-Colonel John I. Rodgers, Second Artillery, U. S. A., has been promoted to the rank of Colonel and transferred to the Fifth Artillery.

Lieutenant-Colonel William E. Waters, Medical Department U. S. A., will be relieved from duty at Columbus Barracks on July 15th, and then proceed home to await retirement at his own request.

Lieutenant-Colonel Marcus P. Miller, First Artillery, U. S. A., is enjoying six weeks' leave of absence.

Colonel B. J. D. Irwin, U. S. A., retired, is residing at Aiken, S. C.

Lieutenant-Commander Richardson Clover, U. S. N., has been detached from the command of the Dolphin, and granted five months' leave of absence.

Major William L. Haskins, First Artillery, U. S. A., has been promoted to the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel and transferred to the Second Artillery. He was stationed at the Presidio several years ago.

Major John A. Darling, U. S. A., is apparently between the devil and the deep blue sea. President McKinley has an idea of revoking the order of the last administration which provided for Major Darling's retirement in June, in order that the latter may be sent to Austria as military attaché of the United States Legation at Vienna. Secretary Alger, so it is said, has declined to order Major Darling to Vienna, but influence is being put to bear upon him to reconsider this determination.

Major Thomas H. Barry, First Infantry, U. S. A., has been relieved from duty at the War Department in Washington, D. C., and ordered to perform the duties of engineer and signal officer at the headquarters of the Department of Columbia.

Major M. J. Cooney, Fourth Cavalry, U. S. A., has been promoted to the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel and transferred to the Third Cavalry.

Captain G. H. Gale, Fourth Cavalry, U. S. A., is en route to the Yosemite National Park with Company C.

Captain J. A. Augur, Fifth Cavalry, U. S. A., has been promoted to the rank of Major and transferred to the Fourth Cavalry.

Captain James B. Erwin, Fourth Cavalry, U. S. A., is en route from Fort Walla Walla to Fort Yellowstone with Troops D and H, and expects to reach his destination about June 21st.

Medical Director George W. Woods, U. S. N., formerly of Mare Island, is now on duty at Brooklyn, N. Y.

Medical Director A. L. Gihon, U. S. N., retired, is residing at 233 Fifth avenue, New York city.

Passed Assistant Paymaster E. D. Ryan, U. S. N., has been ordered to duty on the Concord.

Passed Assistant Engineer H. W. Jones, U. S. N., of the Thetis, came down from Mare Island last Saturday to visit friends for a few days, and registered at the Occidental Hotel.

Assistant Engineer G. H. Shepard, U. S. N., is at Salinas, Cal., on waiting orders.

Post Chaplain W. F. Hubbard, U. S. A., is at 943 Tenth street, San Diego, on sick leave.

Lieutenant Clermont L. Best, First Artillery U. S. A., has been promoted to the rank of Captain.

Lieutenant W. C. P. Muir, U. S. N., is on waiting orders at Shelbville, Ky.

Lieutenant H. Osterhaus, U. S. N., has been ordered to a course of instruction at the War College.

Lieutenant William C. Davis, Fifth Artillery, U. S. A., will go to Fort Collins, Colo., on September 1st, to act as professor of military science and tactics at the State Agricultural College of Colorado.

Lieutenant John W. Joyes, Ordnance Department, U. S. A., will be relieved from duty at the West Point Military Academy on July 21st, and then report to the Chief of Ordnance for duty.

Second Lieutenant E. S. McGlauchlin Jr., Fifth Artillery, U. S. A., has been promoted to the rank of First Lieutenant and transferred to the First Artillery.

Additional Second Lieutenant Lloyd England, Third Artillery, U. S. A., has been promoted to the rank of Second Lieutenant and transferred to the Fifth Artillery.

Ensign L. S. Thompson, U. S. N., has been detached from the Alliance and ordered to a course of instruction at the War College.

The reported engagement of Miss Myra Noyes, of Washington, D. C., to Ensign Yates Stirling, U. S. N., has been denied by the young lady.

Passed Assistant Surgeon E. P. Stone, U. S. N., came down from Mare Island last Tuesday and passed a few days at the California Hotel.

The army and navy were represented at four weddings during this week and each affair possessed many elements of pleasure. The first wedding was that of Lieutenant Thomas A. Pearce, Seventh Infantry, U. S. A., and Miss Minnie Burton, daughter of Colonel George H. Burton, U. S. A., Inspector General of the Pacific District. The wedding took place last Thursday afternoon at the home of the bride's parents on Pacific avenue, Rev. G. E. Walk officiating.

Next in line came the wedding of Miss Ethel Cohen and Lieutenant Bent, which was solemnized at the First Unitarian Church on Wednesday night. Two noticeable features in the Church programme were promised—the decorations and music—and in both respects the anticipations formed were fully realized. The decorations were more military in character than are usually seen in a church, the national colors taking a very prominent part, stacks of arms, etc., and were artistic to a degree. The front of the organ was draped with flags and ornamented with palm leaves and white flowers. To the left of the organ two large flags gracefully draped the window at the rear of the platform in the center of the church, and directly in front of it stood a pretty tent-like canopy of flags, which was adorned with white flowers, giant palms being placed at the foot of the four supports and stacks of arms surrounding it; the background was filled in with a solid bank of Bermuda lilies, the effect of the whole being extremely beautiful. From the moment that the doors opened until the bridal party entered, the ushers, Lieutenants R. C. Croxton, J. P. Haines, R. F. Gardner, S. McP Rutherford, Dana Kilburn, and D. E. Nolan, who were all in full uniform, had their hands full finding seats for the immense throng of friends who filled the church; a few were in evening dress, the majority being in calling costume. During the assembling of the guests the Lyric Quartette, under the leadership of Mrs. Martin Schultz, sang several selections, and finally the Bridesmaid's chorus from Lohengrin, which changed to a bridal Hymn, the words of which were written by Greer Harrison. At its first notes forth from the door to the right of the organ emerged the maid of honor, Miss Emma Butler, and the six bridesmaids—the Misses Julia Crocker, Helen Wagner, Ida Gibbons, Alice Moffatt, Bernice Drown, and Marguerite Joliffe. They proceeded down the center aisle to meet the rest of the party as it entered the church. The procession then re-formed, the ushers leading, then the bridesmaids, followed by the maid-of-honor, and finally the stately bride walking alone. She presented a striking and handsome appearance; her robe of heavy white satin was made with a court train, the body trimmed with chiffon and orange blossoms; she also wore orange blossoms in her hair. A voluminous tulle veil quite enveloped her figure, and she carried on her left arm a large cluster of St. Joseph lilies. Miss Butler, as maid of honor, wore a gown of blue organdie cut décolleté, and with innumerable little frills upon the skirt; the gowns of the bridesmaids were similar in style, but were all of pure white. They also wore short tulle veils from the back of their heads, and each carried a shower bouquet of red sweet peas. At the bower the groom and his best man, Lieutenant Carson, awaited their coming, and the Reverend Dr. Stebbins speedily tied the nuptial knot. After the church service the bridal party, relatives, and a few intimate friends of the family proceeded to the residence of the bride's uncle, Dr. Henry Gibbons, where supper, prepared by the well known caterer, Max Abraham, was served at a number of small tables placed in the several rooms. The decorations here were simple but pretty, pink being the prevailing hue. Lieutenant and Mrs. Bent departed upon their honeymoon trip on Thursday, and upon their return will occupy one of the cottages at the Presidio. Wednesday was prolific of society weddings, for in addition to that of Miss Cohen were those of Miss Anna Grube and Harry Durbrow; Miss Josephine Eichbaume and Frank Hosmer.

The navy was represented on Tuesday at a quiet little wedding that took place over in Oakland. The groom was Assistant Paymaster John Irwin Jr., U. S. N., of the Thetis, son of Rear Admiral Irwin, U. S. N., retired. The fair bride was Miss Genevieve English, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John M. English, a bright and handsome girl who is very popular in society. Only intimate friends and relatives were present at the wedding. The honeymoon is being passed on a trip up north. They will make Oakland their home.

OF all the accomplishments which Henry J. Crocker has mastered, that which gives him the greatest pleasure and of which he is most proud, is his dexterity as an amateur pickpocket. The deftness with which he can "nip" a handkerchief, or "lift" a watch, is often a cause of unpleasant surprise to his friends, who miss scarf-pius and jewelled pencils after a l'ite-à-l'ite with the genial founder of the Horse Show. He often affects to join in the search for such missing articles, and when the lost is found, Crocker's simulated surprise is a rare study.

At the Call Board, on Tuesday, he quietly appropriated Henry Sherwood's timepiece. The intrinsic value of the watch was not great, but Sherwood had owned it for twenty years, it had been with him in the big Sperry fire at Paso Robles, and it not only registered the day, month and year, but it also called the turn on the moon. Sherwood was in despair until he recalled Crocker's practical jokes. Then he lost no time in demanding its return, and what was apparently his watch was promptly passed over to him. It was really an ancient timepiece of Crocker's own, of a similar design to Sherwood's, but the former had had the face repainted so that the numeral twelve adjoined seven, two came after nine, and the moon was hopelessly mixed up with the date. Sherwood studied it in bewilderment, to Crocker's huge delight.

"Better swear off, my hoy," cautioned the joker.

Sherwood made no reply, but, in an affected frenzy, dashed the watch on the floor. Crocker ceased to smile.

"What are you doing that for?" he demanded. "Do you want to ruin the watch?"

"It's no good," said Sherwood, gloomily. "Besides, it's my watch, isn't it?" and he procured a poker to complete the work of demolition.

Crocker never realized how much he prized his own old watch, until he saw the destructive poker descending towards its face.

"Here, that's mine!" he shouted. "Take your own," and he fished the genuine article from the depths of his pocket.

Sherwood smiled blandly, but said nothing.

"It's no fun playing a joke on you," growled Crocker. "You lack the saving sense of humor!"

And then Sherwood's smile broadened.

Opinions are divided in the Bohemian Club on the general question of whether Bert Stoue's temporary resumption of bachelorhood is altogether an unmixed blessing. However, Bert has not failed to improve the shining moments, and he considers that the others should not object to his spreading his wings once in two years, even at the cost of a little momentary disturbance. His constant companions during his vacation are Ed Hughie and the latter's brindled bull-pup. After a day of exacting enjoyment, the three went to a German restaurant a few nights ago, when the pup ate shrimps in the shell, but struck at drinking Bavarian beer from a stein. There were several disagreements about other courses, but finally all three dined to their general satisfaction.

Thereafter, the men concluded to spend the evening at the Orpheum, but the dog objecting, it was decided, after a prolonged debate, to go without him. Accordingly, Hughie dragged the pup by a rope to Powell street, and hailed a passing green car. After a hard tussle, the canine sport was landed on the dummy, where he was securely fastened by his master, Stone meanwhile, with folded arms, assuming his favorite Napoleonic attitude of victory on the pavement. Then Hughie also jumped off the car, and started to walk unconcernedly away.

"By the way," he called over his shoulder to the gripman, with cheerful coolness. "Just let that dog off at Octavia street, will you?"

"Well, of all the dashed cheek! But I'm damned if I don't, young fellow!" ejaculated the admiring gripman.

To the guests of the Palace Hotel is periodically accorded a spectacular treat when Chris Henne, the Beau Brummel of Stanford University, comes up from Palo Alto from Saturday to Monday. His apparel is unique in its gorgeousness, lavish of flaming colors, and fantastical in its effects. As he sails about the court of the Palace, spectators line the balconies and gaze upon his glory through opera glasses. Chris is said to be the beloved son of adoring parents, who, residing in an interior town, desire their offspring to dazzle the world, and to that end lavish their ducats upon the whimsicalities of the radiant young creature. Henne was being piloted about town a few days ago, by a hotel acquaintance, when the organizer of the Yukon River expedition espied one of the tall, narrow ladders used by window cleaners. He became so deeply interested that he examined the ladder carefully from every point of view.

"Now, what do you suppose that's for?" inquired Henne.

"Rescue work—dive brigade!" was the staccato reply.

"Really!" exclaimed the scholarly fop, innocently. "I have often wondered how they got down to the slums!"

The Bohemian Club has made a movement to encourage its artist members, which is already meeting with marked success. Under the direction of Mr. W. G. Stafford, who is an art connoisseur, and always an active friend of the artists, the social room is now used for the exhibition of pictures, not merely for the delectation of the members of the club, but for sale. A memorandum is kept of the prices the painters put upon their works, and the club acts really as the artists' agent. Another change has been the restriction of ladies' day to the first Wednesday of the month. Formerly the female friends of the members were free of the club rooms every Wednesday afternoon. This rule meets the approbation of those stern old bachelors who do not like to be disturbed at their whist or newspaper, while the young fellows, who enjoy the frou-frou of the silken garments of the sex, growl at the change.

To defray the expenses of the coming Christian Endeavor convention in this city, the societies connected with the various churches were assessed certain sums proportionate to their numerical strength. The Swedish church was eager to contribute its quota, but experienced no little difficulty in securing the actual cash from many enthusiastic subscribers. A meeting of the congregation was called to discuss ways and means, and it was generally agreed that it would be necessary to canvass the church for the needed amount. Old John Swanson, the sailmaker, was an interested listener, and anxious to assist.

"You needn't worry 'bout dat," he said, heartily. "I thank I got plenty cloth in my loft to canvas the church. You can have it for nothing to canvas the church!"

It is not generally known, but it is nevertheless a fact, that Ambrose Bierce, now a resident of Los Gatos, devotes nearly all his leisure time to the training of horned toads. Mr. Bierce has collected several hundreds of those intelligent reptiles, and puts them through their "acts" in great shape. They can, under his direction, draw toy carriages, tumble, wrestle, stand on their heads, play dead toad, roll over, play leap-frog to perfection, and execute many other surprising feats. Mr. Bierce's "toadery" is remote from the public eye, but the small boy still peereth through the hole in the fence at the satirist's circus, and is aghast at the magical power he wields.

The University Club has been boasting so much of late about the superiority of its cuisine to that of any other club in town, that a tournament of chefs may be looked for among the novelties of the near future. A dinner, or rather a series of dinners, cooked by the artists of the different clubs in competition, and their merits judged by a syndicate of epicures, would be a most interesting contest. Of course the epicures would have to lay up for repairs after their trying labors, but then this much mooted and perplexing question, "Which club has the best cook?" would be settled at once and forever.

Business frequently takes Frank Shea, the City Hall architect, to the other side of the bay, and a story relating to one of these pilgrimages is going the rounds of the Builders' Exchange, where Shea is held in high esteem. When he boards his train at the Oakland mole, Shea usually occupies a certain seat, where he is frequently joined by one or two friends, who endeavor, through various devices, to break the tedium of the trip. After he had comfortably settled himself in the car one day, about a week ago, Frank was disappointed to find no one about whom he knew. As it happened, he had just come from a high lunch, lasting all afternoon, and was in a particularly talkative mood. Immediately behind him, in the car, sat a lady who was escorting home a nice, new, green parrot. With somewhat of an effort, he squared himself in his seat.

"Polly talk?" he inquired, jauntily.
No reply being vouchsafed by the bird, Shea turned to the owner, and asked, blandly:

"Madam does your parrot speak?"
The lady paid no attention to the question, and the architect again addressed her.

"Madam!" rather reproachfully. "Madam!" louder. Then crescendo. "MADAM! I say, does your parrot talk?"

Much affronted, the woman affected not to hear, and gazed with seeming unconcern out of the window. Shea regarded her attentively for several seconds. Then he rose with an air of having solved a problem, bowed a trifle unsteadily, and with inimitable dignity made a concluding remark:

"Madam," he said, solemnly, "I comprehend. There is the place for you and the parrot—that long, red building over yonder."

And with an indicating finger he pointed to the Institution for the Deaf and Dumb.

Young Addison Mizner, many of his girl friends believe, has not a few features and characteristics in common with the famous Fat Boy of the Pickwick Papers. They have much quiet sport at his expense, and they aver that it is a most congenial task to elude the attentions of the ponderous youth. He was the unconscious butt in a coterie of society girls the other day, and the wit of the young women flashed harmlessly about him.

"It was delightful, meeting you on the ark at Sausalito last Saturday, Mr. Mizner," remarked one piquante damsel, with suspicious sweetness.

"How I envy you, meeting Mr. Mizner in the d-ark!" exclaimed another.

If it had not been for the general laughter which greeted this sally, Addison would have plumed himself at receiving such an appreciative tribute. As it is, he is still trying to fathom the precise sentiments of this admirer.

It was the misfortune of Attorney Edward P. Cole to run up against Superior Judge Wallace not long ago, and he says his fate was similar to that of a wave which strikes against a rock. Cole had made a motion, and was overruled—improperly, as he thought.

"Permit me to remind your Honor," he said, gravely, "that the Supreme Court of this State—"

"Overruled," said the positive Judge.

"Well, the United States Courts—"

"Overruled," calmly reiterated the terror of all criminals brought to the Superior Court.

"And even the Constitution of the United States—"

"Overruled," shouted Wallace, imperiously.

"Oh, well, if your Honor overrules the Constitution," remarked Cole, with a profound obeisance, "I withdraw my motion!"

SOCIETY

IF the brides whom the sun shines on are said to be more blessed than others, surely the first brides of June may justly feel they can claim that distinction. In fact a more lovely day than Tuesday does not often fall to our lot, and that was the day upon which the first of the June army weddings, of which so much has been said and printed, took place at the residence of Colonel Geo. H. Burton on Pacific avenue, when his eldest daughter, Miss Minnie, and Lieutenant Thos. A. Pearce, of the Seventh Infantry, U. S. A., were the bride and groom. The entire house was beautifully decorated with a floral garniture, the prevailing tints being pink and green; in the hall and dining-room, and in the parlor to the left of the entrance, the flowers used were white roses and sweet peas. Here the ceremony was performed by the Rev. Mr. Walk at half-past one, the bridal party standing in the how window, which had been converted into a hower of fern leaves, with an overhanging canopy of white roses and smilax. The lovely brunette bride wore an exquisite robe of white satin en traine, trimmed with chiffon and orange blossoms, a cluster of those sweet blossoms and several diamond pins confining the tulle veil to her coiffure. The Misses Leila and Kathro Burton, who were their sister's only bridesmaids, wore dainty gowns of pale blue mousseline de soie over blue taffeta, and carried bouquets of La France roses. This being a hutton wedding, the groom and his best man, Lieutenant Sells, U. S. A., as well as the bride's father, Colonel Burton, and most of the army and navy officers present, were in full uniform. Mrs. Burton wore a handsome gown of black brocade trimmed with rare old point-lace, and looked remarkably well. The rooms were all artificially lighted, and an extremely pretty incident of the ceremony—which was witnessed by a small circle of intimate friends—occurred as the clergyman pronounced the nuptial blessing. A puff of air from the open window at the back lifted the drawn blind, and a hurst of sunlight enveloped the kneeling figure of the bride. A large reception followed the ceremony, during which time an orchestra discoursed sweet music, and elaborate refreshments were served in the dining-room. A bevy of pretty maidens, Miss Sahin, Miss Stone, Miss Drown, Miss Conner, Miss Hooper and others, gave efficient aid in looking after the guests; and at 4 o'clock the bride cut the wedding cake, using her husband's sword in doing so. Lieut. and Mrs. Pearce departed by the evening train on their honeymoon trip, which will include Salt Lake and other points of interest en route, expecting to reach Fort Logan, where the groom is stationed, about the 20th of June.

In Berkeley, on Tuesday last, Miss Helen Wright and Charles L. Davis were married at the hour of noon, the ceremony being performed by Rev. George A. Swan, at St. Mark's Episcopal church. The fair bride, who wore a beautiful gown of moire trimmed with chiffon, was attended by Miss Ella Holmes, who wore white organdie over pink silk, and Miss Katherine Warfield, whose gown was of white organdie over yellow silk, and both wore leg-horn hats trimmed to correspond with the gowns. Fred Pierson appeared as best man, and Messrs. Hedley, Field, de Long, and Danforth Boardman officiated as ushers. After the ceremony a wedding breakfast was served at the residence of the bride's brother, Hallock Wright.

Next Thursday evening, Miss Mahel Estee and Leonard Everett will be married at St. Luke's church; the ceremony, for which a large number of invitations have been issued, to be followed by a reception at the Estee residence on Sacramento street. Another wedding of the near future will be that of Mrs. Olive Reed and Seth Cushman, which is named to take place at the Reed residence on Filbert street, Oakland, on Wednesday evening, June 16th.

The weddings of the week have been of such absorbing interest that society has not given much thought to any other subject. There have been some theatre parties to welcome back the Frawley Company at the Columbia, and to witness the Chinese play at the Alcazar, which seems to grow in interest with each performance.

The marriage of Miss Annette Lander West and Hugh McDonnell, took place in New York on last Thursday. Mr. and Mrs. McDonnell will make an extended European tour before their return to California.

A recent engagement announcement is that of Miss Carrie Kosbland and Emile Greenebaum.

The season has been so backward that society has not seemed inclined to exchange the comforts of their city homes for, in many cases, the discomforts of country quarters. However, the month of June will no doubt see a large begira from town, and already many have decided upon their locale for several weeks to come. Dr. and Mrs. Wagner have taken a house in Berkeley for the summer months; Miss Eva McAllister will remain in the East with her other sister, Mrs. Frank Newlands, and will, with Mr. Newlands and family, spend the summer in Canada. Mr. and Mrs. Louis Parrott are to be among the Alaskan tourists, and leave by the "Queen" to-day. Del Monte has been chosen by Mrs. Thomas Breeze and family; Mrs. Towne, the Clinton Wordens, Mrs. Low and Miss Flora, Captain Payson and family, Mrs. George Wells and Miss Marie, Mrs. Simpkins, the R. L. Colemans, Mrs. Charley Keeney, the Oysters, Tuhhs, Adam Grants, etc.; and the George Popes will be there in July. The Butlers and Clark Crockers go to Santa Cruz, and the Ed Hopkins to Menlo Park. Burlingame will claim the Tohins, Joe Crocketts, Frank Carolans, Will Crockers, George Newhall, and others. The Spencer Buckbees and J. J. Crooks will be found at San Mateo. Among the householders at San Rafael will be the Gerstles, Slosses, Sydney M. Smiths (who are there already), the Rudolph Spreckels, who go over this week. Mrs. Hager, who leaves town about the 10th, and the Ignatz Steinbarts have taken the cottage of the de Youngs, who have gone abroad for a lengthened absence. At the Hotel Rafael will be found among others: Mrs. Schmiedell, Mrs. John Cunningham and family, the Fred Greens, Ward McAllister, Ed Greenway, Miss Kate Dillon, etc. Mr. and Mrs. Chauncey Boardman have been over visiting Mrs. Hort. The Greenwoods have taken a house in Ross Valley; the Jim Robinsons and the Will Barnes at Sausalito; Mr. and Mrs. Lovell White and Judge Seawell and family at Mill Valley; the Sands Formans, the Babocks, and Brighams go to Lake Tahoe; the Currys to Wawona, and the Phil Lilienthals left last week for Santa Barbara, where they will spend the summer. Bishop Nichols expects to leave for the East in a few days en route to the Conference of Bishops to be held in London. Mrs. Nichols and family will accompany him as far as New York, and there await his return, visiting friends in the East during his absence. Lieutenant and Mrs. Richardson Clover are coming to spend the summer in California at the Miller place in Napa Valley.

At the final meeting for the season of the Channing Auxiliary next Thursday afternoon, Miss Lilian O'Connell will appear in the dramatic essay, "Puritan Pictures." An unusually large audience is expected, as Miss O'Connell's work has excited so much interest, that those who were unable to see her in the Colonial Recitals last winter, are seizing this opportunity of enjoying the first of the series.

Mrs. Romualdo Pacheco, the distinguished authoress, who has many friends in this city, is stopping at the Hotel Bella Vista. Mrs. Pacheco's health is at present not the very best, but her early recovery is hoped for.

On Thursday night the Schwabacher mansion, on Clay street, was again the scene of festivities. Mr. and Mrs. Louis Schwabacher, assisted by their daughter, Minnie Louise, entertained about fifty of their friends at dinner, after which the young folks scattered themselves throughout the house—most of them seeking the beautiful ballroom—where dancing was indulged in. Their beautiful home was most artistically decorated, and, with the aid of the handsome furnishings for a background, presented a very pretty picture. Mrs. Julius Weil, of New York, looked quite the belle of the matrons; while among the younger girls Miss Madelaine Bear, Miss Norma Bachman, Miss Jacobi, Miss Ruth Meyer, and the young hostess herself were most charming.

On Monday evening Mrs. D. N. Walter gave a theatre party at the Columbia Theatre, in honor of Miss Madelaine Bear, of New York, who is visiting friends in San Francisco. The party included some twenty couple—both married and single—all of whom enjoyed The Fatal Card with all its exciting features. Mrs. Walter being in mourning, her daughters, Mrs. Adele Walter Heller and Mrs. Abe Meertief acted as chaperones.

In the general exodus to the seashore and mountains, Hotel Rafael is receiving its full quota of people. Being so near town, and so delightfully situated from a social as well as business standpoint, Hotel Rafael presents advantages that are not combined elsewhere; and then, General Warfield, the lessee, gives his personal attention to the wants of his guests, which fact is a guarantee for everything.

The annual return of the Misses Jacobi has caused the usual flutter among their friends, each trying to out-do the other in order to make the time pass pleasantly during their sojourn on the Coast. Already have theatre parties, dinners, etc., been planned, and later a monster excursion to Alaska is on the tapis.

Mr. and Mrs. Colin M. Boyd will spend nearly all of June, July, August, and September at "Casa Boyd," their lovely summer retreat in Alameda County. Mrs. Boyd will, during these months, discontinue her "at home" day in the city.

Mrs. Sylvain Weil is entertaining as a guest her niece, Miss Madelaine Bear, who will spend the summer here. She is a delightful girl of the brunette type. She has been here but a short time, and has already won a host of friends.

Mrs. Feuchtwauger, who has always been a great favorite with the members of the younger set, shortly expects a visit from her sister, Miss Stettheimer, from New York.

General E. C. Humphreys and Frank H. Pettingell, a prominent banker and broker of Colorado Springs, are guests at the Palace Hotel.

Mrs. Edwin Stevens, wife of the famous comedian, is in the city, and a guest at the Hotel Bella Vista.

AN important decision in the celebrated Hale & Norcross case has just been rendered by the Supreme Court of the State of Nevada. The decision of the court is averse to the Fox, Baggett, and Lynch interests, and means that Joseph Ryan, the Superintendent recently chosen by two-thirds of the stockholders, who are opposed to the Fox-Lynch combination, but to whom possession of the mine was denied, will assume active charge of the property, vice James Cronan, present Superintendent. The decision is a substantial victory for the majority of the stock of the property, and sustains and makes permanent the control and possession of the Hale & Norcross in the hands of R. R. Grayson and his friends.

Purifies as well as Beautifies THE SKIN. No other cosmetic will do it.

Removes Tan, Pimples, Freckles, Moth Patches, Rash, and Skin Diseases, and every blemish on beauty, and defies detection. It has stood the test of 48 years and is so harmless we taste it to be sure it is properly made. Accept no counterfeit of similar name. Dr. L. A. Sayre said to a lady of the haut-ton (a patient): "As you ladies will use them, I recommend 'Gouraud's Cream' as the least harmful of all the Skin preparations." For sale by all Druggists and Fancy-Goods Dealers in the United States, Canada, and Europe.

FERD. T. HOPKINS, Prop'r,

37 Great Jones St., N. Y.

DEAR EDITH—A friend of mine just returned from Paris brings a lot of fashion gossip. She declares that the best dressed woman in the gay French capital is the beautiful Princess de Sazan. Here is one of the costumes in which this charming butterfly recently appeared: Her frock was of cerise and velvet taffeta, trimmed exquisitely with narrow black velvet ribbon and black tulle. The skirt was made up over an independent underskirt, and it was seen plaited from the waist to the ground, the plaits being very small at the top, and lost in the waistband, but widening out downward. The black velvet ribbon trimmed the bottom, and was set on in points in several rows. The corsage was in blouse shape and accordion plaited. Over the shoulders was a large collar-like cape descending very low in the center of the back and just covering the upper part of the sleeves. This was made of black frilled tulle, embroidered with silver and steel beads and with passementerie of gold thread and silk. The waistband was of black piece velvet, cut on the bias and forming a high corslet at the sides, slightly hollowed in the center both in front and behind and fastening on the left side with a large bow of black velvet. The sleeves were slightly draped at the shoulder, and were lightly gathered from the elbow to the wrist on the inner side, and the outer side were trimmed with a frilled crest of cerise taffeta. The hat which crowned the princess' bronze coiffure was of white satin straw. The brim was narrow and the crown high. On the left side was a white aigrette, falling over the edge, and beside this stood a tall white ostrich plume, and there was a narrow half wreath of pink roses which turned behind to form a cache peigne.

She also is in raptures over the chapeaux affected just now by the ladies of Paris. They are dashing and dazzling and so gorgeous with color that they make your eyes blink. They are worn tilted far over the eyes, and are all sorts of shapes and styles. They are trimmed with everything that is beautiful. Tulle flowers, ostrich plumes, taffeta silk, ribbons, wings, birds, everything. The straw is usually coarse, and satiny, and fanciful, and comes in brilliant purples, cherises, yellows, greens, and scarlets. There are sunburnt manillas and fine white Milan straws, too, and horsehair straw, chip and leghorn, so one is sure to be in the fashion whatever.

One of the most fetching styles she describes is the walking hat of either fine or coarse straw, with the brim rolled up to the crown on each side and the trimming consisting of great fluffy ostrich plumes, the latest fad being to have one black plume and one pure white; sometimes these are both on one side, or again one on each side, but always hanging far down over the back of the coiffure.

Hats of vivid cerise straw are extremely popular, and no end pretty. They are always trimmed with different shades of cerise, and are tremendously becoming to all women. One of these hats, shown by a Place Vendome shop, was of coarsely plaited straw, with a medium brim. It was trimmed with enormous ruches of cerise mousseline de soie of two shades, and on one side an aigrette of cerise goura feathers placed in the center of a bow of cerise silk. The back was dashed up sharply, to show a smart cache peigne of cerise flowers.

REFINED ladies pay no more attention to any article of wearing apparel than to their footwear. A handsome foot appears clumsy in a poorly-made shoe; while a well-shaped, fashionably-made shoe gives an aristocratic air. The Siebe shoe is one of the best-made and handsomest in this market, or found anywhere in the world. It is made of the most carefully selected leather and on the most stylish last. Comfort and wear are united with beauty and elegance of finish. To wear a Siebe shoe is to wear the best shoe in this market. Ask your dealer for this make and see that you get it. Every dealer is the agent for these splendid goods.

INSURANCE.

GEORGE C. PRATT, until recently Coast Manager of the Provident, has been appointed general agent of the Union Central Life, with J. F. J. Archibald. The office will be removed from 303 California street further up town.

Insurance Commissioner Clunie has removed the office from 401 California street to the Parrott Building. The move is decidedly unpopular with insurance men, as it is out of their district.

The Pacific Mutual Life has added $100,000 to its capital, just doubling its original stock. The present stockholders will be privileged to take their pro rata of the new issue at par.

H. E. Webster has been appointed general agent of the Security Mutual Life, of Binghampton, N. Y., vice C. N. Comstock, resigned.

P. B. Armstrong, the California fruit grower, has sued the American Union Life and its directors for $300,000. Mr. Armstrong organized the American Union three years ago, and this suit is brought for services rendered then; and for libel.

The widow of Luther Egbert has recovered $11,118 from the Fidelity and Casualty Company on a policy issued to her husband in this State.

The Bankers' Fidelity and Security, capitalized at $100,000, has been organized at Cedar Rapids, Iowa.

A party of Japanese insurance men, who have been investigating the science of insurance as it is exemplified in the United States, have returned home loaded with valuable information.

The Franklin Mutual Fire has been placed in the hands of a receiver.

The newly-elected officers of the Fire Underwriters' Clerks' Association are: J. S. French, President; H. H. Young, Vice President; H. P. Blanchard, Secretary; T. P. D. Gray, Treasurer.

The National Convention of Life Underwriters will meet in annual session from the 22d to the 25th of this month at Saratoga Springs, N. Y.

W. H. Whiting, the Actuary of New York, was in the city last week.

Complaint is made that Referee Reed is permitting his duties, as speaker of the House of Representatives, to interfere with his insurance office.

R. W. Groff has been appointed special agent of the Pacific Mutual, under Kilgarif & Beaver.

A new insurance company has been started in Chicago, for the purpose of insuring employees against the loss of positions—the only one of its kind in the United States.

The officers of the Board of Fire Underwriters of the Pacific are: Chas. D. Haven, President; Wm. J. Dutton, Vice President; George Butler, Treasurer; Executive Committee, Chas. D. Haven, Wm. J. Dutton, Robert Dixon, A. E. Magill, Harry Mann, C. F. Mullins, H. K. Belden, George H. Tyson and G. W. Spencer.

An insurance company has been organized at Richmond, this State, to insure the lives of women only.

The fire insurance companies have reconsidered their determination to leave the State for Washington on account of recent hostile legislation; but rates will have to be elevated very materially.

Of the twelve largest cities in the United States, San Francisco has fewest fire hydrants.

Mr. Theobald, of the Union Casualty, has returned from a business trip East.

Unless a desirable tenant can be found for the ground floor of the Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company's building, made vacant by the removal of the Royal to its new building, the former company will probably move downstairs. These offices are the handsomest in the city, and should be occupied by the Pacific Mutual.

 5 1/2 Kearny street, San Francisco. Entered at San Francisco Postoffice as Second-class Matter.

“GREATER New York”; why not “Greater San Francisco?”

THE star-gazers at Mount Hamilton Observatory are again in a turmoil; and it is apparent that the usefulness of old James Lick's splendid gift to the people of California and the world is being seriously impaired. It is also equally obvious that Professor Holden has a keener faculty for discovering faults in his assistants than he has for finding stars in the heavens.

INSPECTOR Dockery has said that he would follow the fraudulent brandy recently sent out of this State, bound for England, to London if necessary, and there denounce the mixture as impure and unfit for use. The duties of the efficient inspector will hardly carry him so far. He can do more good peering into vagrant milk wagons about San Francisco than in pursuing prune juice abroad.

WE shall have to change the hitherto accepted statistics that ten thousand murders are committed in the United States every year; for if Isaac Hoffman took his own life, it is evident that there has been many an innocent person hanged by the neck. It is suggested that hereafter the murdered man leave an affidavit setting out the facts of his taking off—that is, if Hoffman killed himself: it will be a necessary protection against the stain of suicide.

THE endorsement of C. O. Brown by a Chicago congregation and the denouncing of this city as “hell” by a fellow gospeler, need excite no concern. The Congregationalists of San Francisco have warned their Chicago brethren of the true character of Brown, and their skirts are clean. The man who defended him and denounced this city is both fool and knave, his mouthings bringing only himself into contempt. That this man and the unspeakable Brown are not in San Francisco goes far to disprove his utterance.

THE usual deficit bobs serenely up in the Street Department, and Superintendent Ambrose has laid off about 150 men. Possibly no serious inconvenience will result from this course, but the regularity of the deficit ought to suggest some way of avoiding its recurrence. The general withholding of the salaries of employees, and the neglect of the streets are necessary in order that merchant creditors of the city may get their money. All of which shows that San Francisco has need of a new financial policy conducted on lines of old-time integrity.

IT is said that William Jennings Bryan, late Democratic candidate for President, and at this moment statesman minus a job, is planning a trip around the world. This is a shrewd move, and about the only thing the Kansas orator could do. He cannot talk all the time intervening between the present and the meeting of the next free silver Presidential convention; and if he leaves the United States for two years, returning just before the national meeting of his party, he will sweep all opposition into the ditch, and unless signs fail, come very near warming McKinley's chair.

IT is not improbable that an armor plate plant will be erected at San Francisco at no distant day. There is necessity of such an enterprise here, and there would be work for it from the first. The Scotts have proved that this coast can make warships and armored cruisers second to none in the world. California can show other products than fruits and grain, beautiful women, mossbacks, fast horses, and politicians. We make ships that stay on top of the water—something rather more than Atlantic hulkers of Uncle Sam's new navy have been able to accomplish.

THE department at Washington has finally refused to prevent the shipment abroad of the stuff called pure California brandy, which was recently banled across the continent from this city. In view of the undoubted fact that the English authorities will be notified of the quality of the prune juice and poor whiskey, the position of our government is in this case somewhat immaterial. English law demands a straight certificate of character for everything consumed at home, and the “pure California brandy” made of Nebraska corn and diseased prunes will be very apt to be used in flushing London sewers instead of illuminating English throats.

THE sons of ex-Presidents of the United States appear to imagine that they have a claim by inheritance upon the patience and the people of this country. Young Arthur has been tagging about the Capital in search of a foreign appointment. R. B. Hayes Jr. is willing to accept a job in the library at Washington; the Grants are a standing joke and a source of disgust to ordinary folks, and Russell Harrison has his lightning rod up for a collectorship. Robert Lincoln is engaged in the difficult task of chasing pedigrees for Chicago's hustling Four Hundred, and is about the best of the lot. These degenerate sons of illustrious sires annoy the President, and by their presumption add to the gaiety of nations.

THE high hat ordinance has been on trial one week, and it has worked like a charm. Ladies are finding out what any man could have told them long ago—that they are more attractive indoors without the addition of millinery adornments than with them. There has been developed no opposition to the humane and kindly order of the Supervisors, which is based on the foundation of good breeding, kindness, and consideration for the feelings of others. If we desire to study birds, we naturally go to an aviary or museum, and we seek nodding flowers and buds at the florist or in the garden; they are out of place at the theatre or opera. Thanks to the brave Mayor and the persistent Rottanzi, the high hat “has went.”

IN the mind of the average San Franciscan the distinction between the thick-necked, low-browed bruiser, whose breeding is confined exclusively to his fists, and those who plan for his appearance and take in the dollars earned by the exercise of his developed animal instincts, is so thinly drawn that he refuses to admit its existence. This observation has been brought out by the recent amazing action of the Olympic Club. That this organization of gentlemen has been led into the business of giving prize-fights, and permitting the meeting of professional bruisers for gate money, is a harsh and most ill-seeming descent from the original intention of the organization. A serious mistake has been made, and the sooner the Olympic Club recognizes the fact and gets back to more familiar and higher ground, the better will it be for its reputation.

CAN WE HAVE A GREATER SAN FRANCISCO?

THE present tendency of large American cities is to absorb their outlying suburbs. In union there is strength, and in numbers there are power and grandeur. Moreover, there are many favors conferred by our national government upon large majorities, that are altogether denied to small communities. Ours is a Government by numbers and the many rule. Therefore, the more citizens we can claim for San Francisco, the greater will be its power at home, and its importance before the world at large. A city of half a million, ranks higher and is deemed of more consequence than one of only 300,000 inhabitants. Chicago was prompt to find out how that was, and exalted herself as a city of consequence and renown by uniting with all of her suburbs. She increased her population over one third, without increasing her Governmental expenses in a like ratio. The union of her different parts increased the strength of the whole, resulted in greater economy, and an improved administration. Better men got elected to her councils, her civic pride became aroused, and to-day the promise of her future no man can set bounds to. New York was not slow to take note of what her great rival was doing, and to go and do likewise. It is not necessary to recount what has happened in the Empire City. It is now "THE GREATER NEW YORK" in both name and fact. Mighty difficulties had to be overcome before this much to be desired result could be reached. But an era of good will and reform sprung up, the leaders of both political parties were agreed, and the independents did not differ. To all of which was to be added the general confidence inspired by the really great men who were persuaded and elected to serve as the greater charter makers. What Chicago has completed, and New York has almost finished, may with undoubted profit commend itself to cities similarly situated.

The peculiar situations of New York and Brooklyn, and of San Francisco and Oakland are as alike as two peas. Both New York City proper and San Francisco are located on peninsulas not capable of expansion to the extent that will be required by both places a few years hence. Between New York and Brooklyn there is a wide and rapid stream, whilst between San Francisco and Oakland there is an arm of our beautiful bay which may be easily tunnelled. Within a less area than Greater New York, or Chicago now occupy, we have some five or six municipal governments, which are run at an extravagant cost, and where efficiency is almost unknown, and rascality abounds on every hand. One government, strong because of the greater admixture of good men behind it, could hardly fail to be an improvement upon the municipalities, more or less rotten, which now constitute the petty little governments around us. The men of Oakland would not be likely to care overmuch for Buckleyism on this side of the water, whilst we should be still less enamored of the pettier bosses that are everlastingly capturing more or less of the territory on the other side of the bay. We should help to blot out the Oakland bosses, whilst Oakland would lend her aid to defeat ours, and between the two, honest government would be given a chance. The voters of Alameda County would be as desirable an addition to those of San Francisco as it is claimed those of Brooklyn will be to New York. The greater the number of men of standing and good repute, the greater the chance of securing good men for nominees, with increased probabilities of electing them. The day will come (it ought to have arrived before this) when there will be tunnels across the bay through which steam or electric cars can pass with ease. There will also be tunnels, very easily constructed, running up and down Market street where the water channels now are and having means of ingress and regress at the corners. There would thus be continuous rail communication between the extreme West of our City to the far East of Alameda, or, better still, from our open ocean clear through to the Atlantic. That is an extension or improvement that must be accomplished at no distant day, but to render it practicable we need municipal union. That is what our new charter makers ought to set themselves to accomplish. It is one of the first duties before them. Convinced of the value of these suggestions, the NEWS LETTER will not let them die for want of clear exposition and zealous advocacy.

Extraordinary Imports. Talk about dull trade, indeed! As a matter of fact, our commerce never reached such proportions as now. The Bureau of Statistics at Washington shows during the month of April last the heaviest importations of foreign merchandise that ever took place in the history of the United States. For April of 1896 the aggregate value of imports was about $58,000,000. In March 1896 it was but $16,000,000. In April 1897 the total amounted to $101,305,131. Of course there is no disguising the purpose of these excessive importations. It is to get around and evade the higher duties of the new tariff, over which Congress is still wrangling. There is an estimated profit to the importer on April's business of from $25,000,000 to $30,000,000. That is what we pay for our bungling system of changing one tariff for another. Jobbery and robbery are the outcome of tariff legislation, and will be so long as our methods are based on temptation and fruitful of dishonest rewards. Our proposed tariffs should not be known or allowed to miss fire for periods varying from five to nine months, and when they are so allowed, somebody is about to turn a dishonest penny. Tariffs should be introduced either by a committee, or a special commission, or by the administration, and a joint resolution of both Houses should make them law, and collectable as such from the moment of their introduction. If any proposed duty fails to pass or is reduced, the difference is refunded to the importer. That is the method in vogue in England, France, and Germany, and in all other civilized countries we know of, except the United States, and it would be the practice here but for an overweening desire to leave doors open through which money may be passed. These large importations mean that the new tariff will be practically inoperative for nearly a year after its passage, and that it will produce little or no revenue during that time. About half of McKinley's term will have expired before the great cure-all is applied to the disease of hard-times. It has been computed that about 70 per cent. of the cost of manufacturing goes to labor. Here, then, are over $70,000,000 of money turned over to the pauper labor of Europe, and that at a time when one million of our own working men are out of employment. No such blundering will bring about better times or satisfy the people. The times are growing harder.

A Bounty On Wheat Exported. It is reported from Washington that several Republican Senators have decided to block the passage of the tariff unless a bounty on wheat to be exported is provided for. This is important, if true, and should make David Luhi of Sacramento happy, as he has for many years advocated it as the only possible way of permitting our farmers to share in the general protective policy of the country. He holds that a tariff on products of which we have a surplus for export, is absolutely without protective effect, and he is obviously right. Hence the farmer, as the case stands at present, must work to a disadvantage under any tariff; for he must sell under free trade conditions, whilst he is compelled to buy in a protected market. Either, then, the farmer must be given a bounty on his exports, or in self defense, and in all fairness, he must insist upon free trade all round. It is logically a strong position to take up. It has taken a strong hold upon the farmers of the West, and Grange after Grange has passed resolutions in its favor. A number of Pennsylvania Ministers, taken with the idea recently waited upon the President to learn what he proposed to do about a policy so manifestly just. Mr. McKinley promised an early reply but it has not come yet, and it will not come, for, from his standpoint, no reply is possible.

How We Are Assessed. The State Board of equalization is made up of five members. Four are elected by districts, and one, the Comptroller, is a member ex-officio. Thus it comes that the country is usually represented by four representatives, whilst San Francisco has only one. In this condition of things it is, perhaps, not to be wondered at that the Board almost invariably evinces a disposition to cinch the city whilst letting the country off as light as possible. It is not at all unusual for the city's assessments to be raised from 10 to 20 per cent. over the values our local assessors deem to be fair and just. This has time and again caused intense disgust amongst our citizens, and a disposition to resist payment, if they only knew how. It is a misfortune that the State Board cannot increase individual assessments that may be too low, but must, in order to cure a few evils, perpetrate a great many wrongs. It is safe to say that most of the owners of moderate homes in our suburbs are paying on the basis of a fair and full assessment, but that is hardly quite as true in regard to large establishments down town. Tax shirking is as old as tax collecting. It is as natural for many of us to shirk taxes as it is for a duck to swim. The remedy is the procurement of officials who will, with fairness and courage, assess both the rich and the poor alike. The possessors of great establishments should be assessed proportionately as much, but no more than the dweller in a humble cottage in Richmond or at the Mission. When that is not done at present, the only remedy permissible is to still further crush the class that are fully taxed already. The assessment of the whole city must be raised, and not merely the parts that are favored with comparative immunity. The law badly needs changing in this particular. There is no right or reason in punishing the many for the sins of the few. In regard to the assessing of personal property, there is not one good word to be said. That kind of property is not always to be detected by the eye of an assessor, and it too often escapes taxation altogether. Then it is an invidious, prying tax, which nobody likes and everybody tries to escape. It is in human nature so to do, and the only remedy is a less obnoxious system of taxation. The Examiner is as demagogic in regard to this vexed question as it is in respect to all others. Yet it is the most under-taxed institution in the city. Assessed at less than $50,000, that sum does not to-day equal the value of its hook debts, or of half its presses, and one million would not buy the whole concern. It is easier to excite the mob than to solve the ever-recurring difficulty as to equality of taxation.

Valueless Agency Reports. As they are at present operated, the commercial agencies of this country fall very far short of their true usefulness, and it would appear that in these days of almost universal insurance their alleged mission might be made of far more practical value to the business community than is at present derived from it. The commercial agencies are supposed to furnish confidential and reliable information to their subscribers concerning the standing of men in business throughout the country. The information is accepted as of sufficient accuracy to form the basis of commercial credit, and upon it accounts are opened and goods are sold. The subscriber feels that the rating given the person or firm seeking to establish credit justifies a certain financial standing. The demonstrated facts show that the information paid for by subscribers is often misleading and unreliable, and to its acceptance may be directly charged a very considerable percentage of the losses of business. The writer has in mind a striking illustration of the value of these so-called "reliable" reports. A firm in this city desired credit for several thousand dollars, and as its rating justified the credit, the wholesaler readily granted the accommodation. A short time thereafter the principal of the debtor firm died, and even a hasty investigation showed that the business was actually insolvent, and had been for a long time. The wholesaler who trusted to alleged protection for which he pays annually a large sum, found himself out and injured. The goods had not been opened, so short a time had elapsed between their delivery and the purchaser's death; but the seller failed to recover them, or up to the present moment get one dollar. This is a single instance of the unreliability of the average commercial agency. To those who know how, it is not difficult to get a rating; and as we have shown in this single instance, it is misleading and becomes a positive trap, which, being accepted in place of a more thorough personal investigation or satisfactory security, does the merchant out of his goods and destroys his profits. There is something radically wrong where such a condition exists. The agencies should be held responsible for reports for which good money is demanded, but which, when the facts are developed, are found to be misleading, worthless, and in reality the very instrument by which losses are incurred.

How to Make Money. There is just one sure way to make money in this country that we know of. It is as simple as it is sure. Take twenty-four cents worth of silver of standard fineness, put it into a crucible over a hot fire; when it is melted pour it into a mold, and when it is cool it is equal to fifty cents in United States coin. With the cost of this operation subtracted, there remains about 100 per cent. profit on the transaction. It is estimated that fully $2,000,000 worth of these half dollars are already in circulation, and their number is being added to every day. To what limit they may reach no man can tell. They so exactly imitate the Government's coinage as to defy even experts to determine which is the genuine and which the false. The banks and even the Sub-Treasury have about abandoned the task of determining which is which. So that the business goes on substantially unmolested! Detection and prosecution are next to impossible. The coinage is believed to take place over the Mexican border, so that the venue for false coinage does not lie in our own country. The "passing," of course, takes place here, but it must be "knowingly passed with intent to defraud," but with the hogs coin in such general circulation that even the Government accepts it, how is it to be proven that any one "knowingly" passes it? It is the easiest way ever invented to make money, and where there is so much profit in times like these, hogs coins are bound to increase abundantly. The making of money is the game we are all trying to play, and if "free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1" will enable us to succeed, who has the right to say nay? Not the Democrats, the Popocrats, or the silver Republicans, or even the straight Republicans, who are pledged to silver in a round-about way. Certainly the 6,500,000 citizens who voted for Bryan will not object to this kind of coinage, except that it is not being coined free of cost by the Government. As Congress is at present constituted, this spurious coinage cannot be legislated against, and yet it cannot go on forever without hankering the Government. It is an almost perfect object lesson on the silver question. We must either have the white metal hacked by the yellow, or fifty-cent dollars must be the consequence.

The Merchants' Association's Review. The Merchants' Association has just published its third annual review of the work it has accomplished, all of which is deeply interesting, and marks no small part in the history of our city's new departure on the matter of civic pride. Of the past our citizens are pretty well informed. But the association marks out not a few plans for the future of which it is well to take cognizance. It calls attention to the fact that Mayor Phelan has been asked to appoint a committee of one hundred citizens, representing all classes in the community, to prepare a new charter for San Francisco. It is to be hoped that the result will be the early preparation of a model charter that will merit and win the support of every citizen who has the welfare of the Queen City of the Pacific at heart. With a new organic law, and the new primary election law, it is hoped and believed that San Francisco will at last have a real home rule, and be in a position to govern herself in her own way. The construction of a new sewer system is ardently recommended. The health of the people should be the first duty of their municipal officers. By reason of the exceptionally favorable environment of this peninsula, San Francisco should be one of the healthiest cities in the world, but it has a large death-rate, by reason of its defective drainage. This can be and must be remedied. With a new charter and good officials, our citizens would be very willing that bonds should be issued for the consummation of this much-needed improvement. The re-pavement of Market street with modern and improved paving would constitute this great artery of San Francisco's travel and commerce one of the most imposing streets in the world. It is thought that asphalt or bituminous rock still hold the field as the best paving for suburban streets. The efforts of the present Mayor and Board of Supervisors to bring about economy and reform in the management of the city government are very highly and deservedly commended, and the cooperation of every civic organization is urgently invited. The hope for the future of our community rests in the civic pride of our people.

Criticism Unfair and Unscrupulous. The Examiner is in a rage because it cannot so fire the popular heart as to induce it to do something rash and lawless to a two-thirds majority of the City Fathers. Vituperous and grossly libelous language is employed with total disregard to reason and sense, to describe action that is only open, at worst, to an honest difference of opinion. The Supervisors say, and produce evidence in proof of what they say, that the schedules they have adopted will rarely permit of Spring Valley paying a dividend of 6 per cent. The Examiner declares that they will yield not far from 7 per cent. Admit, for the sake of argument, that the Examiner is right, and what then? Seven per cent. is what most of our savings banks charge, and is about the average loanable value of money at this time when the security is gilt-edged and the danger of loss nil. The Spring Valley has always to take the risk of floods, repairs of plant, and the need of betterments. In view of the facts, net earnings of seven per cent. are not out of the way, and certainly not such as ought to lead to incitements to riot and public disorder, such as the Examiner is indulging in. The majority of us would doubtless like to obtain water free, but then there are about 8000 stockholders who invested their money in a belief in the honesty of purpose of a vast majority of our ratepayers, and we think that belief well founded. The signs all point that way, the consumers appear contented, and the Examiner's fury does not prove to be catching. Certainly no condition has arisen which justifies our contemporary in hurling charges easily within the purview of the libel law. We are told that the Supervisors have "performed the services for which they were paid" and that "they attempted to justify their action with a foolish and ridiculous plea * * * Such men are not expected to reason, but simply to do as they are bidden by the owners who have bought and paid for their political souls and bodies." City Fathers are expected to stand much, but no men who know what honor is care to associate with public officials who can stand such language as that. If what the Examiner says be true, and there is not the slightest indication that it is, eight of our Supervisors ought to be forced to step down and out. If it be not true, and we are convinced to a moral certainty that it is not, they owe it to themselves, their families, and to the good name of the city to apply the usual remedy. The laws of their State will afford them adequate protection.

Brutal and Depraved. The attention of the Society for the Prevention of Vice and the eyes of Postal Inspector Monroe are pointedly called to a pamphlet issued by Kapp & Street, whose place of business is at the corner of Market street and Golden Gate avenue. This firm has had printed, and is busily engaged in circulating, a large number of these little advertising books, in which are pictures so obscene and suggestive that further description of them is forbidden. Every copy of this filthy publication is cause for prompt and vigorous action by the local authorities, as it constitutes a distinct attack upon morality and virtue. That men who claim respectability will employ such methods to advertise their traffic or gain a few dollars is amazing; but if their vulgar propensities find no restraint in the instincts of self-respect and claims of ordinary decency, they should be taught a lesson at the rough hands of the law that will in the future restrain them from further offense. The law says that every obscene, lewd, or lascivious pamphlet, picture, print, or other publication of an indecent character is declared to be non-mailable; and that any person who shall knowingly deposit, or cause to be deposited, for mailing or delivery, anything declared by this section (333 U. S. Statutes) to be unmailable matter, shall upon conviction be fined not more than $5,000, or imprisonment at hard labor not more than five years, or both, at the discretion of the Court. United States Courts have defined indecent literature as anything the tendency of which is to "deprave and corrupt the minds and morals of those open to lascivious influences." Many copies of this indecent publication have doubtless been sent out through the mails; and for each and every such offense the above penalty may be enforced upon those against whom it can be proved.

Aside from the attention of the postal authorities, the local Society for the Prevention of Vice will find this illustrated pamphlet worthy of its immediate and vigorous at-ention. The strong hand of the law should be at once laid upon these offenders. They have printed literally tens of thousands of these abominations, which are designed and expected to fall into the hands of the youth of the city. Let prompt action be taken; let such brutality and moral depravity find swift and merited punishment.

The Ferry Depot. There have been many complaints made because of the delays that have prevented continuous labor and early completion of the ferry depot at the foot of Market street. Injunction after injunction has confronted the Harbor Commissioners, despite their united effort to hasten the work, and, even when the courts have not been called upon to settle other difficulties, the contractors adopt dilatory tactics. It will be remembered that the durability of the foundation, which is the largest concrete work of its kind in the world, was called in question, and charges made that it was not built according to the specifications. After repeated tests made by borings, it was found to be everything that could be desired. But the test cost a year's time. The solidity of the foundation having been passed, the Commissioners advertised for the superstructure, but were met by further obstructions, which resulted in the enactment of laws compelling them to let the contract in six different parts, thus causing further delays for which the Board was in no manner responsible. Then came up the question of the stone to be used. Oregon gray stone was competing with Colusa rock—a home product—and the power of the Commissioners to choose the latter material had to be settled in the Courts. Commissioner Chadbourne brought the different quarry owners together, so that the matter was finally patched up; home material was used, and the State saved more than $50,000 by the deal.

Now, however, the contractors are resorting to dilatory methods. They are delaying the completion of the depot by working a small number of men, when every condition favors the employment of a large force and the speedy completion of the structure. The patience of the Board is about exhausted; and Commissioner Chadbourne is especially incensed, and has finally declared that he will sign no more contractors' demands unless they put on more men and rush the work to its finish. He favors the use of electric light and night shifts in order that the depot may be completed by the first of December next. In this determination the entire Board are united, so that we may expect to observe the greatest activity at the foot of Market street until the last spike is driven and the great work an accomplished fact.

ART JOTTINGS.

THE admission to the green room in the Bohemian Club of the pictures of the artist members for exhibition and sale, has had a most salutary effect upon the artists. It convinces them that their theory that the town is "dead" in an art sense is not correct, and that there are many disinterested people who are more than willing to assist talented artists with their own purse and their influence upon the purses of others. The men who lie back, and growl, and wax lazy, will kick at everything, and want the coin current of the country slipped into their socks, but the genuine, industrious fellows always get a helping hand, and all of them, with a very small exception, need it.

Fred Yates has placed his strong and effective picture of General Barnes on exhibition in the green room, and also a quaint illustration of the verses of Omar:

A book of verses underneath the bough,
A jug of wine, a loaf of bread, and thou
Beside me singing in the wilderness,
Oh, wilderness were paradise enough.

The old philosopher is represented graybearded like Merlin, and the girl, a weird-looking lassie, lies at his feet. The cartoon is of the Beardsley type, and is quaint and forcible.

Arthur Bennett, of Memphis, the animal painter, is here, and has been doing some work in a quiet way for the owners of crack dogs and horses. Mr. Bennett was here several years ago, and painted several of the pets of Harry I. Thornton's stable. His work is of the very best in this line.

Joseph D. Strong exhibits a portrait in pastel of Mr. Clift, which will rank among the best things in this line he has accomplished. It is not alone a perfect likeness, but has an artistic virility, so to speak, which is not often found in the counterfeit presentment of the human face.

Charley Rollo Peters is finding a good market here for his moonlight pictures. He has sold to W. G. Stafford, Fred Yates, and others, and meanwhile keeps painting for the fall exhibition in New York.

Amadee Joullin exhibits a study in Alameda, a landscape full of nice effects and tender feeling. The marsh in the foreground, the sluggish water in the middle distance, and the faint greens on the other shore, with High-street bridge on the left of the picture, make a clever composition, and in all respects a most desirable picture.

Charles Robinson is at work at some marines which will shortly meet the public eye. Robinson is a most conscientious artist who studies from nature, and his work of late shows excellent progress.

Alexander Harrison, the very swell American artist of Paris, and the intimate friend of the eccentric Whistler, will soon be here, and the Bohemian Club will make merry welcome for him.

THERE are many places about the bay to spend a pleasant Sunday; but El Campo leads them all. Round trip, twenty-five cents; four boats each way.

NEW SAFE-DEPOSIT VAULTS.

Safes $4.00 to $150.00 Per Annum.—The Union Trust Company's new safety vaults, corner of Market and Montgomery streets, are the strongest, best guarded, and best lighted in the city. Superior accommodation for its patrons. Ladies will find apartments for their exclusive use. The company transacts a general banking, trust, and savings business, and acts a executor, administrator, trustee, and as custodian of wills, and consults as to trust matters without charge.

Valuables of all kinds taken on storage.

Dr. Franklin Pancoast, the dentist, has moved his parlors from 6 O'Farrell street to better suited offices at 20 O'Farrell street (the Curtaz building). Dr. Pancoast is now permanently located, and his many patients, and others who may desire to avail themselves of his services, will find him at rooms 16, 17, and 26 in the building named. Dr. Pancoast has a splendid reputation as a first-class and experienced dentist.

"We obey no wand but pleasure's."—Tom Moore.

THE Baldwin Theatre opened quietly Sunday night with the Liliuputians in a new fairy tale called Merry Tramps. If you feel any burning anxiety to know what it is all about, buy a libretto. The secret is sold in the lobby for ten cents. To my simple un-German mind it would seem that this "grand spectacular production" is not quite so grand, spectacular and productive as other pieces in which we have seen the Liliuputians. The scenery is proud and sufficient, the ballet is commodious and energetic, and the music is bald and banal—no particular innovation there—yet the opportunities of exploiting the specialized cleverness of these condensed comedians is fewer than usual and farther between. Ebert's miniature jag and undressing scenes—how sacredly they are preserved and handed down from year to year!—are still valuable, and a gaiety-girl dance and a chorus of "East side, Vest side," are exorbitantly comical; several instances of clever pantomime, too,—but these are not half enough for artists of the mammoth capacity of Zink, Ebert and Merkel. Merry Tramps is a bit slow for us children, but of course it will give the old people a good time.

Franz Ebert, poor old gentleman, is ageing! Gout is in his step, and his gestures are beginning to dodder. He is funnier than ever to us, but it's no joke to him. His grandson, Kaleb the Giant, is not with the company this season—gone home to learn German, I understand.

The ballet is composed of Native Daughters of the Golden West, mostly Floral Queens. This saves transportation. The big people of the cast are shipped as freight, and three adult tickets will carry the eight stars.

This is the season when the Tivolite turns to idiocy, and he gets it by the asylumfull in the new review, Miss Frisco. Sixty minutes have been cut since the opening Monday night, which means that several dead scenes and dull songs are out entirely and the pace hastened generally. As the show stands now, it is wild, terrible and funny. Joseph B. Cassell is guilty of the book, the music seems to have been committed by everybody on earth. Tommy Leary's song, "There's no place like 'Frisco,'" has made the particular hit. It is a wonderful tribute to the town, and Leary slugs it with lusty enthusiasm. Hartman has a good one, too, "Nit, nit, nit." Hartman is really funny this time as Tommy Nothing, a caricature of the old fellow who used to shout "matrimonial papers!" on the streets. Darcy is his companion grafter, Sammy Less, and not so good—perhaps for the lack of a fit song. Darcy can dance anything, and the part of Mike in Shamus O'Brien stamped him sterling as a character Irishman, but nature draws the line when Darcy tries a coon song. Who is there in the Tivoli can sing a coon song? Hartman?—never! It's a State's Prison offense whenever he tries. To sing the modern coon song requires the real rag temperament and the fancy nigger essence—the scarcest commodities in the business to-day.

West, like Raffael, is indispensable to the Tivoli. Observe the easy, legitimate worth of him as he plays the Emperor Norton. Raffael is less kind to Greenway. In fact, he doesn't flatter him a little bit, except when he sings like a ripe 'cello. And he makes him wear a ready-made evening tie. Raffael's life will not be worth Adgie's, when the original finds this out. Greenway is a Southerner, you know. Miss Morella has the title part. I should like her better if she would acquire the blessed art of occasional repose, arch herself less, and wreathe fewer smiles. Of the women, Miss Seabrooke and Miss Intropodi are the best. There is brutal truth well acted in Miss Intropodi's boozing scene, and Miss Seabrooke's gracile gentleness is a reproach to all the aggressive chirpiness she has given us in shows past. I admire her work immensely as Mrs. Alameda Mole, the dashing widow of a depraved county; she takes her songs sweetly and unaffectedly, and gives picturesqueness and human pose to her acting. I congratulate Miss Seabrooke on her reform-ation.

The author has lean chances of distinction in this sort of a review, where specialties are of first consideration and satire an after-thought. Mr. Cassell's scheme is all right so far as the beginning and the ending are concerned. He was oddly inventive to vitalize Emperor Norton's portrait and turn it loose on the town, and cleverer still to get it back into its frame by means of the mystic Brahman—in fact, the hypnotic dance in this last scene makes the best situation in the piece. But anybody could have written what goes between, which is only so clever as the actors can make it by upholstering with all sorts of extraneous specialties. Maybe Mr. Cassell is not to blame. Maybe the eager actors crowded him out. Anyway, the show fills the bill. It is full of Junebug craziness, and serves those people right who want to see something fast, furious and irresponsible.

You have seen the young woman who associates with the three life-sized lions at the Orpheum? Well, here are her announced prospects, just as I received them:

Special! Positively last week of Adgie. At the conclusion of her dancing entertainment the animals will be fed in view of the audience.

Deliberate and horrible! isn't it?

That act of Adgie's is a wonder. It dwarfs, pales, and tranquilizes everything else on the Orpheum bill. Who is going to become excited over the peaceful Irishness of the Russell Brothers or the life-prolonging exercise of the Vaidas Sisters on the domesticated trapeze? There was a time when Daily and Hilton's "eccentric comedy creations" would have been attended by considerable risk—but the Orpheum gallery seems to have lost much of its old wildness; weapons are the exception rather than the rule now; almost any old act is allowed to live.

Very often I find myself thinking of Adgie; then I leave some listless show in time to see her enter the cage. The fine, cruel excitement of it fascinates me, and the picture is something that painters do not paint. I shall not forget it soon—those big, lissome brutes, nervous-eyed, clean-jawed, with their paws of velvet and steel, and their soft, feline gestures that are so beautiful, so false, so ominous! And the girl, sometimes dressed in white, sometimes in a red that reflects blood in the beasts' eyes, is as stirring to see as one of her lions. She has the face of a lioness—the broad, strong nose, the bodeful eyes, and the alert, sensuous mouth. In the cage she is one of them. She sings to them, dances to them—not to us; sings the Paloma with sultry seduction in the rhythm of it, dances with indolent, catty grace. And the lionesses bound and hiss, and the big young brute of a lion snuggles lovingly, and goes confidingly through his silly little tricks. Of him she has no fear; the others she watches—as they watch each other.

I sit and see this act many times, and each time I go away wondering from what breed of devils this girl Adgie sprang, wondering when the last night will come. I remember what Daniel Boone said: "There is no such animal as the tamed lion. It is only a question of time and opportunity when the best lion caged will try to kill his master." Boone never would enter the cage without a dog, a Dane, the only animal, he said, that will fight a lion at a pinch. And Boone's lions, compared to Adgie's looked like moth-eaten rugs stuffed. Adgie has no dog. There is nothing between her and death but her nerve and the beasts' caprice.

Prize-fights are against the laws of some States, because they are dangerous, I believe. I saw a prize-fight once in which one of the combatants was killed by the other. I do not remember that it affected me to any extent. I felt rather ashamed of being there, that was all. If anything happens to Adgie, I shall cry, and write her epitaph.

I missed two concerts at Native Sons' Hall—Mr. Denis O'Sullivan's farewell of Monday night, and Mrs. Eunice Westwater's annual of Wednesday night. So with all good will I can join with my colleagues in celebrating both as brilliant successes. I hope that Mr. O'Sullivan will return next year and bring with him another new opera.

Monday will see a genuine first-night at the Columbia—the first production on any stage of Lorimer Stoddard's comedy, The Question. A prize of fifty dollars was offered for the best title, and somebody's idea of The Question won it hands down. It is almost as good a title as that of George Bernard Shaw's new piece, You Never Can Tell, which is to follow Under the Red Robe at the Haymarket, London. Both titles are speculative to a degree. I hope Mr. Stoddard's comedy is a good one. Another bad play would be a hard blow to the Frawleys. In any event it is to the credit of Frawley that he has the nerve to buy untried plays. While it would seem that he has a pretty sure thing in the work of Mr. Stoddard—who dramatized Tess for Mrs. Fiske—you never can tell. The Question is said to concern itself satirically with Kniekerbocker society, two unsophisticated Westerners are introduced by way of contrast, and there is a scene in a woman's club wherein the author has undertaken the manipulation of fifteen female characters of various excitability. But everyone will want to find out for himself, and I can perhaps write better about The Question next week.

The Liliputians play another week at the Baldwin, then the Lyceum Company in The Prisoner of Zenda, The First Gentleman of Europe, The Mayflower, and The Late Mr. Costello. It was in this last-named play that Miss Mary Manning, the Lyceum's new leading woman, won her first success in New York. James K. Hackett heads the company.

Miss Frisco, you know, is only an incident at the Tivoli. It is bridging time up to the Stevens engagement. Edwin Stevens, N. S. G. W., comic opera king, ex-Dalyite, and past master in the gentle art of painless comicality, has gone back to his first love. A week from Monday night he will begin an eight-weeks' season of light opera at the same Tivoli Opera House that sheltered his first efforts ten years ago and more. He brings with him a valise full of metropolitan vogues, The Princess Bonnie, The Isle of Champagne, The Grand Vizier, Wang, and others.

Conway and Leland, merry monopedes (don't ask me what that means) and Josephine Sabel, who can sing, come to the Orpheum Monday night.

That's all. ASHTON STEVENS.

BLYTHEDALE, in addition to occupying one of the most beautiful locations on the line of the scenic railway, is fortunate in having a proprietor whose large experience has peculiarly fitted her for the duties of hostess. The neat and convenient cottages scattered about are everything one could desire, and the hotel is supplied with every comfort and luxury that the most exacting and traveled guest could wish. One thing beyond these bountiful tables and admirably arranged accommodations which is particularly noticeable is the perfect system of lighting employed. Incandescent lights are scattered everywhere within and without, and add greatly to the picturesque and charming appearance of Blythedale.

It is always wise to remember a good thing, and in this connection there is nothing ahead of J. F. Cutter Whiskey, for which E. Martin & Co., 411 Market street, are sole Pacific Coast agents. J. F. Cutter is the finest drink sold anywhere. It is a smooth, mellow, and pure liquor.

The Autobiography of a Professional Beauty. by Elizabeth Phipps Train. Illustrated. Published by J. B. Lippincott Co., Philadelphia. 1896.

This is a record of the experiences of Evelyn Hilliard, a handsome American girl, in English upper class society. Evelyn has been regularly trained by her mother, whose own social antecedents are somewhat dubious, to play the rôle of a beauty, and she does it with great success. Quite early in her career she is invited to good houses, and makes herself so charming that two or three noblemen are anxious that she should share their rank and titles. One of these, the Earl of Denhigh, who is really a splendid fellow, she admires exceedingly, but does not love. It is at the Earl's country seat that the most important incident of the story takes place. A rich French girl, named Yvonne d'Alembert, who is in keen pursuit of Lord Denhigh's coronet, is visiting at Denhigh Court at the same time as Evelyn. Yvonne has a valuable collection of jewels, part of which she carries about with her in a trunk, only herself and her maid, however, being supposed to know the precise place and manner of their concealment. One day, when the guests are kept in the house, Yvonne displays her jewels to Evelyn Hilliard, and a day or two later a Mr. Tresham, also a guest at the Court, in performing some hypnotic experiments to amuse the party, becomes aware of Miss Hilliard's knowledge of the place of concealment of Yvonne's jewels. Having placed Evelyn under complete control, he sends her to abstract the jewels from Yvonne's trunk, and hand them over to her maid, who subsequently gives them to Tresham. An evening or two after the hypnotic experiments, an earring belonging to Yvonne is found clinging to the ruche at the edge of Evelyn's skirt, and it seems almost impossible to resist the conclusion that she stole the jewels. A bright lady suggests that a clever hypnotist be sent for, who will throw Evelyn again into a hypnotic condition, and make her do all that she had done on the night when Tresham controlled her. This is done: where upon Evelyn at once goes to Yvonne's room, opens the secret compartment at the bottom of the trunk, and behaves precisely as she had done before. Tresham had meanwhile left Denhigh Court, and was about to leave England, but was delayed by illness. On investigation being made, the jewels are discovered in his rooms. Cleared of this charge, Evelyn pursues her triumphant career: at the next country-house she goes to she engages in an outrageous flirtation with her host, and captivates him so that he throws discretion to the winds, and makes violent love to her: then, of course, as the sweet creatures generally are, she is frightened by his impetuosity, and throws cold water upon the fire she has lighted and industriously fanned into a blaze. But, not being an altogether had-hearted girl, Evelyn sees that she has done wrong; and experiences a revulsion of feeling in favor of Paul Sturgis, an American lawyer, and one of her earliest admirers, who has been much shocked and pained at her somewhat reckless behavior since she became a recognized beauty in English society. How Evelyn and Paul are ultimately united may be left untold. The story is a good one, and well written, the author, unlike many of her sister novelists, seeming to be reasonably well acquainted with the details of the life she describes. The little volume is well printed, and embellished with photographs from wash-drawings. It forms one volume of the Lotos library, a collection of stories issued by the Lippincott company at seventy-five cents a volume. The volumes are 16 mo. in size, and are covered with "polished buckram," a material which looks to our inexperienced eyes like glazed calico.

There recently fell into our hands a pleasantly written article entitled "An American Woman's Glimpse of Oxford," illustrated by views of Oxford Cathedral, the cloisters of Magdalen College, the Tower of Magdalen from the Botanical Gardens, etc. One luckless paragraph bristles with mistakes: it reads thus: "Christ Church meadows, opposite to which are moored the skiffs and boats and the University barge. A stroll through the famous Broad Walk, which is bordered on either side by magnificent old oaks," etc. Now "skiffs" are in University language racing single-sculling boats, and are never "moored," but are taken out of the river as soon as the scullers step out of them. "The Broad" is "bordered" with grand elms, not with "oaks." The article proceeds: "Though the racing does not take place at this point" i. e., opposite Christ Church meadows. This is just where much exciting racing does take place: the Oxford University Boat Club barge, moored just off Christ Church meadows, is the finishing point for the Eights, the Torpids, and the Fours. But Oxford is a peculiarly dangerous place to write about after a day's visit: to write correctly requires an esoteric knowledge.

In a recent issue of The Dial Mr. John Jay Chapman makes some true and interesting remarks upon the tendency of the Magazines, especially the older and more prosperous ones, to fall into ruts, and to exclude good matter because it does not coincide with "the policy of the magazine." He says that, once a periodical has attained success (i. e., in the eyes of nearly everybody, a large circulation) every new departure represents risk: the safest thing to do is to go on printing the same issue every month. An article or phrase that does not chime in with the ignorance or lack of taste of the average subscriber, that does not pander to popular prejudice, but perhaps even audaciously opposes it or tries to remove it, will alienate subscribers, and, worse than all, cause advertisers to drop off. For nowadays it is not truth, good sense, or right reason that are considered, but patent soap, infants' food, and washing powders. The editor of no periodical in the country dare print a line likely to affect injuriously the sale of a pill or a porous plaster. Such is the boasted independence of the press.

It is really hard to keep track of the changes of form and policy that come over some of the periodicals. Romance began as a publication devoted to short stories: then, despite its name, it became a somewhat feeble illustrated collection of odds and ends. In September, 1896, it doubled its price and the superficial area of its pages. The enlarged Romance was published by the Current Literature Publishing Company, and promised to supply to its purchasers information of a literary, scientific and romantic sort, with abundant pictures. In January, 1897, it passed into the hands of a new proprietor, Mr. Gilson Willets, of 1440 Broadway, New York, who announced that Romance would become a story book, pure and simple, once again. Of course, by "pure and simple" we merely mean that the periodical, which is now of a small octavo size, will be wholly made up of stories. We do not vouch for their purity or their simplicity. Indeed, we have not been encouraged, on turning over the pages of some issues, to tackle any of them.

Mr. C. B. Fernald, the short story writer, has returned to the United States after a bicycling trip with his wife through Japan. Mr. and Mrs. Fernald penetrated to the interior of Japan, where cycles are objects so unfamiliar that the children offered carrots to them as food. Mr. Fernald, however, was disappointed with Japan and the Japanese. Both the country and the people have departed considerably from their old picturesque national life, and so much has been written about them in late years that it is difficult to find new material. Altogether, Mr. and Mrs. Fernald found China more interesting than the land of the chrysanthemum.

The story of the Farallones, by C. Barlow, with half-tones by Bolton and Strong, has just been issued from the Press of Town Talk. It is a neatly got-up brochure, giving an account of the islands, with views of the principal points of interest, pictures of the sea-lions, puffins, cormorants, and other creatures found there. Some of the pictures are from photo-engravings that have been already published in "The Museum" and The Overland Monthly, but many are new. Mr. Barlow is evidently an enterprising photographer, for several of the pictures reproduced can have been by no means easy to secure. The little book costs fifty cents.

NOW that the weddings are over, people are beginning to turn their thoughts countrywards. To the swim, however, "going to the country" does not mean green fields, cozy nooks in winding paths under shady trees, sweet milk and freshly-churned butter, a perfect freedom from social obligations, one dress all day, with a fresh one for dinner—if so inclined, but not a necessity—a good book and a lazy life generally; not much. But to the fashionable devotee the country visit means a change of base merely from the fun and fuss of society life to a place where a shady spot means a quiet flirtation, a clubhouse balcony, a place for mixed drinks and jolly good fellowship with the men. Thin dresses and simple muslins are allowable. Yes, but toilettes must be changed several times a day, and full evening costume for dinner obligatory. Cards day and night, and pleasure in any and every shape the one thing sought, whether a sacrifice results or no. Daughters to be settled in life require the outlay, so paterfamilias learns to acquiesce.

"Why is it," said a girl at one of the recent weddings, "that Wiltsee always has so many nice men friends, real men, and most always hailing from New York?" This probably is one reason of the great popularity of the returned African traveler. However, Wiltsee is so universal an admirer of the fair sex, and so general in his attentions to the girls, it is hopeless to think of him as a possible fatur. Southard Hoffman is another society beau very popular with the women, but as a pretty girl just back from the East is said to have lamented, "Old man Mayne didn't leave the Hoffman boys anything." Young Brooks seems to be getting his hand in, preparatory to next winter's gaieties. At one of the weddings, lately, he did the "sitting on the stairs" act with admirable complacency.

Miss Leontine Blakeman's bright eyes have been doing much damage among the beaux since her return from New York. She is universally admired. Another girl who bids fair to make many conquests next winter is an Oakland belle who figured as bridesmaid to Miss Ethel Cohen when she became Mrs. Bent. Miss Alice Moffatt's sweet face attracted many admiring glances on that auspicious occasion.

Latest news from a popular young couple making the tour of Europe on their wedding trip, finds them in Paris enjoying every moment as people only can in the French capital. On their return they will make their home in the brown stone mansion on Jackson street. The knowing ones repeat the oft told report, that there will be a consolidation of these two families, and the home on the Avenue will be abandoned.

Two of the prettiest buds at the Bent-Cohen wedding were Miss Carroll and Miss Follis, who attracted universal attention; their piquante brunette style is very fetching. Buds and blossoms will have to look to their laurels next winter, and from present indications several many hearts are beating rapidly on their account.

On dit, the Downey Harveys are going to do a lot of entertaining in a suburban way at their newly-acquired summer home at Belvedere. Downey is the soul of hospitality and can be relied upon for giving his friends a rattling good time. The wonder among society folk has been that the Harveys did not select San Rafael for the summer.

The visit of the Italian prince did not cause the sensation expected; but he was so evidently bent on climbing the big mountain to the exclusion of all social attractions that it was a great disappointment to those who wished to entertain him.

Mrs. Henry Scott is already collecting her guests for the "house party" on the Fourth of July holidays, and those who are of the fortunate number say that B'ingham never saw such a merry crowd before.

People frequently ask why Mrs. McLane-Martin is so long in bringing out in society her daughter, Miss Cook, that young lady being an embryo belle at Santa Cruz for some time past.

THE SEÑORA'S SECRET

By Lillian Ferguson

WHEN Bernard Lawton, artist, litterateur, and Bostonian, announced his intention of going to San Francisco for the summer, instead of piloting his mother and sisters about the continent, there was much pouting and dismay in the household. It is really very inconvenient junketing over Europe without a trousered accessory to look after the family luggage. But Bernard was determined to enjoy his outing after his own fashion, and having served in the capacity of envoy extraordinary to his womenkind the summer previous, felt that he had earned the privilege of "flocking by himself" for one season, at least. Accordingly, after seeing his relatives safely aboard an Atlantic steamer, and the last flutter of a Lawton handkerchief or a Lawton petticoat was no longer visible, he started westward with a sigh of relief. One may love one's relatives and still not yearn to be a perennial guide, philosopher, and friend to them.

The young man had two reasons for acquainting himself with San Francisco. He was collecting material for a book of travel, with sketches, and wished to explore the western metropolis; and it was in San Francisco that all trace had been lost of his uncle and godfather in the early fifties. When the latter disappeared, leaving a bag of gold dust and his personal belongings in his lodgings, his friends, believing him dead, had in time forwarded his effects to his brother in Boston, the will naming the latter's son as his heir. The money had been applied to Bernard's education, and Bernard had always cherished a feeling of warmest gratitude for the donor, official proof of whose death had never been established. Of late, a desire had come over him to trace for himself, if possible, the career of his relative in San Francisco.

He had been in the city some weeks without learning more than he already knew. A number of the white-haired pioneers whom he had hunted up gave him corroborative information, but of an unsatisfactory and meager kind. They remembered Lawton well, but shook their heads when Bernard suggested foul play as an explanation of his disappearance. He had no enemies, they argued, and none of his money was missing. It seemed to be the general belief that he had met with a fatal accident and that the body had not been discovered in time for identification.

Bernard, however, could not or would not abandon his search for the final chapter in his benefactor's romantic history. He recalled him as the idol of his childhood, a fine-looking man, to whom he was declared by his parents to bear a striking resemblance. When the elder Lawton had started for California with the gold fever burning high in his veins, he had kissed Bernard, then a little chap, good-bye, with many promises of the good times they should have when he returned. He had also left a sweetheart, a tall, blue-eyed girl, now one of Boston's stately matrons, with two sons at Harvard, for her heart had not broken when her lover failed to come back. Even in those days it was not considered good form in Boston to wither away for mere love.

To Bernard, with his artist's soul alive to impressions and his mind renewing its activity amid surroundings that everywhere appealed to his literary sense, San Francisco and its environs were a fascinating study. Day after day he wandered here and there, drawn by a whim in one direction, by an impulse in another, from Russian Hill to the hay, from Chinatown to Bernal Heights, always finding something new and interesting by land or sea. The Spanish side of life attracted him strongly, and he took especial delight in sketching the relics of adobe architecture that mark the earlier era of romance, and form a picturesque link between the conventional, mercenary present and the soul-stirring, chivalrous past.

One day after adding the finishing touches to a sketch of an alcalde's moss-grown, ivy-embowered resting place in the Mission Dolores burying ground, which he had obtained permission from the church authorities to visit, he strolled for some time about the neighborhood, when, turning the corner into a narrow, unfrequented street, he came upon a crumbling adobe which immediately caught his fancy. There was an air of inscrutable mystery about the quaint, tumble-down dwelling. He drew nearer it, impelled by something more than an artist's desire for details. An influence that he could not until afterward account for or define led him to lift the latch of the wooden gate, which creaked on its hinges under a mass of honeysuckle that twined over and about it. A gnarled grapevine arbor covered the plank walk leading to a low porch that ran the width of the house. The place was silent as death itself. Evidence of the inmate's fondness for flowers was seen in the brilliant-hued geraniums that brightened the shade from every available nook, rooted in rusty tin cans. Cacti blossomed in cracked earthen pots, and hood-red roses nodded at him from boxes where they bloomed luxuriantly. Bernard had to stoop, so low had sunk the roofing, with bits of sunlight piercing its tiles, while the porch almost gave way beneath his tread. He seated himself on a wooden bench against the wall, for no answer had come to his knock. It had been his intention to beg forgiveness for the intrusion, and state that he was a tourist anxious to get a glimpse of the interior of what must be one of the city's oldest landmarks. He knew that the Spaniards are the most kindly and hospitable of people in their casas, and so did not fear rebuke.

The afternoon was warm, and Bernard bared his head, enjoying the solitude of the spot, though a trespasser upon its peace. He was so near to the prosaic world that he could almost hear its heartbeats, yet hidden from the sight of passers-by. It was a bit of Arcady itself within the city limits; an oasis in the desert of civilization.

A bright-eyed lizard crept from under the doorsill and shot past him into the garden. He closed his eyes, yielding to the dreaminess about him. Whether he slept a moment or an hour he never knew. He was abruptly awakened by an exclamation of terror. A Spanish woman of middle age and imposing figure stood before him in the arbor, which she had entered from the street. Her face, singularly handsome yet, was ashen under its olive tint. Her large eyes, black and dilated, were fixed upon her visitor as though they beheld a ghost. When Bernard sprang to his feet, about to apologize for alarming her, she sank to her knees, crossed herself, murmured "Dios! Dios!" and would have fallen to the ground had he not caught her. Presently she staggered to her feet, and flinging him off with sudden strength, rushed to the house, unlocked the door and slipped the bolt sharply into place behind her.

Bernard, nonplussed, and blaming himself for what he had done, picked up his hat from the bench and turned to go, when he caught sight of his own initials cut in deep letters in the panel of the door—B. M. L. He stood as though stunned for a few seconds, and then a light flashed across the darkness of the situation. His uncle's initials were his also. This woman's fright at seeing him who was the living embodiment of the other—surely here was something more than a coincidence.

Inquiries in the neighborhood revealed little more than the fact that the Señora Ygnacia had lived alone in the adobe house as far back as any one could remember. The house itself had been there when all around was but a knee-deep drift of sand. She was very devout, and never left home excepting to go to the Mission or on an errand of mercy or necessity; as much of a recluse as though she were a nun in a convent.

Bernard went to his hotel in an excited condition of mind. His sleep that night was disturbed by dreams of his uncle, who seemed to be alternately heckoning him on and entreating him to keep silence. In the morning he resolved to learn at any cost what the Señora might know. Her manifest fear at sight of him led him to the belief that she of all others in San Francisco was the one to go to for the truth.

That afternoon he invaded for the second time the old garden of the adobe. No one answered his knock, but he could hear the sound of a woman's sobs within.

"Señora," he called, softly but distinctly, "I must speak with you. Upon my honor, as upon that of my uncle, Bernard Melville Lawton, I will not harm you."

Still there was no reply. "Señora," he finally said, "if you do not open the door, I shall be compelled to force it open. I must speak with you."

There was a quick movement within, and the Señora Ygnacia stood with flashing eyes and quivering nostrils in the dimness of the room before him.

"Coward!" she said, as Bernard advanced. "Would you break like a thief into my house?"

Removing his hat, he walked close to her. "Señora," said he, with winning gentleness, "I am not the brute that I seem. I seek news of my uncle, whose initials are carved upon your door. What of him, Señora?"

The woman's eyes were searching every line of his face. "Dios!" she muttered; "the very image—even the voice." Then she paused and regarded Bernard defiantly. There was silence for a few moments. "Yes," she added, finally, "I once knew the Señor Lawton, but that was many years ago. He went away, no one knew where." She lifted her hand nervously to brush a thickly curling lock of gray hair from her temple, and the young man saw upon her finger a ring which he had often when a child turned round upon his uncle's finger. He decided upon a bold stroke, though a blind one.

"Señora Ygnacia," he said, slowly, gazing at her as though he would read her very soul, "I have come to find the murderer of my uncle."

The woman fell to her knees, elapsing his hands in both of her's, and hurst into a torrent of weeping.

"It was because I loved him," she confessed. "Oh, when we of Spanish blood love, we love; and when we hate, mother of mercy, how we hate! And I hated the Señorita in the East whose picture he wore and whom he must marry, he said, although it was I whom he loved. "Honor" he called it. But what was her love compared with mine? When he said good-by to me that night, I was maddened with jealous rage. I stabbed him. Then, terrified at my crime, dug a grave for him in the sand. Since then I have lived only to expiate my sin. I pray, day and night, for forgiveness."

Bernard helped her to rise. "Take me to his grave," he said.

"He has no grave but my heart," the unhappy woman replied. "I—I removed him after awhile. I could not bear to be separated from my beloved. You may as well know all," she added. "Follow me, and then give me up to the authorities if you will. I shall deserve my fate."

Crossing the room to the door of an inner chamber, she heckoned to Bernard. The apartment which they entered was strewn with freshly-cut flowers. At the head and foot of a couch tapers were burning. The Señora lifted a black cloth, disclosing a skeleton, over which she murmured the name of her lover with ineffable tenderness. Her eyes, with remorse, gloom and unquenehable devotion, sought those of her companion in mute, helpless inquiry.

Bernard's voice sounded huskily strange to his own ears as it broke the stillness.

"Señora," he said, "your secret is safe." Then, softly closing the door, he went forth into the summer sunshine.

Japanese art is as peculiar as the little brown men themselves; but a trip to Japan is not necessary to learn it. Just step in to George T. Marsb & Co.'s, at 625 Market street, under the Palace Hotel, and there one can see all manner of quaint tapestries, rare carvings, and strangest curios. It is a veritable little Japan right in the middle of San Francisco.

The Pine Street Market.

There is little to be said of the market during the past week on Pine street. Notwithstanding the cheery talk of good times ahead, another season of dry rot has set in, which has cut the earnings of commission brokers down to the bare bone, and placed the "chippers" in a position where they can not turn a dollar one way or the other. The prospects at some of the mines are all right, but a pity it is people cannot live on prospects. A manipulator with some money, and the brains to use it, would be the biggest kind of a god-send on the street just now. Bonanza strikes would then come along in good time, with more likelihood of their being some use in the way of building up business. Now in face of the prevailing inactivity, news of ore discoveries falls, to a great extent, upon deaf ears. Cbollar held up pretty well during the early part of the week. Con. Cal-Virginia did not. For some reason the last named stock has been drooping for days past, notwithstanding favorable reports from the mine, which continues to produce a fine grade of ore. Chollar-Brunswick, the despised and regretted of the pharasaical censors on the street, is turning out gold at the rate of some $300,000 a year. Many people will incline to the belief that a property of this description must be possessed of some merit, while surprised at the yield of much decried gypsum, with its streaks and hunches of ore. To the ordinary mind the adoption of a policy which would lead to more active development work along the line of the Brunswick lode, would seem sensible just about this time, when money for practically dead work in other quarters is difficult to raise. This and the prosecution of the development of the west country by the South end companies is of chief importance. The constantly reiterated reports of progress elsewhere are beginning to wear a little on public patience. No new assessments are reported for the week.

A New Dry Washer.

If a new machine invented in this city for the saving of gold in dry districts works out as well in practice as it does in theory, the much vexed question of water supply has been solved satisfactorily for all time. These machines are portable in sizes, which will permit of a profitable day's work. They are also simple in the way of gearing. A cylinder, through which a tight-fitting screw revolves, receives the feed, carried downward under pressure by the blades of the screw to a tank of quicksilver, where amalgamation goes on, the waste being subsequently run off after rising above another charge of quicksilver filling the space around the cylinder. So far the experimental machine has done good work, and one will soon be shipped to the southern portion of the State to be tested on auriferous deposits found there, hitherto valueless owing to a lack of water. One good feature about this machine is that the greatest expense about it is the quicksilver.

The Gold of Silver Peak.

The announcement that a syndicate of American capitalists had at last taken bold of the celebrated Blair mines at Silver Peak, Nev., is of the most interesting character, both from the magnitude of the property and the wealth of the purchasers. The only wonder is that such a piece of property should have remained lost to the industry for so many years past, with so many alleged buyers peregrinating throughout the country looking for a mine, the more especially as the price asked has never been exorbitant, not nearly so much, in fact, as the figures placed upon old, worked-out shells in California, depending for a sale upon their past reputation. All that is to be paid for the Blair mines is a million dollars, and it would not be difficult to point to many an investment of more than that money in this State and elsewhere with little in the way of value to back it. The new owners of the Blair mine will be James B. Haggin, Marcus Daly, J. B. Canda, John W. Mackay and George D. Roberts. The experts reporting on the ground are James T. Hague and Alexander M. Womble. These gentlemen, both of whom are well known in the mining world, have been on the ground with a corps of assistants for some time past, and their reports are voluminous. Mr. Roberts would have reported too, had he been permitted to make an examination, which was not done through some misunderstanding. Roberts, however, did not get left, for he ensured his position in the deal no matter who carried it to completion, by shrewdly corraling all the available water in the vicinity, which is about as valuable, if not more so, than the gold itself. It will be an uncommonly cold day when the same festive George D. gets left, and he is just about as safe to fool with in a mining operation as a mule's hind foot, as the manipulators of the Blair deal have now learned by experience.

The Anaconda Of Gold Mining.

For over thirty years the Blair property, consisting of some sixteen claims, has lain idle. This was the will of its whimsical owner, James I. Blair, of New York, reputed worth more money than any other man in the Empire State. Blair had a good deal of bother with the mine, more than he cared to have, situated as he was in point of wealth. Located too far away for personal supervision, thievery was rampant in all directions, and in sheer disgust the order was given to close down operations, although even then, with crude machinery and methods, the property had established the reputation of being a bonanza. Since then, from time to time, lessees have worked on the mine with excellent results, and judging from these and the extent of the ore deposits, the new owners claim that the Blair will prove in gold mining what the Anaconda has been in the world of copper. John Cbiatovich, one of the former lessees, worked in all, it is said, some 10,030 tons of ore, which yielded at the rate of $15.00 to the ton, some $6.50 having been subsequently recovered from the tailings by the cyanide process. Sam Wasson, the latest lessee, worked 1,900 tons, and got $21.00 to the ton, and assays by F. F. Thomas, now of the Gwinn mine, for a term covering three years, show an average value of $15.90. The mining conditions are similar to those at the Alaska Treadwell mine, with two separate and distinct veins, one fifteen feet and the other twenty-five feet wide, which can be literally quarried out of the hillside. The surface exposure, where the vein has already been opened, is said to equal a height of 700 feet. It is expected that an immense plant will be erected at the mines by the new owners, who will only be limited in expenditures by the capabilities of the property in the matter of ore production. The passing of the Blair mine into the hands of such wealthy and enterprising men will be a great thing for this part of Nevada.

The Grand Central Purchase.

A letter from Hamilton Smith is now going the rounds of the press in which that gentleman takes the responsibility of advising the purchase of the Grand Central mine of Mexico, originally accredited to Henry Janin. Smith claims to have recommended the purchase of this ground independent of any advice from Janin. The latter will doubtless not object to this explanation, which does not seem altogether necessary, considering that the recommendation was made upon the report of Janin and Mr. Farish. If the mine turns out all right, there will possibly be others ready to assume any responsibility, covering both preliminary reports; their confirmation and subsequent recommendation as a purchasable venture. In the meantime, as it now stands, betwixt and between, the heroism of Mr. Smith stands out noticeably in black and white.

Will Dredge the Yuba.

A company is about to begin work dredging the Yuba river for gold, near what is known as Park's Bar bridge. The system to be used is one patented in New Zealand, consisting of two boats fitted with buckets of a light draft of water, the capacity being estimated at between eighty and one hundred tons of material in the hour. This is a step in the right direction, although so far the bucket arrangement has not proved successful. The newer system of suction will eventually be adopted in work of this kind, being both cheaper and more effective. It will not be long now until all the rivers of California will be systematically exploited for the gold they are known to contain.

Down Crier

"Hear the Crier!" "What the devil art thou?"
"One that will play the devil, sir, with you."

REVEREND George R. Wallace, before a recent meeting of that anomalous job lot of soul savers, the Chicago Association of Congregational Churches, rose upon his rear extremities, laid back his ears, opened the cavernous mouth of him, and brayed forth the statement that "San Francisco is hell." Brother Wallace was moved to this declaration because we had the good taste to kick C. Overman Brown, his colleague, out of the local fold. The Reverend George has gotten things slightly mixed. San Francisco is not hell. But Dr. Brown, now of Chicago in general and the devil in particular, tried hard enough to raise hell when he was here.

REVEREND V. Marshall Law, rector of the Church of the Advent, in Oakland, made the astounding announcement last Sunday that electricity is God, and that the pentecostal flame was an electric illumination, presumably something like the electric ballet at the Tivoli last winter. But, alas, if the holy man's theory of a God who is seldom found in churches, but turns up nightly in nearly all the theatres and saloons, is true, it is only the rich who can afford to live in daily communion with the Deity, and the TOWN CRIER's well-known penury compels him to still live a goddess existence.

THE TOWN CRIER's excellent friend, Mrs. Perkins, says she don't see the sense in making such a fuss over pulling down that house in Florida, Mo., just because Twain was born there, and as for people hegging for bits of wood or brick as relics, she thinks it's ridiculous. Why, she could show them dozens of houses right here in San Francisco where triplets and even quartettes were born, and she ain't aware that it ever raised the value of the property; for her part she don't think it delicate to call so much attention to an occurrence of that nature.

WHAT with cavorting around the country in ashes or having one's last place of repose in a graveyard placarded over with interment hills against relatives of the deceased, as in the case of the Blanche plot in Laurel Hill Cemetery and Billposter Florist Dauvilliers, there is really no inducement to die. One might as well stay alive and take his chances, as be subjected to persecution and prosecution when he can't fight back.

PLAGIARISM is the somewhat grave charge of which Br'er W. D. Williams, erstwhile pastor of Plymouth Church, stands accused. It appears that the touching verselets appended to certain obituaries of late and signed by the gentleman of the cloth were pilfered from no less a poetical source than Whittier. Our brother's sin is great but it might have been greater. He might have made the poetry original.

NICHOLAS HENNICKER, a frisky septuagenarian, confesses to a fondness for the fair sex, and admits that playing the races is his pet diversion. This combination of temptations has proved disastrous to many a man, and Nicholas should endeavor to reform before it is too late. It would be sad indeed were he to become a confirmed sport in the very flower of his youth.

CHRISTIAN Endeavorers are proudly pointing to the increased attendance at divine service last Sunday as a sign of spiritual growth in our midst, and not unnaturally appropriate some of the credit themselves. But the real reason is to be found elsewhere; since the ladies cannot show off their high hats in the theatres there is nothing for them but to go to church.

ASTRONOMICAL disturbances aloft of Mount Hamilton are to be investigated at the next meeting of the Board of Regents. It is whispered that a total eclipse of salaries will be visible to the naked eye when the professors and their judges come into perihelion.

IT is a common saying that good Americans go to Paris when they die; it is probable that the bad ones go to Chicago.

PENDING the reinstatement of one hundred and thirty-five street department employes, laid off on account of municipal poverty, San Francisco's thoroughfares will probably resemble a garbage heap in the interim. Our streets are none too clean at any time, and the summer winds are likely to have a merry time of it during the coming weeks. Placards explaining the embarrassing situation should be posted at the ferries, that strangers may not be scandalized at our disorderly condition.

THIS Golden State has been painted yellow with bogus five dollar pieces, and the gang of counterfeiters engaged in the nefarious task now repose behind the bars. The efforts of other offenders to blacken our reputation having succeeded equally well, California will soon loom up as brilliantly beside its sister States as a circus donkey in a corral of thoroughbreds. San Francisco is becoming very weary of posing as a goal for the criminal element of the world at large.

THE other day Señor Argandanos, a young Peruvian, avenged an insult tendered his sister by chopping off the ears of the insulter, who was an attaché of the Chilean legation in Bolivia. The report goes on to say that "the Bolivian War Minister has been commissioned to visit England for the purpose of buying arms." But it doesn't seem likely that a man would accept arms as a compensation for his ears.

WILLIAM J. BRYAN, the hoy orator from the rippling Platte, will be here with the rest of the fireworks on the Glorious Fourth. William is not a dangerous explosive, although he makes a good deal of noise. His pyrotechnics in the late presidential contest were dazzling, but attended with no fatal results excepting the injury to his party, which went up in campaign smoke.

THAT very gentlemanly female person, Mrs. John Martin, who is invariably spectacular, whether painting a house in pantalettes or lecturing to empty seats in behalf of a condemned murderer, appeared this week in court as her own attorney, disproving the adage that he who argues his own case has a fool for a client. Mrs. John is several other things, but she is not a fool.

THE Chicago divines, who welcomed Dr. C. O. Brown so eagerly into the midst of them, seem to have but a slight opinion of San Francisco; they compare it to Hell, greatly to the advantage of the latter region. Well, if they take Brown as a representative Californian, we can forgive them their low opinion of us; he certainly did give the town a bad name while he was here.

ALAMEDA COUNTY is excessively agitated because so much heer soaked into her soil in Niles Canyon while the Brewers' Picnic was in steamy progress. It is not so much on temperance grounds, however, as upon those of economy. It grieves Alameda, its politicians particularly, to have had so much good jag material wasted on the desert soil.

BLANKS innumerable are being submitted as evidence in the Fair-Craven case, now dragging its interminable way through the courts. The blankety-blanks used from time to time by exasperated legal counsel and impatient witnesses have not, however, been placed on record. They would, it is feared, cause spontaneous combustion.

FOUR society young men across the bay will turn tramp for their summer vacation. It is just the other way with us over here. Our gilded youth are frequently tramps first and society men afterward. Vide Singer, the Chicago tenderfoot, who hiked his way to the charmed circle.

CAPITALIST BRADBURY, the obnoxious millionaire who has expectorated his way to notoriety, will take his case to the Supreme Court. En route, he should be provided by the authorities with portable cuspadors.

THE fear of death is common to all, and is attributed to the uncertainty of what comes after death; but strange to say, the certainty of what comes after death increases this fear in San Francisco capitalists.

SALARIES at the State University have gone up. The move toward an increased altitude of compensation is quite consistent with a higher education.

ST. MARTIN'S SUMMER.—CASSELL'S MAGAZINE.

We must take our lives as we made them, love;
 St. Martin's summer, though bright, is brief;
 And where in spring was the violet's home
 Is now the grave of the fallen leaf.
 We quarreled once when the spring was here,
 But peace is made with the failing year.
 The summer time of our life is passed,
 We faced its glare and its heat alone,
 With aching hearts and with weary hands
 That the mournful farewell touch had known;
 Now the fiercest struggles of life are o'er,
 Our hands are met to unclasp no more.
 The bitter thought of "what might have been"
 Must never trouble your heart again;
 Hide it away from memory's eyes,
 With our angry words and our parting pain;
 Forget the grief that for me you bore,
 In the love that is yours for evermore.
 We must take our lives as we made them, love;
 St. Martin's summer, though brief, is bright,
 And could there aught in the spring compare
 With the tender glow of the autumn light?
 I loved you first when the spring was here,
 More dearly now in the failing year!

THE MODERN BACCHANTE.—ROSALIE M. JONAS, IN TOWN.

She is crowned with deep rubies, not vine leaves,
 She is gowned in dull gold, her bright hair
 Ripples down to her feet in soft splendor,
 Tiny feet in French slippers, not bare.
 She reclines not on hills, where mad tendrils
 Clamber high to be trod by her feet,
 But she nestles, white, languorous, lovely,
 'Mid satins as perfumed and sweet.
 She upholds the gold weight of the goblet
 In the tremulous clasp of her hand,
 And her lips glow like bright poison berries,
 As her eyes feed the flame they have fanned.
 Foolish Bacchus! You are but a mortal!
 And the wine has made heavy your brain,
 While your love, ah; the goddess! or devil!
 With a kiss locks your shackles again.

INTROSPECTION.—CARRIE BLAKE MORGAN.

O heart of mine, for shame! to ache, and ache!
 Because a few things thou didst love are lost!
 What if some treasures, yielded up, have cost
 Thee dear?—is that a sign that thou needst break?
 Millions of hearts did ache ere thou didst feel
 One stab of pain; for any heart can break;
 But few can play the game of give and take,
 And come out whole from under life's hard heel.
 So heart, brace up, and twang thy quivering strings
 Into new strength. Ask no more tears of me;
 Nor beg of me to voice thy grief for thee.
 Poor heart, thou and thy kind are weakling things!

FETTERED.—FLORENCE HOARE.

Bring me not roses red or white,
 For they belong to the past—
 I look in your tender eyes to-night
 And know the truth at last;
 The love you took and the love you gave
 Have woven a life-long chain,
 And your soul is sighing to be free,
 Tho' constant you remain.
 The white-winged gulls in the open fly,
 Where your restless soul would go;
 'Tis only the love that will not die
 That chains your heart I know—
 And because I hold you dearest—best,
 I long for the time to be
 When you'll lay the roses where I rest
 And think no more of me.

NOTES OF THE ARMY AND NAVY.

The United States Naval Academy graduates, who are located here, gave a most enjoyable banquet at the Bohemian Club last Saturday evening. Covers were laid for twenty-five, and Mr. Symmes Harrison Hunt, of the class of '61, presided. An elaborate menu, music, and many felicitous toasts made the affair very pleasant.

The reports of the officers of the Inspector General's Department, who are now in their final tours of the fiscal year, will be very interesting. There are 103 colleges and other institutions, with more than 40,000 students, nearly 20,000 of whom are enrolled in the military department. Enough army officers for two fighting regiments are detailed upon this duty.

Lieutenant Colonel Evan Miles, First Infantry, U. S. A., has assumed command at the Presidio.

Lieutenant Colonel John I. Rodgers, Second Artillery, U. S. A., has been promoted to the rank of Colonel. He is now at Fort Schuyler, N. Y.

Lieutenant Colonel L. S. Babbitt, U. S. A., and his son, Lieutenant E. B. Babbitt, U. S. A., with their wives, have been down from Benicia Barracks during the past week and stayed at the Occidental Hotel.

Major S. W. Groesbeck, Judge Advocate, U. S. A., was recently granted one month's leave of absence, with permission to apply for an extension of one month.

Rear Admiral Samuel Philip Lee, U. S. N., retired, was stricken with paralysis and died last Saturday at Silver Springs, near Sligo, Md. His death is a matter of deep regret to many officers on this coast.

Commander Richardson Clover, U. S. A., arrived here last Monday with his wife and two daughters. They will pass the summer on their beautiful ranch in Napa Valley.

Paymaster Charles T. J. Cowie, U. S. N., who was detached from the Monocacy, arrived here from Shanghai last Sunday en route home on a leave of absence.

Lieutenant William G. Sills, First Cavalry, U. S. A., has returned to Fort Logan, Colo., after his brief but pleasant visit here.

Lieutenant James Hamilton, Third Artillery, U. S. A., has been granted an extension of three months on his present leave of absence.

Lieutenant John S. Culp, Medical Department, U. S. A., has been appointed medical officer of the squadron of the Fourth Cavalry now marching to Fort Yellowstone. Upon the arrival of the squadron at its destination he will return at once to his station.

Lieutenant S. L. Graham, U. S. N., retired, and Mrs. Graham are at Coronado Beach. They have been residing in the City of Mexico for some time.

Lieutenant H. D. Todd Jr., Third Artillery, U. S. A., was one of the two secretaries of the Academic Board at the graduation exercises at the Military Academy.

Lieutenant F. B. McKenna, Fifteenth Infantry, U. S. A., who is stationed at Fort Sheridan, Ill., has been visiting his father, Judge Joseph McKenna, in Washington, D. C. He was formally presented to President McKinley at the White House on June 4th.

Lieutenant J. F. Reynolds Landis, First Cavalry, U. S. A., has been detached from duty at the Presidio and ordered to join his regiment at Fort Riley, Kansas.

Lieutenant Clermont L. Best, U. S. A., has been promoted to the rank of Captain in the First Artillery. He is at Fort Hamilton, N. Y., but was formerly stationed at the Presidio.

Lieutenant Herbert Winslow, U. S. N., of the Yorktown, has been promoted to the rank of Lieutenant Commander.

Second Lieutenant G. F. McGlathlin Jr., Fifth Artillery, U. S. A., has been promoted to the rank of First Lieutenant.

All officers of the United States Navy retire by law when they reach sixty-two years of age. If the President would adopt this rule for the army it would rejuvenate the service immensely. He can at once retire two Colonels of cavalry, two Colonels of artillery, and three Colonels of infantry. This would cause promotions from Lieutenant-Colonels all down the line, and make several enlisted men Second Lieutenants. It would bring younger men into higher grades, and enable many officers to obtain well-deserved promotions before they are retired for age. The Germans are rejuvenating their army by retiring Generals as young as fifty-three years of age.

There is a rumor at the War Department that General William M. Graham, U. S. A., will soon retire, but those who are best informed state that he will serve his entire term. He retires on the age limit on September 23, 1898. He will therefore be a Brigadier about sixteen months. There is a bare possibility that he will be assigned to the Department of Dakota.

Secretary Gage has issued an order prohibiting officers of the Revenue Cutter Service from soliciting the exercise of the official or personal influence of prominent public citizens to obtain for them assignments to duty, revocation of orders, and other personal favors, often detrimental to the public interest and always injurious to the morale of the service. Any infraction of this order will be considered ample cause for summary action.

Commander William H. Whiting, U. S. A., will be detached from duty as commandant of the Puget Sound Naval Station next Tuesday and ordered to command the Monadnock.

Lieutenant-Commander C. A. Adams, U. S. N., was detached from the Richmond at Philadelphia last Tuesday and ordered to the Monterey as executive officer. He will relieve Lieutenant-Commander A. B. Speyers, U. S. N., who will proceed home on waiting orders.

Lieutenant-Commander J. D. Briggs, U. S. N., arrived here last Sunday, en route to Honolulu. He was recently detached from the New York Navy Yard and ordered to the Philadelphia as executive officer. He will relieve Lieutenant-Commander R. R. Ingersoll, U. S. N., who has been ordered home and granted two months' leave of absence.

Lieutenant-Colonel F. M. Coxe, Paymaster's Department, U. S. A., has been elected senior Vice-Commander of the Commandery of Oregon, Military Order of the Loyal Legion.

Paymaster T. J. Cowie, U. S. N., has been detached from the Monocacy and ordered home. Prior to his departure, the crew of the Monocacy presented him with a handsome gold-headed cane, suitably inscribed, as a testimonial of their esteem.

Paymaster J. B. Redfield, U. S. N., is now general store keeper at Norfolk, Va.

Passed Assistant Engineer G. Kaemmerling, U. S. N., has been detached from the Bureau of Steam Engineering and ordered to the Olympia at Yokohama, per steamer of June 26th. He will relieve Passed Assistant Engineer W. B. Dunning, U. S. N., who will proceed to the Machias at Chemulpo to relieve Chief Engineer A. V. Zane, U. S. N., who has been granted two months' leave of absence.

Captain G. W. Sumner, U. S. N., has been detached from the command of the Monadnock and granted one month's leave of absence.

Mrs. S. D. Sturgis, wife of Lieutenant Sturgis, Fourth Artillery, U. S. A., is visiting her parents in St. Paul, Minn.

Mrs. W. H. Allen, wife of Lieutenant Allen, U. S. N., has changed her mail address to the care of the Navy Pay Office in this city.

Lieutenant J. A. Hoogemeerf, U. S. N., has been undergoing examination for promotion during this week at Washington, D. C.

Ensign S. V. Grabam, U. S. N., has been detached from the Oregon and ordered to the Albatross.

Brigadier General James W. Forsyth, U. S. A., has been appointed President of the Retiring Board here.

Captain C. L. Hooper, U. S. R. C. S., commanding the Bering Sea fleet, arrived in Port Townsend last Tuesday and left the same day for Sitka. He will join the fleet there and then proceed to Unalaska.

Major Delafeld Du Bois, U. S. A., retired, arrived here last Monday in the steamer Newport and is at the Occidental Hotel. He has been visiting Panama.

Passed Assistant Surgeon J. W. Baker, U. S. N., of the Bennington, and Mrs. Baker, are enjoying an outing in the Santa Cruz Mountains at the Hotel Rowardenan.

Lieutenant J. D. C. Hoskins, Third Artillery, U. S. A., has rejoined at Fort Monroe, Va., after a visit to New Rochelle, N. Y.

Lieutenant G. A. Detchmendy, First Infantry, U. S. A., who is on leave of absence from the Presidio until September 1st, is visiting friends at Milton, Ky.

Lieutenant Thomas Bently Mott, First Artillery, U. S. A., has obtained permission to pass the summer abroad.

Mr. William Russell Wright, formerly of Visalia, who was appointed a cadet at Annapolis, from Nevada, has been ordered to report to the Mouterey on June 19th. Mr. Clarence Kemp, of Oakland, who is also a member of the graduating class, has been ordered to the Oregon.

Major John A. Darling, Third Artillery, U. S. A., was retired from active service last Tuesday. He and Mrs. Darling will continue to reside at Madrone Villa, their country home in Rutherford, Napa County. It has been thought all along that Major Darling would be appointed military attache at the United States embassy at Vienna, but no official announcement of this has yet been made.

Captain James Chester, Third Artillery, U. S. A., commanding Aleatraz Island, has been promoted to the rank of Major.

Captain Charles G. Starr, First Infantry, U. S. A., arrived in Santa Cruz last Monday after making the trip from the Presidio on a bicycle. It is probable that the First Infantry will camp at Santa Cruz later in the season.

Civil Engineer Richard C. Hollyday, U. S. N., has been detached from Port Orchard and ordered to Mare Island. Civil Engineer F. O. Maxson, U. S. N., formerly of Mare Island, is his successor.

General Nelson A. Miles, U. S. A., was in Rome last Tuesday, en route to London, where he is expected next Tuesday.

VICTORIA'S DIAMOND JUBILEE.

ALL arrangements for the coming celebration in this city of Queen Victoria's Diamond Jubilee are now completed, and the three days commencing Saturday, 19th inst., will be memorable among the local British born and their friends. Very general and active interest is being taken in the celebration, among the many W. J. Callingham, Reverend W. W. Bolton, Dr. H. Isaac Jones, the well-known oculist, W. Greer Harrison, besides the various members of the committees.

The festival will commence early on Saturday morning with Highland games, aquatic, and other sports at the Chutes. Then there are to be literary exercises, including an oration by General W. H. L. Barnes, an ode written by George A. Adam, music by H. J. Stewart, and sung by 250 voices, and a historic poem read by its author, Dan O'Connell. The day will conclude with a grand ball, splendid fireworks, and magnificent illuminations.

On Sunday afternoon there is to be a grand Te Deum sung at Metropolitan Temple, with two hundred voices, fifteen instruments and the Metropolitan organ accompanying. This is the same music sung at Westminster Abbey at the last jubilee. Reverend John Hemphill, Rabbi Nieto, and Reverend W. W. Bolton will speak. A general admission of twenty-five cents will be charged and fifty cents for reserved seats, tickets for which will be on sale on Monday at Sherman & Clay's. The Jubilee will fittingly end with a splendid banquet at the Palace Hotel on Monday night, at which State and municipal officials, judges, and noted citizens will be present. The Consul-General will preside, and representatives of other countries here resident will be invited. Covers will be laid for between three hundred and four hundred guests. The general committee are: Wm. Doxey, chairman; Joseph McNab, 1st Vice-President; Andrew Wilkie, 2nd Vice-President; Joseph McGaulay, secretary; Joseph B. Freeland, assistant secretary. It will be well to remember that the money received for admission to the Chutes and Temple will be added to the fund, the interest on which is wisely expended in alleviating the suffering of needy British subjects.

FROM TAMALPAIS' LOFTY BROW.

THERE are many beautiful bits of pastoral scenery about San Francisco bay; and there are also points within easy reach where the eye may touch the mountain tops and sweep the many-tempered ocean from Point Reyes Light to the distant Farallones. The most accessible of all these is Mt. Tamalpais, from whose bold summit before and beneath the eye unrolls a panorama of bay, mountain, valley, ocean, sky and city of unrivaled beauty and continual change. One who has stood on this ribbed dome at sunrise has witnessed a sight not to be forgotten. Only the highest points come first into view—the shadows lying deep and dark below; but as old Sol glows brighter in the firmament, darkness fades and the shimmering sea, the glittering spires and remoter objects salute the vision. Sometimes the early riser is greeted by an entirely different but more magical scene. Not infrequently the heavy fog lies like a vast white robe upon land and sea—only Tamalpais' lofty top standing like a sentinel upon the wide expanse of snowy white. With the warming rays of the sun the spotless garment of the night sinks silently down; but the appearance is as if the land were rising slowly from a vast and voiceless sea. First may be seen the heights of Angel Island; then the top of Telegraph Hill; next the lower distances are forced upward as if from the depths of an ocean. The scene is almost weird, but none the less beautiful. Finally, the fog melts into air and the beautiful picture opens clear and near upon the vision. Such scenery were well worth a long journey to see; but when it is scarcely sixty minutes from the city, and is made in pleasant safety, the attractions of Tamalpais are doubled. Thanks to the Mill Valley and Tamalpais Scenic Railway, the traveler is carried through lovely and romantic Blythedale, nestling at the mountain's feet and in its shadow—an ideal spot for repose and quiet, homelike comforts; beneath the towering redwood trees, skirting gorges, through patches of sunshine and cool shadows, glimpses of city and ocean, winding about the mountain's sides, always upward until the summit is reached, and the eye drinks in the scenery—unsurpassed, magnificent, beautiful, grand. The illustration accompanying this number of the NEWS LETTER expresses better than any words the romantic and beautiful scenery to be enjoyed on the scenic railway in going to the top of Tamalpais.

Never! Not a bit of it! That is out of the question. Not one of the many washing-powders that have been made to imitate Pearline claim to excel it in any way. All they ask is to be considered "the same as" or "just as good as" Pearline.

Dated at San Francisco, June 9, 1897.

J. D. SULLIVAN, Attorney for Administrator.

THE usual poker party at the little table in the corner of the card room at the Concordia Club received an addition, the other night, in the person of Joe Friedlander, who rarely plays draw, but who covets the reputation of being a reckless, daring spendthrift, when, as a matter of fact, he is exceedingly thrifty, careful in his habits and economical in his expenditures. Nat Gerson was in the game as well as Ed Salz and other jack pot veterans, so Joe played very warily, and gradually accumulated a little tower of blue chips. Then he was dealt one of those phenomenal hands, which occasionally fall to the lot of every persistent player. He had four kings.

"Of course I won't get a play on them," sighed Joe, to himself, as he looked dubiously at his hand, and hesitatingly threw in one blue chip, as if he expected to lose it.

To his inward delight, Ed Salz came back with a good stiff raise. Joe pretended to be deeply puzzled.

"Damme if I don't believe you're bluffing, Ed," he said, and raised back, to the extent of a moderate bet.

They tilted each other back and forth, until Joe was afraid of arousing his opponent's suspicion, and asked for one card. Ed also drew one.

"He has threes," thought Friedlander, "and he's playing me for two big pair. I've got him!" and he laughed softly to himself.

After the draw Salz made a big bet, as if he had an invincible hand. Joe was convinced it was all a bluff, but he responded cautiously, tilting slightly every raise Ed made.

The pot assumed enormous proportions, and men from other tables stopped to watch the battle. Finally Joe threw in his last stack of chips.

"I have to call you, Ed," he said, preparing to haul in the pot. "What have you got?"

"I have four aces," replied Ed, modestly. "What have you got, Joe?"

Friedlander looked reproachfully at his four kings, and mentally estimated his losses.

"I've got a headache," he announced, as he buried his cards.

Before he studied art, Douglas Tilden, the sculptor, took some lessons in carpentering at the Institution for the Deaf, Dumb and Blind, and he still cherishes the idea that he is an expert mechanic. He had given his wife to understand, so often, that nothing in the line of construction was beyond him, that one day last week she requested her husband to make her a bracket. Tilden readily accepted this commission, and set vigorously to work. A few minutes later, John Stanton, the artist, called to see the sculptor, bringing a friend with him. They were ushered into the workshop, just as Douglas was bringing his hammer down on the head of a refractory nail. But the sculptor's aim was bad, and the nail which the hammer struck was attached to the thumb on Tilden's hand. He dropped the hammer, and began gesticulating wildly, waving his arms, clapping and unclapping his fingers, thrusting his thumb in his mouth, and then between his knees.

"What is he saying?" asked the stranger, who did not understand the language of signs.

"Oh, he's just swearing a little," answered Stanton, who can use the dumb alphabet.

The other watched Tilden's antics and noted the look on the sculptor's expressive face.

"By George," he said admiringly. "What a command of profanity he has!"

Clergymen become accustomed to audiences of varying sizes, but it is seldom that the congregation is represented by a unit. Such was the experience of Reverend M. S. Levy, rabbi of the Congregation Beth Israel, whose kindness and good nature are illustrated by the story which is going the rounds of newspaperdom. It had its foundation in an important festival of the Hebrew calendar, fittingly observed by Rabbi Levy, who preached an eloquent sermon on the occasion. A reporter for a morning paper had been detailed to cover this service, and had also been given a prior assignment. When he had finished his earlier task, and proceeded to the synagogue, he found that the service had been concluded and that the sanctuary was closed. There was no alternative but to follow Dr. Levy to his home, and to beg the privilege of inspecting his manuscript. Unfortunately for the reporter, however, the Rabbi preaches without notes, and the visitor's dilemma was worse than ever. The latter explained that his City Editor would accept no excuse for failure. Dr. Levy was sympathetic but puzzled.

"I will tell you what I might do," he suggested, after thinking the matter over. "I think I could preach that sermon over again."

In addition to his rabbinical duties, he is editor of the Jewish Times and Observer, and so had a fraternal interest in his visitor.

Although thoroughly tired by his labors in the synagogue, the good Rabbi walked up and down his study and re-preached his eloquent sermon to the favored reporter, who made notes of the discourse. Seldom did Dr. Levy preach better and never did he have a more appreciative audience than the grateful journalist who continues to invoke blessings on the Rabbi's head whenever his name is mentioned.

Having dined so generously that he was quite convinced that, like Monte Cristo, the world was his, Jack Chretien hurriedly rushed into a barber shop at ten minutes before eight a few evening ago. He waved his arm imperiously but all the chairs were occupied, and no one paid any attention to him.

"Have an appointment at eight," he fumed. "Must keep it. Have to be shaved. What am I to do? I have it. The bootblack shall shave me,"—all this in his best dramatic style.

The bootblack grinned with delight at the prospect of the temporary promotion. His assurance rose to the occasion, and with the utmost sang froid, he proceeded with his task. The theatrical lawyer's face was soon a white field of lather.

"Don't shave against the grain," cautioned Chretien.

The bootblack tried to look as if he understood what this meant, pursed his lips, nodded wisely, but made no audible reply. He scraped away after a fashion of his own, and pretty soon the shaven territory of the Chretien countenance was a vivid shrimp pink.

"I thought I told you not to shave against the grain," angrily remonstrated Jack.

The bootblack could not comprehend all this talk about grain. He concluded that his customer must be a farmer, and he looked carefully through what hair remains for bits of new mown hay. Then he passed his little black paw over Chretien's unshaven side.

"Dat's not grain, boss," he said, reassuringly. "Dat's only stubble!"

Stout, solemn and important Donald de V. Graham marched up Sutter street the other day, in the rear of an unattractive woman of about his own age. Graham paid no attention to her, although once or twice she glanced at him, timorously, over her shoulder. During these manœuvres she dropped her purse, and proceeded, unconscious of her loss, on her way. The tenor robusto nimbly picked up the pocket book, and, overtaking the woman, raised his hat, with a very grand air, as he was about to return her lost property. Utterly mistaking his purpose, the lady drew herself up in offended dignity.

"Sir!" she said, impressively. "It's a mistake,"—this rather weakly. "I'm a lady!" triumphantly recovering her self possession.

Graham was amazed at the effrontery of the person in supposing he was making advances to her. For once he was absolutely speechless, and turned purple with rage. He is still unable to refer to the episode, in the Bohemian Club, with calmness.

Without deigning to reply to the remarks of the woman, he indignantly deposited the purse on the stone steps of a near-by house, and marched silently and wrathfully away.

At the exclusive Town and Country Club, where women can meet in secret coveau, and where the foot of man may not tread, two members were sitting in the library recently, when they noticed a man at the desk, arranging to take books out on a member's card. The ladies could not overhear all the conversation at the librarian's desk, but caught the words, "Baron von Schroeder." They had never met the Baron, and they gazed at the man before them with veneration.

"What a magnificent head," said one.

"Yes, he shows his breeding," replied the other. "Blood always tells, you know."

"Why one could not fail to pick him out for an aristocrat, anywhere," was a further comment.

Presently the subject of so much discussion departed, and one of the ladies sought the librarian.

"I thought it was a rule that no gentleman should enter this club," she said, severely.

"Gentleman?" echoed the librarian in some surprise.

"Yes. I refer, of course, to the Baron von Schroeder," replied the member, who desired to be impressive.

"But he has not been here," said the bewildered custodian of the books.

"Why, I saw him not a moment ago," persisted the member.

"Oh!" replied the librarian, sweetly. "That was not the Baron. That was his servant!"

A Democratic politician in a country town, a Southerner and one of Mr. Budd's most enthusiastic supporters before and immediately after the Governor's election, has for many months ceased to love the Sacramento Knight of the Double Cross, the promised office never having materialized. Nor did Budd's little joke about his friend's disappointed hopes prove much of a balm for wounded political pride.

"That's all right, Judge," said the Governor, easily; "you're left in good company."

That pleasantry was a trifle too true, and the Judge studied over a way to get even. He was finally inspired with a brilliant scheme for humbling the pride of the Chief Executive. The former's daughter was an undergraduate at the University, and on the occasion of some college function, the Governor was to be the principal guest. When he heard of this, the old man wired to the girl:

"Refuse to allow Governor Budd to be presented to you. He is unworthy."

The only particular in which this drastic treatment failed as a punitive measure was that, there being some three thousand other girls present at the "doings," the daughter of the Judge was lost in the shuffle, especially as the Governor pre-emptorily refused any presentations. The snub, in a perfect state of preservation, is still ready and waiting for the Governor, but the opportunity to administer it is sadly lacking.

Willie Hearst has purchased another gold brick, and as usual, it proved to have but a thin veneer. At the Maher-Sharkey fight, in New York on Wednesday night, the telegraph companies had arranged to place wires at the ringside, so that the bulletins of the rounds could be sent over the country. Just before the encounter, however, Hearst bought the exclusive right for the bulletin service, paying the club ten thousand dollars in good gold coin for the privilege. All the other wires were ordered out, and Willie prepared to enjoy a huge monopoly. But, like other well-laid plans, this, too, "went aglee." The fight was tame, lasted only seven rounds when the police "interfered," and everyone pronounced it a fake. The bulletins were worthless, and everyone was disgusted except the athletic club management, which joyfully jingled Willie's golden dollars, while the pugilists thrust their tongues into their magnificently developed cheeks.

The irrepressible Willis Polk has blossomed out with a new adventure, indicating that his modest and retiring qualities still continue to be his dominant features. With a party of friends, Willis was dining in a private apartment of a large restaurant recently. In an adjoining room a number of Native Sons were enjoying an official banquet. Among the Polk contingent the fun grew so fast and became so very furious that Willis conceived the characteristic idea of enlivening the neighboring party, which, he considered, was conventional to the point of dullness.

The unsuspecting Native Sons were still several steps from their coffee, when the door of their private room was thrown violently open. Willis burst upon them like a shooting star, and before any one comprehended the purport of his visit, he was sharing the space with the flowers and candelabra, and making an impromptu speech from the center of the table. This was very good fun for Polk's dinner companions, who were in a mood to enjoy almost anything, but it was not quite so amusing for the Native Sons, whose appreciation of the oratory was decidedly limited. His eloquence was punctuated with bits of bread, which Willis at first mistook for tributes of praise, but when a cloud of asparagus stalks was showered over him, the young architect looked around in pained surprise.

The speech came to an abrupt conclusion when a discerning Native Son sacrificed his favorite vegetable, and decorated Willis's shirt bosom with an accurately thrown beet of enormous dimensions.

Local politicians at the Union League Club are gathering like bees around boney about W. W. Dudley, the famous Republican campaigner of Indiana. Dudley achieved the major part of his fame during Harrison's first race for the Presidency, when he was Chairman of the Indiana State Committee in Harrison's interests. When Dudley's authorship of the statement that his party "would do the business in blocks of five" had made him notorious, the appreciation of his chief was materially weakened. After the inauguration Dudley went to Washington for the promised reward, but the malodorous "blocks of five" effectually blocked his own path, and through deference to public sentiment, President Harrison felt obliged to turn him down. Dudley never forgave this ingratitude, and his remarks to San Francisco politicians, in the light of his own party history, can be thoroughly understood.

"Harrison's no statesman," says Dudley, deprecatingly.

"But McKinley's the man," with enthusiasm.

At the Union League Club they are making bets regarding Dudley's problematic appointment under this administration.

To enjoy an artistic gastronomic triumph it is only necessary to visit the Maison Riche, at Geary street and Grant avenue. The name suggests a whole category of good things, prepared as only an accomplished French chef can, and every day, from 5 to 9 o'clock, a dinner fit for the gods is spread at this famous restaurant. Fine wines, sweet music, elegant service.

SOCIETY

ON Wednesday last Bishop and Mrs. Nichols held a reception at the Divinity School in San Mateo, which gave many of their friends an opportunity of wishing them bon voyage, as they departed the next day on their trip abroad. Quite a number went down from San Francisco to be present at the ordination, which took place at St. Matthew's Church, San Mateo, it being the first one of graduates from the Divinity School, making it therefore a memorable occasion.

Banquets appeared to be the rule last Saturday. The Red room of the Bohemian Club was the place selected by the graduates of the U. S. Naval Academy for their annual dinner, when twenty-five guests were seated at a table made beautiful with flowers and other decorations; and after the elaborate menu had been discussed, speeches were made and reminiscences indulged in by those present. On Saturday afternoon the Bar Association gave a banquet in its rooms on California street, in honor of the newly-appointed Judges, Morrow and de Haven, which is spoken of as having been a remarkably pleasant gathering; there were upwards of sixty guests present, and wit and wine flowed together to the enjoyment of all.

On Saturday evening Mr. A. Schilling entertained the members of the Deutscher Verein Club in a very handsome manner at his residence in Oakland, the spacious house and beautiful grounds being used for the purpose, while Lake Merritt was also pressed into service to afford pleasure to those of his guests who cared for a row upon the water. The club colors were used in decorating the mansion; electric lights made the grounds almost as bright as day, while upon the lake colored lights gave brilliancy to the scene. The guests, upon arriving, were received in the grounds, which resembled fairy land, by Mr. and Mrs. Schilling, where varied attractions were provided for their amusement, such as an electrical display, music, recitation and light refreshments in pretty nooks and arbors, an elaborate supper being served in the house.

On Sunday the Country Club gave their annual bull-head breakfast to the members of the Pacific-Union Club at their quarters near Point Reyes, and about seventy-five guests enjoyed the feast, which was served in the grounds on tables laid under the branches of wide-spreading oak trees.

The 25th of June has been named by the San Francisco Scottish Thistle Club for their grand banquet, which will be given at B'nai B'rith Hall.

The chief society wedding of the week, as well as one of the prettiest of the year thus far, took place at St. Luke's Church on Wednesday evening, when Miss Mabel Estee and Leonard Everett were the bride and groom. Pretty as St. Luke's Church always appears when effectively dressed, it never looked more charming than on this occasion. The decorations, which were very elaborate, were all in white and green. The walls of the church on either side were hidden by large palm and fern leaves; garlands of ivy festooned the spaces between the pillars, around which they were also twined, and in the centre aisle every sixth pew was adorned with a cluster of white sweet peas, fastened to a large stalk of bamboo with knots of white satin ribbon. In the chancel stood a giant palm, smaller ones being placed at intervals here and there. The altar was a mass of Bermuda lilies and white gladiolas; and white sweet peas decorated the altar rails, pulpit, reading desk, choir benches—in fact, they were placed in every available spot. The church was crowded, not an inch of standing room being unoccupied when the notes of the Lohengrin Chorus gave notice of the coming of the bridal party. The cortege was led by the six ushers, Messrs. Woods, Morton, Gibbous, Lucien Knight, J. Hoitt and W. Nichols, who wore sprays of white gladiolas as wedding favors, and as they proceeded up the centre aisle they took positions on either side as they neared the chancel. They were followed by the six bridesmaids, the Misses Churchill, Lowell, Bradford, Ayres, Thompson and Bras-tow, who were costumed alike in green organdie gowns trimmed with Valenciennes lace, each carried a bunch of white gladiolas, and they also wore sprays of the same flower in their hair. They also placed themselves on either side of the aisle nearer the door below the ushers, and between the lines thus formed passed the bride escorted by her father, M. M. Estee, who gave her away. The maids and ushers then followed the bride, instead of, as usual, preceding her to the altar, where the groom and his best man, James Hobbs, awaited her, and the Rev. W. Shaw, assistant rector of St. Luke's Church, performed the ceremony. The lovely bride wore a beautiful robe of heavy white satin en traine, trimmed with duchesse lace; a fleecy tulle veil was fastened to her hair with a pearl and diamond pin and spray of orange blossoms, and she carried a large cluster of Bermuda lilies on her left arm. After the ceremony a reception was held at the Estee residence on Sacramento street, where sweet peas in every variety of tint were used lavishly for decorative purposes, in combination with gladiolas, ferns and scarlet geraniums. Later a handsome supper was served. The bouquet was caught by Miss Mary Heath; Miss Netta Edwards received the coin that was in the cake, and Miss Anna Wainwright received the ring. Some very handsome presents were received by the young couple, and upon their return from their honeymoon trip, they will reside in a home of their own on Baker street.

The 23d of June, which is to witness the Macleay-Grant nuptials in Oregon, and the Coleman-Knowles bridal in Oakland, is the date set for a wedding in San Francisco, which will be that of Miss Carrie Koshland and Emil Greenbaum, which is to take place at the residence of the bride's mother on Pine street on the morning of that day. From Oakland comes the announcement of Miss Edna Wyman's engagement to John Spencer Riley, both of Fruitvale, where the wedding will take place at an early date.

It will seem like old times at Del Monte this summer, so many of those who used to be regular habitués of that charming place deciding to return to their old love instead of seeking pastures new. Mr. and Mrs. H. S. Crocker expect to spend the greater part of the summer there, as well as the Bruguieres. The Clark Crockers will only give a part of their time to Santa Cruz; they are altogether too fond of Castle Crags to neglect the Tavern for any other resort; and there also will be found Colonel Fred Crocker's family, that gentleman and his daughter having returned this week from the East. Quite a large party of their friends will pass the Fourth of July holiday with them in the mountains.

House parties are to be the rule this summer, it seems, and a succession of them are to be given by those who own places of their own in the country, from Burlingame to Menlo Park, from Mill Valley to Lakeport, to which latter place quite a party are going from hereabouts to see how Miss Sallie Collier will deport herself as Queen of the water carnival about to take place in that part of the State.

Mr. Henry P. Bowie, who has lately returned from his Oriental trip, is at San Mateo, superintending the building of his Japanese villa. Mr. and Mrs. O. D. Baldwin have taken possession of their cottage in Mill Valley, where they will spend the summer months. Mrs. Frank Pixley has gone over to her cottage in Marin County for the summer. The Charley Josselyns are at their San Mateo villa for the season; the Downey Harveys are to pass several weeks at Lake Tahoe. Cal. Byrne is the head and front of a camping-out party in Yosemite. Louis Sloss Jr. has gone to Alaska; Carey Friedlander, Alex. Hamilton, and Eugene Garten are keeping bachelor hall in Sausalito, where they are occupying the Wakefield-Boker cottage. Horace Platt is also a denizen of that hilly suburb, his sister, Mrs. Kent, of New York, being his guest.

Mr. and Mrs. Homer King have returned from their Eastern trip, which took in Mexico en route; and the Russ Wilsons are with us once more. Miss Mollie Phelan's friends have been giving her a warm welcome home from a six months' visit to Los Angeles.

One of last week's pretty brides, Mrs. Pearce, and Lieutenant Pearce, have been the guests of Colonel and Mrs. Burton a part of this week at their residence on Pacific avenue.

Leo Cooper is enjoying his annual summer outing this season at Highland Springs.

The California Hotel is very popular with Hawaiians. Many of the leading people of the Islands can be found there at all times. Among those at present sojourning at this hospitable house are Judge and Mrs. H. A. Wideman, Mr. E. C. Macfarlane, Miss Wideman, Mr. Harry Macfarlane, Miss Ingard Macfarlane, Colonel G. W. Macfarlane and family, Mr. and Mrs. C. J. Falk, Mr. and Mrs. A. P. Wilder, and others. The California seems to be very much favored by newly married couples, the bridal apartments being in constant demand, and, if the present influx continues, extra accommodations will have to be provided for these interesting guests.

Mrs. Lily Hastings-Jerome and Miss Marie Zane are enjoying life together in New York; the Misses Alice and Lucille Younger are also in Gotham; Miss Maud still lingers in San Francisco. Mrs. and the Misses Withrow, who have been the guests of Mrs. W. H. Mills this week, left on Thursday for their annual trip to Europe, where they will pass several weeks. Mrs. Marriner-Campbell expects to leave about the 20th, but her travels will not extend beyond New York, where she goes to attend the musical convention which will be held in July.

At Hotel Mt. View, in Ross Valley, quite a number of social events have occupied the guests' attention for the past fortnight. Progressive euchre, hearts and whist parties have been in order, and Mrs. Bauer being the most lucky winner, was suitably rewarded with a very handsome souvenir, in the shape of a silver ornament. On the other hand, the contestants for the booby prize were indeed many. A hall was given on Saturday evening last, and numerous friends of the guests were present from this city and San Rafael.

General A. W. Barrett entertained a number of ladies and gentlemen very delightfully on Sunday, June 6th, by a sail on the bay. The party lunched at Hotel Rafael, returning to the city in the evening. The General's guests were Mr. and Mrs. F. L. Gray, Mr. and Mrs. James Keegan, Mrs. W. Beekman, Colonel J. B. Fuller, Mr. John Fuller, and General R. H. Warfield.

Hotel Rafael has one very great advantage for summer residence in that it is just the distance from the city necessary to a pleasant morning and evening trip; and the arrangements for and care of guests are as nearly perfect as it is possible to get them. General Warfield leaves nothing for the imagination to fill in, as those who have once stopped with him at that beautiful hostelry can testify.

Tamalpais is certain to become all the rage now that society has turned its discriminating eyes in that direction. On last Tuesday evening Messrs. Wiltsee and Hoffman chaperoned a party to the summit. It's just the right distance from the city, and the whole journey is one continual scene of beauty.

Much sympathy is being expressed for Mrs. McCoppin in her great loss by the death of her husband. Mrs. McCoppin is herself only slowly recovering from a very serious illness, and is at present residing at the Hotel Pleasanton.

The many friends of Alfred R. Grim will regret to learn that he is confined to his bed at the residence of his sister, Mrs. Herold, 2302 Webster street. He had the misfortune to slip and fall from an electric car and split his knee-cap. Some time will elapse before he will again be out.

Mr. and Mrs. Julius Weil, accompanied by Miss Francis Jacobi and Miss Madelaine Beer, left Saturday for an extended trip in the Yosemite Valley.

Mr. and Mrs. Louis Schwabacher will spend the summer at Lucerne, on Lake Washington, while their daughters will be members of the Greenbaum Alaska party.

Mr. and Mrs. R. H. Pease have returned from a three mouths' visit East, and are again at their home, 2600 Pacific avenue.

Mr. S. Gump and his grandchild will spend their vacation at Ben Lomond this year, leaving the city for that place next week.

Weddings are frequent in these early summer days, and banquets, suppers, and swell luncheons the order of the time. Max Abraham, the society eater at 428 Geary street, it kept busy getting up these important features of social functions and marriage feasts. He is prompt, reasonable, and strictly up to date.

FERD. T. HOPKINS, Prop'r,
37 Great Jones St., N. Y.

DEAR EDITH:—I notice that collarettes are still worn as a finish and are elaborated ruffs that do not hang as did the much-lamented, but at last defunct, feather boa. A great, handsome sash bow may finish them, and some of the new ones are thus finished, only they fasten at the back. Many of these collarettes, by the addition of a rather deep lace frill, become almost a cape, and are suitable for theatre wear. Among the current capes are severe tailor-made ones, but the ripple and fluty effects of last season are all gone. Collars of tailor capes are high and severe, and the horrid gimped and belaced cloth affair of last season—well, if we have one we don't mention it, and we would rather die than wear it.

The next grade to tailor finish in capes is a long ways from it, for between the severe sorts and the very fanciful "confections" no compromise exists. These dainty garments are made of pretty much everything nice, like the little girl of the nursery rhyme. I saw one which had a cream lace yoke cut into tabs in front and finished with fluffy ruches of black chiffon edged with black velvet ribbon. Attached to the yoke were three more ruffles; two of lace, between which was a third of black chiffon. This cape accompanied a dress of black and white striped liberty silk. This was taken diagonally for the skirt, which was trimmed at the hem with black silk embroidery. The bodice was a simple blouse finished with a lace trimmed collar and a folded black satin belt.

Jacket bodices have been in fashion so long and have appeared in so many forms that it seems as if a radical change in styles must soon relegate them to the despised rank of "has been." Yet this very same condition has existed for many months without change, and new jacket devices have been coming out all the while. They are still coming, and I saw two somewhat novel ones which are well worth describing.

One was a pale gray suiting that had a shaggy white nap, and was trimmed with dark gray braid and narrow steel galoon. The jacket was fitted at backs and sides, and its open fronts, with their pendant tabs, were edged with braid. Revers and sailor collar were edged with steel galoon, and the chemisette was yellow silk banded with embroidered lace-edged stripes. A wide band of braid, headed on both sides with galoon, trimmed the dress skirt near the hem. Green and white mixed suiting was the fabric of the other dress, whose bodice was slightly bloused at either side of its fitted vest. A vest-like insertion at the back was of the same materials as the front—ecru batiste embroidered with white and plaid over ecru silk. Reseda green satin supplied the revers and collar, a band of the satin trimmed with ecru lace coming next to the vest.

The empire coat is dethroned—is so utterly out that women are now wondering how they could have thought it pretty. A few are shown, very jaunty, cut much shorter in the back than in the front and no longer than the hips anywhere. These are boxed so that they stand well out at the back and have an undeniably saucy look, but an empire coat that comes below the hips is simply intolerable. Boxy boleros, fastening in front or at the side, have taken their place. Other coats are of the covert cloth, short-jacket order, slightly boxed in front and fitted back and sides. These come just below the hips and are made strictly tailor finish, the skirts below the waist line fitting closely without a trace of fulness except at the very back, where there is a demure box pleat or so. No buttons show anywhere, and the coat is light weight.

BELINDA.

Recalled Stormy Times.

"Well, that looks natural," said the old soldier, looking at a can of condensed milk on the breakfast table in place of ordinary milk that failed on account of the storm. "It's the Gail Borden Eagle Brand we used during the war."

Other waters try—Jackson's Napa Soda gets there.

INSURANCE

THE semi-annual banquet of the San Francisco Life Underwriters' Association was held at the Occidental Hotel on the evening of the 11th inst. Interesting papers were read by the members and guests. These social gatherings of the underwriters are increasing, and it has been determined that the second annual banquet, which takes place December 10th, shall exceed in its importance anything of its character held on the Coast.

The recent action of the Western British America and Westchester Fire Insurance Companies in withdrawing from the Coast Association, will have the effect of throwing rates wide open again. This course has been decided upon by the Executive Committee, unless the resignations of these companies are withdrawn.

E. P. Marshall, Secretary of Union Central Life, will visit the Coast early next month.

Major John B. Day, of the Washington, has returned from an extended trip to the South.

Insurance Commissioner McNall, of Kansas, has notified Robert Dixon, United States manager of the Royal Exchange, that unless he complies with the Kansas insurance law he must withdraw. Dixon holds that his company has complied with all the requirements; but has thus far failed to bring McNall to his point of view.

The Equitable Indemnity Company, of Seattle, has been closed up by Commissioner Jenkins. The assets, which it was claimed equaled $25,000, consisted of country lands about Seattle, which were the worst sort of wild-cat. In consequence, Jenkins shut its doors in the interest of those who had insured in it. This concern has a number of victims in this State. Its methods, as are those always adopted by similar irresponsible companies, were to operate away from home, where its character was least known and consequently most respected.

The United States Casualty has ceased writing burglar insurance in Chicago, owing to the fact that the festive burglar is too active for the police.

The widow of a Kentucky man has received $5,000 from the United States Mutual Association for the death of her husband, which was caused by a mosquito bite.

Thos. Godwin has been appointed Pacific Coast manager of the Preferred Accident, vice E. S. Fowler, deceased.

Coast agents do not take kindly to the proposed reductions of commissions, and are preparing to give battle to the managers.

One of the anomalies of insurance is found in that English fire companies are doing an enormous business in this country, with not a single life company in the United States. American fire companies are starving to death in England, while American life companies are making money.

Russell W. Oshorn, a bright insurance man of San Francisco, has published a valuable treatise on the elements of insurance law.

The new Insurance Commissioner intends to devote some attention to the numerous fraternal and other insurance associations which have not complied with the strict letter of the law. Those concerns that are not meeting claims promptly will be likely to get into chancery.

A SUMMER SONG.—HARRIET WINTHROP WARING.

Golden grasses,
 Summer lasses,
 Flowering pink and white and blue,
 Bold sun shining,
 White arms twining—
 O my love, be true, be true!

Moonlight flooding,
 Flowers a-budding,
 (Pity hearts that never knew),
 Young blood rushing,
 Fond words gushing—
 O my love for you I sue!

Far we wander,
 Deep we ponder,
 Life and love forever new—
 O the rapture
 Of my capture—
 O the world was made for two!

SAN FRANCISCO
NEWS LETTER
 California Advertiser.

Vol. LIV.

SAN FRANCISCO, JUNE 19, 1897.

Number 25.

Printed and Published every Saturday by the proprietor, FRED MARRIOTT
 54 Kearny street, San Francisco. Entered at San Francisco Postoffice as Second-class Matter.

The office of the NEWS LETTER in New York City is at Temple Court;
 and at Chicago, 808 Boyce Building, (Frank E. Morrison, Eastern Representative), where information may be obtained regarding subscription and advertising rates.

GREATER New York and Greater Chicago lead the way. Shall the cities about the Golden Gate fail to profit by their experience?

HAVE the officers of the Society for the Prevention of Vice turned their attention to the indecent advertising pamphlets issued by Kapp & Street? This lewd publication has been sent through the mails by the thousands, but we hear of no arrests for using the postal service for immoral purposes.

ASPLENDID celebration of the Queen's Diamond Jubilee is arranged by loyal Britons in San Francisco for to-day, to-morrow, and Monday. The Stars and Stripes ripple in the breeze with the English flag to-day, and Americans everywhere mingle in the chorus, "God Save the Queen," heard wherever a Briton salutes the rising sun.

MANY ship-masters coming to this port show a decided aversion to existing quarantine regulations, and the Board of Health is very wisely taking steps to refresh their recollections upon this important matter. Arrest and fine would have a very wholesome effect upon those who refuse to respect the laws. The memory of a great many men lie in their pockets.

THE action of the Supervisors in refusing to allow the use of the sidewalks by the owners of abutting property, for show windows, will be regarded with satisfaction generally. The sidewalks belong to the public, and to permit the least encroachment upon them by ambitious merchants would result in their ultimate absorption for purposes of display, and pedestrians would have to take to the streets.

AUDITOR Broderick has refused to pay the School census marshal and his assistant for alleged overtime amounting to $580. The NEWS LETTER holds with the Auditor. The presumption is against the idea that any city official works overtime. The precedents are all the other way. That a large percentage of them work overtime could be easily proved, but we have never heard of any drawback on their salaries on this account.

THE Supervisors have informed the directors that the schools of San Francisco must get along next year with less money than is demanded. The people of this city are always willing to vote money for legitimate educational purposes; but it has been practically demonstrated that our public school system has been gradually loaded up with all manner of useless frills and fancies; that thousands upon thousands of dollars have been frittered away in salaries and useless flourishes. Children should be taught the practical branches. The public schools are for the purpose of fitting boys and girls for bread-winning, and all the fineries and superfluities of which we have heard so much should be cut out. The grafting of specialties on to a general system of education can do no good, and really does much harm. Keep the appropriation down to its original and legitimate intent.

IT is said that no more public boxing matches for money are to be allowed in New York. This ought to fill the prize ring managers of the Olympic Club—which organization has turned itself into a small, cheap purveyor of unsavory, not to say fake, prize-fights, for a few ill-smelling dollars—with deep concern. Should San Francisco follow the cleaner example of New York, this congenial occupation of uncongenial fellows would be gone, and they might have to do something more genteel for a living.

JAMES Stranahan, a resident of Brooklyn, was the first man to suggest the economy and necessity of the Greater New York. He began this agitation fourteen years ago, and to-day he sees his dream an accomplished fact. The NEWS LETTER advocates a Greater San Francisco, but does not expect to wait fourteen years to see it an accomplished fact. The political, economical, and physical necessity of a great united city about this Gateway of the Pacific only requires investigation to convince the most pessimistic of its practicability.

THE act of S. G. Murphy, President of the First National Bank, in discharging George Maxwell, for twenty years the faithful paying teller of that institution, because as an involuntary witness he was compelled to testify to certain facts in the Davis will case, as an expert in writing, shows the character that he is. Maxwell had no choice in the matter of his testimony. It is possible that he was unacquainted with the peculiar qualities which mark the President of the First National, and define his unique position among gentlemen. Murphy had consented that Maxwell should testify, but with that fine and delicate sense of honor for which he is noted, discharged him because he failed to perjure himself or go to jail for contempt.

THE Superintendent of the Nevada Insane Asylum has endeavored to boycott the Gazette of that city for having published articles reflecting upon his management of that institution. He informed the merchants of Reno that they could have no asylum trade if they advertised in the Gazette. The Superintendent has adopted a course of retaliation that should be hailed with delight by the Reno paper; for if the merchants of his town have the least independence they will resent such a low attempt upon the part of the asylum official to shield himself from criticism. The Gazette should continue its roast—more particularly as the Superintendent has undertaken to stop its mouth by the most despicable of all methods, the cowardly boycott.

THE Supreme Court has rendered a decision in regard to the collateral heirs law that is of considerable importance. It decides that the Legislature did not exceed its powers in taxing the right to inheritance, which it declares to be a very different thing from taxing an income. The case at bar was that of Henry W. Payne on an appeal from the court below ordering him to pay the sum of $7,449 as a tax on a legacy left him by his uncle, J. C. Wilmerding, deceased. The court holds that the act is valid because it lays down a general rule for the taxation of inheritances, which it has an undoubted right to do. Inheritance is a privilege conferred by the State, and the State has a right to tax it as a privilege. It is not a right, and could not be claimed as such. It is something the State could give or withhold, and is therefore amenable to State taxation as the State may decide. This is an important decision because of its bearing upon quite a number of unsettled estates within the borders of California.

FOR A GREATER SAN FRANCISCO.

THE Half Million Club, enthusiastic and capable as it was, lamentably failed of its purpose and disbanded. The end it had in view was the increasing of the city's population to half a million. It got up junketing tours, spread itself over the land considerably, sent much readable advertising around, and generally did a good work that may yield results some day. But the times were hard, and the people not in an immigrating mood; so that little or nothing came of the movement. The purpose of the club, however, could be accomplished in an incredibly short space of time. Population would not come within the city, but a Greater San Francisco can be made to go to enough people to make up the desired half million. The addition of Oakland, Alameda, Berkeley and Sausalito would just about do it. Without a doubt it would be a very desirable thing to do. It has proven to be so in the cases of the New Chicago and the Greater New York. Cities are judged of abroad by the number of their people. Half a million sounds a great deal more important than three hundred thousand. Moreover, a city which finds work and bread for a large suburban population has a right to claim them as citizens, and they, in turn, owe loyalty to the city that supports them. The closer the union between them, the stronger they will be, and the better their interests will be subserved. This, we think, will be admitted on all hands. Why not, then, set about creating a GREATER SAN FRANCISCO?

We notice that Mayor Phelan and the election Commissioners are proposing to have two elections this year, the first to give us a Board of fifteen freeholders, and the second to vote on a new charter. The cost will be considerable, and the final result is pretty sure to be as abortive as it always has been. Our ratepaying citizens do not want a charter framed solely in the interests of the tax-eaters, and none other can be passed as things stand at present. With the help of Oakland, Berkeley and Alameda, the thing would be accomplished at the first attempt. Let a committee of one hundred take in hand the union of our city and suburbs, hold interviews with leading citizens on the other side of the bay, prepare a practicable scheme, which ought not to be difficult with the examples of Chicago and New York before them, and with less effort than it will take to frame a charter to be defeated, the GREATER SAN FRANCISCO will be an established fact. Before the men who may undertake this enterprise a great opportunity lies. The new and greater city would be taken out of many bad grooves in which it has too long been run. A desirable class of voters would be added, who would give strength to our own taxpayers, and the tax-eaters and their friends would be restrained from getting away with everything in sight. That has been the result in Chicago, and in New York it is believed that Tammany will cease to be the grave danger and menace that it so long has been. At present we can undertake nothing of importance because of corrupt Bosses and the large class of voters who sympathize with them. We cannot issue bonds for water works, better sewers, or other desirable purposes, because we are pretty sure the Bosses and their henchmen would divert most of the money to their own uses. How long, O Lord! how long is this shame to last!

The city united would have larger credit, a better population, and more economical government than it now has divided into some half dozen parts. One Mayor should come cheaper than four or five, one street department should be stronger and more equal to its work than half a dozen of the kind we now have, and so it would go nearly all along the whole line of municipal offices. San Francisco at present pays a great deal too much for the little it gets. It should secure a better conduct of its public business, and pay much less for it. In union there is strength, durability, and economy. San Francisco, on both sides of the bay, needs more and better schools. Sanitary sewers, good lighting, and, perhaps, it would be better if it owned its own water works. The purchase of these large plants already in successful operation could be brought about by issue of long time low-rate bonds, and their operation made more secure, economical and satisfactory as a whole under municipal control than under separate management. It is becoming almost imperative that one or more of these works should be undertaken at once. With a perfect union established these things could soon be obtained, our capacity to borrow money on low terms would be increased, and the pro rata burden of taxation would be less. There are no serious legal difficulties in the way of accomplishing such a union, and by the time the Legislature meets again the whole business should be cut and dried, ready for action. If this view be approved, it follows that it would be a waste of time and money to set to work on a new charter. We cannot get a desirable one, no matter how hard we try, and no matter how strong the noise is at the time for reform. We have tried several times, and failed always. The majority of our incongruous voters have not changed for the better, and the prospects for the success of a good measure are darker, rather than fairer. As we could constitute the GREATER SAN FRANCISCO as quickly and more surely, than we could frame and ratify a New Charter, the better and better project should be adopted.

Pan-American Delegates. The Manufacturers' and Producers' Association of this State is determined that the delegates from the Central and South American countries to the Pan-American Congress shall visit California before they return home; and to that end the directors of the organization have invited all important local commercial bodies to join in an effort to secure the presence of these influential representatives in this State, where they may investigate the products of California and study the trade relations of our State with the countries south. California is just now reaching out for foreign commerce. The rich countries South of us are more closely united by commercial ties with Germany and England than they are with this State. The distant foreign nations have sent representatives to them, have studied their necessities, trade wants, and business methods, have met them in a practical way, and have captured their commerce. These Central American States lie at our doors; their products are largely dissimilar to our own; they want the products of California's soil, the machinery, agricultural implements, and fabrics of California manufacture. The Pan-American Congress was in the direction of more profitable, larger and closer commercial relations. Having seen the East, the South and the Middle West, it would be especially fitting that the representative members from our neighbors leave this country only after they have seen the fairest portion of it. We hope that the Manufacturers' and Producers' Association may be met promptly by other local commercial bodies, and as a result of their united efforts, that these Central and South American business men may be brought to this State and obtain a practical knowledge of Californian products, trade conditions, opportunities, and people.

Is It To Be Annexation Right Or Wrong? It begins to look as if Hawaii is to be annexed right or wrong. President McKinley appears to have lent his ear to a few not over scrupulous Hawaiian Planters and to have been beguiled thereby. The treaty of annexation has already been negotiated by the Executive and is now informally before the Senate's Financial and Foreign Relations Committees, to the end that it may be promptly reported the moment the tariff is out of the way. It is a rule or ruin policy on the part of the administration, and must be fought to the bitter end. It is a long and rough road through both Houses, especially when a two-thirds majority must be had. As the treaty involves the finances of the country, it must needs go to the House of Representatives. But we do not believe it will ever reach there. Two-thirds of the Senators, we are persuaded, are not ready to vote for a measure so fraught with future mischief as is this indefensible departure from the teachings of the early fathers and from the uniform precedents established from the foundation of the Government until now. America for the Americans has been our watchword, "the eschewing of foreign entanglements" was the advice of the Father of his Country and has so far been followed with safe and otherwise excellent results. The Monroe doctrine has been the keystone of our foreign policy, not always allowed by other countries, but always stoutly maintained by us until now. Annex a country

2,100 miles away from our continent and away goes the Monroe doctrine! We might as well claim to take Ireland. Moreover, we have unrepealed treaties with France and England guaranteeing the independence of the Hawaiian Islands. What do we want to do all this for? Is it in the line of protecting our home industries? It would forever let in the island sugar duty free, and therein lies the kernel of the scheme. The planters want it for that reason and that alone. They would fight annexation to its death, if it were not for the monstrous advantages that would be extended to sugar production for all time. We are all rejoicing at the vast promises of our sugar beet productions, but annex Hawaii, and beet sugar growing and manufacturing must die. It cannot compete with cane sugar, grown on stolen lands, and produced under labor conditions that can never be permitted to grow up in our own dear country. The semi-slave labor of the Chinese, Japanese, and Kanakas, as it exists on the islands to-day, is revolting to our people. To support, or even tolerate it, on what it is proposed to make a territory or State of this Union, would be to demean ourselves in our own eyes, and to render us a byword and a reproach to other nations. Yet if we annex Hawaii these people will constitute nine-tenths of its population. They are there and there they will continue. We cannot drive them out if we would. The talk of Americans taking their places is idle; Americans, thank God! do not work their hours, nor for their amount of pay, nor could they work at all in such a climate. Hawaii has about enough population to constitute her a State of the Union, and that she would soon seek admission we may be sure. Out of her population there is only about 1 in 14 a white person, so that it is easy to see who would soon govern. We are bound by our constitution to set up a Republican form of Government, so that we could not if we would confine the franchise to the 8,000 whites, the majority of whom are not Americans and probably would not accept citizenship. It is not conceivable that we could set up a free state at such a distance and made up of such ignorant and incongruous elements, without trouble following. Why make the experiment? Simply that a few planters, many of them not Americans, may get the advantage of our otherwise protected market. We would not obtain our sugar any cheaper. That has been determined. Under the reciprocity treaty the planters not only exacted the rebated duty, but the 2 cents a pound freight rate from the East to here. From a naval point of view, what possible use would islands 2,100 miles away be to the defense of this country? If we want a coaling station there, we have one already. Hawaii would be a point of weakness in time of war, because she would have to be defended, a task to which our entire navy would not be adequate. The trade with her would remain ours anyhow, and the bulk of her sugar would come here until beet growing overtakes our demands. Until these arguments are answered—and they never can be—annexation remains an indefensible proposition, and that being so the proposed action by Congress is an outrage.

The New Journalism. The Examiner prides itself on nothing so much as that it is a conspicuous example of "new journalism." It is! It is!! It is something new for a newspaper to swallow itself whole, body, soul and breeches. Yet that is about what it has just done. The other day it affected to be terribly wrath at the Federal courts for listening to an application for a writ of habeas corpus for Durrant. The Federal courts, and all courts, are hectored, lectured and abused in the most approved style of the "new journalism," and the lawyers who apply for writs of habeas corpus, and the Judges who grant them, are told that they must be "disciplined," and that their action must be rendered odious to the community. Fancy such sentiments in regard to the noblest buttress with which personal liberty is safeguarded. They could only emanate from the new journalism, which affects to lack veneration or respect for anything older, or with more promise of long life, than Willie Hearst's fortune. The oldest and noblest of liberty's laws is scoffed at, and those whose sworn and constitutional duty it is to operate it, are threatened with all sorts of dire consequences. Then think of this for impudence! The last man before Durrant to go to that court, and invoke that self-same writ, and, by its means, get released from the Sacramento jail, was Long Green Lawrence, the Examiner editor! If the court was wrong in the case in which a human life was involved, it follows that it was no less wrong when it prevented a fellow serving a sentence for lying. We notice that Governor Budd is being bespattered almost daily with the most nauseous flattery. It is probably about the worst thing that can be said of that gentleman that he undoubtedly likes it. In requital, he gives out news in advance to the Examiner, and even constitutes himself its reporter. He is credited with some smartness as a politician. Clearly a mistake! There is no "smartness" in thus angering all the other dailies. The ugly fact leaks out that Boss Martin Kelly had a private knock which would give him private audience to the Governor at a moment's notice and at all hours. The Examiner has said such terrible things against Kelly that one cannot help marvelling at its defending anybody for keeping such a man's company. It considers him such a bad egg that his libel suit is about the only one it ever had the courage to stand by. It approves of the Governor's course because he was afraid of a recount, and needed Kelly, the Boss of the opposite party, to save him his office. Well may Budd cry: "Save me from my friends!"

The Mercantile Library. The Mercantile Library has just been made the fortunate recipient of a substantial bequest, which comes at a most opportune time, and will very materially reduce the debt of that institution. John W. Hendrie, an old-time San Francisco merchant, who has for many years lived in New York, spending his winters only in this State, has given to the President of the library a piece of real estate valued at $15,000, the conditions of the gift being that it should be applied to the principal of the debt of the Library Association, which amounts to $75,000 and is held by the Hibernia Bank. The Mercantile Library Association has for a long time been struggling with its debts, and the question of the sale of its valuable property on Van Ness and Golden Gate avenues has more than once been canvassed; but this substantial and generous gift, which reduces the principal of the obligation by one-fifth, will give new hope to the members, who are struggling to extinguish this debt and improve the usefulness of the Association. The action of this disinterested non-resident presents an object lesson of significance to wealthy citizens of San Francisco. If Mr. Hendrie, who no longer is identified with the city and its institutions, can without solicitation donate one-fifth of the fixed debt of the library, it should not be difficult to raise the remaining $60,000 here, and so free the library of a harassing obligation, and very materially enlarge its field of usefulness.

Thomas Magee, the President of the Association, expresses the hope that the donation of books to the library may be of a more practical and scientific character. His desire is that the institution may widen its sphere in a practical way, and by its facilities of education for young men and young women, become of greater value than ever. It may be added that the library is now open to young ladies free of charge. The library room is one of the largest and most comfortable in the country, and young women who have no place to spend their leisure may feel free to go there and enjoy the privilege of its magazines, papers, and books every evening without cost. Surely, the Mercantile Library is a most worthy object, and its debt, now reduced to $60,000, should be soon liquidated.

Queen Victoria's Affliction. At last evil days are beginning to come upon the British Queen. During her long reign she has been lucky in many things. The politics of the State have been quiet but exceedingly successful. With such men as Melbourne, Grey, Wellington, Peel, Canning, Palmerston, Beaconsfield, Derby, Gladstone and Salisbury she has had advisers never equaled in British history, except, perhaps, in the single case of William Pitt. To each and all of them she was in the highest sense of the term a persona grata. Loyal to her throne as they necessarily were by reason of the offices they held, they were still more loyal to her person, and not one of them, save Sir Robert Peel, ever gave her one hour's worry that she could possibly be saved. She has unquestionably been fortunate in her Ministers. With infinite tact she succeeded in marrying her family well off. Her blood runs in the veins of most of the royal families of Europe. She was fortunate in her marriage, but unfortunate in its too early termination by the death of her consort. Even in the matter of weather, on days of State displays, she was lucky, and "Queen's weather" became a household word among her subjects. In the increase of her Empire, and in the peaceful conquering and occupation of many lands, her reign far and away surpasses all previous records. Are evil days drawing nigh? In her old age the good Queen is stricken with blindness. The great Jubilee to celebrate the completion of the 60th year of her reign will be to her a blank. She will not be able to see the multitudes who have come from afar to see her. They will be disappointed that their Queen could not see them, and the disappointment will be mutual. Has Victoria's career ended? We believe not. The eye trouble that has so suddenly overtaken her is cataract, or darkening of the lens. By a delicate, but safe and usually successful operation her sight can be restored. Mr. Gladstone, at a still greater age than hers, became afflicted with the same trouble, and within a few weeks was as keen of sight as ever. Her people will pray that her usual good fortune will see her successfully through this great calamity.

Mrs. Langtry's Divorce. The Court Journal, referring to Mrs. Langtry's divorce, intimates that she had better not remarry and appear in England with that as her justification. Judge Crump's decree from Lake County would not run in England or in America or anywhere outside of Lake County, and there only whilst he is the Superior Judge. The law of California provides that the party complaining shall have had a bona fide residence within the county for three months, and within the State for twelve. It is a matter of the utmost notoriety, and as such perfectly well known to Judge Crump, that the Jersey courtizan never resided for the statutory period in either his County or in the State. We all know that, and it is but an idle falsification of the things that are which permits Judge Crump, or anybody else, to give judicial credence to affidavits that are contrary to their own personal knowledge of the facts. Judge Crump should have taken counsel of his own knowledge, and acted accordingly. He knew that Mr. Langtry knew nothing of the proceedings, that they were in the nature of a farce, that the real grounds for separation existed on his side, that the Langtry woman was within this very Judge's jurisdiction as the open and notorious mistress of Gebhart, and that if the law had received its just dues, she, at any rate, would have passed considerable time in that dirty little jail which is hardly fit for human habitation, but perhaps, is too good for a wanton who, forgetting the parsonage in which she was raised and married, and the good country squire whom she married, advertised her God-given attractions, did her best to render vice known to our young folks, and to put the decent people of two continents to shame. Such divorcees as her's are doing more harm to California than any other cause of which we have knowledge. They become notorious, secure wide advertising, and are far-reaching in their bad influence. We wish we could say that they were confined to far-off Lake County, but they are as easily obtained, as notoriously false, and altogether as unworthy of Judicial sanction in San Francisco as in any part of this State, or any other.

Detectives who do not Detect. The Hoffman case furnishes an example of the state of affairs that has existed in this municipality for at least a quarter of a century past. During all that time we have had a detective force that cannot detect—when it does not want to do so. Ordinarily a bank forger or a burglar of Nob Hill or the Western Addition is run to earth, no matter to what part of the world he flies. That is unobjectionable and all right. But why cannot the same vigilance and sagacity be displayed in regard to crimes against the person, ranging upwards from murderous assault to murder? The reason is that our detective department has no stomach for crimes against the person—if it does not like the person. It has to our knowledge employed stool-pigeons upon whom it has had its hands to murder citizens whose hoots the whole department is unworthy to black. Now comes the Hoffman case, in regard to which the detectives cannot detect. The consensus of opinion among intelligent men points clearly in a certain direction. One man had the opportunity and the motive to commit the deed, but the Chief of Police says he did not commit it, and of course that settles it, so far as he is concerned. The astounding fact remains that the whole Force is engaged in protecting this man from the charge of guilt, whilst it appears to be doing nothing to find out who else fills the bill of probability, not to say of certainty. In other words, it would not detect if it could. All the indications are that it is retained the other way. It will not work with those who are sincere in their efforts to probe the facts to the bottom, but who are insulted to a degree that is disreputable on the part of public officials. But then, of such is the kingdom of the San Francisco Police Department, though certainly not of the kingdom of Heaven. The daily press must needs get most of its police news, reliable and unreliable as it often is, from the Police Department, and unless it will, when called upon, report the thing that is not, it cannot have the news that is essential to its life. We know this to be true from personal experience. No police news that filters through the dailies is to be relied upon, unless otherwise fortified. The Chronicle is the worst sinner in this connection, and the Call the least. The former knows that Chinatown has always been levied upon in case of need, and about all our morning and evening contemporaries know that all the known women of shame in our city have to pay for police protection. The Examiner at one time made a bluff at exposing and breaking up this state of affairs, but it had personal reasons, as we well know, for calling off its dogs of war. The external Police Department still goes on in its old track rejoicing.

Up-to-Date Straws.

The trip out of town is incomplete and uncomfortable without a straw hat. Groom & Hagan, the up-to-date hatters at 942 Market street, under the Baldwin Hotel, have a choice assortment of the latest styles in straw hats. The warm weather in the country makes it imperative on every man contemplating an outing to secure one of these light and airy hats before starting. This popular firm, recognizing that the straw hat is not worn as much as the derby hat, has put them on sale at very reasonable prices.

AMERICA TO BRITAIN.

[Lines commemorating the Sixtieth Anniversary of Her Britannic Majesty's Reign.]

HIGH o'er the standards of Europe flutter the colors of Britain,
 Britain the white-cliffed and rock-girt—loved of the passionate sea ;
 Britain, whose arm through long ages won for her honour and glory ;
 Britain, the mother of nations—mother of nations to be.
 Under the echoing heavens wanders the boisterous storm wind,
 Kissing the breasts of his mistress robed in their mantle of green,
 Singing the proud name of Britain over the face of creation,
 Telling the stars of her daughters—gems round the throne of their Queen.

Over the flags of the west world towers America's banner,
 Emblem of manhood's grand freedom, subject to God and to law ;
 Flag of a nation whose pages still are unsullied and perfect,
 Flag long devoted to justice—patient in peace and in war.
 Hovers the sun-nurtured eagle over her mountains and valleys,
 Watching the Nation's advancement up the steep steps of the years ;
 Passing from youth into manhood, mighty and sure of attainment,
 Sure of the glories that follow youth's early struggles and fears.

Over the rest of the nations America towers with Britain,
 E'en as the lion or eagle rules o'er its separate kind ;
 Both have the highest of missions—both are humanity's keepers,
 Teachers of virtue and honour, bearers of light to the blind.
 So let our peoples move onward, shoulder close buttressed to shoulder,
 Strong in their unified power, putting all foemen to flight ;
 Working for peace and for plenty, helping the world to advancement
 Out from the gloom that retards it, into the broadening light.

HOWARD V. SUTHERLAND.

DEATH OF GEORGE E. BARNES.

THE death of George E. Barnes, one of the founders of the Morning Call, and a dramatic critic widely known and as generally respected, occurred on last Wednesday, the 16th inst., in this city. Mr. Barnes's health had been bad for several years, but his demise was totally unexpected. Had he lived until the 4th day of next month he would have been seventy years old, having been born in St. Johns, New Brunswick, July 4, 1827. He came to California in 1854, and practically from that time down to the day of his death was identified with San Francisco newspaper work. Throughout his long career he was regarded as an able and conscientious writer; he was more prone to kindness in his work than harshness, and in his private life, no less than his public career, earned and enjoyed the friendship of all who knew him, and the affectionate esteem of many. He filled a distinct place in the history of journalism in San Francisco, and his pleasing personality and generous character will long be tenderly remembered by a wide circle of friends. The remains were interred yesterday in Mountain View Cemetery, the Press Club having charge of the obsequies.

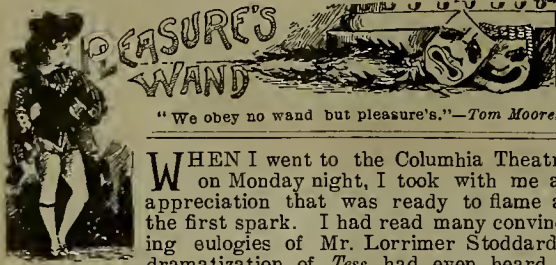

BOAT racing will be the chief attraction at El Campo to-morrow. The oars for the shell races are from Weeks & Co., ship chandlers, at 31 Market street, whose racing oars are the lightest and best to be found in the market.

"We obey no wand but pleasure's."—Tom Moore.

WHEN I went to the Columbia Theatre on Monday night, I took with me an appreciation that was ready to flame at the first spark. I had read many convincing eulogies of Mr. Lorrimer Stoddard's dramatization of Tess, had even heard it whispered that he might be that vague Messiah, the American Dramatist, and somebody who had seen a rehearsal of The Question told me that the play was delicate and true, with something of the polished irony of Henry James in its composition.

Here are some Jamesey shafts from Mr. Stoddard's wit works:

"How do you like my ruff?"
"It's rough on you."

"Your eyes are as deep as lakes—
I wonder what's underneath?"
"Mud, probably."

"See that shooting star! it's out of sight."

"If they hlack-hall me, I'll hlack-eye-hall them."

Now, in what language may a man express his appreciation of that johherslop and keep within the law?

The scene of this play is Paradeo, New York. (Don't tell anyone, this means Tuxedo. This was published confidentially in all the advance notices.)

The inmates of Paradeo are Knickerhockers. (This is no secret, it is printed on the play bill, and corroborated by their conversation).

Listen to the Knickerhockers knicking on their native heath:

"His wife is a perfect fright."
"Oh, she is a good woman."
"She has to be with that face."

The Question is called A Satirical Comedy. If Stoddard is a satirist, so is Sharkey. I should like to see these two gentlemen in an exchange of satire.

I should het my money on Stoddard.

Mr. Lorrimer Stoddard's question seems to be this:

If Mr. and Mrs. Cannon, wealthy, estimable country folk from the town of Morris, Ill., are landed open-mouthed and dazed at Paradeo, and Mr. Morris is immediately taken in tow by what is known to society intelligencers as a ravishing blonde, and pure but imprudent Mrs. Morris therefore permits a rakish young homebreaker to make love to her, and is horribly shocked when he kisses her full upon the mouth, and the kissing is witnessed by the Homebreaker's jealous mistress and other persons of high degree, and the jealous mistress calls a meeting of the Daughters of Old New York, of which she is vice-president, and endeavors to expel poor little Mrs. Cannon, who has only just attained membership, and through the efforts of Mr. Cannon and the Homebreaker and several other trusty witnesses and lusty speech-makers Mrs. Cannon is acquitted of the charge of osculation, and the jealous mistress is expelled in her stead—if all these things be considered, is it just retribution that in the last minute of the play Mrs. Cannon should be elected by acclamation to the office of vice-President of the Howling Daughters of Old New York?

I think not. What do you think?

This question, however, has only a slight bearing on the real motive of the play, it is merely to satisfy the title and thicken the plot. I have learned that Mr. Stoddard's purpose is to expose the social practices of the Knickerbockers in three acts. He is a strong young man and willing, and he hits hard. Every Knickerbockered joke, every Amsterdanned pun, all the slugs of patrician repartee are bagged, and handed in a play-house by coarse, plebeian play actors to make a Western holiday. Mr. Stoddard has spared nothing and nobody. He is the only dramatist who ever has dared to paint the manners and morals of this pet aristocracy as they are. After the last curtain there is not a manicure in the family circle but feels she would die sooner than be tainted by hase Knickerhocker blood.

You can imagine the consternation the news of this play will strike to the corrupt firesides of Tuxedo. It will kill the place. Gentle strangers from Morris, Ill. will no longer immigrate to be taken in; even the Sabbath picnicker will give it a wide berth; and the Kilkenny servant girl will ask Tuxedo for its references.

It is not to be expected of modest talents like the Frawleys that they play this piece exactly as the author would have it played. Several members of the company persisted in being human beings whenever the lines gave them the slightest chance, and while that undoubtedly galled Mr. Stoddard, the audience was very tolerant. These rebels were Mr. Frank Worthing, Miss Blanche Bates, Miss Gladys Wallis, Mr. Thomas Ross and Miss Georgia Bushy. The others, particularly Miss Eleanor Moretti and her dialect laugh, were as much like Mr. Stoddard's Tuxedoodles as he could ask them to be at their regular salaries.

The Question will be quietly hurried after to-morrow night's performance. Mr. Frawley and the gentlemen who share with him the proprietorship of the Frawley Company are neither philanthropists nor reformers, and they have found that anarchistic drama has a very depressing effect on the box office. I wish that Mr. Stoddard's play had been a good one, or even a brilliant failure. Such violent collapses as The Social Trust and The Question are dangerous to the Frawley company: they shake the grit of the management. It requires money and nerve to buy untried plays, and, without a new one that is a success, it will be impossible to maintain the company in its present state of expensiveness. To make anything like a decent profit, the territory must be increased. New York, Chicago and other big cities must be invaded, and of course this will require a new play. It does not seem to me that the season here and the Coast tour will be sufficient to support this high-salaried company. There are two more chances. One is a play now being written for the Frawleys by William Haworth, the author of The Ensign; the other is The Game of Life, by Malcolm Watson, the critic of the "St. James's Gazette." Charles Wyndham thinks enough of the latter piece to announce it for the opening of his winter season at the Criterion.

At the Orpheum Miss Josephine Sabel is warhling, and if your senses thirst for something that is galvanic, immediate and special, I recommend Miss Sabel. She has personality, and sings sparks out of her polished steel-pitched throat.

It is a matter of history that that insinuating music to which the hypnotic step is danced in Miss Frisco was composed by young Mr. Melville Ellis, of this city. It is supple, intimate and funny, and to my mind the best bit of music in the piece.

The Prisoner of Zenda did not exhaust half its popularity when Frohman's players gave it here last season, so with it the Lyceum Company will open the season at the Baldwin on Monday. Miss Mary Mannering, a young woman who has come in for no end of newspaper panegyrics since her metropolitan debut last season, will play the Princess Flavia. Mr. Hackett retains his admirable monopoly of the three Rudolphs. The company reads much stronger than the one we saw in the first production.

The Columbia is sure of a good week with Bronson Howard's famous money-maker, Shenandoah. It was rehearsed surreptitiously all through The Question's days of preparation, and a second-to-none performance is promised.

Edwin Stevens opens his engagement at the Tivoli Monday night in Wing. Everything from "a nine-foot giant" to a band of tamed banjoists will be used in the production. Wing never has been overdone here, and with such an artist as Mr. Stevens and at Tivoli prices, there should be a merry crush at the little opera house around the corner.

The Orpheum announces four big cards: Lew Dockstader, the veteran minstrel; Alex. Heindl, 'cello soloist; John Canfield and Violet Carleton, comic opera burlesquers, and Carton and Herbert, comedy acrobats.

No novelties, you will observe, at the playhouses, but compared to our present afflictions it looks like the coming of a busy, brilliant week. ASHTON STEVENS.

ART JOTTINGS.

KEITH exhibits this week, in the Sutter street gallery, a picture which shows all the merit and characteristics of his later work. It is a view of Mount Shasta, with the Sacramento river, then a pure mountain torrent, brawling in the foreground. The light is strong and bold, and the detail more closely painted than was Keith's wont in his earlier works. The exquisite transparency of the water, the rich brown foliage, and the delightful atmosphere are all in Keith's best vein.

Charles Judson exhibits a Venetian scene in the Bohemian Club green room, entitled "Flirtation"—a gondolier smiling at a fair Venetian serving wench, as she stands on the threshold of one of the grand palaces of the bride of the sea. The composition is good, and the handling clever, though lacking, perhaps, some strength in color.

A really exquisite picture is a view of slough and marsh exhibited by W. S. Fonda in the same room. The artist has caught that marvelous blending of browns and subdued purples which make our marshes a symphony in color, nature's mellow old tapestry, as it were. It is an evening effect, and the shadows of the dun bank lie heavy on the water.

A portrait of William Greer Harrison by Yates, and two clever pastel portraits by J. D. Strong comprise the new features this week of the green room's exhibit.

De Haas exhibits a good moonlight in the Sutter street gallery. But he has painted in the moon itself, which is a mistake. The best that the most skillful artist can do with the moon is to make it a big yellow blotch, usually out of proportion with the rest of the picture. Hide away the moon and use the light, and then the picture has more of the reproduction of nature.

ONE of the most fashionable resorts in this State is Vicby Springs, on the line of the San Francisco and North Pacific Railway. The Springs are famed for their champagne baths, whose beneficial effects make a visit to this place doubly desirable. A bus meets every train, and visitors are quickly whirled away to the Springs, where a commodious modern hotel and neat cottages await their choice. The tables are the best, and every comfort and attention are paid to the guests who resolve on spending a week or a month at this beautiful resort.

Nothing can be more delightful during the summer months than dining out; and Swain's Restaurant, at 213 Sutter street, offers a table d'hote dinner between the hours of 5 and 8 o'clock for $1, which includes the best the market affords, elegantly served by the politest waiters.

Anything constantly before the public, and which stands the test of popular criticism, may claim merit. Argonaut Whiskey is such an article—the man who has not enjoyed Argonaut is a curiosity. This liquor is pure, mellow, and aged. E. Martin & Co., at 411 Market street, are sole agents for this popular whiskey on the Pacific Coast.

"Marvelous Evidence; or, A Witness from the Grave." A psychological study. Published by Thomas H. Bates, San Francisco.

The story tells of three young New Yorkers, relatives and intimate friends, who went forth into the world to seek adventure, and, if chance might so ordain, to better their fortunes. Two of them, induced by the offer of a high bounty, enter the Imperialist army in Mexico at the time of the French Intervention, and, in attempting to escape to the frontier of the United States, are shot. At the very hour of their death the third, Henry, on board a vessel off the coast of Europe, heard a rattle of musketry, and on reaching New York, learned that his mother had heard the same sound at the same hour. An Agnus Dei that one of the young men had worn comes mysteriously into the hands of Harry, who, fully resolved to find out if his cousins are really dead or not, makes his way down to Mexico. There Harry finds a priest who knew his cousins, and buried their bodies: the priest recognizes the Agnus Dei at once, and with the readiness of men of his profession, pronounces its restoration to Harry a miracle. The rest of the story is taken up with various hypnotic experiments in which Harry took part in San Francisco. The general purpose of the book seems to be to induce people to pay more attention to hypnotic and kindred phenomena, and to lead them to the belief that there is a future life. The author is apparently not exempt from the curious notion into which all professors of and believers in spiritual manifestations who are not conscious humbugs fall, which is this: if they can produce certain phenomena, apparently inexplicable, and which you frankly confess yourself unable to understand, they at once offer you, and demand that you accept, some solution much harder to swallow than the phenomena themselves. They do not for a moment appear to understand that a man may confess himself completely mystified by an occurrence without being in the least degree bound to accept the first solution offered to him by a man in the street. Nor do they seem capable of understanding how intelligent people are quite content to admit their inability to explain many things, and are not at all worried thereby. The world is full of mysteries, and there is plenty of plain, honest, every-day work to be done without delving over-deeply into what seems hidden from mortal ken. A weak mind is much more disturbed at a strange, inexplicable occurrence than a strong one, which has long ago accepted the fact that, man's vision being finite, he cannot very well expect to comprehend the infinite. And, fortunately for us, no understanding of the unknowable is necessary to the performance of our daily duties, and excessive contemplation of the mysterious tends to weaken the powers of mind and body for good purposes. For this reason, although we have read "Marvelous Evidence" with some interest, we have not been much impressed, and are of the opinion that a perusal of it is unlikely to do anybody any particular good or to make anything clearer than it was before. The eulogistic passages quoted from the remarks of the literary critics of the newspapers of San Francisco and Fresno do not shake us in the smallest degree from our opinion.

"A Change With the Seasons; or, An Episode of Castle Crags." A novel by Duncan Cunningham. Published by the Dunsmuir Publishing Company and for sale by the San Francisco News Company.

The young and lovely bride of an old and unattractive millionaire meets the hero of this tale at the Tavern of Castle Crags. The two are much impressed with each other, and carry on a somewhat lively flirtation together. Later, when they meet again on a snow-bound train, and spend a night in each other's company in a little solitary cabin in the mountains during the prevalence of a violent storm, they fall madly in love. The old husband is conveniently killed, and the lovers retire to a lonely rancho in Southern California, where we are to suppose they spend the rest of their days in bliss. The people in the story, both men and women, are vulgar and commonplace, and all speak the same queer English. The general style of the language used may be gathered from the fact that the grill-room of the Palace Hotel is described as "that clean, savory-conducted department of San Francisco's greatest caravanserai." The Lord deliver us! Other queer phrases are: "You was worse scared than she was." "It is better for a girl to marry most any kind of a man." "Mr. B. did not have a very exalted opinion of some of the ultra-ultra guests, who were aping to such an extent that they were killing off the vegetation of the Sierras with their agony." At the end of the volume there is a list of sixteen printer's errors, but ten times that number stand uncorrected. Altogether, the story is a very poor, trashy, vulgar production, apparently the work of a country school-boy. We should be sorry to think that the visitors to Castle Crags, many of whom come from San Francisco, speak and behave no better than this writer represents them as doing.

In the June issue of Godey's is a short story entitled "Two Maids and a Man," which is illustrated by photographs taken from life. Though we think this a most inartistic method of illustrating a piece of fiction, the photographs themselves are quite satisfactory. An article on Cairo by Dr. F. E. Clark, an emissary of the Society of Christian Endeavor, is well illustrated, as also are "French Opera in New Orleans," and "Pottery in America." Fred Werden contributes an article on "Woman and her Boat," in which the following queer sentence occurs: "It is my opinion that every woman who expects to go upon the water ought to learn to row and to manage a boat before she ventures." That is to say, that a woman ought to know how to row and manage a boat before she steps into a boat. Very good: but how in the world is she to acquire the knowledge? This is just on a par with the advice not to go into the water until you can swim. In "The Bookery" Chelifer says that, though foreigners would probably accuse Americans of "ubiquitous flippancy" (whatever this may be), "mysticism is one of the most prominent traits of the American character." Abraham Lincoln, Poe, Hawthorne, Emerson, and Walt Whitman, are all classed as mystics. We do not often find ourselves in accord with the sentiments expressed in the Editorial department of Godey's, but in the issue before us we read some remarks upon the so-called pictures supplied to a long-suffering public by the "great dailies," with which we are pleased to confess our agreement.

"Fifty Years of Masonry in California," if one may determine by the first part just issued by George Spaulding & Co., is to be a most beautiful work. Part I. is printed in large, clear type, elegantly illustrated, and is worthy of the noble order of which it treats. The work will appear in twenty parts, and is compiled and edited by Edwin A. Sherman, 33rd degree Mason.

Mr. George W. Cable, till lately Editor of The Symposium, is now editing Current Literature, the June issue of which contains an article on Henry M. Alden, Editor of Harper's Magazine, the first of a series entitled "Great Magazine Editors."

THE weather, which is so unsatisfactory in the city, is by no means perfect at the near-by resorts, and old Boreas roars and whistles more or less everywhere. Notwithstanding the somewhat sturdy zephyrs of late, San Rafael has been crowded with visitors and the Hotel Rafael the objective point for pleasure seekers. Sheltered in a nook of the broad veranda, the women sit and chat, do fancy work or read, while indoors, in the long parlor, the elder women gather for eards and gossip. After lunch comes the siesta till time for a drive or ride, then train time brings the men, and a dainty dinner gown is in order, and the evening goes by with merriment. The club house is a favorite place for lounging; bowling vies with tennis, and the moonlight has been a thing of beauty and joy for all. No wonder that people like this popular hotel, where General Warfield is ever on the qui vive to promote the comfort and pleasure of his guests.

The Tamalpais trip up the big mountain is growing in favor with our swagger set, and since San Rafael and Sausalito have taken it up, it has become quite the thing for society people to make up parties to spend the night on the summit and watch the sun rise on the heights next morning. And now that that universal joy-giver, Wiltsee, has led the way, no doubt others will follow. On dit, that favorite beau has of late shown such a preference for May that June is nowhere.

Propos of San Rafael, the resident colony there will suffer a serious loss in the departure of Miss Juliet Williams, whose trip East is said to be for a lengthened period, and if Rumor speaks by the eard, we may never see the young lady as a girl again. When Hymen claims her devotion a change will ensue that will add another to the many charming young matrons who are so distinctive a feature of our California swim.

How strange it is that people who are the pink of propriety and good manners at their homes in the city appear to throw aside these qualities when they "go to the country." Not alone do they exhibit bad manners to a marked degree, but a lack of prudence as well, seemingly unaware (or indifferent) of the fact that numberless eyes and tongues are upon them and their actions.

Delightful Del Monte is beginning to fill up its list of guests for the summer. The Alvords, Paysons, and Lows, are all old stand-bys, the Bruguieres ditto, and later in the season all the other resorts will send a quota of their guests to swell the number. The Lloyd Tevises are said to have engaged rooms for September, when it is expected that Fred Sharon and family will join their party.

Gossip says that society will have a genuine surprise ere long in an engagement of two well-known members of the charmed circle. Much speculation on the subject was indulged last winter, but the soft impeachment was so strenuously denied that it died away. Recently the matter has been taken up again, and now is regarded as something to surprise those not on the inside.

THE hour was late, and even the guardian owls of the Bohemian Club were blinking when Jack Watson, the junior member of the firm of Taylor & Co., was breaking away from a half dozen friends when his chum, George Baxter, called to him:

"By the way, Jack, can't we induce you to attend our cotillion next Friday night?"

"Thanks, old man; but you know I have no time to waste on such niceties as are required for these social 'functions,' I think you call them, nor inclination to shine, even if I could, in their superficial atmosphere, which has light, but no warmth, and even less sincerity. I'm too old to change tactics and mingle in society, take part in its nothings, and drink its froth—even under penalty of losing the favor of San Francisco's pretty buds and matrons."

A fellow of high principle and noble character was Jack Watson. He was square and upright in all his dealings, took a broad, unbiased view of all subjects but Society, the mere mention of which was most distasteful to him. His mother often remarked that the hardest task in her life was to induce Jack, when a mere child, to attend his dancing school on Saturday afternoons. When asked a few years ago to mention the happiest day of his life, he unexpectedly answered: "The day my mother said I might quit dancing school."

Watson claimed he would rather saw five cords of wood, with the thermometer 100 deg. in the shade, than participate in any affair of a social nature for five minutes. When asked for an explanation regarding his ideas on the subject, he somehow or other evaded all further questioning by replying that he simply disliked it on general principles. His friends called him a crank on the subject, but he was rather proud of the distinction. More than one ambitious mother, with marriageable daughters and a penchant for entertaining, was heard to say: "What a pity that such a fine specimen of manhood in every particular should make such a social recluse."

The following evening found Jack and his chum in the latter's rooms, ensconced in deep, easy chairs, and waxing rather confidential over the soothing effects of their Havanas; by means of the most diplomatic measures, worthy of a Tallyrand, Baxter succeeded in bringing the conversation round to the hated theme, "Society."

"Tell me, Jack," he asked, as he nonchalantly puffed away at his cigar, narrowing his eyes as he watched each successive ring of smoke break and fade away, "why have you such a dislike of taking part in social functions?"

"Because," answered Watson, "society is not unlike those rings of smoke you so artistically formed during the past half hour—attractive enough at first glance, I'll admit; they look so real that you are deluded with the idea that they are substantial enough to grasp; you attempt it, and lo, you find—nothing. You take a cursory glance at Society, and you find it attractive, even fascinating, if you will have it so; you make a study of it, and you will find that it possesses the same qualities as the ring of smoke—it is false and flimsy."

"You miserable cynic," he replied, "just mark my words, when I say that the time is not far distant when you will entertain entirely different ideas. Your object is to be stamped as a man with a marked individuality, and what is more, pardon my candor, when I say that I really do not think you feel at heart about it as you so eloquently claim you do."

"Many thanks, dear George, for the very polite way in which you tell me that I lie; however, he that as it may, let us dismiss the subject, as I am positive you will be as incapable of convincing me as I you."

"As you will, old boy; but in conclusion let me say that if you were only to give Society a fair trial, and take it as you find it, you would be a great deal better off."

The only answer that Jack vouchsafed was to suggest in a half-suppressed yawn that they finish the evening at the Baldwin Theatre, at which place El Capitan was nightly drawing big crowds.

The usher had escorted them to their seats at the conclusion of the second act.

"Hello," said George. "If my eyes deceive me not, I see my hrother Charley and his wife and her sister occupying the box opposite."

Looking in the direction indicated, Jack exclaimed: "Quite an aristocratic-looking trio, and no mistake; but, by the way, George, you have never mentioned even the existence of your sister-in-law. How's that?"

"Very natural, considering the fair sex are not supposed to have any charms for you."

"True enough; but tell me her name. An Eastern girl? New York or Chicago?"

"Edith Thornton; she has been visiting here for the past two weeks. Her home is in Washington, to which city she intends shortly to return. She is one of the finest young women I have ever met, but—what's all this to you, anyway?" Heaving a heavy sigh, somewhat indicative of the fact that he wished to change the subject, he said: "We must not forget to reserve our seats for the first night of the Lyceum people. They will be here in a short time."

George smiled quietly to himself when he noticed that Jack's eyes were directed more frequently toward Box A than to the stage; but wisely refrained from saying anything. At the conclusion of the play, they slowly walked along Market street toward Powell. Just as they reached the corner, they came face to face with Mr. and Mrs. Baxter and Miss Thornton; and George proudly presented his chum to Miss Thornton.

Just before parting for the night, Jack almost apologetically exclaimed: "Say, George—nice girl—that Miss Thornton. Pity she goes East so soon."

A few days after the foregoing incident, a number of Jack's closest friends held a meeting in order to devise ways and means to ensure his appearance at the coming cotillion on Friday night. So long as the scheme were practicable, it was immaterial to them whether the means resorted to should be more foul than fair. After much deliberation, they finally hit upon a capital scheme. One of their number contemplated joining the Benedicts shortly; it was agreed upon giving a last bachelors' dinner in his honor, which was to take place at their club on the same evening as the cotillion.

In due time the unsuspecting Jack was asked to the dinner; he accepted with alacrity, laughing in his sleeve at the folly of the man who was to sacrifice all the comforts of a bachelor's life for a "silly little girl." As for me, he continued in his soliloquy, the world is more likely to come to an end than that I should ever find myself the honored guest at a dinner of such a nature. Such rank idiocy to tie oneself for life even to the best woman in the world! They might call me a "fool," but "he laughs best who laughs last."

The eventful dinner took place shortly after this deeply laid scheme. It passed off with éclat, and it was indeed an occasion where there was a "feast of reason and a flow of wit." The repartee, the retorts, and handying of words flew thick and fast, and it really seemed that the guests were disciples of the man who first said that it is wise to "eat, drink, and be merry, for to-morrow ye die." It was with a shadow of regret that the conspirators were finally forced to tear themselves from their brandy and soda; but the time was ripe for the carrying out of the conspiracy, and, after cheering the future Benedict with real gusto, they departed for the cotillion, and left Jack Watson in the company of his cynical thoughts and his cigar. Heaving a heavy sigh of relief, after the cessation of all the noise and excitement, he scanned the evening paper in a desultory manner for a few seconds, and ere many minutes had gone by he passed into the land of "Nod," dreaming of the fools who would have to talk themselves tired and dance themselves sick at the cotillion.

Just when his slumber was the deepest and his dreams the sweetest, he was ceremoniously awakened by the steward of the club, who said

"Beg pardon, sir; sorry to disturb you, but there is someone that wishes to speak with you at the telephone, and he seems to be most excited like."

Hurrying to the instrument he ascertained that George Baxter had suddenly been taken seriously ill, and was waiting in the corridor of the building in which the cotillion took place, to be taken to his home. The party at the other end said that Baxter insisted on having Watson call for him, as he did not wish to cause any undue excitement either there or at his home. He preferred instead to share Watson's rooms with him that night.

It all came so suddenly that the idea that he would have to appear at the cotillion never for one moment entered his mind. His closest friend was ill, and it was his burden duty to be on hand. Without further delay, he rang for a cab, and in five minutes found himself in the corridor of the building and being heartily welcomed by the reception committee, foremost among whom was George Baxter, but not as he anticipated—finding him lying prostrate with a physician anxiously bending over him, but George Baxter, spick and span in his fine full dress, with a face wreathed in smiles. In a second he was received by the rest of his companions of the recent dinner, all of whom comprised the reception committee.

Baxter rather sheepishly advanced towards Watson, holding out his hand for forgiveness.

"Forgive me, old boy, for what no doubt appears to you as a most diabolic scheme. We simply wanted to cure you of your unwarranted ideas, and, realizing that we could do nothing with you by argument, we concluded that main force would be used as a last resort."

Watson did not pay the slightest attention to his belated explanation, but made a desperate dash for the door; he had gone but two steps when he found himself besieged on all sides.

"You can't escape us, Jack," said Baxter, "for what can one man do against such a formidable army? Just as well capitulate. The cloak-room is to your left, and, after you have relieved yourself of your hat and overcoat, I shall wait at the door for you and shall be most happy to escort you to the ball-room."

The expression of Jack's face, in fact his entire attitude, beggared description. He stood there as if rooted to the spot. He saw that he was caught and could do nothing but surrender. He did not relish the idea of making a scene, and so was forced to "face the music" in two senses of the word.

He had reached the threshold of the ball-room on the faithful arm of George, when he espied Miss Thornton, looking sweeter and more beautiful than ever. A tell-tale glow in her cheeks, which found its counterpart in the voice of the cynical Jack, might have been seen had Baxter used half an eye, but he was conveniently oblivious, and after a moment's talk drifted away. The perfume of the flowers, the seductiveness of the music, the brilliancy of the illuminations, and the picturesqueness of the decorations all seemed to wield a peculiar fascination over Watson, and as he recognized his many friends, one by one, and exchanged a word here and there, he felt entirely en rapport with his surroundings, and for the time being forgot that he had ever entertained any hostile ideas toward Society. Ere he was aware of the fact, he had filled his card, on which the name of Miss Thornton played no unimportant part. Four hours later, as the delighted man handed that young lady into her carriage, it was easy to see that he had not only buried the hatchet, but was both a convert and a captive.

California climate is sometimes preccious; and it was but a few weeks later that the following notice appeared in the society columns of the NEWS LETTER:

"The engagement is announced of Miss Edith Thornton, of Washington, D. C., and Jack Watson, of San Francisco. This is rather a surprise, but it is a pleasant one, as Miss Thornton is a beautiful and accomplished girl and Mr. Watson a man of wealth and personal worth. Watson has always been looked on as a woman hater and a confirmed bachelor. If rumor tells the truth, Cupid shot his arrow at this would-be misogynist a few weeks ago at the Baldwin Theatre, at which place he first saw the young lady."

Jack's club friends are now waiting for an invitation to his final stag dinner.

Speculation on Pine Street.

Dealers cannot complain of inactivity in the local mining share market during the past week. Chollar, for one, has done some lofty tumbling, and judging from the indications of manipulation on all sides, the end is not yet. At one time the north and south end mines offered an attraction for dealers, the rise in value being sufficient to enable a line operator to make a handsome turn on an investment. The market certainly looks more promising than it has for months past, and the inducement offered by activity in the fluctuating will not fail to attract capital to the street. Chollar reports a hullion yield of nearly $29,000 net for the past month from the workings of Brunswick ore. This has been rather a surprise to many people who had accepted the statements about the worthlessness of the newly purchased ground as gospel. It will also serve to strengthen confidence in the possibilities of the future in developing the Brunswick lode, more especially as all of the ore already encountered runs very high in gold. If the other companies would devote the same attention to the ground they own there, as the Chollar people have, it might be better for them in the long run. Great things are hoped for from the work now being done in the Gold Hill group, as the west country now being opened up is believed to be rich in mineral. Sierra Nevada has a very flattering prospect on the 900-level west, and some energetic work is now promised to determine the extent and value of the new find.

Should Be Postponed.

The attempt now being made to revive American Flat has hardly passed into the initiatory stages of development before an assessment is slapped on Rock Island. The holders of some 30,000 shares have revived the company by means of a Board of Directors, consisting of three holders and two newly-elected men, and it is said that the assessment is levied for the purpose of locating the rest of the stock. Many of the holders may have died since the stock dropped out of sight, and others are ignorant possibly of the fact that some of their co-shareholders, and a minority at that, are about to sell them out should they not pay up two cents a share on their holdings. It would be interesting to know in what manner this money is to be expended, more especially as the American Flat Development Company has offered to carry on the work of opening up the mines for a certain interest in the ground. There is no expense attached to this arrangement in so far as any of the companies is concerned, and in view of the fact the present demand for money is totally unwarranted. The assessment should, in all justice to outside holders, be postponed indefinitely or rescinded altogether until such time as necessity arises for funds to carry on work for the benefit of all concerned.

Lane's Mission to London.

Charles D. Lane, the wealthy mining man, has left for London to effect, if possible, the sale of the La Esperanza mine of Mexico to English capitalists. Mr. Lane is a man of a different calibre from the ordinary type of mining promoter. He is a capable expert in all branches of his profession and honest in his convictions, which are not likely to be changed in a hurry. Whatever he may say in regard to a mine will come as close to being correct as anything could be within the power of human ken. In this respect he will be a novelty in London among the mining faculty. He ought to score a grand success in his undertaking, and this might be depended upon were it not for the peculiar disposition of the English investor. People who turn a rawhide down for a catch-penny scheme like the Union Gold and other wild-cat ventures, cannot be accredited with a strong sense of discrimination in matters of the kind. If Lane carries his point in this case, it must be accepted as an indication of a healthier condition of affairs and a more judicious conduct of investments.

A Row Over Water Rights.

The close down of the Texas Consolidated Mine, near Redding, was announced in a dispatch from that town during the week, worded in such a manner as to give the impression that the power company was to blame. If what the representatives of that concern say is correct, the blame rests entirely with the Mountain Copper Company, which desires to monopolize the entire water supply available, despite a prior right to a certain number of inches claimed by the power company. As there was an injunction taken out by the English company's representative, Fielding, before he left for London the other day, the matter will come up immediately before the United States Circuit Court in this city. This will likely throw some light on the case, which is all the more interesting from the fact that a tie-up in the work of an active mine like the Texas must involve one or other of the parties to the dispute in heavy expense sooner or later. As the contestants are well off financially, there is every opening for a lively and protracted litigation, which might expand materially should the mine-owners decide to interfere, provided the counsel retained on all sides are able to raise some knotty law points which will require interpretation at the hands of the higher courts. For aught any one knows this may develop into another cause celebre in the local annals of mining litigation. A close-down just now must, however, be particularly unfortunate for the owners of the mine, which has been on the market for some time past. No one can tell where a battle over water rights is apt to end, unless the matter is settled at an early stage out of courts, which would be the most sensible plan.

The Dead Barnato.

The death of Mr. Barnato is to be regretted in many ways. To his manipulations was due in a large measure the enthusiasm which enabled so many people to make money in the mining market, and the popularity generally of mining speculation. Westralia, British Columbia and California itself, in a very small way, unfortunately, all felt the beneficial influences of the boom in the Kaffir stocks. The question is now as to the man capable of filling the gap left vacant by Barnato, inspired with the same ambition and possessed of the natural talent for the peculiar line of operations. Of course it is certain that the puffy little parasites waxen fat and proud through the beneficence of the dead, will cry parvenue as they strut their little course of ignobility. The toady is always an ingrate. The name of Barnato will live, however, as one of the successful men of the century, irrespective of an early career, which was from all accounts honest, if not quite dignified enough to suit the ideas of some people who could not in turn say as much. Friends of John Hays Hammond in this city, who know him well enough to judge, will not for a moment credit him with such bad form, to put it mildly, as that displayed in an alleged interview on the death of a man to whom he is so largely indebted for his success. The interview referred to is not, it is unnecessary to state, accepted here as genuine. The vulgarity of tone itself is sufficient to justify the assertion.

Faded Glories Of Aurora.

An Exchange says: "Poor old Aurora has struck hard lines, sure enough. The Postoffice there has been closed down, and all mail for Aurora will go to Fletcher's. Aurora, once the best known town in the inter-mountain county, with a city government, 8,000 population, and piles of money, has so degenerated that it's about forgotten officially. The mining regions are dotted with have-been towns, but few have fallen from prestige equal to Aurora." This was the scene of the labors of the estimable Mr. Alfred E. Ann, who flourished while the Esmeralda Con. boom lasted. Mr. Ann like many another foreign investor fell a victim to an over estimate of his personal knowledge of mining and ability to cope with an undertaking which had already proved a failure in the hands of more experienced men. Aurora had lived and died in history as a mining camp long before Mr. Ann resurrected it and the fortunes of the men who landed him after angling in more or less troubled waters for over a decade. In years to come some other Ann may arise to ring another change on the old old story of the honanza mines of Aurora revamping its glories for another short lived period.

Down-Crier

"Hear the Crier!" "What the devil art thou?"
"One that will play the devil, sir, with you."

PERJURY, forgery and a few other trifling offenses prevented a supposititious wife and widow, Laura Milcu, accompanied by the inevitable infant exhibit, from being awarded the valuable estate of the late Charles A. James, a medico of three score and more. Miss Milcu claimed to have captured the doctor by her rendition of the song "Love's Sorrow." It is feared that this may stimulate the ballad evil among other adventuresses after the sacks of aged millionaires. Fair woman may talk man to death, but singing him there is indeed horrible torture.

THE estimable Mrs. Perkius says she hopes if they think of annexing Hawaii they'll have some dress reforms before they turn the South Sea ladies into Americans, as she hears they are quite without what she considers the essential parts of their garments and simply wear trimmings, which would give foreigners coming here by way of the Orient quite a wrong impression of the American girl.

FUNDS for firecrackers on the Glorious Fourth have reached the several thousand dollar mark. The CRIER is in sympathy with the popping of the restive cracker, but is apprehensive that the literary committee on celebratiou affairs will promulgate another poem contest, repeating its sin of last year. Poetical pyrotechnics are hereby respectfully unsolicited.

MRS. Florence Blythe-Hinckley is sole heiress of the Blythe estate but this does not signify that her connection with the local courts is at an end. The young widow is defendant in several new suits already. These are probably as nothing in numbers, compared with the matrimonial suits which this interesting little heiress will have to dodge in the future.

IT is to be hoped that all possible leniency will be shown to young Lipp, who shot and killed Miss Goodman the other night, while she and a party of serenaders from Yell County, Arkansas, were catawauling under his window. It is all very well to uphold the name of your county, and these yellers from Yell County may have meant well, but there are limits.

A FIGHT is inaugurated against the Fisk will. The late Asa's shade may not be hovering in the lower regions but if it transpires that his cherished gold be eventually gobbled up by the lawyers in process of litigation, assuredly the released Fisk spirit, disembodied but doubtless a spectre at the feast, will languish in an exclusive hades of its own.

A LOCAL contemporary, which is naught if not insanely sensational, advertises San Francisco's impending doom. The l. c.'s influence is indeed devastating but not so fatal as that. Its destructive operations are, of course, a frightful blight upon our fair commonwealth but they have not yet wrought our everlasting doom.

THIS week there has been another terrible case of suicide by a reckless speculator. No one can help pitying poor Barney Barnato who remembers the awful straits to which the poor mau was reduced. It is said that three million sterling was all he had in the world.

CORSETS are again to the fore in an object-lesson on health of the female form divine. The subject is by no means a new one, and it concerns the wearers only, yet men evince both eagerness and ability to grasp that same.

FROM the legal discord over the famous Bell estate, and the family jars revealed by this week's filing of complaints in court, it would appear that the Bells are loudly out of tune and harsh.

OAKLAND is being held up nightly by thugs and light-fingered gentry. We have 'em over here, too, but they usually do their looting after they get elected to office.

THE charge of selling liquors without a license, for which Inez Forrest, an employee of a Market street restaurant, was arrested by a stupid policeman, in which unjust act the officer was sustained by Sergeant Gleason, has been dismissed without trial. The Sergeant endeavored to have the girl plead guilty, when he knew that she was in reality innocent. Her arrest was an outrage, for which the incompetence of the police sergeant is responsible. The mere right to go in peace is small salve for the indignity of arrest and the brutality of detention in prison as a common criminal.

'TIS true that Oakland has her Honorable Leila Kirkham Yarde-Buller, who has managed to keep herself notoriously before the public of two continents. 'Tis true that Lake County has her own many-tinted Lily, the uow mature Langtry divorcelet who once enjoyed a Priuce's favor. But San Francisco has a petticoated freak, too, in Madame Johnnie Martiu, who as an Amazon of amazing resources in the notoriety business can't be beat. Queer girls, these three, but the greatest of all is Mrs. Johnnee.

WEATHER Prophet Hammon wants to fly a kite in order to test the weather, and is waiting for Uncle Sam to buy him an assortment of them. The Weather Bureau has decided to establish twenty or thirty of the air stations advocated by Hammon and his associate in the weather business, McAdie. It is to be hoped that such operations will be delayed however, until after the Bryan cyclone has safely passed over our heads. Too much wind might do serious damage.

CONSIDERING the sensational scenes, deathbed recitals and dramatic denouements generally that are now a regular part of our court proceedings, it is surprising that the local theatres do not suffer from a falling off in patronage. It speaks well for San Francisco's pride that it does not run entirely to free shows in the alluring line of choice family scaudals, last will fracasas, and murder mysteries.

THAT worthy Judge, Campbell, has added another to the long list of reasons why he should not be a Court. He was accosted one evening this week by a young woman with a salutatiou of "hello, Judge Campbell," and the distinguished jurist ordered her locked up. All of which shows that a whiskered vacuum is a sensitive curiosity where women have no votes.

THERE'S a most uuholy row in the ranks of the Reformed Episcopalians over the garb in which they shall tread their earthly way to spiritual glory. Why not confine yourselves to the cloak of religion, plain and simple, Oh warring representatives of an improved brand of gospel, and leave all drygoods differences to the vain and ungodly who have not your passports to heaven?

WILLIE HEARST'S paper advertises that it will soon contain an article on the strangest thing that ever happened in San Francisco. It would be easy to say what would be the most remarkable thing that could ever occur in this community: The faking Examiner turned into an honest and decent paper; but it will never be truthfully written.

THE water schedule is agitating Oakland consumers, and pending the final settlement of rates the citizens of that suburban centre, refusing to imbibe the liquid at its present price, are assuaging their thirst with whiskey. Any old thing for an excuse to patronize their favorite beverage.

IT is to be deplored that young girls with mistaken longings for the tinsel glitter of a gay life, do not take warning from the suicides of almost daily occurrence in this city that mark the miserable close of some wretched creature's misspent life.

THERE is a smile so debonair
Upon her face engraven,
As if she'd have you think her Fair,
But I believe her Craven.

THERE is complaint among business men that the mails are unnecessarily delayed in landing at this port. Delay in the landing of males is also a cause of perennial complaint with a large contingent of spinsters hereabouts.

THE ROSE JAR

ALL SOUL'S EVE—DORA SIGERSON, IN THE BOOKMAN.

All Soul's Day is a day on which prayers are said for the souls of the faithful dead.

I cried all night to you,
I called till day was here;
Perhaps you could not come,
Or were too tired, dear.

Your chair I set by mine,
I made the dim hearth glow.
I whispered, "When he comes
I shall not let him go."

I closed the shutters tight,
I feared the dawn of day,
I stopped the husy clock
That timed your hours away.

Loud howled my neighbor's dog,
O glad was I to hear,
The dead are going by,
Now you will come my dear,

To take the chair by mine—
Until the cock would crow—
O, if it be you came,
And could not let me know.

For once a shadow passed
Behind me in the room,
I thought your loving eyes
Would meet mine in the gloom.

And once I thought I heard
A footstep by my chair,
I raised my eager hands,
But no sweet ghost was there.

We were to wide apart—
You in your spirit land—
I knew not when you came,
I could not understand.

Your eyes perhaps met mine,
Reproached me through the gloom,
Alas, for me alone
The empty, empty room!

The dead were passing home,
The cock crew loud and clear,
Mavourneen, if you came,
I knew not you were here.

LOVE WAS TRUE TO ME—JOHN BOYLE O'REILLY.

Love was true to me,

True and tender,

I who ought to be

Love's defender.

Let the cold winds blow

Till they chilled him,

Let the winds and sun

Shroud him—and I knew

That I killed him.

Years he cried to me

To be kinder,

I was blind to see,

And grew blinder,

Years with soft hands raised,

Fondly reaching,

Wept and prayed and praised,

Still beseeching,

When he died, I woke,

God, how lonely!

When the gray dawn broke

On one only.

Now beside Love's grave

I am kneeling,

All he sought and gave

DEAR EDITH:—A friend of mine writing from Paris says: I saw two American girls, one of them the young woman with eleven new gowns, disporting at a little country place in the suburbs of Paris, in gowns that were inexpensive but very chic.

One wore a cream challie skirt with large crimson roses nestling in their green leaves. The vest of the gown was crimson taffeta, with sleeves and bolero of cream challie, over which set a collar of home embroidered muslin.

The other wore a white pique dress with a hand of batiste around the foot. The waist was of the batiste, with the skirt trimmed upon the hips to form a hasque. There were revers and epaulettes of hook linen, and tiny panels of embroidered lineu upon the skirt.

With these were two other young women, also inexpensively gowned. One wore a green gingham, with tiny blue silk thread running through it. A big double ruffle of plaid set over the shoulders. A tall, pointed stock of white linen encircled the neck.

Both young women wore hats of cream straw, trimmed with ribbou and flowers. The second girl's gown was of figured mull, over plain taffeta, of the 20c. weight. There was no effort at show, the object being a pretty and cheap gown for summer wear. She wore a wrap of pale green striped batiste, edged with silk embroidery, and with long taffeta streamers in the front. The wrap was bordered with a ruffle of white embroidered muslin.

The piques and cloth gowns, which are to be worn in the early fall, have sleeves that are long and tight fitting, filled very slightly at the arm-hole. The collars are high and without trimming, and all of the skirts are trimmed elaborately. But, of course, this is anticipating matters. The light gowns we first catch a glimpse of are hardly as unusual as that. We are coming to tight sleeves and severe neck effects by degrees.

I saw such a pretty, girlish gown of pique trimmed with a bright shade of bluet.

The skirt was a godet, rather moderate in width, with the fullness all carried to the back. It was trimmed with narrow bluet braid. Three rows of the braid followed the seams of the front gore to within 6 inches of the waistband. There the braid was turned in sharp corners and continued around the skirt. Below this was another trimming of braid.

The jacket was a bolero of the pique over a vest of bluet linen. It fastened at the bust with a large white pearl button. There was a broad, round collar and lapels of pique, edged with three hands of the braid, that followed the edge of the jacket. The sleeves were the usual coat sleeves, with a finish of braid at the wrists.

The hat to be worn with this gown was of rough, pure white straw. It had a broad brim, faced with bluet tulle. The crown was surrounded by a plisse of bluet tulle and a plaiting of white taffeta ribbon. The hat was turned up at the back, and trimmed with tall bows of taffeta ribbon.

The combining of startling colors that fairly make you wince is just now a freak of fashion, but all do not see fit to follow. I am glad to say. For instance, the most brilliant royal purple hat is trimmed with alternate ruches of vivid scarlet and purple tulle, and an emerald green straw has flowers of bright orange and bows of clear crude purple. Scarlet and crude pale blue is another combination, but the softer tints are far more becoming.

It is almost an inexplicable, but nevertheless very important fact, that any skin under a well-lined shadow veil appears to excellent advantage, and that under this cobweb covering, whether bought in black or white, defects of the facial cuticle are not apparent to the keenest eye.

BELINDA.

B. M. LELONG, Secretary of the State Board of Horticulture, is remembered by three of his friends more in sorrow than in anger, and this is why: During the last Legislature he entertained a crowd with tales of perilous encounters with wild boar in Butte's sylvan glades. Among his listeners were Assemblyman John W. Keegan, William Alford, the political tenderfoot from Tulare, and Carleton H. Johnson, the popular and good-looking young secretary of the People's Party County Committee, who laughingly accused Lelong of running to earth no more dangerous a beast than a tame pig, whereupon Lelong invited them to his house, where, sure enough, suspended in chunks from the basement ceiling, were sections of Butte boar, cured by the doughty Sacramento hunter over a manzanita wood fire to impart a fragrant delicacy to it. After a pleasant half hour holding up their host's sideboard, the guests departed, Lelong insisting upon presenting them with samples of the meat. Johnson, upon reaching his hotel, stowed his share away in a bureau drawer. That night he was rudely awakened from dreams of Populistic victory by a fearful scrimmage in his apartment. Springing up, he prepared to wage mortal combat with the miscreant who had mistaken the room of an honest Populist for that of a San Francisco hoodler; but it proved to be an army of rats, and next day he had to foot a bill for damaged furniture. Keegan hoarded the train after packing his pig in a grip along with some choice old Bourbon, and was smoking placidly when he heard a commotion in the baggage car. He hurried forward, to find his grip a wreck, two large hunting dogs having located the wild game therein, the precious whiskey being smashed in the melee. Alford, on his homeward journey, deposited his prize in a paper on the rack above the seat occupied by a young lady. Induced by the heat, the pork commenced to drip, and in time the almost frying fat permeated the millinery beneath, presently precipitating some essence of wild boar down the wearer's neck. Alford paid for the hat.

A day or two after Col. John P. Jackson's appointment as Collector of the Port, he repaired, early in the morning, to the Customs House. In the ancient elevator, which crawled at a snail's pace toward the roof, there was only one other passenger, and the boy who managed the lift, not recognizing Col. Jackson, improved the occasion by improvising a lively clog dance, at which the collector gazed in silent disapproval. When Jackson made his exit from the elevator, the other passenger remarked:

"Well, young fellow, you have queered yourself beautifully."

"As how?" asked the unabashed Native Son of the Golden West.

"That was your new boss. That's all!"

"The h—l!" ejaculated the kid, dismayed for the first time in his career. "I must square myself with His Customs, somehow."

He studied over the situation silently, and when the Collector left his office several hours later, the boy greeted him with great affability.

"Col. Jackson?" he inquired, condescendingly.

The Colonel nodded.

"Ah! Congratulate you," proceeded the boy, blandly. "Glad to have you with us, colonel," he added, as Jackson gazed upon him.

"I hope you and I will be friends, Collector," continued the amiable youth.

Then he concluded to pursue his advantage and "strike the Collector for a job," as the elevator creaked slowly downward.

"By the way, Colonel," he began. "I've been running this elevator for eighteen months and, —"

Just then the wheezy old lift struck the ground floor, and the door flew open.

"Well, you run it d—n slowly, sir," interrupted the Colonel, as he stepped into the corridor.

When Ed Cutter's wife went away for the summer, the worthy grain merchant thought he could properly allow himself a little more latitude than when under his usually strict domestic government. After the conclusion of the ritual at his Masonic lodge, the other evening, he gladly assented to the proposition of his friend Pulaski to have a quiet little time. In the course of their rambling they were joined by Tom Walkington and Captain Mills, and the latter, finding that Cutter had never seen what he dubbed "the Circassian show" in an old building not far from Grant avenue and Geary, offered to pilot him thither. Cutter was game, and at the darkened entrance, Tom Walkington collected five dollars from the novitiate, for the prospective sights he was to see. Cutter paid up like a thoroughbred, and then was guided through an unlighted and tortuous maze of narrow passage ways and steep steps. From time to time, his trio of guides stimulated his flagging interest to the summit of expectancy, so that poor Cutter was continually on the qui vice without procuring anything more gratifying than a hat covered with cobwebs and a pair of badly harked shins. Finally they told him that the fun was actually about to commence.

"Now, my boy," said Tom Walkington, cheerily. "You are about to see something which will make your hair stand on end. You have to go it alone, though."

Cutter stumbled along in the darkness for several minutes, and finally found a door, which he opened with some difficulty,—only to emerge on the sidewalk, where he was greeted by the jeers of his faithful friends.

Two old-time cronies are Sam Beaver, the veteran paying teller of the Bank of California and Captain Rowe, the Exempt Fireman and man about town. Each is past his first youth, is jovial, portly and fond of a joke. Beaver was gazing into the window of a fashionable haberdasher, a few days ago, when the Captain sauntered up.

"I was just looking at that necktie," said Beaver, pointing to a handsome cravat.

"Yes? Go in and get it," advised Rowe promptly.

Without a word Beaver entered the store, said he would take the beautiful two dollar scarf, and ordered the bill sent to Captain Rowe. The latter was hardly prepared for this outcome of his suggestion, but he was too game to repudiate the obligation. He meditated revenge, however, and presently he got it.

The Captain is a stylish dresser, and he expressed his regret to his chum that he could not find a colored silk waistcoat of sufficient dimensions to suit his girth.

"That's easy," replied Beaver. "I know a store where there is a beauty. It fits me like a glove and you and I are about of a size. We'll go there now if you like."

The garment proved all that Beaver had promised for it in texture and fit.

"I'll take it," said Rowe. "Ten dollars? That's all right. Send the bill to S. Beaver, Bank of California!"

Much difference of opinion prevails among hotelmen, restaurant keepers and those who desire to rent lodgings as to the benefits to be derived from the forthcoming Christian Endeavor Convention. One such had been asked for a subscription to defray the expenses of the gathering. He was perfectly willing to subscribe, provided he could receive an assurance that the amount of his donation would be returned to him many times multiplied, in profits from his increased business. To satisfy himself on this mooted point, he requested that the question of his subscription be held in abeyance while he quietly hid him to the office of Horace G. Platt, and sought counsel from his attorney. Horace listened gravely while his client stated his dilemma. Then he sat silent, apparently wrapped in profound thought, while the client watched him admiringly.

"We may learn the lesson of experience," Horace remarked sagely, after an interval. "I am informed that at the Christian Endeavor Convention in Boston last year, the delegates came with one shirt and one five dollar piece,—and, during their stay, changed neither."

Platt refused to make any statement, but that subscription is still withheld.

Down at Burlingame, there is a very popular and lively girl, bright and pretty, her only regret being too much flesh—a decided tendency to corpulence. To hide it she assumes a very English gait. She was calling, the other day, at one of the houses in her set, and, with mannish stride, went the rounds of the drawingroom, shaking hands with all present. When she sat down, little three-year-old Elizabeth, the daughter of the house, who had been gazing open-mouthed at the visitor, said, in shrilly, penetrating tones: "Do some more."

The girl did not understand, and turned to the child, with her most engaging manner.

"What do you want, darling?" she asked, sweetly. "Won't loo please walk dat funny way, again," repeated Elizabeth promptly, and to the horror of her mother, began to swagger about the apartment in exact imitation of the caller.

The kid was promptly hustled out and now the girl with the English gait is trying to devise a new style of locomotion.

The dean of dramatic critics died when George E. Barnes passed away. His embarkation on the sea of theatrical censorship was due entirely to ill-luck, although it afterwards proved no misfortune to his disciples. When he sold his interest in the Call, thirty years ago, to Loring Pickering, for $60,000, Barnes planned to return to his Eastern home, there to invest his money in some safe enterprise which would ensure him a competence. Unfortunately for him, he considered his capital hardly sufficient for his purpose, and before his departure he concluded that he could increase the amount of his "stake" quickly and surely by a few investments in stocks, then the prevailing California craze. He began to dabble on Pine street, and sustained a few losses, which, of course, his pride forced him to retrieve. The upshot of his speculations was the loss of his entire capital and he was obliged to seek employment in the very office where he had so recently been proprietor. His calamity gave birth to a notable journalistic career.

If it were not for his good looks and the unintentional admiration which he evokes from his fair friends, the life of Cornelius Sullivan would be a happy one. When he is not soliciting life insurance, he is generally dabbling in Democratic politics, but he occasionally takes time to dine, and a few nights ago, on the recommendation of a friend, he went to a restaurant where the customers are at the tender mercies of a corps of feminine waiters,—stewardesses, they call themselves.

After he had been served with black coffee, Cornelius peered through his eye glasses at his check, upon which he placed a big, round dollar. The fashionably attired attendant, supposing that such a handsome man could not but be generous, especially to a poor girl and a pretty one, gently placed her hand upon the dollar.

"Is this for me?" she inquired, with a coy smile. "Yes," replied Sullivan,— "to pay the check with," he added, sententiously.

"Oh," rejoined the disappointed waitress, tossing her head. "You can do that yourself."

"Great Scott!" said Cornelius, reddening. "She thought my other name was Vanderbilt!"

HIRAM TUBBS, a pioneer of 1853, and widely known as a man of wealth, high character, and influence in this community, died at his home in East Oakland last Sunday. Mr. Tubbs was a gentleman of great energy and executive ability, and during his long and successful career in San Francisco built up a large manufacturing plant, the Tubbs Cordage Company, besides controlling and directing other interests. He was seventy-four years of age and a native of New Hampshire. He leaves a widow and five children. The funeral services were held at 2 o'clock on Tuesday last, and were largely attended.

THERE was a pretty wedding in San Jose last Monday evening, when, at the Methodist Episcopal Church, the Rev. F. E. Fisher united in marriage Miss Lottie Brosins, of the Garden City, and Robert E. Russ of San Francisco. The lovely bride, who looked charming in a robe of white silk covered with white tulle, was attended by the Misses Lizzie Hilderbrandt and Olga Buneman as bridesmaids; the groom was supported by Robt. A. Lowenstein as best man. Following the ceremony a large reception was held at the home of the bride on South Fourth street, house and grounds being elaborately decorated with flowers and Chinese lanterns, and later a bandsome supper proved a delightful finale to the wedding festivities. Mr. and Mrs. Russ will reside in San Francisco at the groom's handsome new house on Folsom and Twenty-fourth streets.

On Wednesday evening there was another wedding in Oakland, when Mrs. Olive Reed and Seth Cushman were the bride and groom, the marriage taking place at the Reed residence on Filbert street.

There will be a number of weddings next week. On Monday Miss Ada Smith and Arthur F. Bridge, whose engagement was recently announced, will be wedded at the home of the bride's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Alexander Smith. The marriage of Miss Carrie Koshland and Emil Greenbaum will take place on Wednesday morning at the family residence on Pine street.

On Wednesday afternoon Miss Jessie Coleman and Harry Knowles will be married at the home of the bride's mother, in Oakland. It will be a quiet ceremonial to which only relatives and intimate friends are bidden. The bride will be attended by the Misses Dickson and Smith, as bridesmaids, and by Miss Donaldson, of Philadelphia, who will officiate as maid-of-honor. Thomas Knowles is to be his brother's best man. Joe Grant and his bride, who are also to be united the same day in Portland, Oregon, will go direct to Europe for their honeymoon, where they will spend several months in travel before coming to reside in California.

Among last week's weddings was that of Miss Francis Coleman and Arthur Holden, of Boston, which was solemnized at the Coleman residence, on California street, on Wednesday evening. Pink was the prevailing tint, that color being used almost exclusively for decorative purposes, the bridal party standing in a bower of pink blossoms, lit by pink shaded electric lights during the ceremony, which was performed by the Reverend Dr. McKenzie in the presence of a large number of guests. The bride was robed in white satin en traine. She wore a tulle veil and wreath of orange blossoms and carried a bouquet of bride's roses. Miss Sara Coleman, as maid-of-honor, was gowned in pale pink satin trimmed with duchesse lace, and the Misses Alice Boggs and Emma Robbins wore gowns of pink crepe de chine, and all three young ladies carried bouquets of Duchesse of Albany roses. J. C. Coleman, Jr., appeared as the groom's best man. Boston will be the future home of Mr. and Mrs. Holden.

Mr. and Mrs. Denis O'Sullivan, who left us on their return to Europe last Friday, had a good send-off in the way of teas, dinners, etc. The afternoon at the Presidio, where they were the guests of Captain and Mrs. O'Connell, was a most pleasant affair; and the banquet d'adieu in the red room of the Bobemian Club, at which Mr. O'Sullivan figured as chief guest, was a gathering long to be remembered by all who participated.

Benj. J. Schmidt left the city last Thursday for New York, going by way of Los Angeles (where he will spend several days) and Colorado Springs. Mr. Schmidt will be absent some time, returning to San Francisco early in August.

Principal among the events of the month is the celebration got up by our loyal British residents to do honor to the diamond jubilee of Her Gracious Majesty Victoria, not the least enjoyable feature of which will no doubt be the banquet to take place at the Palace Hotel on Monday evening, when General Barnes, Rabbi Voorsanger, and Mayor Pbelan will be among the speech makers of the occasion.

A. B. Forbes has succeeded Joe Grant as President of the Burlingame Club, the change being necessitated by Mr. Grant's anticipated prolonged absence from California. To-day and to-morrow will be the second set of "luncheon days," which have recently become a feature of the club, and lunch will be served on the veranda of the club house, during which orchestral music will be in order.

Mrs. E. J. Pringle, of Oakland, is in the van this year among the campers, her party of about a dozen having gone on a tour of the country from Oakland to Clear Lake, intending to camp en route, and remain at each as long as the fancy pleases them, and it must be acknowledged that it will be both pleasant and instructive. They expect to be away until towards the end of August.

The Tavern of Castle Crags is now open for the season, and, it goes without saying, will be eagerly sought by those who delight in the pure mountain air which is there to be enjoyed in such perfection. Life at the Inn passes as a restful dream, and those who once pay a visit to it are always sure to go again. A large party are booked for the Fourth of July holiday, and a gala time is anticipated.

There have been a number of departures this week for Del Monte. Those who left on Tuesday include Mrs. Low and Miss Flora, Mrs. A. N. Towne, Mr. and Mrs. Clinton Worden, who will pass the entire season there, as well as Mr. and Mrs. W. G. Irwin, who arrived from Honolulu last week. Mrs. Thomas Breeze and family are spending the month of June at Del Monte.

Mr. and Mrs. Frank Sullivan will pass the summer at Phelan Park, in Santa Cruz; Mrs. Henry McLane Martin is at "The Cabin's," as her Santa Cruz cottage is called. Claude Terry Hamilton is occupying his cottage known as "The Hutch," at Sausalito. Porter Ashe, Jere Sullivan, Dr. Livingston, and H. H. McPike are off on a fishing expedition in Lake County. Mrs. Mollie Latbam is among the guests at Highland Springs. Mr. and Mrs. Moody and Miss Mae are at the Geysers. Rudolph Spreckels has gone to Honolulu, and during his absence Mrs. Spreckels will be at San Rafael.

Miss Juliet Williams accompanied her cousin, Miss Ethel Rogers, who has been visiting her at San Rafael for several months, when she left for the East this week, with the intention of remaining as her cousin's guest in Ohio for the rest of the summer. Miss Jennie Flood's present intention is to remain at the Windsor Hotel, in New York, until autumn.

Mrs. Leland Stanford has arrived in London, for which destination Mrs. Irvine and her sons, J. W. and Cal. Byrne, left us on Thursday, anticipating an absence of several months.

The wife of Admiral Beardslee and Mrs. George M. Stoney were among the passengers of the steamer Australia, for Honolulu last Tuesday.

Alaska is attracting many visitors from San Francisco this summer. Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Watson have already departed. Among those thither bound this week were Mr. and Mrs. I. W. Hellman and family, Mrs. Esberg and the Misses Francis, Edith and Rena Jacobi of New York, who went in a party, leaving here last Thursday via Oregon. Mrs. M. Eisner, the Misses Reinstein, Alice Wolf and Florence Crowley form another party leaving to-day. Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Jewett, Mrs. Louis Parrott, Mrs. Ehrman, Mr. and Miss Florence Brown, and Mr. Heller leave next week. Mrs. A. P. Whittell and daughter and Mr. and Mrs. C. F. Kohl are among those who will sail in July; and Mr. and Mrs. H. H. Sherwood have chosen August for their trip.

Mrs. Philip Peck and the Misses Peck sailed on Tuesday for the Hawaiian Islands, where they will spend the summer months at the Peck plantation.

B. Herrman and his daughters, Misses Dorothy and Daisy, have gone to Oregon, where they will spend several weeks at the seaside resorts of that State.

Mrs. Cora Ives, Mrs. Samuel Fitzgerald, and Herman Oelrichs, of New York, are at the Hotel Paso Robles, and will spend the next two months at that sanitarium.

Raphael Weil, who has been in Paris for the past year, will not return until some time next month.

ATTORNEY HENRY ACH.

Henry Ach.

ONE of the most active and progressive attorneys at the San Francisco bar is Henry Ach, of the firm of Rothchild & Ach, and just at this time especially prominent because of his participation in the effort to solve the mystery surrounding the death of Isaac Hoffman. Mr. Ach is a man of strong conviction and great energy. Once enlisted in a case, he never rests content until he has solved it and uncovered the bottom facts. This admirable trait of character, so necessary to the equipment of the lawyer, is brought into very prominent light in the case alluded to above. Mr. Ach is a young man, and enjoys a successful legal career not usually the reward of longer professional effort.

BEAUTIFUL Blythedale is one of the most attractive places in easy daily reach of the city. Commodious cottages, a hotel where every convenience is at the command of visitors, a proprietress whose constant efforts and long experience are exerted for the pleasure of her guests; a table par excellence, delightful view, on the direct route of the Mt. Tamalpais scenic railway—in short, the location, service, and communication all tend to make Blythedale an ideal summer resort.

J. F. BONNET, for a long time connected with the Daily Report, was on last Monday selected by the Board of Supervisors License Collector, to supercede Frederick Lees. The choice of the Board was a good one. Mr. Bonnet is a capable gentleman, and will make a faithful and efficient Collector. His appointment is a just recognition of merit.

Foremost among the restaurants of the country stands the Maison Riche, at the corner of Grant avenue and Geary street, which has entertained many notable Americans and foreign visitors. From 5 to 9 o'clock in the evening, an elegant dinner is served. The finest wines, sweet music, and most refined service to be had in the city.

The many friends of President Albert Miller of the San Francisco Savings Union are congratulating him upon escape from what might easily have been a fatal accident. Last Thursday morning, accompanied by Mrs. Miller, he drove from his residence in Oakland to the train, when the team became frightened and ran away, the coachman being unable to stop them. The carriage was overturned, and Mr. and Mrs. Miller thrown to the ground. Mrs. Miller was uninjured, but her husband was somewhat bruised and cut about the face.

THE WHEEL OF FORTUNE.

No. I.

A QUARTER of a century ago, to engage the tiger in his lair, and play blue chips all through a deal was not considered a reprehensible pastime. Everybody gambled. The merchant, the judge, the lawyer, the soldier, the granger, all enjoyed the excitement of a night in the halls of the Egyptian King. The professional sports were on terms of social equality with the highest in the land. True, they did not invite the Knights of the Green Table to their houses, but they drank and dined with them elsewhere, and were entertained by them at banquets of royal profusion. For the sports of old were a lavish and princely class, and always had money to throw to the birds. Easily come, easily go was their motto. If fortune was kind on Monday, she might change her mind by Tuesday, so it was well to let the cash fly while they had it. They dressed fashionably and expensively. Indeed, well-dressed as a gambler was among the epigrams of the times.

One of the very swell faro banks of the city was situated on Montgomery street in a building opposite the Occidental Hotel, and over Garcia's saloon. John Scott, a veteran sport, was its keeper, and his favorite dealer was Charley Burroughs, a man who had graduated from Yale with honors, and who never lost his taste for English literature. Scott had the reputation of running an absolutely square game. When Burroughs was at the box all knew that Charley was incapable of taking the slightest advantage of a player, and would rather yield than insist. There was almost no limit to the betting, and any man of standing could have his check cashed by Scott. Around the table one met the best-known characters of San Francisco, chatting merrily, and playing as much for the excitement of the sport as for the gain. It was not considered the correct thing to show any annoyance at losing, and most stoically those old Spartans watched their blue and red chips vanish into the dealer's draw.

In a room adjoining the play-room an all-night supper was served, free to all comers. There were hot and cold dishes, fine wines, the best of brandies and whiskies, and respectful and attentive waiters. The cooking was unexceptionable. So as long as the game was running, drinks and cigars free were served to the guests. Burroughs, while dealing, could maintain a conversation with those near him, and never made a mistake in the paying or receipt of a debt. He had that dual quality of observation which is so valuable to a man of his occupation. Poor Charley fell down stairs in a lodging house on Bush street in the early "eighties," and broke his neck. He was a prince among gamblers.

Large sums changed hands in Scott's house. John Saunders, a wealthy lawyer who resided in San Rafael, played under the most varying luck at Scott's one night. Saunders strolled in after a big dinner at the old Poodle Dog, with but twenty-five dollars in his pocket. He reached the table just as Burroughs had placed the cards in the box for a new deal, and planked all his capital on the ace. It won. Saunders let the bet, now fifty, remain, and the ace won. Still the plucky player refrained from "pinching his bet," and the ace won again. "I'll bet any man fifty it wins clear out," said Saunders. He backed his judgment, and it did, giving him four hundred dollars on the original investment of twenty-five. With this stake Saunders took in $3,000, then it melted to $600, and he finally left after a dashing play during the last deal $1,400 ahead of the game, all raked in from his twenty-five dollar grub stake.

But this was only the luck of the minority. A quartermaster from the Presidio, who was an inveterate gambler, visited Scott's one night with $800 of the regimental funds in his pocket. He doubled them in an hour or so, and then sat down to supper. Disregarding that superstition almost universal with gamblers, that those who make a break on a winning, and then play again, must invariably lose, the soldier lit a cigar, and thought he'd venture a twenty just as a flyer. He did, and lost it, and in the attempt to recoup, every dollar of his winnings and the original capital followed it. He was in a bad way, but was saved from disgrace by one of the men who had played at the table with him.

It was after a big game at Scott's that Harry Logan and Gus Guerrero met in Garcia's saloon, and some hot words passed. Finally Guerrero drew his pistol and shot Logan in the side, inflicting a wound which was at first considered fatal. But Logan, a big, bealthy stock broker, recovered, and Guerrero paid some thousands of dollars to avoid prosecution. This became the nucleus of Logan's fortune in New York, where he moved shortly afterward.

Vol. LIV.

SAN FRANCISCO, JUNE 26, 1897.

Number 26.

Printed and Published every Saturday by the proprietor, FRED MARRIOTT
 54 Kearny street, San Francisco. Entered at San Francisco Postoffice as Second-class Matter.

The office of the NEWS LETTER in New York City is at Temple Court;
 and at Chicago, 303 Boyce Building, (Frank E. Morrison, Eastern Representative), where information may be obtained regarding subscription and advertising rates.

I. W. Lees is almost as good a Chief of Police as he is an attorney.

JUDGE Campbell this week turned loose some sixty Chinameu who had been caught by the police in the very act of gambling. The Judge usually rules against the evidence of a case; but this is a little surprising, from the fact that the Chinese have no votes.

DURING the absence of James D. Phelan, Supervisor Rottanzi is acting Mayor. The Doctor's name is in-separably connected with the municipal legislation of the present year. It was owing to his persistent efforts that the high headgear worn by ladies is prohibited at the theatres, and men enabled to view the amusements their money pays for; besides escape from a desire to commit justifiable homicide.

CONGRESSMAN Bailey, of Texas, has publicly declared that he is for Bryan for President at the next general election. The dispatch conveying this announcement adds that it created something of a sensation.
 This is the only element of surprise. It is as well settled now that Bryan will be a candidate in 1900 as that he was defeated in 1896, or that he is totally unfitted for the office.

IN order to placate a patron of his bank, S. G. Murphy discharged a faithful and competent paying teller, because his testimony as a truthful man was distasteful that patron. Accepting this reasoning as correct—and it is certainly justifiable in view of the facts—Murphy would have promoted his employee if he had sworn to a falsehood. This is a peculiar sort of moral code for a bank president, and Murphy is the only man in the banking business in San Francisco who occupies such an uncomplimentary position.

SUBSCRIPTIONS for the entertainment of the Christian Endeavorers who will be here next month are being promptly met. These people, who are to visit San Francisco from the East, are representative young men and women, and no doubt many of them will remain here, or return later. They are vigorous, active, intelligent, and are very different from the contingent which annually visits the southern part of the State in search of lungs and other necessities of existence, and who unfortunately increase the cemetery, rather than the school, census.

THE Merchants' Association has addressed a communication to the Supervisors requesting continued sweeping on the principal streets, notwithstanding the shortage in the street department funds. The Christian Endeavorers are coming many thousands strong, and it would be very had policy to let them see our streets as dirty as they would soon become if the sweeping were neglected. It is to be hoped that some effort will be made to sprinkle much more liberally during the sojourn of the Endeavorers. It would be a most excellent idea to sprinkle Market street on Sundays during their stay, otherwise the visitors who risk an afternoon promenade on that street will have neither time nor mind for Sabbath evening de-votious.

MAYOR Phelan has vetoed the ordinance prohibiting the laying of asphaltum roofs within the fire limits.
 The Mayor justified his veto on the sound ground that the ordinance would injure and displace a local industry and product, without compensation. If the insurance companies are prepared to accept asphaltum roofings, the Supervisors should be content. There are a number of leaks in the municipal roof that require plugging, and the Supervisor who applies a material warranted to stop them need have no fear of Mayor Phelan's veto.

THE movement by Mayor Phelan to put all the overhead wires of the city underground has met an encouraging response from the Southern Pacific Company, which has written a letter to the Supervisors signifying its williness to put its electric lines in a properly constructed conduit within the next six months. This is a good beginning. Now let us hear from the telegraph, telephone, and other corporations whose poles disfigure the streets and whose wires are a menace to life.

W. W. Montague has been appointed postmaster at San Francisco. He is a capable man and a successful merchant, and for this reason will give the office a business rather than a political administration. Mr. Montague is a Republican. It is understood that he will select Benjamin F. McKinley, uncle of William McKinley, as his deputy. He has had some experience in the department, and is now in charge of Station F. The fact that Uncle Ben is a close relative of the President does not necessarily imply that he will not make an excellent deputy to Mr.
 Montague, although that fact may have something to do with his appointment.

THE Balboa Boulevard fund has been expended, and the gentlemen who had charge of it have made their final report. They are entitled to the sincere thanks of all good citizens, for their efforts have resulted in food and shelter to many of the deserving, and in the completion of a considerable public improvement. Nearly every one is willing to contribute to movements of this character: the difficulty always is to find business men who will give their time to the work. In the present instance every member of the committee did well his duty; but Daniel Meyer, Lipman Sachs, L. R. Ellert, and William Bunker, proprietor of the Report, are entitled to and freely accorded especial credit. Mr. Bunker really was the father of the boulevard plan for helping the poor, and the NEWS LETTER thinks Bunker Boulevard would have been a more euphonious name for that handsome roadway than the one selected.

IT is more than likely that young Figel owes his present unfortunate predicament to his passion for the race track; and it is admitted that Isaac Norton lies in the grave, a suicide, because he "played the races." There are two prominent instances of the curse of race track gambling. How many deaths, how much crime, disgrace, and misery have been caused by this desperate game of chance cannot ever be approximated. It is amazing that men on moderate salaries, occupying positions of great responsibility, handling thousands of other people's money, are permitted to regularly visit the race tracks, and be seen in the betting ring day after day unchallenged. For the losses and disgrace which frequently follow, employer is almost as much to blame as the weak employee. As long as such freedom is permitted, the story of defalcations, embezzlements, and suicides will be told—bringing shame and sorrow to the innocent and retribution to the guilty.

WHO OBJECTS TO A GREATER SAN FRANCISCO?

SAN FRANCISCO at present is reckoned eighth or ninth in the rank of large American cities. Let it unite with the suburban population that naturally belongs to it, and it would at once jump up to the position of about sixth. In a few years it would be surpassed only by Chicago, Philadelphia, and New York. Who objects to this advancement? Nobody, we think, who has given a little study to the advantages, rather than to the difficulties, of bringing about such an arrangement. The difficulties would be insignificant compared with those which have successfully been overcome in the cases of Chicago and New York. Whilst San Francisco would be benefited, the municipalities around her would be advantaged in a still larger degree. The weaker would draw strength from the stronger, as is invariably the case. There would be more civic pride, more friendly rivalry, and in such a union there would be more power to effect any great project of common interest, and there will be many such in the near future. Oakland, Alameda, and Berkeley have to be brought into closer touch with San Francisco than they are. A tunnel under the bay, from the ferry depot to the Oakland water front, is a certainty of the not distant future. Its accomplishment would be quicker and surer if the two sides of the bay were one great city. Then the Market-street cars will have to be run under ground ere long. It is not possible that that great boulevard can carry for many years more the traffic that is coming to it. No great street in the world is constructed like it. As all the streets to the north and south run into it at an acute angle, and as the ferries are located at one end of it, its traffic is already more than it comfortably carries. It is now almost more than an aged person's life is worth to attempt to cross it during the busy hours of the day, and its dangers would be insupportable were it not for the excellent service of the police at the more crowded crossing places. An under-ground system of cars, with electricity for lighting and as the motive power, could be so easily constructed and so cheaply operated that the marvel is that it is not already in existence. It is bound to come sooner or later. There is no use in trying to dam up Niagara or to try to empty the ocean with a clam shell. The march of progress will not be stayed by any little difficulties that at present stand in the way of putting San Francisco on "the right side of the bay." It will be remembered that when the Goat Island terminus question excited all attention, the late Senator Stanford declared that San Francisco was on "the wrong side of the bay," and although his words were not very cheerfully received at the time, he was undoubtedly right. Had the founders of this city imagined that there would so soon be a railroad eastward to the Atlantic, they never would have looked to this side of the bay for a great metropolis. But with a not very large sum of money, it is now about as easy to put San Francisco in direct railroad connection with the rest of the country as it is to wink one's eyes. The change will come because it will be necessary, profitable, and, therefore, inevitable. With that accomplished, the two sides of the bay will become materially one, and to hasten its accomplishment they cannot too soon become united in the bonds of municipal union.

Then again, the Alameda side of the bay would bring to our aid in governing this city wisely and well a large and most desirable class of voters. Five times have we tried to pass a fair and clean charter, but have failed every time, because the powers that make for corruption in public office were able to poll more votes than honest citizens, anxious only for good and clean Government. It is a lamentable confession to have to make, but every man amongst us knows it to be true. We are about to try a sixth time, with sure and certain failure staring us in the face. No charter that ought to be passed will, as matters political stand, be ratified by a majority of the men entitled to votes. To attempt it is a mere waste of time and money. With a Greater San Francisco established, the taxing owners of homes would be largely in the majority, and a better, stronger, and more vice-suppressing charter than has ever yet been proposed for this city could easily be enacted into a law. A respectable majority of from three to four thousand from the other side of the bay, which could pretty certainly be depended upon, would end Buckleyism, Raineyism, and Kellyism, and with them the voting power of the Rockrollers of Tar Flat and of the Tigers of Telegraph Hill. People of saving proclivities, with the responsibility of families, and a desire for decent environment, betake themselves to the suburbs, if they can. It is a distinct loss to the city to have such people move away. As we cannot keep them within our present boundaries, we cannot do better than to enlarge the city until it embraces as safe voting power for municipal purposes as there is in the State. We believe the sixth attempt to procure a charter will be as abortive as its five predecessors. The attempt, in our judgment, will be full of worry, annoyance, expense, and ultimate failure. The men are foolish or over-sanguine who imagine that they can succeed where others have failed. It is hardly conceivable that a better charter can be framed than the last defeated one, and there is not an atom of evidence that the voting power has changed for the better since then. The uniform verdict of San Francisco, as it at present exists, is against an honest charter. The tax-eaters, with their friends and allies, outvote the taxpayers, and that being so, the way to secure relief is to join forces with enough other taxpayers to bring the tax-eaters under subjection. The union of cities with their suburbs is the trend of the age. It is found to work well wherever tried. There are very special reasons why it should be applicable to the peculiar case of San Francisco.

The Folly of Annexation. There is not one really good word to be said for annexation—not one! Wherever it is advocated there is an underlying motive that takes no account of the public good. It means the sure and certain death of the beet sugar industry of California, and that will be a disaster to our State. As the Springfield Republican well says: "The sugar is grown upon the Islands by about the cheapest and most degraded coolie and contract labor known in the world. * * * The inadequacy of a protective policy that uncovers our own product, whilst levying high taxes on that of Cuba and other places is absurd." Hardly before the ink is dry upon the closing pages of his volume of memoirs, where John Sherman put forth his solemn conviction of the un wisdom of a policy of territorial expansion beyond the present borders, temporary political expediency has driven him to append his signature to a treaty of annexation of a country 2,100 miles away, and of a people, save a few, as remote in civilized attainment and kindred character as the Terra del Fuegians. Yet Hawaii is to be admitted as a territory, and all its inhabitants, save the Chinese, are admitted to citizenship at once. The natives number 31,000, the Japanese 24,000, the Chinese 22,000, the Portuguese 15,000, leaving a remainder of only 8,000 of American, English and German origin. We say without much fear of successful contradiction that such an incongruous people are incapable of self-government on American principles. A very large majority are against such a system being forced upon them. If a popular vote were taken on the Islands it would be found that a four-fifths vote would be found opposed to annexation. Nothing but turmoil and trouble can arise from the attempt. Contrary to the advice of the early fathers, in violation of the Monroe doctrine, and destruction of our most promising industry, annexation has nothing to commend it to anybody save a handful of Hawaiian planters. It is true that it is claimed that we would lose a trade of about four millions a year. A more unfounded assertion was never made. That trade is ours because of our nearness to the Islands, and because we alone have most of the articles the Hawaiians buy. Nothing can reverse these conditions, and therefore nothing can change the course of that trade away from us. Moreover, if that trade is to be kept only under existing conditions, it is not worth having. We pay just about the total value of that trade in rebated sugar duties, and now propose a total sacrifice of our beet growing and sugar manufacturing industries. Then, again, it is said that Japan had a covetous eye on Hawaii; to which Premier Ito at once made reply that Japan would not take the Islands if tendered them as a gift. The truth is that no country wants Hawaii at any price, and most countries of Europe are glad to see us depart from our safe policy of splendid isolation. Whilst we, in both eanes and beets, have a pretty considerable home product, to the existence of which protection is absolutely essential, it is a violation of party pledges, and of the well settled policy of the country, to let in duty free the product of the cheapest and most degraded labor system, and that argument alone ought in right and justice to determine the whole question. According to the treaty, vessels having Hawaiian registry, are at once to be entitled to American registry. What this will amount to will be surprising. By the time the treaty can be ratified, most of the foreign bottoms of the Pacific will be found to have gained American registry. It is a tricky, unwise, and even a deplorable measure all through.

Our esteemed contemporary, the Evening Bulletin, does injustice to its own good name, and seems to have "gone and got ruined" on this subject. It falsifies when it says that the record shows that the Japanese want the Islands. The Japanese emigrated to Hawaii because of a treaty giving them rights equal to those of the most favored nation, including that of naturalization. What Japan now protests against is a treaty that would at once sweep away all rights already acquired. We would, were we in her place, insist upon the maintenance of those rights, and the indications are that she will do that at all hazards. Otherwise, her Prime Minister says, she "would not take the Islands as a free gift." With that declaration she clearly has the best of the argument. Moreover, Japan is in the family of nations to stay, and may not be ruled out and her treaties set at naught, without a grave reflection resting upon the civilization of the country that would engage in the enterprisc. The latest dispatches show with what cheerful alacrity Great Britain assents to annexation, provided that the rights of her citizens are guaranteed. We shall concede those rights cheerfully. What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gauder. What we concede to Great Britain, we must necessarily yield to Japan, and then to China, and upon those terms Hawaii would not be worth having.

Newspaper Charity Funds. A most remarkable accusation has been made against the New York Herald by the New York Sun; and it is nothing less than a direct charge that the Herald, after having collected more than fifteen thousand dollars for the purchase of ice to be distributed free among the poor of New York, spent less than three thousand dollars for that purpose—leaving a balance of more than twelve thousand dollars unaccounted for. It is to be noted that the Herald, instead of making prompt denial, backed up by itemized statement of its free ice fund, failed to make response at all, even after having been very pointedly requested to do so by several of the New York papers besides the Sun.

The charge of the Sun opens up a particularly pertinent question, which is well worth the attention of the whole public. The Herald, as a paper, may be called ultra-respectable in its general character, as contra-distinguished from the distempered yellow journalism of New York and San Francisco. Its proprietor, James Gordon Bennett, is a very wealthy man, liberal, high-minded, generous; and it may be assumed if the Herald, charged with acts compared with which everyday theft becomes virtue and ordinary crime a recommendation of good character, refuses to clear its skirts by undisputable proofs of innocence—or any proofs at all—that it is time for people generally to look strictly to the ultimate end of their subscription for charitable purposes, of which "enterprising" daily papers are the frequent and self-appointed custodians. If the old-fashioned and staid Herald endures a charge of this character in silence, contributors who generously respond to every appeal of the new journalism—and they are not infrequent—have a right to look with interest for the balance sheets of these eager purveyors of public charity, filtered through irresponsible or unknown hands.

The trouble with this sort of collections is that the public do not know who takes the money contributed by a generous people; it is an easy thing for a daily newspaper to gather large sums on behalf of any really laudable purpose. It would be quite as easy, and usually a perfectly safe matter, for a paper engineering a scheme, and hoisted by a big original subscription, to recoup itself for its supposed gift, beside absorbing a large part of the hard coin taken from the pockets of credulous contributors. The starting of these charitable collections by heavy donations may very well give the public an appetite for information as to who the custodians of their thousands of dollars are! Are they men who are entitled to large confidence? Are they noted for integrity and personal honor? Are they known at all? A great newspaper like the Herald has many employees. The people know the paper—not the men who work for it. In the case of the Herald it appears that receipt of the funds was acknowledged from day to day, but the itemized statement of expenditures was not published—else such a scandal would have been impossible.

Charity is the sweetest and most precious word known to the human heart, and its practical expression should never be checked nor embarrassed; but this amazing predicament of the Herald may well cause the unsuspecting public to hesitate and make inquiry before they give their thousands to men utterly unknown to them, or who, if known, might not be trusted with enough to black their boots.

Debs, the Anarchist. Eugene V. Debs let the cat out of the bag at Chicago the other day when he declared that the "present American system of government would be overthrown by peaceable means if possible, but by force of arms if necessary," and that himself and his blind followers were prepared to resist United States troops whenever the occasion presented itself and the moment was opportune. In making this announcement, this revolutionist served timely notice upon the Federal authorities, upon vested accumulations, and people who respect the rights of others, and who love peace and stability rather than anarchy and insecurity of life and property.

Debs is at present making an effort to bring an army of idle men from the great centers of population in the Middle-West to some State nearer the Pacific Ocean, where they may colonize a large area of land, build cities and homes, and as he has declared, secure control of the machinery of State government, and practically demonstrate the Socialistic theories of which he is the chief promoter and exponent in this country. Until his outburst in Chicago, it was generally supposed that Debs was opposed to the use of force in relieving the distress of the laboring element and permanently elevating the poorer classes. His Chicago harangue has shown him up in his true colors, and places him in the direct ranks of the anarchists, and an enemy of all that society cherishes. He proposes to aid the laboring man by assailing and striking down the laws under which property is acquired and its security guaranteed; to substitute chaos for order and revolution for peace. His open declarations, into which he was betrayed in the frenzy of the moment, is now denied by him, but its truth is indisputable. Its disastrous effect upon the colonization scheme will be immediately apparent. No State will welcome Debs and his army of tramps when it is known that their determination is the ultimate control of State governments and their announced purpose to reach their ends even should it involve an appeal to arms. The Western States are in need of money to develop their resources, and in order to obtain it they must offer first of all reasonable, conservative and safe laws. The Governor of Washington sent to Debs a pressing invitation to lead his anarchists to that State, where they would be welcomed; but it is doubtful if he would have done so had the real character and intent of this enemy of society been known. The introduction of the colonists would be the signal for the desertion of that State by every trust company, every foreign banking institution, every insurance company—in fact, every dollar that could be moved would disappear.

Unfortunately for Mr. Debs and fortunately for the State to which he turns, the distance between his headquarters in Chicago and the great West is far; to walk is impossible, and the payment of railroad fares not to be thought of. His appeal to Secretary Alger for transportation, after his declaration of intent to defy the laws and overthrow the government, is a joke which he may appreciate hereafter. Under ordinary conditions Debs would be simply amusing; in the present social and financial conditions of the country this anarchist and his lieutenants may require the attention of the government which they despise.

Foreign Facts And Telegraphic Fiction. The more experience we gain the more satisfied we are that little or no reliance is to be placed in the despatches from abroad, which are undoubtedly, in great part, cooked up to suit what are believed to be the American sympathies of the hour. Some years ago the writer had occasion to visit London and there met the principal agent of the Associated press. The statements he telegraphed to this side of the water were, as a rule, either highly colored or grossly false. When taken to task for such work, his answer was that if he did not devote himself to catering to American prejudices he would not retain his official head for a single week. As close observers we are bound to say that the evil has gone on increasing from that day to this. We are convinced, for instance, that scarcely a word of truth has ever yet been telegraphed to this country about either Spain or Cuha. Without knowing how the facts certainly are, we venture the helief that Spain's darkest days are over. Gomez has disbanded his forces, and the Philippines are again subdued. The "Cuhan patriots" has all along been only a synonym for a band of cutthroats and handitti in the pay of a New York syndicate. There never at any time has been anything but mere guerilla warfare, and the only interference needed from our Government ought to have begun at home. In the cases of both Hawaii and Cuba, their troubles were originated in the United States, and are yet being kept alive by selfish interests, for the purpose of plunder. We think that Spain sees daylight ahead. Seeing what this country and continent owe to her early enterprises, she has certainly been very badly treated. The case of Hawaii is still worse. We found her happy and prosperous under a wise king and a mild form of government. We sent her missionaries, bibles and rum, stole her lands, degraded her people, filled them with diseases that they knew not how to control, stole their government, and left them as foreigners in their own land, to which they had so hospitably and generously welcomed the missionary authors of all their woes. When the record is a little further repeated, and annexation an accomplished fact, a page in the history of this country's connection with Hawaii will be reached that will bring a blush to the faces of generations of Americans yet unborn.

The English Empire And Its Queen. The past has been a wonderful week in London. There was probably never on earth such a show. It far exceeded the triumphal entries of returned warriors into ancient Rome. It concentrated for one purpose, and with one mind, all civilized nations of the globe. A part of that never-to-be forgotten pageantry was there in the highest spirit of chivalry to do honor to the good old Royal Lady who has for sixty years presided successfully over the mightiest Empire of these days, and a still larger part was there, not only out of loving regard for their Queen, but to demonstrate by their personality, and by all that it represents the mightiness of that Empire upon which the sun never sets, and throughout which there is unity and strength of Government, and peace, progress, and prosperity healthily proceeding on the highest plane of civilized advancement. England may have jealous rivals. In these days of commercial competition, rivalries are of the nature of the business. But Great Britain, notwithstanding, is respected the wide world over. Her flag floats over every sea, and it yet remains true that Britannia rules the waves. Her commerce is carried everywhere and is invariably attended by fair dealing, justice and right. Wherever an enterprise is to be developed, there her money goes in larger volume, and at cheaper rates, than it can generally be obtained elsewhere. The world has borrowed ten billions of dollars from her, which is at least two billions more than all the gold and silver there is in existence to repay it with, and it is remarkable that she still continues to lend more liberally than other nations. By this process she has become deeply interested in the progress and prosperity of well nigh all the world, and becomes a force for peace everywhere. She is concerned in the welfare of every country in which she has invested her money, and that is in pretty nearly all countries. By far her largest loans have been placed in the United States, and, as a consequence, she cannot make any serious attack upon us, or permit anybody else to do so if she can help it. We are her largest creditor. There is much of her money in our railroads, telegraphs, municipal debts, breweries, maufactories, irrigation works, and, in short, there is hardly "a good thing" in all our broad domain that she has not, so to speak, got her fingers in. Thus it comes that even we free and independent Americans are workers, and profit earners for our cousins across the ocean. It is really a marvellous condition, when one comes to think of it seriously. We sometimes predict the ultimate decadence of Great Britain, but how can that take place when all nations, kindreds, and tongues are working for her and making her richer and stronger every day? She takes very remarkable care of her citizens abroad, and of her foreign loans. Therein lies much wisdom. The British would not have been the explorers and pioneers that they are, had not the fact been well understood that they could rely upon the support of the strong government at the back of them. There is not a foreign nation to-day that thinks of defaulting to British creditors, because they know, from the Egyptian and other examples, what would follow. The larger Nations cannot afford to default because they still need to borrow. England is not likely to lose much by reason of had debts; her investments have been too shrewdly made for that. Her navy, which is constantly being enlarged and strengthened, is believed to be equal to any conceivable emergency, and her army is stronger than is generally suspected. In India alone she has over a million of as good soldiers as the world knows. This is an emigrating age, and now that the United States are pretty well filled up, England owns the hulk of the available new countries. She is rapidly spreading herself over the Earth's surface. These are surprising material advantages. Beyond these she is well to the front in matters of higher civilization, her government is deeply rooted in the hearts of her people, and honesty is the rule of the land. To the good woman, who, as Queen, has acted well her part for sixty years, the world in general, and Great Britain in particular, owe much, and they have just demonstrated their appreciation of the fact.

The Right Of Petition. It is always your mob organ that wants to trample on individual liberty. The right of petition has for nearly six centuries and a half been deemed one of the most cherished guarantees to be found in Magna Charta. No Monarch has dared to set it at naught, and no free state has been successfully established without adopting it. But now comes the most pronounced representative of "the new journalism" of the period, as well as of the unwashed mob that hacks it, and practically declares that the right of the individual citizen to petition is now and henceforth to cease and determine, and to be exercised only in such cases as it may please the Examiner to grant an indulgence for that purpose. The other day a large number of citizens signed a petition against annexation, and ever since this mob's organ has been "roasting" those citizens for exercising their right. Their motives have been assailed, their characters attacked, their business harassed, their private affairs brought to public view, and dire threats of more and worse treatment, if their signatures be not withdrawn. It is painful to observe the number of men who are succumbing to this threat. They are unworthy of their manhood and should be ashamed of themselves. Fortunately a large majority stand by their convictions, and only hold in contempt the threats of a journal without a particle of influence with decent people. It happens that two can play at the Examiner's game. The opponents of annexation have no reason to shrink from such a contest. Than a majority of the Hawaiian planters, no worse men ever cut a throat, or scuttled a ship, and the creatures they have hired to villify better men than themselves, are doing the work for which they have been trained, and that seems altogether to their tastes. Turn about is said to be fair play, and as the treaty will not be ratified this year, if at all, there will remain plenty of time in which to give the men in whose service the Examiner acts, a little of their own sauce.

THE WHEEL OF FORTUNE.

No. 11.

ONE of the most, indeed it may be said the most, striking figure among the old-time gamblers, was "Bill" Briggs, who kept a gambling house on Bush street, adjoining the Cosmopolitan Hotel, since displaced to make room for Crocker's building. Briggs was a Cherokee, and a man of truly magnificent physique. He was about six foot three in height and exquisitely proportioned. His complexion was of no deeper color than bronze, his eyes large and lustrous, and his entire personnel dignified and commanding. Briggs' game was well patronized by the sporty element of the town, though his entertainments after dark were not as lavish as those set forth by John Scott. He was, like most of his class, a man of generous impulse, and many kindly acts are credited to him. On one occasion a young man engaged in an English bank in a responsible capacity entered Briggs' room, very much intoxicated. He played, and in the beginning won, but like the majority his luck deserted him, and at two o'clock in the morning he had dropped nearly two thousand dollars. Briggs, who had watched his play narrowly, noticed that the cheeks the dealer honored were in different names, and were endorsed by the young banker before he cashed them in the bank's name. The steady run of disaster completely sobered the unfortunate gambler. As he was leaving, with a look of despair upon his face, Briggs stopped him.

"Didn't you marry Miss —," he asked, naming an old Californian.

"I did, eighteen months ago," was the reply.

"He was an old friend of mine," said the gambler, "and did me many a good turn in early days, and I won't see his daughter suffer. Now, young man, you know you have got yourself into a bad scrape and that you dare not show up at the bank to-day without those checks. Wait a few minutes for me." He went to the money drawer, made a package of all the checks the youth had lost, and handed it back to him.

"Mr. Briggs, you have saved my life," cried the clerk, "what can I do to show you my gratitude?"

"Nothing," replied the gambler; "hold on, though; there is one thing. Promise me, for your wife's sake, that you will never enter a gambling house again." He did, and, what is more, kept it, and is now the manager of a large bank in the northern country.

Another of the dashing type of Californian gamblers was Bill Barnes. Colonel Barnes, for such was his title by common consent, was a dark, handsome man, of lithe, sinewy form, of intellectual tastes, and was a most perfect horseman. He could ride and subdue the wildest bronco that ever came from the "round up," and in early days, in Sacramento, used to wear a portion of the costume usual to the Spanish caballero. During the sessions of the Legislature, Colonel Barnes used to give the most lavish banquets at Bill Hunt's, Hotel de France, or at Guinean's Arcade. Hunt was himself an oddity. He was a big, heavy-boned fellow, bearded like a miner, and a decidedly tough appearing character. Yet he was a graduate of Yale, and a man of the most perfect manner, when he choose, and of refined tastes. When he and Barnes put their heads together to compose a menu, the whole State had to yield tribute—Canadian geese, woodcock and grouse from the East, and Northwestern country patty furnished forth their table. Their wines were the best and rarest that the cellars of San Francisco could yield. White Hermitage, Chateau La Fitte, Mouton Rothschild, all the finest brands were theirs. And the guests were composed of the leaders at the Bar, and the most prominent merchants, and men of all the professions. Barnes and Hunt have long since gone across the river. It is related of Barnes that one night, when dining with a friend of his, he heard his wife laughingly complain that they were too poor to afford a piano. "Madam," said the gambler, "I have here three hundred dollars, and I am one of the most superstitious men alive. Now, if you will, while you keep your mind on that piano, press those bills against your heart, I think we shall have no trouble about making the rifle." The lady did so, and Barnes, remarking, "I will be back directly for another cup of coffee," took his hat and went directly to Pat Robson's gambling house on Post street. It was the middle of the deal, and the ace had won twice. Barnes placed the entire amount, $300, on that card, and it came up third time winner. He "pinched" it just half, letting $300 still remain on the ace, which turned up for the fourth time, winning straight through the deal. Returning to the house of his entertainer, he presented the lady with six hundred dollars, telling how he believed that fortune had favored him through her influence. And that same night, long after the family had gone to sleep, Barnes again turned up at the gambling houses and cleared $5000 on his own account.

"We obey no wand but pleasure's."—Tom Moore.

THE air of prosperity is jingling in the box-office, the managerial waistcoat is bland and unwrinkled, the manager dines punctually at every day. The repertories are stocked with novelties, but no novelty is to be seen on any local stage. The reliables of the past, immediate and remote, have been exhumed. Good old Shenandoah is booming at the Columbia, valuable Zenda is boarding at the Baldwin, foolish Wang is fooling at the Tivoli.

And Wang is the best show in the town.

I know that only one manager out of a possible three will agree with me; but it would be the same on any other choice; and this one has the advantage of being excellent and true. It is not a question of the comparative values of war melodrama, costume melodrama and comic operetta—Shenandoah, The Prisoner of Zenda, Wang, is each an established institution, which has been discussed here when the institution and myself were of tenderer years. At present Wang glitters as a performance, a production. It goes as smooth as a summer drink. The costumes are new and smashing, the scenery is rich, the color scheme is not indigestible; the elephant is a copious work of art; the chorus is composed of live, willing members, who act as well as sing; the orchestra is delightfully subordinate to the singers, firm and official in the choruses; the average work of the cast is as lofty as that of any road show at three times the admission; and Edwin Stevens is the star. Mr. Stevens, I regret to say, is no relation of mine, but he is a comedian of the first quality. He makes you laugh without and within; he is an actor of not one personality, but twenty; and what is more pertinent to this occasion, he is an artist where artists are rarest found, and that is in comic opera. Unlike most of his bounding brethren along this line, Mr. Stevens's ideas of comicality are not centered in that anatomical feature unmentionable in polite criticism. His hits are achieved at the other end.

For many years—it must date back to the time when Edwin Stevens left San Francisco and went out into the wide, wide world to expand his reputation, the Tivoli stage has nursed the superstition that the Tivoli audience could be moved to mirth only by the most superhuman efforts on the part of the comedian. Hence Tivoli comedians have been somewhat in excess of humanity as it is found at large. Ferris Hartman was a faithful believer in this superstition; he employed in his work nothing less than the strength of ten ordinary men; he had the constitution of a lion, the temperament of dynamite, and the persuasiveness of a battering ram. In good time he became a cult; nature evolved men and women to a mould where Hartman, and only Hartman, could strike laughter to their souls. These were the Hartmanites. They cared little for the softer comic operas, because in such as these Hartman often had a legitimate character part to play, and frequently played it with something of legitimate character skill. It was the burlesques, extravaganzas, spectacles, and operatic farces, in which Hartman was several thirds of the performance, that drew them by the thousands strong.

I was interested Monday night to see the Hartmanite all over the place, and I wondered what the outcome would be. I had good reason to believe that Ed Stevens, who had been a wonderful man at the Tivoli years ago, would be a success on his reappearance. But I doubted if the audience would succeed as well.

The very entrance of Mr. Stevens was a reproach to doubt. He came down the stage gently, with several tons of elephant pressed between his knees, dolefully dismounted by means of an adjacent building, and told in touching song the story of the elephant on his hands—"the elephant ate all night and the elephant ate all day." He sang with the humble sincerity of a man who had made a mistake and could own up that it was an elephant on him. There were fervor, disappointment, grief, and responsibility in his voice; it was he, nobody else but long, lean himself, who had Siamesed with an animal whose diurnal capacity for food would strain a warehouse. It was a vivid reality, sad, sorry, and appealing. And comical it was to the limit, for everyone saw the joke except, apparently, the man who joked it. It was the humor of Cervantes—Cervantes, the founder of tall comedians. And the Hartmanite, the plain Tivolite, and the casual playgoer came over in a single ecstasy of wonder and delight.

* * *

I have said before that Mr. Stevens was brilliantly supported. Let me particularize. Miss Seabrook seems to have settled down to exacting from herself nothing but the best of which she is capable; her Marie is conspicuously the best of the women's parts, easily acted and sung with delicate particularity. Miss Morella does not do so well with the Crown Prince; she gives a fair performance, but clouds it with a frightful consciousness of her costumes and many instances of bad articulation. The same fault—articulation, I mean—is all that stands between Mr. Raffael and an ideal Boucher. Miss Helen Harrington plays the widow; she sings, too, at times, atrociously, but she is very tactful as a "feeder" to Mr. Stevens, and therefore is not entirely to be despised. Mr. Leary is fat and funny as the elephant keeper; Mr. Darcy's idea of the inn-keeper is not one of his best. Captain Fracasse is another first-rate character by Mr. West. Gustav Hinrichs has the baton, and whatever private opinion he may harbor of Wang as a musical work (or of light opera as an institution) he makes the very most of its performance.

Altogether the Tivoli's Wang is given with pomp, celerity, humor and sweet sound. It is the best comedy performance I have ever seen at this house, and it does not, I am glad to write, seem like the same old Tivoli smile. It is something new and individual, and asks no odds for price, place or people.

The Lyceum Theatre Company of this season is, with several advantageous changes, the same company that brought us the Prisoner of Zenda last October. It is not the Lyceum company that we are used to, and it is impossible fairly to compare the present players with their predecessors until we have seen them in a moderately quiet play, where it is to be hoped they will strike a softer key. The melodramatization of Anthony Hope's romance will stand a deal of noisy acting; it was noisily acted last season, and we all more or less liked it. It is noisier than ever now—so loud, in fact, that many of its pretty improbabilities and brave heroics have lost all seeming of plausibility. In the various roles of Rudolph, Mr. Hackett has three-fifths of the play, and it is only fair to say that he makes four-fifths of the noise. This play is a good one, and Mr. Hackett is a young actor of marked abilities; but his present work has a tendency to conceal both those facts. His drunken scene would be an affront to the worst wine ever vinted, his cadenza of madness in Black Michael's castle is much like a bad comedian's Gaspard in The Chimes of Normandy, and his scene with Flavia at the end of the third act has degenerated into cheap melodrama. Mr. Hackett's over-acting is a menace to the company. Miss Odell does anything and everything to Antoinette de Mauban, and Miss Mary Mannering, the new leading woman, affects a strenuousness in Flavia that, even if better than Miss Irving's anemic acting, is nothing to what Miss Mannering might accomplish by being more herself, and less a feminine Hackett. Mr. Walcott's Sapt remains the best character in the piece. George W. Middleton is good, too, as Hentzau; also Edward Morgan, who plays Black Michael.

* * *

Shenandoah, at the Columbia, is better given than Zenda at the Baldwin. There is money still in Bronson Howard's old war-horse, and after three unfortunate weeks I am glad to see Mr. Frawley and his managers once more on the road to opulence. Shenandoah takes a big cast, and the acting is bound to be variegated. The pitfalls of Southern dialect are carefully avoided; in the Frawley production no dialect is used—except Mr. Worthing's fashionable Londonese, which voices Col. Kerchival West, U. S. A., somewhat incongruously; and Mr. Clarke's brogue, which is not classic, but atoned for by the first respectable command of his legs that I ever have seen him execute. Captain Heartsease is a character not unlike the woodea Lieutenant in The Senator, and Mr. Frawley is without a peer in that sort of part. He is the best man in the play this week. Still, such parts only come once or twice in a lifetime, and I should not advise Mr. Frawley to take any chances on the years that lie between. I hesitate to criticize Miss Bates's version of the Southern heroine. I once made a brutal attack on a young woman who played just such a part. "Her dialect," quoth I, "came from Maine." I afterwards discovered that she was bo'n an' raised in ole Virginny, and that dark reflections had been cast upon her color line. But I insist that Miss Wallis is of the North all right. She is all right, any way. Life is too long and beautiful for me to dwell on the balance of the cast. I would rather praise it.

ASHTON STEVENS.

All the new turns are worth while at the Orpheum this week, particularly Lew Dockstader's. The veteran minstrel sings, gags, lectures and anecdotes for something like half an hour before the audience will part with him. Alex Heindl, the 'celloist of reputation, plays popular music; John Canfield and Violet Carlton do a clever operatic hurlesque; and Caron and Herbert, the comedy acrobats, who were such a go at the Orpheum two years ago, are repeating their success. All in all, it is the best bill the Orpheum has had in many months. Next week will be added to the roll Smith and Fuller, Oriental instrumentalists.

Wang continues at the Tivoli.

Next week at the Columbia the Frawley Company presents for the first time here A Social Highwayman, the play in which the Holland brothers scored a national success. The piece is an adaptation by Mary T. Stone of a novelette written by Elizabeth P. Train for Lippincott's.

The First Gentleman of Europe, "a play of sentiment and manners," in which Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett has undertaken to redeem the profligate George of Wales, will be the Lyceum Company's bill at the Baldwin next week. Mrs. Burnett believes that George was not as black as George Reynolds printed him, but, it is said, she has left him with sins enough to be interesting.

The First Born has been a blessing to the Alcazar; Monday night it enters upon the third month of its successful career. For sixty nights it has packed the little theatre, and another week and a day and it will have achieved the longest run on record in San Francisco. The accompanying piece for next week's bill is a comedy in two acts by Dion Boucicault, Andy Blake; or, The Irish Diamond. Mr. Mark Thall, a theatrical man of extensive experience, is now associated with the Alcazar management. He announces the following players engaged for the new stock season: Frank Carlyle, leading man; Miss Selene Johnson, leading woman, and George Trader, comedian.

THE old and widely known wholesale drug firm of Mack & Co. will soon move into their own substantial five-story brick building at 13 and 15 Fremont street. The firm are now at 11 Front street, where they have been located for the past seventeen years. Mack & Co. are proprietors of Peruvian Bitters, Moore's Poison Oak Remedy, and other proprietary medicines.

SINCE Wyckoff, Seamans & Benedict opened a branch for the Remington typewriter here, there has been a very material increase of business. Under the energetic direction of the Pacific Coast manager, F. E. Van Buskirk, the Remington has more than justified the expectations of the New York office.

The Maison Riche, the justly-famous French restaurant, corner Geary street and Grant avenue, sets a splendid dinner between the hours of 5 and 9 o'clock every day. The reputation of the Maison Riche extends around the world. Every delicacy of the season served in most faultless manner, lures the jaded appetite, and sweet music and fine wines serve to make up a menu unexcelled anywhere on earth.

THE UBIQUITOUS SUMMER MAN.

WHO spends the dollars he has made,
 On ice cream soda, lemonade,
 At ninety-something in the shade?
 The summer man.

Who is it haits the fishing hooks,
 The hammock swings in cosy nooks,
 And huys the girls the latest hooks?
 The summer man.

Who parts the hriers overhead,
 And on the turf his coat will spread
 For some divinity to tread?
 The summer man.

Who fetches, carries, night and day,
 A slave to every woman's way—
 Who is, indeed, her lawful prey?
 The summer man.

Who tunes guitar and hanjo strings,
 And smashes rattlesnakes and things,
 And revels in engagement rings?
 The summer man.

Who is it dives in from the brink
 When some fair swimmer fain would sink,
 And is rewarded—I don't think?
 The summer man.

Who narrowly escapes sunstroke,
 Gets tangled up with poison oak,
 And reaches home, sweet home, dead hroke?
 The summer man.

PICTURESQUE CALIFORNIA.

ONE of the many strange and beautiful sights for which Yosemite Valley, California's wonderland, is noted is presented with this issue of the NEWS LETTER's picturesque series. It represents sunrise in Mirror Lake. Everyone who has stood in the early dawn upon the margin of this lake will well remember the exquisite tracery of the massive walls, the delicate outlining of trees, and the bold-cut elevation of the mountain which sleeps at his feet. Through the notched peak at the bottom of this picture the sun glows like hurnished gold in the water long before it greets the wondering traveller's eyes above the rugged mountain's eastern battlements. A more imperious leaf of Nature's book is rarely seen, and is always remembered.

FOR some time it has been understood that the Golden Rule Bazaar would take over the business of the Emporium, and negotiations have progressed so far that a lease was executed Thursday between Mrs. Parrott, owner of the Emporium building, and Mr. Andrew M. Davis, of the Bazaar, terminating August 1st. Meantime it is expected that negotiations will be completed and a twenty years' lease he executed between Mrs. Parrott and the Golden Rule. Mr. Andrew M. Davis, than whom no man is more widely or favorably known in the city, has charge of the negotiations, and will no doubt successfully conclude this important deal. His past husiness career justifies the helief that the Emporium, under his direction, would become one of the permanent and most important mercantile establishments on the Pacific Coast.

THOSE of our swim who own or rent country places for the summer, have not, so far at least, fulfilled the hopes of their friends in providing entertainment for man and beast. The de Youngs are non est, the Louis Parrotts hors de combat through illness, and Mrs. Hager late in taking up her rural abode. At B'ingham things are not as lively as they were last year. To be sure, Walter Hobart and Charley Baldwin are now married men, Joe Grant is off on his wedding trip abroad, Joe Tobin mourns his erstwhile British pal, and Alfred Ford is bent upon making an aristocratic tone pervade the gatherings at the Club House. Every one at all conversant with Anglican "upper circles" knows how pokey the tone is to an American idea, "awfully good form" being opposed to noisy acts or utterances. Hence the decidedly quiet air of that swagger settlement. With the advent of the Crockett and Wilson families no doubt more of an American element will obtain. We bear already of Fourth of July festivities being planned down there.

A good story is told of a young merchant of this city, whose first marriage anniversary was celebrated not long ago. Old habits with him are hard to break. Recently he was entertaining his more or less fair inamorata (who for want of a better name will be called "Gussie") at the usual semi-weekly French dinner, when, suddenly remembering the orange blossoms and Lohengrin march but a brief twelve month gone, he jumped up from the table, and explaining that he must buy a present for his wife and take her out to dinner, as that was the day of his marriage one year ago, hastily departed. Imagine the surprise of the sphinx-like waiter who one hour later took his order for a second dinner, and with another vis-a-vis (his wife) in the identical room from which he had hastened sixty minutes before!

The British exile and his Anglo-American brethren were unlucky in the weather for the Jubilee rejoicings. The proverbial "Queen's weather" did not show up, but if anything could emphasize the difference between the genuine Briton and his would-be English-Yankee brother, it was the manner of taking the unwelcome rain. Johnny Bull, with the natural phlegm of his race, tramped along, "trews" turned up, umbrella in hand, and stoical phiz, while the Anglo-American growled, grumbled, and hobbled along in discomfort and disgust.

The guests at the Hotel Rafael have taken up tennis with a vim, and since Mr. J. J. Crooks has organized a club of players under professional training, practice in the fine court over there goes on daily. The chances are that some unusually good games will be seen at the coming tournament at the Hotel. Gossip says that George de Long's intention to compete for the championship this time is to please a certain charming fair one of the Western Addition.

What a delightful life Mrs. de Young leads, fitting here and there as fancy dictates with hosts of friends to welcome and entertain her everywhere. The Oelrichs party do not seem to be in haste to leave the happy hunting grounds of the East for their native heath. Rumor has it that a very swell crowd of New Yorkers intend coming out to test the pleasures of famed Del Monte in the late summer, and possibly Mrs. Oelrichs and Miss Fair may be of the number.

"Oh, my!" said one of the buds to another society girl recently, "if Captain Maus had only been playing for keeps with some one of the several girls to whom he was so devoted when he was here, what a glorious time she would be having now over with him at the Queen's Jubilee. Ain't he just in luck to be along with old Miles on his staff instead of flirting with the women down at Coronado."

The right of a woman to name her dogs after her many victims may not be questioned so long as she does not impress her peculiar fancies upon the public nostrils. This fact is brought to mind by the last dog show here, when an animal named "Jule" sat the show out—and no doubt felt the disgrace of his title. That the humiliated animal has a permanent grievance against his notorious mistress owing to the shameful conduct of his namesake, who dances attendance upon this woman, to the brutal neglect of his wife and her new-born babe, is not questioned by the many people who are cognizant of the facts.

The best is always the cheapest. And in this case the best whiskey is J. F. Cutter. Smooth as oil, mellow with age, it is the delight of the connoisseur and judge of good drinks everywhere. For this rare liquor, E. Martin & Co., at 411 Market street, are the sole Pacific Coast agents.

THEY were devoted, and the fact that he had not yet succeeded in procuring a post that should make it possible for them to marry—that they had not money enough, in common speaking, to set up a house—drew them in a way closer together and made the long engagement the sweeter for the uncertainty of things. Hope was a tender, mirthful companion with them—not blind, only bandaged across the eyes, and capable of lifting the bandage to give an assuring wink at these pretty lovers on occasions. The day arrived, however, when the gods seemed to turn away from their concerns and everything went suddenly askew. An evil spirit came upon the scenes—a wealthy evil spirit, old and in love (it was preposterous!)—in love with Sylvia, and Sylvia fell under the power of his spell, for she met her lover one day with a pale little face and said: "Temple, I must marry him. There are my sisters, you know, and the boys! The mother insists. We are so much poorer than I knew, and she says that you and I might wait forever."

"Sylvia," he answered, "this is simply nonsense! I refuse to take you seriously."

"But, dear, we cannot marry, can we?"

"What could we do on five hundred a year?"

"Well," she answered, with a sudden merry look in her blue eyes, "we might love on that, you know."

"Precisely; love in a cottage, etc."

"Even in quite a nice little house!"

"You can't possibly propose—"

"Certainly not, I don't. That's exactly the question. We cannot love one another in a nice little house on five hundred a year, therefore I must marry some one else and live in a palace without love on a million!"

Temple Lewis opened his eyes in amazement. "Ah!" he said after a considerable pause, "you are all alike, you women. Money, money—you'd sell your souls for money!"

"I tried to sell it for love!" she said, again with a little laugh—a sad little laugh this time—but Temple did not know in the least what she meant. Women are always illogical when discussing any serious matter. He therefore strode with many strides up and down the room and frowned and hit his lip. Then at last he came to a standstill and said with really noble calm: "You mean to marry this millionaire?"

The sight of his beautiful, strong face, pale with suppressed indignation—just indignation—made the tears creep into her eyes. "What do you suggest, then?" she said.

"Suggest!" he repeated with a genuine look of dismay. "What should I suggest?"

"I don't know," she answered, and the tears went hack whence they had come.

Sylvia was engaged to the millionaire, and Temple Lewis was miserable. "He is 60," he reiterated over and over again to himself, and set his teeth. "Who would have thought that Sylvia—"

Meanwhile Sylvia looked wistfully at her lover when she met him, so that he who was old caught the look one day and knew that the little girl he was to marry would sacrifice all his millions for that Jackanapes even now if—What was that if? A month passed and he watched; this evil spirit watched, peered into their souls; broke his own heart to see the clearer through the cleft into theirs. Sylvia loved the Jackanapes—the Jackanapes loved Sylvia—and money was the "if"—not with Sylvia even, only with the Jackanapes. One morning the millionaire came to Sylvia, and he said:

"My little girl, I have been dreaming, as old men are wont to dream, a very pretty, golden dream. Well, that's over. Whilst I was asleep, dreaming, the little girl that I loved was suffering, suffering, and suffering, just that my dream might be golden. That sort of nonsense wouldn't do, would it? Now listen; Jackanapes has got a post."

"Jackanapes?"

"I beg your pardon—Mr. Temple Lewis—a very good post—a thousand a year to start with. And now you can marry and be happy."

"Marry and be happy! What do you mean?"

"Just that, little girl. That is how I love you. Good-bye! It was the prettiest dream in the world, my dream!" He stooped down and kissed both her hands, and she leaned suddenly forward and looked into his eyes. "You gave him that post," she said, but he only smiled sadly and went away.

* * * * *

Temple Lewis found her next day sitting in the great, big drawing room alone, her hands idle in her lap and a wondrous look in her blue eyes. He felt suddenly shy and could hardly stammer out his satisfaction with her, with himself, and with the world in general.

"O, Sylvia!" he said, "you are not going to marry that man after all, and now—now I have such a splendid post."

"You will be wanting a wife, I suppose, in such a position."

"Why, yes, Sylvia; I should think so. They expect one to be married, you know." He sat by her side and took her hand in his. There followed a long silence; then he continued: "Sylvia, now we will be married at once, won't we? You do really love me? You did all the time, didn't you? Now that you have sent him away—"

"Temple!" she said, looking oddly up at him, "I did love you—but I don't now. I don't love you at all. * * * I love him. Loved you! Why, no; I never loved you. What am I saying? We did not know what the word meant. O! it was a mean sort of substitute, ours—but now I know what a poor thing this love is you, who are young, offer to us. Temple, I had read in books, in so many, so many books, about love, and I always said to myself: 'There is no such thing. These are poets' fancies. No one in the world loves like that.' And I heard people say: 'She loves him—he is in love with her,' and I thought, 'I suppose they love as Temple and I love,' and I began to see what an honor you were conferring on me, for all the young men and every one else seemed to think a poor girl was privileged whom young men condescended to notice."

"Sylvia, what are you saying?"

"O! you loved me in your way, no doubt, but not so much as you loved your clubs, your luxuries, your very smart clothes, your shooting. I was low down in the list of your pleasures. Something must be foresworn, and I was the one you found easiest to do without!" She looked up at him with no malice in her look and laughed; then added: "Some one else determined to do without me, too!"

"Some one else? Do you mean that that scoundrel threw you?"

"Hush! His motif was different, you see—and I have asked him to come back. Temple, the hooks did not lie—the poets' fancies were not only fancies. Ah! when some of you are as old as he you may have learned to be as great hearted, and, perhaps, if you try very hard, as delightful," she added demurely.

"I don't understand anything you say. I have come to ask you to be my wife. Will you, Sylvia?"

"No, I cannot; I have promised!"

"What! promised the millionaire?"

"Yes, Temple; you mustn't tell any one, but I love him shamefully."—Westminster Budget.

DEAR EDITH.—Among all the staggering new colors of this season, the very newest undoubtedly is violet, vying for pre-eminence in fashionable patronage with Egyptian iris, the most flaming shade of purple known. All of these glowing tones, on a black ground of green foliage and blue sky, form a picture well worth seeing, while the details of the toilet are sometimes as astonishing as beautiful.

This summer, at least, so very lovely are the afternoon parasols, that a woman who attends an outdoor party can wear her hat or not as she pleases. Hostesses so far have abjured their hats and carry sunsbades to exactly match their gowns, some of them showing silk domes with big lace butterflies appliqued onto the silk, but the net wings left free to flutter in every breeze. All of these full dress parasols have extremely long handles, showing great extravagance and beauty concentrated in the handles. An ivory shepherd's crook, prettily inlaid, a long gold inlaid ebony staff, with a tiny miniature topped comit box set in the end, or a remarkable twisted serpent, coiled near the head and with jewelled eyes, are among the novel and costly sticks, on which flouneed cauopies are mounted for use with fete dresses.

The mention of green, blue and cerise all tossed together in one costume may set sensitive teeth on edge, and yet the result is exquisite, and this capital French model, by enterprising American dressmakers, is copied in blue muslin of a pale shade, with bolero of rose-pink taffeta, and the collar and waistband done in iris velvet. The combinations, however, do not cease with color alone; just as important are many arrangements in fabrics, piquet and velvet, grass linen and satin-brown canvas and delicate lisse. French crepe and tweed being all united in the worthy cause of glorifying a lawn full of pleasure seekers.

But now for a word concerning black and white lawn dresses. Too much cannot be said nor written in their favor. Moreover, in consideration of the chic air of elegance they bear, small expense need be encountered, and for girls of 18 they are as appropriate as for women of 40.

A very pretty one is sketched with a ruffled skirt. Here the petticoat itself is of snow white swiss over a clear white silk slip, and two deep muslin flounces, set on in pronounced curves, are both edged and headed with a pretty imitation of black chantilly. Over the waist of white silk many bands of muslin are drawn, each one edged with narrow black lace, and fastened each at the top of the rich black taffeta girdle with a skeleton button of cut steel.

The nearest rival to this study in black and white is the picturesque little suit in the large sketeb, illustrating the best use of narrow black velvet ribbon on white lawn. Over a white, rose, green or blue silk slip this gown can be used, and its hat of white chip, enveloped in masses of black silk muslin, make it, from top to toe, a costume entirely within the achievement of amateur fingers, if need be.

There is a most commendable custom followed this season, at teas and tournaments, of wearing short and perfectly plain walking skirts of brown linen, white duck, or stiff dark blue piquet, with pretty blouses of ecru lace, or cafe au lait embroidery that have under bodies of bright colored china silk. The lace or embroidery blouse fastens up on the left side, is caught in at the waist by a belt of elastic gilt studded with mock jewels and a hip-short frill of lace hangs out below the belt. A bright ribbon forms the collar, and, with a flower hat, a costume at once smart and inexpensive is the result.

CHAS. PAGE, Pres.; HOWARD E. WRIGHT, Secy; A. J. CARMANY, Mgr.

Our Neocene mining experts—such men as Ross E. River Gold. Browne, Waldemar Lindgren, and numerous superintendents of mines of a high local repute, that the next immediate and prolific source of gold in California will be the intact channels of the neocene river. Gravel, as that well-known authority, Augustus J. Bowie, lately remarked, has been the source of four-fifths of all the gold yield in California since its first discovery, but that the auriferous gravel is distinctly traceable to the neocene channels of a pre-volcanic drainage system of the Sierra Nevada has been clearly recognized only by a few. The first attempt to map out any portion of that ancient channel system in contrast to the channels of modern rivers is not yet seven years old. Mr. Ross E. Browne in 1890, in the tenth Annual Report of the State Mineralogist of California, presented an accurate topographic study of this kind upon a part of the American River Basin at Forest Hill, where several very rich channel mines have been opened sufficiently to afford abundant data on the neocene river system at that point. Undertaking a more comprehensive scheme, Mr. Waldemar Lindgren, of the United States Geological Survey, attempted in 1893 to show pictorially on a single map the recent and the neocene drainage system of both the Yuba and the American river basins. The elaborate report accompanying his map, and illustrated by cross-sections of many open neocene channels, has not yet been superseded as the most accurate and brilliant study of the gold-bearing rivers of pre-volcanic times.

Formation of the Placers. The neocene channels, at considerable elevations above the present river beds, are, generally speaking, within the same watersheds or basins as the modern rivers; and their courses (again generally speaking) are parallel to the modern streams. But on comparing the two river systems in detail, it is seen that the erosion which created the modern channels has affected the neocene channels in three ways: (1). It has sometimes chanced to follow the same bed as the ancient river. (2). It has sometimes cut across the ancient bed at intervals. (3). It has sometimes approached so closely to one of the sides of the old bed as to destroy the rim and lay bare the channel's contents. In all such cases the result of erosion has been to carry off and scatter the neocene gravel in new places, the distance of carriage and the ultimate place of deposit varying with the declivities of the modern streams. Hence the placers or deposits of displaced auriferous gravels, which have been the object of hydraulic mining.

Great Channels Still Intact. Not everywhere, however, have these ancient channels been disturbed. At many points they are yet intact. The lava that originally filled them has remained in place, and their hidden position is often outlined for miles along the hillsides by the line of contact between the lava and the original bed-rock of the sides of the channel. Once the lowest levels in the neocene landscape, these lava capped channels when intact now form unbroken ridges of varying width, on both sides of which the channel's rim, as defined by the contact of lava and bed-rock, is traceable for miles. The mining problem is to determine the level of the channel's bed, after which a tunnel of sufficient drainage, running to that level, completes the simplest and cheapest form of mining now practiced in California. No pumping, no hoisting, no hard ore to mine or to crush; nothing but a breast of gravel, usually free or uncemented, which varies in gold bearing richness from the bed of the channel, where the coarsest gold lies, up to a height of five or ten feet, where the "pay gravel" ceases.

Where Majestic Rivers Rolled. It is too early to pronounce yet in general from north to south upon all parts of the neocene river system so far opened by drift mining. But with reference to the dimensions of the channels and the character of the gold, certain facts are already firmly established. The channels are wider and the gold coarser in the north than in the south. The seat of the neocene channels of far the widest dimensions yet known in California is the high divide between the head-waters of the Feather and the North Yuba rivers. There the Thistle mine, in Sierra County, has been working in a breast of gravel more than fifteen hundred feet wide, and although this extraordinary width is surmised to indicate a bend in the stream, it is not believed that the width of the channel will shrink again below one thousand feet. Further south, on the contrary, on the Forest Hill divide between the forks of the American river, the ex-Superintendent of the Mayflower reports the average width of the channel seventy-five feet, though the neighboring Morning Star mine reached an average width of three hundred and fifty feet. These averages are based on a year's work.

To the southward, in El Dorado Sierra County's Banner Record. County, the ancient streams appear to have undergone much subdivision, and neocene rivers became neocene rivulets. As to the character of gold yielded by these different river basins, whatever may be the unsolved cause of the disparity, it is certain that coarse gold in nugget-like fragments is the distinguishing mark of the northern channels. At the Thistle and other neighboring mines the gold is of such coarseness that fully eighty per cent of it is caught in the first forty-eight feet of the sluice boxes. The neocene gravels of the Northern Yuba have also never been cemented by percolations of water saturated with carbonate of lime. They do not, therefore, involve the expense of a mill to crush them. Sierra County, where the North Fork of the Yuba takes its rise, has produced gold, according to records of Wells, Fargo & Co. alone, worth $250,000,000, of which about one-tenth is accredited to quartz mines. The balance, $225,000,000, came from auriferous gravels from broken channels, and (to a small extent) from the intact channels of the neocene rivers.

Some Typical Gravel Mines. But the intact channels are of such recent development that a few years ago the Thistle, then an unopened channel in the heart of this gold region, went begging for a buyer in California for $100,000. It found buyers in Scotland. How much it has yielded in the past six years we are not prepared to say, but it is authoritatively stated that monthly shipments have frequently averaged $140,000 for considerable periods, while the gravel has at times reached as high as $28 per carload of one ton. The mine being opened by shaft instead of tunnel, making hoisting of gravel and pumping water constantly necessary, the cost of production has reached $1.25 a car. The best average yield of the Morning Star and Mayflower, cited by the ex-Superintendent, for a lengthened period, was $9.50 a car for the former and $5 for the latter, with an average cost in each of about 75 cents.

Untold Wealth Yet in Store. Even these returns, though less startling than the Thistle, have enabled the stock of the Morning Star, which four years ago sold for $1.25 a share, to pay in dividends an average of $6 per share every month for the past two years. It is impossible to estimate the gold which a mine like the Thistle, with three miles of channel and its extraordinary width, may ultimately produce, but in the opinion of mining men it stands easily first among all gold producing mines of California. Other examples might be adduced from different localities, but enough has been cited to confirm the opening statement of this article, that California may expect a greatly increased gold yield from the intact lava capped channels of her neocene rivers.

Among Bulls and Bears. Pine street has been dull during the week and the market has had the customary holiday decline. Chollar has suffered the most, although the mine on the Brunswick is doing better in the way of bullion production than any of the other properties just now. Sierra Nevada is looming up again, and some significant features are developing in the formation now encountered in the promising south-end group. The outlook is very promising for a market, notwithstanding the prevalent weakness.

THE regular monthly dividend and quarterly coupons on Railroad and other bonds will be payable next month.

The Crier

"Hear the Crier!" "What the devil art thou?"
"Oe that will play the devil, sir, with you."

"PASTOR" C. O. Brown, of Green-street church, Chicago, is still determined to thrust himself upon our long-suffering attention, though it was reasonable to expect, from the vigorous way in which he was kicked out of this city, that he would be glad to crawl into the nearest kennel and nurse his wounds. A two-column letter has been inflicted upon us this week from this ministerial mountebank, in which he declares that he will "try to think no evil of the brethren who pursued him, and who could not secure churches within one hundred miles of Chicago." The whining hypocrite has for the nonce uttered by accident a truth. The brethren who made such a bold stand for morality and pulpit decency would not, of course, be tolerated in Satan's stronghold.

OUR society girls of marriageable age and tendencies do not appear to fall over themselves in a wild scramble to secure titled prey. Their brilliant inactivity while Prince Luigi of Savoy tarried in the midst of us is proof of their good sense, and is likewise an example which maids of mistaken ideas in other American cities will do well to follow. As for the Prince, it is not likely that fear keeps him out of the market. Matrimony can have no terrors for a mountain climber accustomed to being snowed under, and to courting blizzards on precipices.

BOSTON is adjusting its spectacles in conventional horror to read about the escapades in their midst of one Yee Wah, a "Christianized" Mongolian, just arrested for knifing a countryman, Yee Bang, it transpiring that the wily Wah is a San Francisco highbinder with a gory record. Boston has long entertained fanciful notions that the Chinese were a real nice, tractable, peace-loving brand of heathen, with a yearning for religious conversion, and it is devoutly to be hoped that the object lesson will destroy their hallucinations.

CONSIDERING the space which the dailies accord the Hoffman case, and the ghoulish glee with which they gloat upon the non-unravelment thereof, in conjunction with the astonishing tactics pursued by our Captain of Police, one may be forgiven for wondering if there be something of a decaying nature in the local Denmark. The question is, whose sack supplies the fuel for the fire of mystery?

THE ludicrous spectacle of Royalist Palmer salaaming in nightly obeisance before the Hawaiian Fat Lady ere retiring to nocturnal rest and pajamas, is too grotesque to be nauseating. By good rights this groveler before the ham-like charms of the Domini's aggregation of greasy avoirdupois should be hustled out of the country, but not, please heaven, via the Golden Gate.

THE attorneys in the Fair will-and-deed contest have resorted to French quotations in order to illustrate their arguments. This explanation is made to relieve the minds of those among the spectators who erroneously imagined that the legal luminaries in question were making a scholarly bluff at hog Latin.

SINCE the ill-success of Laura Miller, the vultresses who hover about San Francisco, waiting for fat carcasses to fall, seem to have lost their nerve. The days go by, and still neither widow nor progeny has been raised up for Baruey Barnato. The thing is almost unprecedented.

THERE were panics in some of the churches last Sunday when the earthquake occurred, and people started for the doors, but in the First Congregational it made no commotion, which is not surprising, considering the upheavals to which they are accustomed.

MANY wise old heads are wagging over the discord between sweet-voiced Millie Flynn and her car-conductor husband. King Corphetua and the beggar never works successfully outside romance.

WHAT a pity that Sunday's earthquake in this city did not arouse sleeping Justice from her trance. Another temblor, please, O Lord.

PEOPLE should stick to their trade, nor flounder in devious pursuits which may lead to their eternal undoing. There is Sister Craven for instance. Once on a time the mature but astute Nettie wielded an influence hereabouts almost lobbystic in power, despite her ineligibility to the ranks of her kind in scheming, for Nettie was never a fascinating person from the strictly feminine point of view. So long as she confined her ambition to the school-ma'am plane, all went merry as a dinner bell, with only the occasional yelp of a spanked kid to break its harmony. But in essaying to soar to contract widowhood and the station of a millionairess, the Craven airship is fast coming to grief, and the moral is obvious.

ANDREW J. ITSELL, pedagogue, whose scalp is coveted by the Board of Education, he being accused of incompetency and showing a general lack of that perspicacity which is best defined as not "onto his job," need spend no anxious moments regarding his educational salary. Prospects are exceedingly bright for the disciplinarian in question, whose chief joy in life is the administering of corporal punishment, School Director Waller having declared that action will be taken by the Board "at a legal pace." As a legal pace is equivalent to a snail's pace, Itsell is safe.

THE CRIER is pleased to learn that "the mining outlook in California was never so encouraging," but notwithstanding this cheerful statement, made by an optimistic contemporary of Republican principles, it would be well-nigh impossible to make the local Democracy believe it. The great Lane mine, whose pléthoric yield was expected to pan out wealth galore with which to receive in dazzling style William, the Would-be Conqueror, has shut down with the energy of a steel trap and can't be worked a little bit. No, the mining outlook just now is nit.

MRS. PERKINS says she's out of all patience with the daily papers; they get their facts so mixed. Why only the other day one paper gave a picture of London and headed it, "Route of the Gorgeous Procession on Tuesday." What will foreigners think of us, she'd like to know, when they catch us making a slip of that sort; she'd have thought even a babe would know that this is the Victorian Jubilee. The Gorgeous era is past long ago. It's just that kind of thing that makes them call this a jay town.

THROUGHOUT this jubilee business, during which deserved encomiums have been showered upon the great and good ruler Britannia, the CRIER notes with surprise that amid all the bouquet throwing across the pond to Her Majesty, one of her most prominent and unique virtues has been given the overlook, hence he hastens to bring up the rear of the procession with a tribute thereto: Victoria has never tried to conceal the truth about her age.

GOOD sometimes emanates from evil. The ill-smelling, not to say putrid, atmosphere in the Coroner's quarters is horrible in its effect upon the olfactory nerves, and a deadly insult to the lungs that pump it in. But it creates a general distaste for morgue accommodations, which cannot fail to exert a wholesome influence upon minds with suicidal tendencies. No really self-respecting person would want to be found dead in such a place.

AFTER two years steady diet of Durrant, the Chestnut of the Century, it is positively refreshing to be regaled on a few courses of hattle, murder and sudden death, with arson charge thrown in by way of imparting added flavor to the morning menu. This five-cent meal, dished up at daylight by our local journals, is nothing if not cheap for the money. The Hoffman-Figel mystery is gruesome but none the less diverting.

TO-MORROW a venerable San Francisco couple, Mr. and Mrs. Adolph Godchaux, will celebrate their golden wedding, surrounded by their devoted descendants, presenting a domestic picture rarely seen in these degenerate portions of God's footstool, and hearing happy proof that love can outlive the ravages of time, and that filial pride is not a dead letter.

SOMEBODY should wire the distinguished glohetrotter, S. W. J. Bryan at large, to bring his overcoat along with him when he lands upon these golden shores. The chill in the atmosphere around reception-committee headquarters produced icicles on the corrugated brows of its members when Angel Lane flew.

HER WORLD.—EMILY HUNTINGTON MILLER.

BEHIND them slowly sank the western world,
Before them new horizons opened wide—
"Yonder," he said, "old Rome and Venice wait,
And lovely Florence by the Arno's tide."
She heard, but backward all her heart had sped,
Where the young moon sailed through the sunset red,
"Yonder," she thought, "with breathing soft and deep,
My little lad lies smiling in his sleep."

They sailed where Capri dreamed upon the sea,
And Naples slept beneath her olive-trees;
They saw the plains where trod the gods of old,
Pink with the flush of wild anemones.
They saw the marbles by the Master wrought
To shrine the heavenly beauty of his thought.
Still ran one longing through her smiles and sighs—
"If I could see my little lad's sweet eyes!"

Down from her shrine the dear Madonna gazed,
Her baby lying warm against her breast:
"What does she see?" he whispered, "can she guess
"The cruel thorns to those soft temples pressed?"
"Ah, no," she said, "she shuts him safe from harms,
Within the love-locked harbor of her arms.
No fear of coming fate could make me sad
If so, to-night, I held my little lad."

"If you could choose," he said, "a royal boon,
Like that girl dancing yonder for the king,
What gift from all her kingdom would you bid Obedient Fortune in her hand to bring?"
The dancer's robe, the glittering banquet-hall,
Swam in the mist of tears along the wall—
"Not power," she said, "nor riches, nor delight,
But just to kiss my little lad to-night!"

TO THE VANQUISHED.—GEORGE H. BROADHURST.

Here's to the men who lose!
What though their work be e'er so nobly planned,
And watched with zealous care,
No glorious halo crowns their efforts grand,
Contempt is failure's share.

Here's to the men who lose!
If triumph's easy smile our struggles greet Courage is easy then;
The king is he who after fierce defeat
Can up and fight again.

Here's to the men who lose!
The ready plaudits of a fawning world
Ring sweet in victors' ears;
The vanquished's banners never are unfurled,
For them there sounds no cheers.

Here's to the men who lose!
The touch: one of true worth is not success;
There is a higher test—
Though fate may darkly frown, onward to press
And bravely do one's best.

Here's to the men who lose!
It is the vanquished's praises that I sing,
And this the toast I choose:
"A hard fought failure is a noble thing, Here's luck to them who lose!"

OF REMEMBRANCE.—LADY LINOLEY, IN THE FLOWER SELLER.

Methinks that you'll remember, when I die,
Not some brave action, nor yet stately speech—
Though sheltered lives to these may sometimes reach—
But just a turn of lip, a glance of eye,
A trivial jest, a laughing word, a sigh,
A trick too strong to cure, too slight to teach,
Scarce noticed, haply mocked by all and each—
Now a full source of tears you'd fain defy.

Ah, do not weep! The traveler, having come
From mountain heights, cares not for drifted snow,
Nor rock, nor branch, as record of the day;
But plucks a gentian blue and bears it home,
Safe in his bosom—I would have you so
Keep one sweet speck of love at heart alway.

The boy came into the house weeping, and his mother was naturally solicitous. "What's the matter, Tommy?" she asked. "The boy across the street hit me," he replied. "Oh, well, I wouldn't cry for that," she returned. "Show that you can be a little man." "I ain't crying for that," he retorted. "Then what are you crying for?" "He ran into the house before I could get at him."—Chicago Post.

"I can't tell whether the lady with Mr. Sterlingworth is his wife or not," remarked Mrs. Throckmorton to her husband, as she gazed across the theatre through her lorgnette. "Has Sterlingworth got his dress suit on?" asked Mr. Throckmorton. "No; he is wearing a brown suit." "Yes; the lady is his wife."

Philip Gilbert Hamerton: An Autobiography, 1834-1858, and a memoir by his wife, 1858-1891. With a portrait. Boston. Roberts Brothers. 1896.

The subject of this autobiography and memoir was born in Lancashire in 1834, of one of the oldest and best-descended families in the English untitled aristocracy. His father, John Hammerton (as he spelled it), however, followed a profession that was looked on by the rest of the family as beneath the dignity of a direct descendant of Sir Stephen Hamerton, who was condemned in Westminster Hall to death for high treason against His Majesty King Henry the Eighth. We remember a proud old English lady, whose nephew wished to introduce an attorney to her, sniffing and saying, "Barristers and physicians I have heard of, but what are attorneys?" Mr. Hamerton's relatives were, as was this old lady, "county people," and occupied a distinctly higher social position than the lawyers, parsons, and doctors of the towns and villages. John Hammerton was an able, handsome, and unusually strong man, but he had one fatal weakness—an over-fondness for conviviality, which at last ruined his health and caused his death at an early age. Philip's association with his father was by no means agreeable, for the elder man's temper was fitful and violent, and his behavior to his young son was at times positively cruel. However, the affection and kindness of one of the boy's aunts were unceasing, and Philip came to regard her as a mother, his own mother having died when he was still a young child. At school Philip was studious, and though not fond of the ordinary sports of his schoolfellows, was still able to take care of himself. He was much interested in religious questions, and, as he grew up, found himself unable to accept all the dogmas of the Established Church, to which, of course, all his relatives belonged. Though he was never aggressive in the expression of his unbelief, he was always frank, and incurred great odium among his relatives on account of it. He early showed a fondness for literature, and at the age of thirteen wrote a poem entitled "Prince Charles Edward after the battle of Culloden," the versification of which is easy, graceful, and vastly more elegant than that of most of the poems we see printed nowadays. He was constantly reading, and was very methodical in his studies; indeed, throughout his life, his love of order manifested itself strongly. It was intended that he should, like other young men of his class, be educated at Oxford, but he felt no inclination to go to that stronghold of orthodoxy and home of lost causes, the natural bent of his mind being towards art and modern literature rather than towards the classical languages. Yet he fully recognized that the "scholarly temper—a patient, careful, exact, and studious temper—is valuable in all the pursuits of life." Had he been a man of the world, his course would (as he says) have been quite clear. Born of an excellent county family, with enough means to live like a gentleman, possessed of a good voice, a retentive memory, and the ability to speak well in public, he would have gone to Oxford, taken his degree, married a Lancashire heiress, offered his services to the Conservative party, and become a member of Parliament. But though he perceived plainly enough the worldly wisdom of this course, he decided to be both a painter and an author. One of his first teachers in art was Mr. Pettitt, who taught him to draw in "a hard, clear, scientific manner," but who was not a man of general, or even of artistic, culture. In London, whither Mr. Hamerton went to visit the picture exhibitions, he met Rogers, the poet, Leslie, the painter, Mr. Watkiss Lloyd (the writer on Greek art, history, and literature), George Eliot, and other persons of note. At twenty-one years of age he published "The Isles of Loch Awe and other poems," which, though not a pecuniary success, was very well received by the reviews. On a visit to Paris, he fell in with a M. Gindriez, for whose character and conversation he conceived a great liking. Two years later he married Eugénie Gindriez, and the young couple began housekeeping at Innistrynich on Loch Awe; but in 1861 they removed to France, in various parts of which they thenceforward continued to live. From 1858 the narrative is carried on to the death of her husband in 1894 by Mrs. Hamerton, who writes in an affectionate and very interesting manner, and in English devoid, so far as we can see, of any trace of foreign idiom. Though their life was by no means without anxieties (one of the greatest being that Mr. Hamerton suffered from recurrent attacks of most painful nervousness, which incapacitated him from all work and rendered it impossible for him to endure the slightest noise, or to travel by train) it was a happy one, and Mr. Hamerton accomplished a vast amount of literary and artistic work. His culture was so wide and so various that he illumined every subject that he touched, and, above all, his books are always thoroughly interesting, and pervaded by a keen sense of honor and high principle. Though ordinarily very gentle, if he felt that he had been cheated or deceived, Mr. Hamerton's wrath was heroic, and never failed to thoroughly frighten its objects. Of Mr. Hamerton's many works we like best "The Intellectual Life," "Human Intercourse," and "French and English." The present volume, which contains nearly six hundred pages, is issued by Messrs. Roberts, of Boston, who quite early in Mr. Hamerton's literary career, republished his books in America, and with such success that some of them gained even more readers in the United States than in Great Britain. Mrs. Hamerton more than once gratefully acknowledges the services rendered by Messrs. Roberts to the spread of Mr. Hamerton's fame, and the receipt of little checks, which were very welcome in a household where the head, though not personally extravagant, never stinted himself in the purchase of materials for the pursuit of art.

Matka and Kotik, a tale of the Mist Islands, by David Starr Jordan; published by the Whitaker and Ray Company, San Francisco. 1897.

President Jordan's work as a member of the Bering Sea Commission for 1896 furnished him with the material for this tale, which is dedicated to his associates. It describes the life of the seals upon the Pribylof Islands, and is most copiously illustrated from photographs taken for the various Commissions by Mr. Charles W. Townsend, and from drawings by Miss Chloe Frances Lesley, a zoological student of Stanford University. The life of the baby seals, of the silken-haired females, of the bachelors, and of the great heachmasters, is graphically told. The heachmasters are the largest, strongest, and bravest seals, who gather round themselves the most attractive females, and fiercely resent any interference. The bachelor, or unmated, seals must wait until the heachmasters are out of sight and hearing before they venture to take any liberties with the females. A fight for supremacy between two heachmasters is well narrated. The volume is correctly printed on fine paper, and many of the full-page photogravures are most interesting.

A recent issue of "The Bachelor of Arts," a monthly magazine published in New York, and "devoted to University interests and general literature," contains half-a-dozen poems, one of which is by the Japanese, Yone Noguchi, an article on College Commencements by F. W. Crane, and a long paper by Arthur Inkersley entitled "Oxford and Cambridge: a Comparison." The writer's familiarity with both the great English Universities has enabled him to direct attention to many points of difference between two institutions that much resemble each other, and are very unlike the Universities of other countries. The issue also contains the usual editorial notes on Science, Athletics, the Colleges, Music and the Drama. The Bachelor of Arts is excellently printed on a long narrow page of good paper, and by its freedom from cuts, miscalled illustrations, affords relief to eyes wearied by the contemplation of the ordinary picture-book magazines.

The opening article of the July issue of The Overland Monthly, the price of which is now ten cents, is by Arthur Inkersley, and deals with the adventurous career of Alexander Baranof, the first Chief Manager of the Russian Colonies in America. It is fully illustrated by reproductions of photographs and pen drawings by Boeringer. Professor E. S. Holden, of the Lick Observatory, contributes a freely illustrated article on the Mountain Observatories of the World.

The City of Refuge, a novel, by Sir Walter Besant. Published by the Frederick A. Stokes Company, New York and London, 1888.

This is the story of a community founded at Aldermanbury, in the State of New York, by an English gentleman, and successfully maintained by him for several years. The land and buildings were purchased by himself and his first disciples, an English couple of gentle birth. The members of the community labor on the farm, in the gardens and workshops, and sell their surplus products in the neighboring towns. They have no money, no strong drink, no tobacco, no playing cards, though there is a piano, and they occasionally indulge in a sort of shuffling walk-round which serves as an apology for dancing. The members, except the three mentioned above, are all of the lower class, rough and uneducated. Thrice a day they meet in the large, bare, barn-like hall to eat their meals of coarse, though plentiful, food; after the evening repast comes the Rite of Meditation. During "Meditation" the men and women sit with their backs to the tables and gradually fall into a semi-hypnotised condition, and fancy that they see visions and receive communications from the other world. To this queer assemblage there enters one day Sir Charles Osterley, a Baronet, once a distinguished member of Parliament and a rising statesman. Sir Charles's brilliant career had been blasted by an incurable passion for gambling, which had swallowed up all his own fortune, and all of his wife's property that he could lay hands upon. Broken and disgraced, he had come to the United States, and had fallen lower and lower until he had even committed murder. To escape from the clutches of the law he entered "The House," whither came in search of him, and with intent to induce him to commit suicide, Gilbert Maryon, Lady Osterley's oldest and most trusted friend. Gilbert finds amid the uncongenial inmates of "The House" one sweet girl, the child of the English couple who were the Master's first disciples. Having been born and brought up in "the House," Cicely knows nothing of "Outside," as the rest of the world is termed by the recluses. She, too, has her hours of Meditation, in which she falls into a sort of trance, and communes with her dead mother. How the desired deliverance of Dorabyn, Lady Osterley, from her worthless husband is effected, and how Cicely turns out to be well-born and a fit bride for Gilbert Maryon, is charmingly told. The Master of "The House" at last sees the utter futility of the life he had so long lived, and resigns his post. The Brothers and Sisters, after his departure, introduce newspapers, books, literary and dramatic entertainments, and many other things from "Outside." The story shows very cleverly the folly of trying to get out of the world, while we still remain in it and of it. All schemes of life, which aim at repressing the natural instincts and tendencies of mankind are doomed to failure: you may, as Horace says, drive out Nature with a pitchfork, but she will always come back. The prolonged trances in which the members of the community indulged every evening are shown to result from mere emptiness of heart and vacuity of mind: having nothing to think about or to excite their interest, they became machines for the performance of a certain amount of work and the digestion of a good deal of food, until the more stolid of the men almost lost the power of speech. Without books, pictures, or communication with the outside world, they dreamed their lives away, becoming mere pigs at a well-filled trough. Like all the stories that come from Sir Walter's skillful and practised pen, "The City of Refuge" is thoroughly wholesome, and unfailingly interesting. We suppose that Sir Walter must be classed as a Romanticist: he has certainly never fallen into the slough of Realism by wallowing in which so many writers of the day are faithfully doing the work of their master—the Devil.

The Looker-On

EARTHQUAKE shocks are not the most agreeable features of the ups and downs in the life of an elevator hoy. The usual Sabbath quiet in the Crocker Building was broken last Sunday, soon after noon by a violent jangling of bells. Only the central lift was then in operation, and the youth in charge thought a general alarm had been turned in. A summons seemed to come simultaneously from every floor in the building, as soon as the first shock was felt. All the Sunday workers were apparently seized with a sudden desire to escape from their offices to the nearest sanctuary. Expressions of their relief in the immediate termination of the world came from all parts of the big structure. The elevator hoy glanced at the indicator. Only two floors were unheard from,—eleven and seven.

"Come, seven,—come, eleven," he repeated, from force of habit, and a moment later the missing calls came. That from the eleventh floor was the more insistent, the bell ringing again and again.

The elevator shot up to the roof, and on the top floor was Hall McAllister, pale as death, his finger still pressing the button. The intrepid climber of the Sierra Club leaped into the lift.

"Down," he whispered. "Down! Quick."

"Surely a sport like you 's not afraid, Mr. Allister," said the elevator hoy, reproachfully.

"No,—oh, no!" hastily replied Hall.

"I'll be howled!" remarked the manipulator of the lift, in describing the scene, subsequently. "If the post-master had a-made them shoots large enough, damme if Judge McAllister wouldn't have come down head first!"

Some men pride themselves on their mechanical genius and believe they can save vast sums by performing various trivial jobs themselves rather than by the employment of regular artisans. Of such is Charles L. Pierce, the commission merchant. He takes great pride in his Oakland home and spends all his leisure hours in its adornment. He promised, a week ago, to paint the kitchen linoleum, but deferred the task from day to day, until his wife lost patience and declared he had no intention of attending to it. This insinuation put Pierce on his mettle.

"I will do it to-night," he solemnly affirmed.

"But you forget we are going to that reception," he was reminded.

"After we return, I was about to add," concluded Pierce, who had forgotten the reception.

About half-past twelve that night, Pierce came home, took off his swallow tail coat, turned up his trousers at the bottom, and set to work. The undertaking was more elaborate than he had anticipated and the commission merchant splashed away at the paint pot, while the clock kept on striking. It was after three before he had finished, and meanwhile half asleep, he had stumbled over the paint pot, covered his patent leathers with the drab coloring, ruined his dress trousers, and, he was afterwards informed, made a very poor job of the linoleum. Pierce arrived at his office at eleven o'clock on the following morning. He hopes the paint will wear off his hands and wrists, and, next time he will give the painter a chance.

It is a far cry from the great railroad strike at Sacramento in 1894 to the arrest of Leader Fanciulli of the Marine Band on Decoration Day at Washington, D. C.; but the New York Sun of the 6th inst., connects these two incidents by the free use of Lieutenant Draper, now stationed at the National Capital. The Sun's Washington correspondent, must have drawn the Lieutenant's thrilling part in the great strike from the lips of that "brainiest, manliest, and fairest officer in the service," as the writer pleases to describe him. Instead of being in command of "three hundred marines from Mare Island," Draper was the junior company officer, and was next to the junior in rank of five who were present for duty in Sacramento; and the lieutenant's command never exceeded forty men. The very laudatory remarks applied to Lieutenant Draper and credited to Colonel Graham by the Sun, escaped the notice of all the associates of the Lieutenant, so far as can be recalled. It is true that Draper was immortalized by the saying that "bullets are cheaper than hayonets," at Sacramento upon the occasion of a sentry's breaking his rifle. The Lieutenant, while here, failed to provoke the deep affection for himself expressed in the Sun; in fact, very much the reverse is true. It is declared, finally, that this model of modern military achievements is a "man who can whip his weight in wild-cats, or, for his rank and inches, any officer or man in the service." It is an even bet that he will find any number of them about Mare Island who would be very glad of the opportunity to represent the wildcats.

In front of the paying teller's window in the First National Bank was a long line of customers the other day, when a middle-aged man, rather the worse for wear, presented a check for $100.

"You must get some one to identify you, sir," said handsome Charlie McIntosh, who was installed at the teller's counter.

"What's the matter with the check?" asked the stranger, indignantly. "Isn't it good?"

"The check's all right, but I don't know you. You must be identified," replied McIntosh, with courteous insistence.

After various ineffectual protests, the man went out in high dudgeon, but presently returned, more unsteady than before, and again took his place in the line. When all ahead of him had transacted their business, he finally secured the place at the teller's wicket a second time.

"I tell you what I'll do, young man," he said, insinuatingly to McIntosh; "I need money, and I guess you do, too. Now, you can have that check for $75!" and he swelled with a lively sense of his own generosity.

McIntosh tried again to explain the necessity for identification. The man became furious.

"You make me tired," he snorted, in great scorn. "This is a hell of a hank!" and he hounced down the steps, hanging the door, in a frenzy of wrath.

There are few more competent critics than George Hamlin Fitch, who is a careful censor in the use of the language, and who is especially annoyed at the inferior character of much of the newspaper English which finds its way into print. Editor Fitch has a horror, too, of stereotyped phrases, and in the newsroom of the Chronicle they say that his special abominations are the use of the term "Jupiter Pluvius," and references in interior dispatches to the "jubilations of the farmers." One of his assistants recently departed on a vacation in the country.

"We have no correspondent in the neighborhood where you are going," said Fitch, "and I wish you would send us any news that transpires there."

The junior telegraph editor agreed, but during his absence the only unusual event was the heavy June rain, which, as it happened, was very welcome in the particular section in question. With special reference to the prejudices of his superior, the young newspaperman carefully compiled and sent to the Chronicle the following news item:

"Jupiter Pluvius is in evidence here, and the farmers are jubilant."

Fitch's face was a study when the dispatch was shown to him.

"Well," he said, grimly, recovering his equanimity, for he can appreciate a joke as well as any one, "that news is important, if true."

Young Henry Madison began his career as a marine insurance broker under what he deemed a peculiarly kind stroke of fortune. The gilding on his business sign was hardly dry when his first customer appeared, handing him a note from an intimate friend, to the following effect:

"Bearer is O. K., and desires some marine insurance. Good luck to you!"

Madison laughed softly to himself.

"Here's a good thing," he soliloquized, sotto voce. "They come to me a running. I guess I'll cultivate this a bit."

"Have a cigar?" he said, aloud, to his first client, producing a box of perfectos, from a secret drawer. "Take two or three," he added, for he thought he could afford to be generous.

"Been to lunch?" he asked, a moment later, after the stranger had filled his waistcoat pockets with three-for-a-half cigars. "No? Neither have I. Well, we can have a bite, and talk business afterwards."

Henry insisted upon purchasing two mellow cocktails, "family style," and subsequently played the host, with great generosity, at the best French caterer's. The young insurance broker topped off the high lunch with some yellow chartreuse, and settled the score without wincing. His commission on that prospective marine premium would compensate him amply.

As they left the restaurant, the customer, a resident of San Rafael, suggested that as he was somewhat hurried, a condition which had not previously occurred to him, Madison should telephone to an Oakland address, which he gave, for the details of the cargo to be insured. They parted with mutual expressions of esteem.

Henry paid thirty cents more for the telephone charges and learned from Black Steen hundred, Oakland, that the gentleman had ordered for his San Rafael house, eighteen pieces of sewer pipe. He desired to have the piping covered with insurance en route to Sausalito!

It did not take the young broker long to compute that the premium on this risk would be just forty-nine cents, upon which his commission would amount to nine and four-fifth cents!

Several young Englishmen, crossing the bay on Tuesday, went over on the port side of the ferry boat to take a look at the small fleet of our own White Navy, lying majestically at anchor. They discovered a stranger in the stream.

"What's that flag she's flying at her stern?" asked one.

"That?" replied Septimus de Greayer, the broker.

"You're a pretty man not to know your own flag! Why, that's the Union Jack. What did you suppose it was?"

"But I never saw a British cruiser that color?" persisted the first speaker. "They are always kept so white and clean."

"Oh, she's just up from Callao," explained De Greayer, glibly. "They'll paint her while she's in port. Besides, she isn't a cruiser. She's a sloop-of-war," and he proceeded to expatiate upon the peculiarities of British naval architecture which always served as a means of identification.

"Pardon me for correcting you," said a gentleman who overheard De Greayer's disquisition, "but that's the Japanese flag, not the British."

There is a little story behind the recent action of the Board of Regents lopping off $2000 a year from the salary of President Kellogg of the State University. Ever since his appointment, Dr. Kellogg has been paid the snug sum of $8000 per annum, $6000 being the regular remuneration for the college presidency and $2000 being an additional allowance for the entertainment of visitors on behalf of the University. But President Kellogg is a thrifty soul and being an ex-Congregational minister considered it a wicked waste to fritter away such a sum in worldly and carnal entertainment, when it could be put to so much better use. So he expended about $100 every year in giving a reception to the senior students whom he fed on thin sandwiches and weak lemonade, and in giving a few quiet "home" dinners. The remaining $1900 he applied where it would do more good,—namely, in swelling his little bank account. So the worldly regents lopped off the perquisites and Dr. Kellogg bewails his limited opportunities "for doing good."

SOCIETY

HOW thoroughly our British residents enjoyed their Jubilee festivities, neither the earthquakes nor the rain appearing to dampen their enthusiasm in the faintest degree. The Chutes were crowded during the days and nights given over to the celebrations there, and the banquet at the Palace Hotel on Monday night was a feast fit for even Royalty itself.

June, the month of roses, has been decidedly a month of weddings as well, and they seemingly increase as the days go by. The present week was ushered in with the wedding of Miss Lillie Goldstein and Isaac Wolf, which took place at the Goldstein residence, on Sutter street, amid a wealth of floral surroundings, which made beautiful the entire interior of the house. The ceremony was performed at six o'clock by the Reverend Jacob Nieto, the bridal party entering the room to the strains of the Mendelssohn wedding march. Little Stella Wolf, as ring-bearer, came first; then Miss Rosa Livingston, as maid-of-honor, attired in pink and white silk, the Misses Phoebe Wolf and Miriam Levy as bridesmaids, who wore gowns of white organdie, and then the bride, who was robed in white satin en traine, trimmed with tulle. She wore a tulle veil and wreath of orange blossoms, and carried a cluster of Bermuda lilies. Solomon Wolf was best man. After congratulations had been offered and received, the company sat down to a bridal dinner, and later the bride and groom departed on a honeymoon trip through the Southern counties.

On Monday evening the wedding of Miss Edith Smith and Arthur Bridge was solemnized at the home of the bride, on Ellis street, the ceremony being performed by the Reverend W. I. Kip, beneath a true lover's knot, which was suspended from a floral arch. There were no attendants to either bride or groom, but a handsome supper was enjoyed by the relatives and friends, of whom only a limited number was present.

One of the prettiest weddings which Oakland has seen this year was the ceremonial on Wednesday, when Miss Jessie Coleman and Harry Knowles were married at the home of the bride's mother; and in Portland, Oregon, Miss Edith Macleay and Joe Grant were united in marriage on Wednesday at the First Presbyterian Church, which was profusely decked with palms, ferns, and flowers, the Reverend Edgar Hill tying the nuptial knot. The bride, who was attended by her sister Mahel, as maid-of-honor, wore a robe of white satin covered with white chiffon; Miss Mahel's gown was of white organdie; she wore a Leghorn hat trimmed with pink and carried a bouquet of La France roses. Roderick Macleay was the groom's best man.

A very pretty wedding of last week was solemnized at the home of the bride's parents on Vallejo street, when the Reverend W. W. Bolton united in marriage Miss Mary Irene Roden and Joseph T. Monges. The ceremony was performed in a bower composed of bridal roses, over which hovered white doves holding in their beaks a true-lovers' knot of tulle; and the other floral decorations of the rooms were extremely artistic. The pretty brunette bride wore a robe of white satin trimmed with duchesse lace, a tulle veil, and carried a bouquet of orange blossoms. She was attended by her sister Bessie and Miss Sallie Charles as bridesmaids, who wore gowns of white organdie over white silk, and both carried shower bouquets of ferns and grasses. A reception and supper followed the ceremony, and the happy pair have been passing their honeymoon at Coronado.

Joe Grant, who was married to Miss Macleay at Portland, Oregon, last Wednesday, with his bride sails for Europe on Wednesday next, and as they intend to do the Continent as well as the British Isles very thoroughly, they have set October as the time of their probable return to California, when they will be warmly greeted and welcomed home.

To-morrow there will be a golden wedding anniversary celebrated at the Godchaux residence on Webster street, when Mr. and Mrs. Adolph Godchaux will receive the congratulations of their hosts of friends in San Francisco on the completion of fifty years of happy wedded life.

On Wednesday, at high noon, in the presence of the family, Miss Carrie Koshland, daughter of the late S. Koshland, was married to Mr. Emile Greenebaum, at the residence of the bride's mother on Pine street. The bride wore a beautiful gown of corded silk, with point lace trimming; and her tulle veil was held with orange blossoms. The marriage ceremony was performed by Rev. Dr. Jacob Voorsanger. After the wedding breakfast the couple left on a trip to the southern part of the State. Mr. Greenebaum is the manager of the King Morse Canning Company, and brother to Mrs. William Haas and Mrs. I. N. Walter.

This will be a gala day at Sar. Rafael, as the first paper chase of the season will take place under the leadership of Miss Warhurton and Dr. Howett. It will start from the Hotel Rafael, where this evening the first hop of the season will be given, and it promises to be a charming affair. The Hotel is now well filled with summer guests, and large additions are expected next week for the tennis tournament, which is to be held there next Saturday. General Warfield has made every arrangement for the reception and entertainment of his guests this season, and Hotel Rafael promises to be even more popular than ever. The lawn tennis tournament for the championship of the Pacific States (gentlemen's singles) will take place at the hotel, commencing on Friday, July 2d, will include Saturday and end on Monday.

Del Monte never looked more attractive than it does at present, and most of the old habitués are now there for the summer. There will be music and dancing, tennis, bathing, riding, fireworks, and feasting, etc., as a few of the holiday attractions for the guests, and as usual it is anticipated that the hotel will be filled to repletion next week.

The charms of the Santa Clara Valley are acknowledged by all who have ever been in that part of the State, and the Hotel Vendome is a most popular resort, where one can be equally happy for a day or for a month, as the case may be. Mr. and Mrs. Walter Dean have taken up their quarters there, with the intention of remaining for several weeks, and are accompanied by Miss Flora, who has just returned from an Eastern school, at which she is studying. Mrs. O. C. Pratt and her son are at the Vendome for the summer.

Great preparations are being made at Castle Crag for a proper celebration of the coming Fourth of July holiday, and it goes without saying that all the guests at the Tavern will have a jolly good time. Mr. and Mrs. J. M. Goewey, Mrs. L. S. Spencer and Miss Gertrude Goewey are among those who have selected Castle Crag for their summer quarters.

Mr. and Mrs. Downey Harvey have been visiting the Yosemite Valley this week. Mayor Phelan has been a guest at Bartlett Springs of late. Mr. and Mrs. Lloyd Tevis and Miss Breckenridge have returned from their Eastern visit, and it is probable that Mr. and Mrs. Fred Sharon will be here to spend the month of September with them at Del Monte.

The first of a series of dances was given at Blythedale on last Saturday evening, and it proved to be a most enjoyable affair. The large reception room and dining-room were thrown open, and excellent music was provided for the merry guests and their friends, many of whom were present from the city. Mrs. Gregg has made arrangements for the attendance of a pianist every Saturday light. The recent rains had washed the trees and made them a brighter green, and cleared the air and filled it with the odor of the forest about, making a beautiful place still more attractive.

On the steamship Queen, which sailed from Victoria last Thursday for the far northwest, were the members of the much-talked-of Alaska party, which had grown to unexpected proportions under the stimulating management of Messrs. Haas and Low. The party included Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Greenebaum, Miss Madelaine Bear, the Misses Jacobi, the Misses Schwabaeher, Mr. Louis Haas, Mr. Joseph Lowe, the Messrs. Hellman, from New York. Mesdames Esberg, Weil and Hellman, and their respective families, made up another pleasant party which sailed on the same ship.

On Wednesday night the friends of Mr. and Mrs. Jacob Neustadter assembled at their residence, corner Van Ness avenue and Sacramento street, to celebrate their silver wedding. A most enjoyable evening was passed, and much laughter provoked when one of the juniors of the family read a poem commenting upon several of the more important events that were experienced by the couple during the twenty-five years sail upon the sea of matrimony. Each event noted was cleverly illustrated by a large caricature.

A benefit will be given Sister Cora, in the interest of her charitable work among poor children, at the California Theatre next Thursday evening, July 1st, under the management of Frank C. Thompson, assisted by W. B. Bird-sall and E. M. Cameron. A comedy by John Kendrick Bangs will be produced by well-known amateur talent, which will be followed by singing, in which the Police chorus of thirty voices will take part. The charity is a most worthy one, and the work of Sister Cora richly deserves all possible encouragement.

St. John Lodge of Masons gave their annual banquet at the Maison Riche last Thursday evening. The banquet hall was most beautifully decorated for the occasion with palms, ferns, and flowers, and presented a brilliant appearance. The banquet was a most elaborate affair, and fully maintained the reputation of this popular restaurant.

Marshall B. Woodworth, who was Judge Morrow's private secretary when he occupied the bench in the District Court, was last Thursday selected by the Judge for a similar position in the United States Circuit Court. The compliment is a deserved one, and the promotion a source of gratification to the young man's many friends.

The Misses Tay were among the Californians who were in London for the Jubilee week, but expect to return to Paris before the end of this month. Mr. and Mrs. C. P. Huntington arrived in London early in the week from New York. Mrs. Hiteboeck and Mrs. Coit are en route to Paris, having left here for that paradise last week.

The following well-known San Franciscans were passengers for Honolulu on the Steamship Mariposa, which sailed last Thursday for the Islands and Australia: A. D. Baldwin, F. F. Baldwin, Professor and Mrs. E. E. Brown, S. Castle, Miss Eloise Castle, Mr. and Mrs. G. H. Mead and son.

Mr. Arthur Baehman, who for the past two months has been sojourning in New York, has returned home for the summer. With him come Mrs. Henry Koeh and family, who are the guests of Mr. and Mrs. B. Triest.

Major and Mrs. John A. Darling, U. S. A., retired, will leave their country home, Madrone Villa, at Rutherford, Napa County, about July 1st, to pass a month at the Tavern of Castle Crags. They will be joined there by Miss Ella Hastings and Miss Elizabeth Zane. Later on they will go to Del Monte and Bartlett Springs.

Floyd Judah and H. R. Judah, Jr., are at Upper Soda Springs, Siskiyou Co.

NOTES OF THE ARMY AND NAVY.

There has been much criticism recently by the press all over the country regarding the fact that General Nelson A. Miles, U. S. A., occupied a $500 stateroom when he crossed the Atlantic to go to Europe. It has even been asserted that he charged the War Department that amount, but the officials on guard deny this. They state that General Miles paid his fare at $100. He had selected a stateroom but when he reached the steamship it was occupied by Mrs. Abbey. She did not wish to move so the steamship company offered to General Miles the use of a deck stateroom for himself and a member of his party. This was accepted and no extra price was charged.

Why the artillery is stationed at Angel Island is a mystery. There is but one mounted gun there, a small artillery piece, that is used for the morning and evening gun. Consequently the whole command is obliged to go to either Fort Point or the Presidio for drill. The privates have a kick coming on this for it means simply a cold lunch instead of a hot one for them. It seems as if some of the old smooth bore guns in the island could be mounted for artillery drill for recruits.

Secretary Long, of the Navy, has disapproved of the findings of a recent court-martial in the case of Lieutenant Fidelio S. Carter, U. S. N., of the Independence, who was accused of sending a letter to a civilian, threatening that if the latter did not withdraw a letter which the former erroneously supposed he had sent to the Navy Department, making charges to the officers, he would have his son arrested and tried for fraudulent enlistment. The facts were proved, but the officer was acquitted by the court. In disapproving the decision, Secretary Long declares his conduct most reprehensible and unbecoming. The Secretary has no authority to order a second trial for the same alleged offense, hence Lieutenant Carter will escape unpunished.

The Monterey and Monadnock left Thursday evening for Portland, to participate in the Fourth of July celebration there. Captain William H. Whiting, U. S. N., assumed command of the Monadnock, vice Captain George W. Sumner, U. S. N. The Monterey, while at Portland, will receive the beautiful set of silver service that is the gift of the people of Oregon to the battleship Oregon. The Monterey will receive a handsome silk banner in recognition of its services.

Plans were forwarded to the Secretary of War this week for a new assembly building to be erected at the Presidio. The building will be near the present quarters, and will have a frontage of 216 feet. It will cost about $50,000, and will be two stories in height with a large assembly hall, club rooms, officers' mess, and sleeping quarters. If the plans be approved and the building erected, it will be a much needed addition to the Presidio, as the proposed concentration of forces here will make more room absolutely necessary.

Mr. Henry T. Scott, who left Washington, D. C., last Tuesday for this city, stated before leaving that he firmly believed that at least one of the new torpedo boats would be constructed at the Union Iron Works.

The Navy Department has not been at all successful in securing enlistments in the seamen branch. There are now more than 700 vacancies, with more recurring daily. The date of commissioning several vessels will have to be postponed on this account unless the Navy Department devises some scheme to overcome the existing difficulties.

The Boston, which has been at Nagasaki for some time, is expected at Yokohama in time to celebrate the glorious Fourth.

Advertisements for bids are now out for dredging the channel at Mare Island. There will be work for the contractors for at least one and one-half years. When the work is completed any vessel in the navy will be able to dock at the navy yard.

Rear Admiral George Brown, U. S. N., was retired from active service on June 19th, owing to the age limit. Recently he has been in command of the Norfolk Navy Yard.

General A. W. Greeley, U. S. A., had the middle finger of his right hand amputated last Saturday in Washington, D. C. During the past five years he has suffered from necrosis, resulting from freezing while on duty in the Arctic. He is now doing well.

Colonel Anson Mills, Third Cavalry, U. S. A., has been promoted to the rank of Brigadier General.

Captain C. V. Gridley, U. S. N., has been ordered detached from the Richmond on July 1st, and will leave here July 7th by steamer for the Asiatic Station to assume command of the Olympia now at Yokohama. He will relieve Captain J. J. Read, U. S. N., who will proceed home and then enjoy two months' leave of absence.

Commander J. G. Brown, U. S. N., has been ordered to command the Puget Sound Naval Station.

Quartermaster General George H. Weeks, U. S. A., is en route here from Washington, D. C., to make a personal inspection of all Government work now under way in and around San Francisco bay. Upon his report will depend the amount of money that will be expended for coast defense work.

Colonel William John Lyster, Ninth Infantry, U. S. A., will be retired from service on the age limit on June 27th.

Lieutenant Colonel H. E. Noyes, Second Cavalry, U. S. A., who was recently promoted to the rank of Colonel, has had his nomination objected to and is under investigation. Consequently all confirmations in the cavalry branch of the army are held up in the Senate Committee on Military Affairs awaiting the action of the committee.

Lieutenant Colonel William H. Bisbee, First Infantry, U. S. A., has been granted one month's leave of absence, after which he will join his new station.

Lieutenant Colonel Marcus P. Miller, First Artillery, U. S. A., has been promoted to the rank of Colonel of the Third Artillery.

Major Thomas H. Barry, First Infantry, U. S. A., who has been on special duty in Washington, D. C., since December 1893, has been appointed inspector of small arms practice at the Department of Columbia.

Paymaster Edwin B. Webster, U. S. N., who is now at Seattle, Wash., has been sued for divorce. He is in receipt of a salary of $2000 a year and his wife alleges that he does not contribute to her support. During the past year he has sent her only $40. She prays for $50 a month alimony.

Captain J. C. Hester, Third Artillery, U. S. A., has been promoted to the rank of Major.

Captain Lewis Smith, Third Artillery, U. S. A., has been promoted to the rank of Major of the Fourth Artillery.

Chaplain T. A. Gill, U. S. N., has been ordered to duty at the Mare Island Navy Yard.

Lieutenant A. C. Quay, Third Artillery, U. S. A., has been promoted to the rank of Captain.

Lieutenant J. D. C. Haskins, Third Artillery, U. S. A., has been promoted to the rank of Captain.

Lieutenant Elmer W. Hubbard, Third Artillery, U. S. A., has been appointed professor of military science and tactics at the State University of Nevada, at Reno, to take effect on September 1st. He will relieve Lieutenant William R. Hamilton, Fifth Artillery, U. S. A., who will then join his battery.

Lieutenant Herbert Deakyns, Corps of Engineers, U. S. A., has been appointed a member of the California Debris Commission.

Lieutenant J. Franklin Bell, Seventh Cavalry, U. S. A., has been granted an extension of one month on his leave of absence.

Lieutenant J. F. Reynolds Landis, First Cavalry, U. S. A., has reported for duty with his regiment at Fort Riley, Kansas.

Lieutenant Delamere Skerrett, Fifth Artillery, U. S. A., has been promoted to the rank of Captain of the Third Artillery.

Lieutenant Charles W. Hobbs, Third Artillery, U. S. A., has been promoted to the rank of Captain.

Second Lieutenant Archibald Campbell, Third Artillery, U. S. A., has been promoted to the rank of First Lieutenant.

Additional Second Lieutenant Clarence H. McNeil, First Artillery, U. S. A., has been promoted to the rank of Second Lieutenant of the Fifth Artillery.

Ensign F. Boughter, U. S. N., has been detached from the Thetis, ordered home and granted two months' leave of absence.

INSURANCE

THE United States Casualty Company has reinsured its entire burglar policies with the Fidelity and Casualty Company, and will abandon that branch of the business. This leaves the field practically in the hands of the latter company in the Western field, as the New England Burglar Insurance Company now confines its operations to the country lying east of the Missouri river.

Insurance Commissioner Clunie is stirring up the Assessment Companies. He has discovered that with one exception—the Fidelity Mutual Aid—none of the policies issued by them have the assessment clause defined as required by law. The plain intent of the language of these policies is to befog the insured so that he hardly knows what his policy does mean.

The New York Life has sued the Pittsburg Dispatch for $100,000 for libel. The Dispatch declared that one Diston took out $600,000 insurance, dying two days later, the tenor of the article being to the discredit of the company. The facts are that the insurance policy was for $135,000, taken out in 1880, and the company paid the loss four days before the publication of the criticism.

Glasgow, Scotland, is to have another big fire insurance company, with a capital of $5,000,000.

London now has an umbrella insurance company, with a capital of $50,000, to insure the return of umbrellas, canes, etc., when lost, strayed or stolen.

George Ingraham has been elected Vice President and Wm. H. Wright Secretary of the Phenix of Brooklyn.

The Providence-Washington received $100,000 cash in its recent reinsurance deal with the Norwood.

U. B. Wilson and Daniel Porter have been sued for libel by Chas. Markwardt, of Denver. Porter and Wilson charged Markwardt with having set fire to his house.

G. M. Stolp has returned from a trip to the East.

General R. H. Magill has been appointed Special Agent of the British America and Western Insurance Companies. Max A. Wesondonck, Special Director of the Germania Life, is visiting the Coast.

Henry F. Gordon will hereafter represent the Sun Insurance Company in Oakland.

Tom C. Grant, of the North British and Mercantile, has returned from a vacation trip.

E. W. Carpenter, one of the best known insurance men of this Coast, has just got back from a voyage around the world.

Chas. D. Haven, manager of the Liverpool and London and Globe, accompanied by his wife, is taking a vacation in Mexico.

The British America and Western Assurance Companies of Toronto have withdrawn from the local Insurance Board; the Westbester has also withdrawn and will probably abolish its Coast management, reporting to Chicago. A number of other companies have notified the Board of their intention to resign.

Owing to the recently enacted insurance laws of the State of Washington, all the compacts of local agencies in that territory have been abolished.

Deputy Insurance Commissioner Robrer, who has held his position for the past twenty years, will be retained by Commissioner Clunie.

Bicycle companies are being organized and failing throughout the Coast with the utmost facility.

The Pacific Mutual Life expects to have all its recent additional capital stock of $100,000 taken before December 1st.

P. B. Armstrong last week made application to the Attorney-General for the removal of the officers, trustees, and directors of the Mutual Fire, on the ground that they have violated the law in running a mutual company as a stock corporation.
